In the same way, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person’s mind, and knows that this person has accomplished wholesome qualities and accomplished unwholesome qualities. Later the Tathāgata again uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe this person’s mind, and knows that this person’s wholesome qualities have ceased and his unwholesome qualities have arisen. [Although] this person’s wholesome qualities have ceased and his unwholesome qualities have arisen, a remainder of his wholesome roots has not been cut off, [yet] they certainly will be cut off in the future. Thus this person is of a nature to decline and regress. Ānanda, this is what is called the Tathāgata’s great knowledge of people’s faculties. This is how the Tathāgata correctly knows the roots of all qualities.

Again, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person’s mind, [realizing,] “I do not see in this person any pure quality at all, not even amounting to a single hair. This person is definitely filled with evil and unwholesome defiling qualities. These are the roots of future becoming, resulting in trouble and suffering, the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death. On the breaking up of the body at death, such a person will certainly go to a bad realm of existence and be reborn in hell.”

Ānanda, it is like seeds of grain that are spoiled and damaged, rotten and broken, harmed by wind and heat, not having been stored safely in autumn. If a householder sows these seeds in a barren field, does not tend them well, and the rains are not timely, what do you think, Ānanda: will those seeds grow and thrive?

Venerable Ānanda replied, “They will not, World-honored One.”

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person's mind, [realizing,] "I do not see in that person any pure quality at all, not even amounting to a single hair. That person is definitely filled with evil and unwholesome defiling qualities. These are the roots of future becoming, resulting in trouble and suffering, the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death. On the breaking up of the body at death, such a person will certainly go to a bad realm of existence and be reborn in hell." Ānanda, this is what is called the Tathāgata's great knowledge of people's faculties. This is how the Tathāgata correctly knows the roots of all qualities.

At this Venerable Ānanda extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said, "The World-honored One has now explained three types of person in this way. Could he also explain the [corresponding] other three types of person?"

The World-honored One said:

602a He can explain them. Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person's mind, and knows that this person has accomplished unwholesome qualities and accomplished wholesome qualities. Later the Tathāgata again uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe this person's mind, and finds that this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen. [Although] this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen, a remainder of his unwholesome roots has not been cut off, and from these unwholesome roots the unwholesome can grow back again. In this way this person is of a nature to decline and regress.<sup>327</sup>

Ānanda, it is as with a fire that has just begun burning, when only a single tongue of flame is burning, and then someone feeds it with dry grass or dead wood. What do you think, Ānanda: will that fire increase and flare up?

Venerable Ānanda replied, "It will, World-honored One."

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person's mind, and knows that this person has accomplished unwholesome qualities and accomplished wholesome qualities. Later the Tathāgata again uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe this person's mind, and finds that this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen. [Although] this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen, a remainder of his unwholesome roots has not yet been cut off, and from these unwholesome roots the unwholesome can grow back again. In this way this person is of a nature to decline and regress. Ānanda, this is what is called the Tathāgata's great knowledge of people's faculties. This is how the Tathāgata correctly discerns the roots of all qualities.

Again, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person's mind, and knows that this person has accomplished unwholesome qualities and accomplished wholesome qualities. Later the Tathāgata again uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe this person's mind, and finds that this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen. [Although] this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen, a remainder of his unwholesome roots has not been cut off, [yet] they will certainly be cut off in the future, and in this way this person will be of a nature to attain purity.

Ānanda, it is just as when a fire has burned down to just one tongue of flame and someone comes and puts it on level clear ground or places it on a rock. What do you think, Ānanda: will that fire increase and flare up?

Venerable Ānanda replied, "It will not, World-honored One."

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person's mind, and knows that this person has accomplished unwholesome qualities and accomplished wholesome qualities. Later the Tathāgata again uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe this person's mind, and finds that this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen. [Although] this person's unwholesome qualities have ceased and his wholesome qualities have arisen, a remainder of his unwholesome roots has not been cut off, [yet] they certainly will be cut off in the future, and in this way this person gains in pure qualities. Ānanda, this is what is called the Tathāgata's great knowledge of people's faculties. This is how the Tathāgata correctly discerns the roots of all qualities.

602b Again, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person's mind, and sees that this person does not have even a small amount of black karma, not even amounting to a single hair. This person is definitely full of wholesome qualities, which give happiness and bring happy results, and will certainly lead to his being reborn in a good realm of existence and attaining a long life [there]. A person like this will certainly attain final nirvana in this very life.

Ānanda, it is just as when burning coals have long gone out and become cold, yet someone feeds them with dry grass or lots of dead wood. What do you think, Ānanda: will those dead coals begin burning again?

Venerable Ānanda replied, "They will not, World-honored One."
[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, Ānanda, the Tathāgata uses the knowledge of the minds of others to observe another person's mind, and sees that this person does not have even a small amount of black karma, not even amounting to a single hair. This person is completely full of wholesome qualities, which give happiness and bring happy results, and will certainly lead to his being reborn in a good realm of existence and attaining a long life [there]. A person like this will certainly attain final nirvana in this very life. Ānanda, this is what is called the Tathāgata's great knowledge of people's faculties. This is how the Tathāgata correctly knows the roots of all qualities.

Ānanda, of the three types of person I described earlier, the first gains in pure qualities, the second is of a nature to decline and regress, and the third, on the breaking up of the body at death, will certainly go to a bad realm of existence and be reborn in hell. Of the three types of person I described later, the first is of a nature to decline and regress, the second gains in pure qualities, and the third will attain final nirvana in this very life.<sup>328</sup>

Ānanda, I have now explained to you the great knowledge of people's faculties. What a teacher should do for his disciples out of great compassion, mercy, sympathy, and concern, seeking their benefit and welfare, seeking their safety and well-being—that I have now done. All of you should do your part. Go sit in meditation and contemplation in a secluded place, on a mountain, in a forest, at the base of a tree, in an empty and quiet place. Do not be negligent. Make diligent efforts, lest you regret it later. This is my instruction; this is my teaching.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

113. The Discourse on the Root of all Phenomena<sup>329</sup>

602c

Thus have I heard. At one time, the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

If heterodox practitioners ask you, "What is the root of all phenomena?", you should answer them in this way, "All phenomena have desire as their root."

If they ask further, "What connects all phenomena?", you should answer in this way, "Contact connects all phenomena."

If they ask further, "From what do they come?", you should answer in this way, "They come from feelings."

If they ask further, "Because of what do they exist?", you should answer in this way, "They exist because of intentions and perceptions."

If they ask further, "What is their leader?", you should answer in this way, "Mindfulness is their leader."

If they ask further, "What is foremost among them?", you should answer in this way, "Concentration is foremost among them."

If they ask further, "What is supreme among them?", you should answer in this way, "Wisdom is supreme among them."

If they ask further: "What is their true [essence]?" you should answer in this way: "Liberation is their true [essence]."

If they ask further, “What is their culmination?”, you should answer in this way, “Nirvana is their culmination.”

Thus, monks, desire is the root of all phenomena, contact connects them, they come from feelings, they exist because of intentions and perceptions, mindfulness is their leader, concentration is foremost among them, wisdom is supreme among them, liberation is their true [essence], and nirvana is their culmination.

Therefore, monks, you should train in this way:<sup>330</sup> practice the mental attitude of [one who has] gone forth to train in the path, practice the perception of impermanence, practice the perception of dukkha in impermanence, practice the perception of not-self in dukkha, practice the perception of impurity, practice the perception of the repulsiveness of food, practice the perception of not delighting in the entire world, practice the perception of death.

Knowing likes and dislikes in regard to the world, practice perceiving them like this in the mind. Knowing the arising and existence of the world, practice perceiving it like this in the mind. Knowing, as it really is, the world’s arising and ceasing, its attraction, its peril, and the escape from it, practice perceiving it like this in the mind.

If a monk is able to practice the mental attitude of [one who has] gone forth to train in the path, then he is able to practice the perception of impermanence, to practice the perception of dukkha in impermanence, to practice the perception of not-self in dukkha, to practice the perception of impurity, to practice the perception of the repulsiveness of food, to practice the perception of not delighting in the entire world, and to practice the perception of death.

Knowing likes and dislikes in regard to the world, he is able to practice perceiving them like this in the mind; knowing the arising and existence of the world, he is able to practice perceiving it like this in the mind. If, knowing as it really is, the world’s arising, its ceasing, its attraction, its peril, and the escape from it, he is able to practice perceiving it like this in the mind, then such a monk is said to have abandoned craving and removed the fetters. Having rightly known and rightly contemplated all phenomena, he has attained the end of dukkha.

603a Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

114. The Discourse on Uddaka [Rāmaputta]<sup>331</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time, the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

In assemblies Uddaka Rāmaputta often spoke like this, "In this lifetime I have contemplated this and realized this. Not knowing the root of the tumor, I have subsequently come to know fully the root of the tumor."<sup>332</sup>

Uddaka Rāmaputta was not omniscient yet he claimed to be omniscient;<sup>333</sup> he had not actually realized but claimed to have realized.

Uddaka Rāmaputta had this view and taught like this, "Existence is an illness, a tumor, a thorn. Those who advocate nonperception are foolish. Those who have realized [know]: this is tranquil, this is sublime, namely attaining the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception."

He delighted in his own identity and clung to his own identity. Attached to his own identity, he practiced attaining the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. On the breaking up of the body at death, he was reborn among the devas of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. When his life span there is exhausted he will return to this world and be reborn as a lowly person.<sup>334</sup>

As to this, a monk [in my dispensation] might rightly say, "In this lifetime I have contemplated this and realized this. Not knowing the root of the tumor, I have subsequently come to know fully the root of the tumor."

For a monk, what is right contemplation? A monk knows the six bases of contact, knows their arising, knows their passing away, knows their attraction, knows their peril, and knows the escape from them. He knows [this] with wisdom, as it really is. For a monk this is called right contemplation.

For a monk, what is realization? A monk knows the three [types of] feeling, knows their arising, knows their passing away, knows their attraction, knows their peril, and knows the escape from them. He knows this with wisdom, as it really is. For a monk, this is called right realization.<sup>335</sup>

For a monk, what is not knowing the root of the tumor but subsequently coming to know fully the root of the tumor? A monk knows that craving can be brought to cessation and pulls it out by its roots completely, so that it does not arise again. For a monk, this is called not knowing the root of the tumor but subsequently coming to know fully the root of the tumor.

As to the tumor, this is the body, with its coarse form made of the four elements, born of father and mother, to be nourished by food and drink, to be covered by clothing and blankets, to be massaged and bathed, having to endure being mishandled—it is impermanent by nature, of a nature to deteriorate and fall apart. This is called the tumor.

As to the root of the tumor, this is the threefold craving.<sup>336</sup> Craving for sensual pleasures, craving for form, and craving for the formless: these are called the root of the tumor.

As to the taints of the tumor, these are the six bases of sense contact. The taint [related to] the eye on seeing forms, the taint [related to] the ear on hearing sounds, the taint [related to] the nose on smelling odors, the taint [related to] the tongue on tasting flavors, the taint [related to] the body on experiencing tangibles, the taint [related to] the mind on knowing mental objects: these are called the taints of the tumor.

603b

Monks, I have taught you about the tumor, and about the root of the tumor.<sup>337</sup> What a teacher should do for his disciples out of great compassion, mercy, sympathy, and concern, seeking their benefit and welfare, seeking their safety and well-being, that I have now done. You too should do your part. Go sit in meditation and contemplation in a secluded place, on a mountain, in a forest, at the base of a tree, in an empty and quiet place. Do not be negligent. Make diligent efforts, lest you regret it later. This is my instruction; this is my teaching.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

115. The Discourse with the Simile of the Honeyball<sup>338</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu.

Then the World-honored One, at dawn, when the night was over, having put on his robes and taken his bowl, went into Kapilavatthu to beg for almsfood. After having partaken of the midday meal, he put away his robe and bowl and washed his hands and feet. With his sitting mat over his shoulder he went to a Sakyan shrine in a bamboo grove. Entering the great forest, he spread his mat under a tree and sat down cross-legged.

Then the Sakyan Daṇḍapāṇi, leaning on a staff, came by on his afternoon walk. He approached the Buddha and they exchanged greetings. Leaning on his staff, he stood before the Buddha and asked the World-honored One, “Renunciant Gotama, what is the basis of your dispensation? What do you teach?”

The World-honored One answered:

Sakyan, [my teaching] is not to quarrel with anyone in the entire world—devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas—to practice the pure holy life secluded from sensual desires,<sup>339</sup> abandon hypocrisy, cut off worries, and not be attached to existence, nonexistence, or nonperception. This is the basis of my dispensation, this is what I teach.

When the Sakyan Daṇḍapāṇi heard what the Buddha said, he neither agreed nor disagreed. Shaking his head, the Sakyan Daṇḍapāṇi left.

Not long after the Sakyan Daṇḍapāṇi had left, in the late afternoon, the World-honored One rose from sitting in meditation and went to the assembly hall. He sat on a seat prepared in front of the sangha of monks and addressed the monks:

This morning I put on my robes and took my bowl and went into Kapilavatthu to beg for almsfood. Having partaken of the midday meal, I put away my robes and bowl and washed my hands and feet. With my sitting mat over my shoulder I went to a Sakyan shrine in a bamboo grove. Entering the great forest, I spread my sitting mat under a tree and sat down cross-legged.

Then the Sakyan Daṇḍapāṇi, leaning on a staff, came by on his afternoon walk. He approached me and we exchanged greetings. Leaning on his staff, he stood before me and asked, “Renunciant Gotama, what is the basis of your dispensation? What do you teach?” I answered, “Sakyan, [my teaching] is not to quarrel with anyone in the entire world—devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas—to practice the pure holy life secluded from sensual desires, abandon hypocrisy, cut off worries, and not be attached to existence, nonexistence, or nonperception: this is the basis of my dispensation, this is what I teach.”

603c

When the Sakyan Daṇḍapāṇi heard what I said, he neither agreed nor disagreed. Shaking his head, the Sakyan Daṇḍapāṇi left.

Then one of the monks rose from his seat, arranged his robe to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, what is meant by “not to quarrel with anyone in the entire world—devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas—to practice the pure holy life secluded from sensual desires, abandon hypocrisy, cut off worries, and not be attached to existence, nonexistence, or nonperception”?

The World-honored One said:

Monk, suppose that a person, with a [corresponding] reflection as the cause, leaves the household life to train in the path. With intention and perception he practices not desiring past, future, and present phenomena, not rejoicing in them, not becoming attached to them, and not dwelling on them.<sup>340</sup>

This is called the end of dukkha, [namely, the end of] the underlying tendency to desire, the underlying tendency to hatred, the underlying tendency to existence, the underlying tendency to conceit, the underlying tendency to ignorance, the underlying tendency to views, and the underlying tendency to doubt. [This is called the end of] quarrel, resentment, flattery, deceit, false speech, divisive speech, and innumerable evil and unwholesome states—this is called the end of dukkha.

Having said this, the Buddha rose from his seat and went into his dwelling to sit in meditation. Then the monks thought:

Venerable friends, you should know that the World-honored One has risen from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having spoken about this matter in brief, without explaining its details, [namely,] “Suppose that a person, with a [corresponding] reflection as the cause, leaves the household life to train in the path. With intention and perception he practices not desiring past, future, and present phenomena, not rejoicing in them, not becoming attached to them, and not dwelling on them.

“This is called the end of dukkha, [namely, the end of] the underlying tendency to desire, the underlying tendency to hatred, the underlying tendency to existence, the underlying tendency to conceit, the underlying tendency to ignorance, the underlying tendency to views, and the underlying tendency to doubt. [This is called the end of] quarrel, resentment, flattery, deceit, false speech, divisive speech, and innumerable evil and unwholesome states—this is called the end of dukkha.”

They further thought, “Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?” They further thought:

Venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. Venerable Mahākaccāna would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief. Venerable friends, let us together approach Venerable Mahākaccāna and request him to explain this matter. As Venerable Mahākaccāna explains it, so we will remember it well.

Thereupon the monks approached Venerable Mahākaccāna. Having 604a exchanged greetings, they stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

Venerable Mahākaccāna, please know that the World-honored One rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having spoken on this matter in brief without explaining the details, [namely,] “Monks, suppose that a person, with a [corresponding] reflection as the cause, leaves the household life to train in the path. With intention and perception he practices not desiring past, future, and present phenomena, not rejoicing in them, not becoming attached to them, and not dwelling on them.

“This is called the end of dukkha, [namely the end of] the underlying tendency to desire, the underlying tendency to hatred, the underlying tendency to existence, the underlying tendency to conceit, the underlying tendency to ignorance, the underlying tendency to views, and the underlying tendency to doubt. [This is called the end of] quarrel, resentment, flattery, deceit, false speech, divisive speech, and innumerable evil and unwholesome states—this is called the end of dukkha.”

Then we had this thought, “Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?” We further thought, “Venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. Venerable Mahākaccāna would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief.” May Venerable Mahākaccāna, out of compassion, teach us in detail!

Then Venerable Mahākaccāna said:

Venerable friends, listen while I tell you a simile. On hearing a simile wise people understand the meaning. Venerable friends, it is as if a man wishing to obtain heartwood, searches for it. In search of heartwood he enters the forest, carrying an axe. He sees a great tree possessing roots, branches, joints, twigs, leaves, flowers, and heartwood. That man does not take hold of the roots, branches, joints, and heartwood but only takes hold of the twigs and leaves.

Venerable friends, what you have said is just like that. The World-honored One was present yet you left him and come to ask me about this matter. Why is that? Venerable friends, you should know that the World-honored One is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. The teaching of this right meaning, the revelation of all meaning, comes from the World-honored One. Venerable friends, you should have approached the World-honored One himself to ask about this matter, saying, “World-honored One, how is this? What is the meaning of this?” As the World-honored One taught it, so, venerable friends, you should have remembered it.

Then the monks said:

Yes, indeed, Venerable Mahākaccāna, the World-honored One is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. The teaching of this right meaning, the revelation of all meaning, comes from the World-honored One. We should have approached the World-honored One to ask about this matter, saying, “World-honored One, how is this? What is the meaning of this?” As the World-honored One taught it, so we should have remembered it well.

However, Venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. Venerable Mahākaccāna will be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One said in brief. May Venerable Mahākaccāna explain it in detail, out of compassion!

604b

Venerable Mahākaccāna addressed the monks:

Venerable friends, listen together to what I say. Venerable friends, in dependence on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. The coming together of these three things is contact. In dependence on contact there is feeling. If there is feeling, there is perception; if there is perception, there is intention; if there is intention, there is thought; if there is thought, there is differentiation.<sup>341</sup> A monk, having gone forth to train in the path with such a [corresponding] reflection as the cause, with intention and perception practices not desiring past, future, and present phenomena, not rejoicing in them, not becoming attached to them, and not dwelling on them.

This is called the end of dukkha, [namely, the end of] the underlying tendency to desire, the underlying tendency to hatred, the underlying tendency to existence, the underlying tendency to conceit, the underlying tendency to ignorance, the underlying tendency to views, and the underlying tendency to doubt. [This is called the end of] quarrel, resentment, flattery, deceit, false speech, divisive speech, and countless evil and unwholesome states—this is called the end of dukkha.

In the same way for the ear . . . nose . . . tongue . . . body . . . in dependence on the mind and mental objects, mind consciousness arises. The coming together of these three things is contact. In dependence on contact there is feeling. If there is feeling, there is perception; if there is perception, there is intention; if there is intention, there is thought; if there is thought, there is differentiation. A monk, having gone forth to train in the path with such a [corresponding] reflection as the cause, with intention and perception practices not desiring past, future, and present phenomena, not rejoicing in them, not becoming attached to them and not dwelling on them.

This is called the end of dukkha, [namely, the end of] the underlying tendency to desire, the underlying tendency to hatred, the underlying tendency to existence, the underlying tendency to conceit, the underlying tendency to ignorance, the underlying tendency to views, and the underlying tendency to doubt. [This is called the end of] quarrel, resentment, flattery, deceit, false speech, divisive speech, and countless evil and unwholesome states—this is called the end of dukkha.

Venerable friends, without the eye, without forms, and without eye consciousness, the existence of contact and the manifestation of contact for a monk are not possible. If contact does not manifest, the existence of feeling and the manifestation of feeling are not possible. If feeling does not manifest, the existence and manifestation of thought, intention, and perception of a practitioner, gone forth and training in the path, are not possible. In the same way for the ear . . . nose . . . tongue . . . body . . . without the mind, without mental objects, without mind consciousness, the existence of contact and the manifestation of contact are not possible. If contact does not manifest, the existence of feeling and the manifestation of feeling are not possible. If feeling does not manifest, the existence and manifestation of thought, intention, and perception of a practitioner, gone forth and training in the path, are not possible.<sup>342</sup>

[On the other hand], venerable friends, because of the eye, because of forms, because of eye consciousness, the existence of contact and the manifestation of contact for a monk are certainly possible. If contact manifests, the existence of feeling and the manifestation of feeling are certainly possible. If feeling manifests, the existence and manifestation of thought, intention, and perception of a practitioner, gone forth and training in the path, are certainly possible. In the same way for the ear . . . nose . . . tongue . . . body . . . because of the mind, because of mental objects, because of mind consciousness, the existence of contact and the manifestation of contact are certainly possible. If contact manifests, the existence of feeling and the manifestation of feeling are certainly possible. If feeling manifests, the existence and manifestation of thought, intention, and perception of a practitioner, gone forth and training in the path, are certainly possible.

Venerable friends, the World-honored One rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having spoken on this matter in brief without explaining the details, [thus:] “Monks, suppose that a person, with a [corresponding] reflection as the cause, leaves the household life to train in the path. With intention and perception he practices not desiring past, future, and present phenomena, not rejoicing in them, not becoming attached to them, and not dwelling on them.

604c

“This is called the end of dukkha, [namely, the end of] the underlying tendency to desire, the underlying tendency to hatred, the underlying tendency to existence, the underlying tendency to conceit, the underlying tendency to ignorance, the underlying tendency to views, and the underlying tendency to doubt. [This is called the end of] quarrel, resentment, flattery, deceit, false speech, divisive speech, and countless evil and unwholesome states—this is called the end of dukkha.”

What the World-honored One spoke of only in brief without explaining the details, I have explained in detail in this way, employing these phrases and words. Venerable friends, approach the Buddha and set out [my explanation] in full [to him]. As the World-honored One explains its meaning, venerable friends, you should remember it!

Then, having heard what Venerable Mahākaccāna had said, bearing well in mind [how] to recite it, the monks rose from their seats, circumambulated Venerable Mahākaccāna three times, and left. They approached the Buddha. Having paid homage to him, they stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, the instruction that the World-honored One gave in brief without explaining its meaning in detail, after which he rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation—Venerable Mahākaccāna has explained it to us in detail employing these phrases and words.

Having heard this, the World-honored One expressed praise:

It is well, it is well! My disciple is endowed with the eye, with knowledge, with Dharma, with meaning. Why is that? [Because] in regard to this matter which the teacher taught to his disciples in brief, without explaining its details, that disciple has taught it in detail employing these phrases and words. You should remember it like this, [just] as the monk Mahākaccāna has taught it. Why is that? According to this explanation, so you should contemplate the meaning.

Monks, it is as if someone, due to dwelling in a secluded place, in the mountains or a forest, were to suddenly obtain a ball of honey. Whichever part of it he eats, he gets the taste of it. In the same way, a clansman in my true Dharma and discipline, whichever part of it he contemplates, he gets the taste of it: Contemplating the eyes he gets the taste, contemplating the ears . . . nose . . . tongue . . . body . . . contemplating the mind he gets the taste.<sup>343</sup>

At that time Venerable Ānanda was fanning the Buddha. Then Venerable Ānanda extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said, “World-honored One, what is the name of this teaching? How should we remember it?”

The World-honored One said, “Ānanda, the name of this teaching is ‘the simile of the honeyball.’ Thus you should remember it.”

Then the World-honored One told the monks:

605a Having received this teaching with the simile of the honeyball, you should learn it and recite it. Why is that? Monks, the teaching with the simile of the honeyball is meaningful. It is the root of the holy life. It leads toward the path,<sup>344</sup> toward awakening, toward nirvana. If clansmen shave off their hair and beards, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to practice the path, they should remember well this simile of the honeyball.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

116. The Discourse Spoken to Gotamī<sup>345</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time, the Buddha was staying among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu in the Nigrodhārāma, where he spent the rains retreat with a large number of monks.

At that time Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī went to the Buddha, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet, stood back to one side, and said:

World-honored One, are women able to attain the fourth fruit of a renunciant? Will women therefore be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline?<sup>346</sup>

The World-honored One told her:

Desist! Desist, Gotamī! Do not think this: “Women will be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline.” Gotamī, shave off your hair like this, wear the yellow robe, and for the rest of your life practice the holy life in purity.

At this, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, having been refused by the Buddha, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

At that time the monks were mending the Buddha’s robes, [thinking,] “The World-honored One will soon end his rains retreat among the Sakyans. The robes are mended and the three months have passed. [Soon] he will collect his robes, take his bowl, and wander among the people.”

Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī heard that the monks were mending the Buddha’s robes [thinking,] “The World-honored One will soon end his rains retreat among the Sakyans. The robes are mended and the three months have passed. [Soon] he will collect his robes, take his bowl, and wander among the people.” Having heard this, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī went to the Buddha, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet, stood back to one side, and said:

World-honored One, are women able to attain the fourth fruit of a renunciant? Will women therefore be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline?

The World-honored One again told her:

Desist! Desist, Gotamī! Do not think this: “Women will be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline.” Gotamī, shave off your hair like this, wear the yellow robe, and for the rest of your life practice the holy life in purity.

605b

At this Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, having again been refused by the Buddha, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

Then the World-honored One concluded his rains retreat among the Sakyans. The robes had been mended and the three months had passed. He gathered up his robes, took his bowl, and went journeying among the people.

Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, accompanied by some elder women of the Sakyan clan, followed in pursuit of the Buddha, who traveled in stages until he arrived at Nāḍika and stayed in the Giṇḍakāvasatha Hall.<sup>347</sup>

At that time Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī went to the Buddha, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet, stood back to one side and said:

World-honored One, are women able to attain the fourth fruit of a renunciant? Will women therefore be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline?

A third time the World-honored One told her:

Desist! Desist, Gotamī! Do not think this: “Women will be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline.” Gotamī, shave off your hair like this, wear the yellow robe, and for the rest of your life practice the holy life in purity.

Thereupon Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, having been refused by the Buddha for a third time, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

Then Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī stood outside the entrance crying in great sorrow, all covered in dirt, her bare feet muddied and soiled [from the journey]. Venerable Ānanda, on seeing Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī standing outside crying in great sorrow, all covered in dirt, her bare feet muddied and soiled, asked, “Gotamī, why are you standing outside the entrance crying in great sorrow, all covered in dirt, your bare feet muddied and soiled?”

Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī answered, “Venerable Ānanda, [it is because] women are not allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline.”

Venerable Ānanda said, “Gotamī, wait here. I will go to the Buddha to speak to him about this matter.”

Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī said, “Yes indeed, Venerable Ānanda.”

Thereupon, Venerable Ānanda went to the Buddha [and] paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet. He extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said:

605c World-honored One, are women able to attain the fourth fruit of a renunciant? Will women therefore be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline?

The World-honored One told him:

Desist! Desist, Ānanda! Do not think this: “Women will be allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline.” Ānanda, if women are allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, the holy life will not last long. Ānanda, it is just as in a family with many females and few males: will this family prosper?

Venerable Ānanda said, “No, World-honored One.”

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, Ānanda, if women are allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, the holy life will not last long.

Ānanda, it is just as in rice fields and wheat fields: if weeds grow, the fields will be ruined. In the same way, Ānanda, if women are allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, the holy life will not last long.<sup>348</sup>

Venerable Ānanda said further:

World-honored One, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī has greatly benefited the World-honored One. Why is that? After the World-honored One’s mother died, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī raised the World-honored One.<sup>349</sup>

The World-honored One said:

It is like this, Ānanda, it is like this, Ānanda. Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī greatly benefited me; she raised me after my mother died. But, Ānanda, I have also greatly benefited Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī. Why is that?

Ānanda, because of me Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī took refuge in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, has no doubts about these three things worthy of respect, and [has no doubts about the four truths of] dukkha, its arising, its ending, and the path. She is accomplished in faith, upholds the precepts, has wide knowledge, is accomplished in giving, and has attained wisdom. She refrains from killing, having abandoned killing. She refrains from taking what is not given, having abandoned taking what is not given. She refrains from sexual misconduct, having abandoned sexual misconduct. She refrains from false speech, having abandoned false speech. She refrains from intoxicants, having abandoned intoxicants.

Ānanda, if because of another person, someone takes refuge in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, has no doubts about these three things worthy of respect, and [has no doubts about the four truths of] dukkha, its arising, its ending, and the way to it, is accomplished in faith, upholds the precepts, has wide knowledge, is accomplished in giving, and has attained wisdom; [if that person] refrains from killing, having abandoned killing; refrains from taking what is not given, having abandoned taking what is not given; refrains from sexual misconduct, having abandoned sexual misconduct; refrains from false speech, having abandoned false speech; refrains from intoxicants, having abandoned intoxicants—then, Ānanda, even if one were to make offerings to that person with clothes and blankets, food and drink, beds and bedding, and medicine, all the requisites of life, for the rest of one's life, one could not repay this favor.

606a     Ānanda, for women I will now lay down eight rules of respect, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives. Ānanda, just as a fisherman or his apprentice may build a dike in deep water to keep the water in and not let it flow out, in the same way, Ānanda, I now lay down eight rules of respect, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives. What are these eight?

Ānanda, a nun should seek full ordination from the monks. Ānanda, this is the first rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.<sup>350</sup>

Ānanda, a nun should seek instruction every half-month from the monks. Ānanda, this is the second rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Ānanda, a nun is not allowed to spend the rains retreat in an area where there are no monks. Ānanda, this is the third rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Ānanda, when a nun has completed the rains retreat, she should ask in both assemblies about three things: seeking about what has been seen, what has been heard, and what has been suspected. Ānanda, this is the fourth rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Ānanda, if a monk has not given a nun permission to ask about the discourses, the discipline, or the Abhidharma, then that nun is not allowed to ask him about them. [Only] if he gives her permission to ask about the discourses, the discipline, or the Abhidharma is she allowed to ask. Ānanda, this is the fifth rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.<sup>351</sup>

Ānanda, a nun is not allowed to point out the transgressions of a monk but a monk is allowed to point out the transgressions of a nun. Ānanda, this is the sixth rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Ānanda, if a nun commits a serious offense (saṅghādisesa), she is to undergo penance before both assemblies for fifteen days. Ānanda, this is the seventh rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Ānanda, even if a nun has received full ordination for a hundred years she must still prostrate herself humbly before a recently ordained monk, be respectful and submissive, and greet him by extending her hands with palms together. Ānanda, this is the eighth rule of respect that I lay down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

606b

Ānanda, I lay down for women these eight rules of respect, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives. Ānanda, if Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī upholds these eight rules of respect, then this is her leaving home out of faith, going forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, obtaining full ordination, and becoming a nun.

Thereupon Venerable Ānanda, having heard what the Buddha said, received it well, retained it well, paid homage at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. He went to Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī and told her:

Gotamī, women are allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline. Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, the World-honored One has laid down for women eight rules of respect, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives. What are these eight?

Gotamī, a nun should seek full ordination from the monks. Gotamī, this is the first rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Gotamī, a nun should seek instruction every half-month from the monks. Gotamī, this is the second rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Gotamī, a nun is not allowed to spend the rains retreat in an area where there are no monks. Gotamī, this is the third rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Gotamī, when a nun has completed the rains retreat she should ask in both assemblies about three things: seeking about what has been seen, what has been heard, and what has been suspected. Gotamī, this is the fourth rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Gotamī, if a monk has not given a nun permission to ask about the discourses, the discipline, or the Abhidharma, then that nun is not allowed to ask him about them. [Only] if he has given her permission to ask about the discourses, the discipline, or the Abhidharma is she allowed to ask. Gotamī, this is the fifth rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Gotamī, a nun is not allowed to point out the transgressions of a monk but a monk is allowed to point out the transgressions of a nun. Gotamī, this is the sixth rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

606c Gotamī, if a nun commits a serious offense, she is to undergo penance before both assemblies for fifteen days. Gotamī, this is the seventh rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Gotamī, even if a nun has had full ordination for a hundred years she must still prostrate herself humbly before a recently ordained monk, be respectful and submissive, and greet him, extending her hands with palms together. Gotamī, this is the eighth rule of respect that the World-honored One has laid down for women, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives.

Gotamī, the World-honored One has laid down for women these eight rules of respect, which women may not transgress but must uphold until the end of their lives. Gotamī, the World-honored One has said this: “If Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī upholds these eight rules of respect, then this is her leaving home out of faith and going forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, obtaining full ordination, and becoming a nun.”

At this Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī said:

Venerable Ānanda, listen while I tell you a simile. The wise, on hearing a simile, understand its implication.

Venerable Ānanda, it is just as [when] a warrior woman, a brahmin woman, a householder woman, or a worker woman, beautiful and attractive, having cleansed and bathed herself and anointed her body with fragrant oils, may put on bright clean clothes, and adorn herself with necklaces made of various kinds of precious stones. Suppose someone, feeling well-disposed toward this woman and wishing to benefit her and make her happy, then gives her a wreath of lotuses, a wreath of champak flowers, a wreath of great-flowered jasmine (sumanā), a wreath of Arabian jasmine (vassikā), or a wreath of roses. That woman would rejoice and accept it with both hands and adorn her head with it.

In the same way, Venerable Ānanda, the World-honored One has laid down for women these eight rules of respect and I receive them on my head and will uphold them until the end of my life.

Then Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī went forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, obtained full ordination, and became a nun.<sup>352</sup>

At a later time, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī came to be followed and surrounded by a large assembly of nuns. Accompanied by various elder and highly regarded nuns who were known to the king, and who had practiced the holy life for a long time, she approached Venerable Ānanda.

Having paid homage to him and stood back to one side, she said:

607a Venerable Ānanda should know that these are elder and highly regarded nuns, who are known to kings, and who have practiced the holy life for a long time. There are young monks, new in the training, who have only recently gone forth and entered this true Dharma and discipline, who have begun [this practice] not long ago. We wish that those monks should be ordered to pay homage to these nuns according to their seniority, that they should show respect and reverence and greet them by extending their hands with palms together.

At this Venerable Ānanda said, “Gotamī, wait here. I will go to the Buddha and ask him about this.”

Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī said, “Certainly, Venerable Ānanda.”

Then Venerable Ānanda went to the Buddha, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet and stood back to one side. Extending his hands with palms together, he addressed the Buddha:

World-honored One, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, accompanied by various elder and highly regarded nuns who are known to kings and who have practiced the holy life for a long time, came to me today. Having paid homage at my feet and stood to one side with palms together, she said to me, “Venerable Ānanda, these elder and highly regarded nuns are known to kings and have practiced the holy life for a long time. There are young monks, new in the training, who have only recently gone forth and entered this true teaching and discipline, who have begun [this practice] not long ago. We wish that those monks should be ordered to pay homage to these nuns according to their seniority, that they should show respect and reverence and greet them by extending their hands with palms together.”

The World-honored One said:

Desist! Desist, Ānanda! Guard your words, do not speak like this! Ānanda, if you knew what I know, you would not say one word [about this], let alone speak like this.

Ānanda, if women had not been allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, then brahmins and householders would spread their clothes on the ground and say, “Diligent renunciants, walk on this! The diligent renunciants practice what is difficult to practice. Grant us long-lasting benefit and gain, peace and happiness [by stepping on these clothes]!”

Ānanda, if women had not been allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, then brahmins and householders would spread their hair on the ground and say, “Diligent renunciants, walk on this! The diligent renunciants practice what is difficult to practice. Grant us long-lasting benefit and gain, peace and happiness [by stepping on this hair]!”

Ānanda, if women had not been allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, then brahmins and householders, on seeing renunciants, would have been waiting by the wayside holding in their hands various types of food and drink, saying, “Venerable ones, accept this, eat this, take it with you and use it as you wish. Grant us long-lasting benefit and gain, peace and happiness!”

Ānanda, if women had not been allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, then faithful brahmins, on seeing diligent renunciants, would respectfully take them by the arm, lead them into their houses, and hold up various sorts of material goods to give to the renunciants, saying, “Venerable Ones, accept this, take it with you and use it as you wish! Grant us long-lasting benefit and gain, peace and happiness!”

607b

Ānanda, if women had not been allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, then even the sun and moon, endowed as they are with great spiritual powers, great virtue, great merit, great spiritual might—even they would not equal the great spiritual might of a diligent renunciant, much less would those lifeless, skinny heterodox practitioners.

Ānanda, if women had not been allowed to leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path in this true Dharma and discipline, then this true Dharma would have lasted a thousand years. Now its duration has been decreased by five hundred years; it will last only five hundred years.

Ānanda, you should know that there are five positions a woman cannot achieve. It is not possible for a woman to be a tathāgata, without attachment and fully awakened;<sup>353</sup> a wheel-turning monarch; Sakka, the ruler of the devas; King Māra; or Great Brahmā. Know that a man can achieve these five states. It is possible that a man can be a tathāgata, without attachment and fully awakened; a wheel-turning monarch; Sakka, the ruler of the devas; King Māra; or Great Brahmā.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Division 11

The [First] Great Division

117. The Discourse on Delicate [Upbringing]<sup>354</sup>

607c

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

In the past, [before] I had left the household life to practice the path, I [lived] at leisure, composed and happy, being brought up in an extremely delicate [manner]. While I was [still] living in the home of my father, Suddhodana, he built various palaces for me: a spring palace, a summer palace, and a winter palace.

To provide for my recreation, he had various kinds of flower ponds constructed not far from these palaces: flower ponds for blue lotuses, for pink lotuses, for red lotuses, and for white lotuses. In those ponds he had various water flowers planted: blue lotus, pink lotus, red lotus, and white lotus. He had them constantly supplied with water and flowers; and he had them guarded, so that no one else could gain access to them.

To provide for my recreation, he had various kinds of land-dwelling flowers planted on the banks of the ponds: great-flowered jasmine, Arabian jasmine, champak, fragrant lily, honey-scent flower, rose flower, and water lily.<sup>355</sup>

To provide for my recreation, he assigned four people to bathe me. Having bathed me, they would apply red sandalwood paste to my body. Having applied sandalwood paste to my body, they would dress me in new silk clothes, brand new from top to bottom, inside and out, surface and interior. By day and by night they constantly held a parasol over me, the Crown Prince, so that I would not be dampened by dew at night or scorched by the sun during the day.

Whereas in other, ordinary households coarse grains, wheat, bean soup, and ginger were the primary foods, within the household of my father, Suddhodana, even the lowest-ranking servants had rice and sumptuous dishes as their primary foods.

Again, meals were constantly prepared for me from game birds and beasts, the most beautiful birds and beasts—pheasant or partridge, and deer or roe—such game birds and beasts, the most beautiful birds and beasts.

I recall how, long ago, when I was [still] living in the home of my father, Suddhodana, I would go up to the main palace to spend the four months of the summer season. There were no other men there, only women for my entertainment. Once there, I had no [thought of] coming down again. When I wanted to visit parks, thirty renowned cavalymen of the best quality were selected to provide a ceremonial escort, both ahead of me and behind me, to wait on me and guide me—not to mention my other [servants]. Such was my prestige and power. So exceedingly delicate [was my upbringing].

608a I also recall how, long ago, I saw farmers resting in their fields. I went to the base of a rose-apple tree and sat down cross-legged. Secluded from sensual pleasures, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, I entered and abided in the first absorption, which is with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion.<sup>356</sup>

I thought, “Unlearned ignorant worldlings are themselves subject to disease, not exempt from disease. On seeing other people become sick, they feel disgust and slight them as undesirable and unpleasant, not observing their own [condition].”

Again, I thought, “I am myself subject to disease, not exempt from disease. If on seeing other people become sick I were to feel disgust and slight them as undesirable and unpleasant, then that would not be appropriate for me, since I too am subject to this [condition].” On my having observed in this way, the pride caused by being without sickness naturally vanished.

Again, I thought, “Unlearned ignorant worldlings are themselves subject to old age, not exempt from old age. On seeing other people become old, they feel disgust and slight them as undesirable and unpleasant, not observing their own [condition].”

Again I thought, “I am myself subject to old age, not exempt from old age. If on seeing other people become old I were to feel disgust and slight them as undesirable and unpleasant, that would not be appropriate for me, since I too am subject to this [condition].” On my having contemplated in this way, the pride caused by [youthful] age naturally vanished.<sup>357</sup>

Unlearned ignorant worldlings are proud, conceited, and become negligent due to being without disease. Due to sensual desires their ignorance grows and they do not practice the holy life. Unlearned ignorant worldlings are proud, conceited, and become negligent due to being [youthful]. Because of sensual desires their ignorance grows and they do not practice the holy life. Unlearned ignorant worldlings are proud, conceited, and become negligent due to being alive. Due to sensual desires their ignorance grows and they do not practice the holy life.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

Subject to disease, subject to old age, and subject to death.
 [Despite] being themselves similarly subject [to these],
 Worldlings view [these conditions] with disgust.
 If I were to feel disgust [at these conditions],
 [Despite] not having gone beyond them,
 That would not be appropriate for me,
 Since I too am subject to this.

One who practices like this Realizes the Dharma that [leads to] freedom from rebirth
 As for pride in being without disease,
 Youthful, and of long life.
 Eliminating all [such] pride,
 One sees the peace of dispassion.

By awakening in this way,
 One is not anxious in regard to sensual pleasures.
 Attaining the perception that there is nothing [in sensual pleasures],
 He practices the pure holy life.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

608b

118. The Discourse on the Elephant<sup>358</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī in the Eastern Park, in the Hall of Migāra’s Mother.

At that time, in the afternoon, the World-honored One rose from sitting in seclusion, came down from the hall, and said, “Udāyin, let us go together to the Eastern River to bathe.”<sup>359</sup>

Venerable Udāyin answered, “Yes.”

Then the World-honored One went to the Eastern River together with Venerable Udāyin. He took off his robes, left them on the bank, and entered the water to bathe. Having bathed, he came out, wiped his body [dry], and put on his robes.

At that time King Pasenadi had an elephant (nāga) named Sati.<sup>360</sup> It was crossing the Eastern River to the accompaniment of all kinds of entertaining music. On seeing it, the multitude said, “This is a nāga among nāgas, a great royal nāga. What is its name?”

Venerable Udāyin extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, this elephant has a massive body, and the multitude, on seeing it, say, “This is a nāga among nāgas, a great royal nāga. What is its name?”

The World-honored One said:

That is so, Udāyin. That is so, Udāyin. This elephant has a massive body, and the multitude, on seeing it, say, “This is a nāga among nāgas, a great royal nāga. What is its name?”

Udāyin, if a horse, a camel, an ox, a donkey, a serpent, a human being, or a tree has grown to have a massive bodily form, then Udāyin, the multitude, on seeing it, say, “This is a nāga among nāgas, a great royal nāga. What is its name?”

Udāyin, in this world with its devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, of anyone who does not harm [others] through [acts of] body, speech, or mind I say, “he is a nāga.”<sup>361</sup> Udāyin, in this world with its devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, the Tathāgata does not harm [others] through [acts of] body, speech, or mind. For this reason I am called a nāga.

Then Venerable Udāyin extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One! May the World-honored One enhance my inspirational power! May the Well-gone One enhance my inspirational power! Allow me, in the presence of the Buddha, to chant in praise of the World-honored One with verses related to the characteristics of a nāga!

The World-honored One said, “Do as you wish.”

Then, Venerable Udāyin, in the presence of the Buddha, praised the World-honored One with verses related to the characteristics of a nāga:

The Fully Awakened One, born among humans,
Taming himself, attained right concentration.
Practicing the holy path,
He calmed his mind and was able by himself to attain happiness.

Respected by men
For transcending all things,
He is also respected by devas
[As] one who has become an arahant, without attachment.

608c

He has gone beyond all fetters,
From being in the jungle [of fetters], he has left the jungle behind
[by attaining nirvana].<sup>362</sup>
Having discarded sensual pleasures, he delights in dispassion,
Like true gold extracted from ore.

Renowned as the Fully Awakened One,
Like the sun ascending in the sky,
[He is] supreme among all nāgas,
Like the highest summit among a multitude of mountains.

Praised as a great nāga,
He does no harm anywhere.

The nāga among all nāgas,
Truly is an unsurpassable nāga.

Gentleness and harmlessness—
These two are the nāga's [hind] legs.
Asceticism and celibacy
Are the nāga's practice.

The great nāga has faith as his trunk,
Two kinds of virtue as his tusks;
Mindfulness as his neck, and wisdom as his head,
To contemplate and analyze the teaching;

Receiving and retaining the teachings is his belly,
Delight in seclusion is his two forelegs.<sup>363</sup>
Settled well on the in- and out-breaths,
[His] mind attains perfect concentration.

The nāga remains concentrated when walking and when standing still;
When seated he is concentrated and also when lying down.
The nāga is concentrated at all times.
This is the constant state of the nāga.

He accepts food from a household that is without fault.
He does not accept it from one that is with fault.
[If] he receives food that is bad or impure,
He discards it, as a lion does.

The food that is offered to him
He accepts out of compassion for others.
The nāga, in eating the faithful offerings of others,
Maintains his life without attachment.

He has cut off all fetters, big and small,
Attained liberation from all bonds.
Wherever he travels,
His mind is not bound by any attachment.

Just as a white lotus

Is born in water and grows up nourished by water, [Yet] the muddy water cannot become attached
 To its fine fragrance and delightful form—

In the same way, the supremely Awakened One
 Was born into the world and is active in the world, [Yet] is not defiled by sensual pleasures,
 Just as the [lotus] flower to which the [muddy] water does not become attached.

It is just as a blazing fire
 Will cease burning if not supplied with fuel.
 Without fuel a fire will not continue;
 Such a fire is said to have ceased.

Wise men deliver these similes,
 Wishing their meaning to be understood.
 This is what the nāga has come to know,
 And what the nāga among nāgas teaches.

609a

Free from sexual desire and hatred,
 Having discarded ignorance and attained the [state] without taints,
 [When] the nāga abandons his body,
 This nāga is said to have ceased.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Venerable Udāyin was delighted and received it respectfully.

119. The Discourse on the Grounds for Speaking<sup>364</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's
 Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

Herein there are [just] three grounds for speaking,<sup>365</sup> not four and not five.
 If a monk has seen [something], then based on that he may speak, saying,
 "I saw it." [If he has] heard . . . recognized . . . known [something, then based on that] a monk may speak, saying, "This is what I know."

What are the three [grounds for speaking]? Based on the past a monk may speak, saying, “Like this it was in the past.” Based on the future a monk may speak, saying, “Like this it will be in the future.” Based on the present a monk may speak, saying, “Like this it is now.” These are the three grounds for speaking, not four and not five.

If a monk has seen [something], then based on that he may speak, saying, “I saw it.” [If he has] heard . . . cognized . . . known [something, then based on that] a monk may speak, saying, “This is what I know.” Since what he says is wholesome, he gains benefit. Since he does not say what is unwholesome, he gains benefit.

A disciple of the noble ones listens attentively with both ears to the Dharma. Having listened attentively with both ears to the Dharma, he abandons one factor, practices one factor, and realizes one factor. Having abandoned one factor, practiced one factor, and realized one factor, he attains right concentration.

A disciple of the noble ones, having attained right concentration of mind, then abandons all sensual passion, hatred, and ignorance. In this way a disciple of the noble ones attains liberation of the mind. Having attained liberation, he knows that he is liberated. He knows as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experience of existence.”<sup>366</sup>

Based on what a person says, there are four grounds on which one should observe him, [thinking,] “Is this venerable one fit to engage in discussion or not fit to engage in discussion?” If this venerable one does not respond definitively to a definitive argument, does not respond analytically to an analytical argument, does not respond conclusively to a conclusive argument, and does not respond with finality to a final argument, then in these ways this venerable one is not fit to engage in discussion, not fit to engage in argumentation.

If [however] this venerable one does respond definitively to a definitive argument, does respond analytically to an analytical argument, does respond conclusively to a conclusive argument, and does respond with finality to a final argument, then in these ways this venerable one is fit to engage in discussion, fit to engage in argumentation.<sup>367</sup>

609b

Again, based on what a person has said, there are a further four grounds on which one should observe him, [thinking,] “Is this venerable one fit to engage in discussion or not fit to engage in discussion?” If this venerable one is inconsistent about standpoints and their opposites, inconsistent about what is known, inconsistent about what has been explained through similes, and inconsistent about procedure, then in these ways this venerable one is not fit to engage in discussion, not fit to engage in argumentation.

If [however] this venerable one is consistent about standpoints and their opposites, consistent about what is known, consistent about what has been explained through similes, and consistent about procedure, then in these ways this venerable one is fit to engage in discussion, fit to engage in argumentation.<sup>368</sup>

Depending on what is being spoken of, he curbs his verbal activity at the [proper] time. He discards his preformed views, discards resentful states of mind, discards sensual desire, discards hatred, discards delusion, discards pride, discards obstinate silence, discards stinginess and jealousy. He does not pursue victory, does not prevail over others, and does not seize on their mistakes. He talks only about what is meaningful, about Dharma. Having talked about what is meaningful, about Dharma, and having taught it and again taught it, he himself is delighted and causes others to be delighted. Such talk about what is meaningful, such talk on [these] subjects is noble talk about what is meaningful, noble talk about [these] matters. It leads all the way to total destruction of the taints.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

If when arguing in a discussion,
The confused mind harbors cherishing and pride,
Then this is not noble; it destroys virtue,
With each seeking advantage over the other.

Just seeking to find fault with the other,
Wishing to defeat him;
Striving ever more for victory over each other—
Noble ones do not speak like this.

If he wants to be competent in discussion,
A wise one should know the [proper] timing.
With Dharma and with meaning,
This is how the noble ones discuss.

The wise speak like this:
Without dispute, without pride,
Without feelings of aversion,
Without fetters, without taints.

Compliant and unconfused,
They speak with right knowledge.
They accept what is well said,
And they themselves never speak evil.

In discussion they do not remonstrate,
And are not affected by others' remonstrations.
They know the standpoints and grounds for their speech,
This is [the way] they discuss.

Thus speak the noble ones,
The wise ones who completely get the meaning.
For happiness in the present,
And for peace in the hereafter,
You should know that an intelligent person
Speaks without bias or banality.

609c Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

120. The Discourse on a Teaching about Impermanence<sup>369</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's
Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

Form is impermanent; what is impermanent, that it is dukkha; what is dukkha, that is not-self. Feeling too is impermanent; what is impermanent, that is dukkha; what is dukkha, that is not-self. Perception too is impermanent; what is impermanent, that is dukkha; what is dukkha, that is not-self. Volitional formations too are impermanent; what is impermanent, that is dukkha; what is dukkha, that is not-self. Consciousness too is impermanent; what is impermanent, that is dukkha; what is dukkha, that is not-self. That is to say: Form is impermanent . . . feeling . . . perception . . . volitional formations . . . consciousness is impermanent; what is impermanent, that is dukkha; what is dukkha, that is not-self.

A learned noble disciple, contemplating in this way, cultivates the thirty-seven requisites of awakening with unobstructed right attention and right mindfulness<sup>370</sup> Knowing like this and seeing like this, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire, from the taint of existence, and from the taint of ignorance. Being liberated, he knows that he is liberated, and he knows as it really is: “Birth has been ended for me, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

Among existing sentient beings whatsoever—including the nine abodes of sentient beings, up to the stage beyond the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, [called] “the pinnacle of existence”—among [all of] these this is the foremost, this is the greatest, this is the victor, this is the utmost, this is the most admirable, this is the most excellent, namely: an arahant in the world. Why is that? Because an arahant in the world has attained [true] peace and happiness.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

Freedom from attachment is the foremost happiness.

[An arahant] has abandoned sensual desires, and is without craving for existence.

He has forever discarded the “I”-conceit,
Having torn asunder the net of ignorance.

He has attained imperturbability,
His mind is without defilements.

He is not defiled by attachment to the world,
Having lived the holy life and attained freedom from taints.

He understands and knows the five aggregates,
His province is the seven wholesome states.<sup>371</sup>
A great hero, he dwells in a place
That is free from all fear.

Having attained the seven treasures of awakening,
And trained in the threefold training,
He is well reputed as a superior friend,
The Buddha's supreme and true son.

He has attained the tenfold path,
A great nāga with a supremely concentrated mind.
Foremost in this world,
He is without craving for existence.

610a Unperturbed by the myriad affairs,
Liberated from future existence,
Having cut off birth, old age, disease, and death.
What was to be done is done: he has eradicated the taints.

He has generated the knowledge of one beyond training
Having made this body his last.
Equipped with the foremost holy life,
His mind is not dependent on others.

Above, below, and in all directions,
Nowhere does he find delight.
He can roar a lion's roar,
Supremely awakened in the world.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

121. The Discourse on the Invitation Ceremony (Pavāraṇā)<sup>372</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary, spending the rains retreat together with a large assembly of five hundred monks.

At that time on the fifteenth of the month, at the time of the recitation of the code of rules, at the invitation ceremony (pavāraṇā), the World-honored One sat down on a seat arranged before the assembly of monks. He addressed the monks:

I am a brahmin, having attained complete cessation. [I am] the unsurpassable King of Physicians and this present body is the last one for me. Being a brahmin, having attained complete cessation, being the unexcelled King of Physicians, and this present body being the last one for me, I say that you are my true sons, born from my mouth and transformed by the nature of the Dharma. Being my true sons, born from my mouth and transformed by the nature of the Dharma, you should through instruction transform [others, and also] teach and admonish one another.<sup>373</sup>

At that time Venerable Sāriputta was also seated among the assembly. Then Venerable Sāriputta rose from his seat, arranged his robe to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and said:

Just now the World-honored One said [this]: “I am a brahmin, having attained complete cessation. [I am] the unsurpassable King of Physicians, and this present body is the last one for me. Being a brahmin, having attained complete cessation, being the unsurpassable King of Physicians, and this present body being the last one for me, I say that you are my true sons, born from my mouth and transformed by the nature of the Dharma. Being my true sons, born from my mouth and transformed by the nature of the Dharma, you should through instruction transform [others, and also] teach and admonish one another.”

The World-honored One tames those who are not [yet] tamed, stills those who are not [yet] stilled, delivers those who are not [yet] delivered, liberates those who are not [yet] liberated, quenches those who are not [yet] quenched, brings to attainment of the path those who have not [yet] attained the path, establishes in the holy life those who are not [yet] established in the holy life. [He causes them to] know the path, awaken to the path, recognize the path, and talk about the path.

610b

From the World-honored One the disciples obtain the Dharma, receive instruction, and receive admonition. Having received instruction and admonition, following the World-honored One’s words, they then put it into practice and gain a good understanding of the true Dharma in accordance with its purport. That is so. World-honored One, is there not something to censure in my bodily, verbal, and mental conduct?

Then the World-honored One said:

Sāriputta, I do not censure your bodily, verbal, and mental conduct. Why is that? Sāriputta, you possess intelligent wisdom, great wisdom, quick wisdom, swift wisdom, sharp wisdom, wide wisdom, deep wisdom, emancipating wisdom, brightly penetrating wisdom. Sāriputta, you have achieved true wisdom.

Sāriputta, it is just as the crown prince of a wheel-turning monarch, if he does not overstep the instructions he has received but respectfully accepts what his father, the king, transmits to him, he is then able to transmit it in turn. In the same way, Sāriputta, you are able to keep turning the wheel of Dharma that I have set turning. For this reason, Sāriputta, I do not censure your bodily, verbal, and mental conduct.

Venerable Sāriputta again extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said:

That is so. The World-honored One does not censure my bodily, verbal, and mental conduct. Does the World-honored One not censure the bodily, verbal, and mental conduct of these five hundred monks?

The World-honored One said:

Sāriputta, I also do not censure the bodily, verbal, and mental conduct of these five hundred monks. Why is that? Sāriputta, these five hundred monks have all attained freedom from attachment. In them the taints have been eradicated, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, the heavy burden has been discarded, the fetter of existence has been eradicated, and they have attained the good benefit of right knowledge and right liberation.

The only exception is one monk, of whom I earlier foretold that he would, here and now, attain final knowledge, understanding as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experience of existence.”<sup>374</sup>

For this reason, Sāriputta, I do not censure the bodily, verbal, and mental conduct of these five hundred monks.

A third time Venerable Sāriputta extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said:

That is so. The World-honored One does not censure my bodily, verbal, and mental conduct, and he also does not censure the bodily, verbal, and mental conduct of these five hundred monks. World-honored One, among these five hundred monks, how many monks have attained the three higher knowledges, how many monks have attained liberation both ways, and how many monks have attained liberation by wisdom?

The World-honored One said:

Sāriputta, among these five hundred monks, ninety monks have attained the three higher knowledges, ninety monks have attained liberation both ways, and the remaining monks have attained liberation by wisdom.

Sāriputta, this assembly is without branches, without leaves, and without knots or faults. It is pure and genuine [heartwood], having become rightly established.<sup>375</sup>

At that time Venerable Vaṅgīsa was seated among the assembly. Then Venerable Vaṅgīsa rose from his seat, arranged his robe to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and said:

That is so. The World-honored One has uplifted me. May the Well-gone One [further] uplift me, so that I may, in the presence of the Buddha and the assembly of monks, utter suitable verses of praise. 610c

The World-honored One said, “Vaṅgīsa, do as you wish!”

Then in the presence of the Buddha and the assembly of monks, Venerable Vaṅgīsa uttered suitable verses of praise:

Today, on the fifteenth, the day of invitation,
An assembly of five hundred monks is seated together.
Having gotten rid of all fetters,
They are without obstructions, seers for whom [repeated] existence is ended.

Shining with pure light,
[They are] liberated from every kind of existence.
They have put an end to birth, old age, disease, and death,
Eliminated the taints, and done what had to be done.

[They] have put an end to restlessness-and-worry and the fetter of doubt,
To pride and the taint of existence,
And they have cut off the thorn that is the fetter of craving.
[Thanks to] the Highest Physician, these no longer exist.

Brave as lions,
[They] have removed all fear.
They have crossed over birth and death,
With all taints completely eradicated.<sup>376</sup>

Just as a wheel-turning monarch,
Surrounded by his many courtiers,
Rules over his entire territory,
As far as the great ocean,

In the same way, the heroic conqueror,
The unsurpassable caravan leader,
Is revered gladly by his disciples,
Who have realized the three [higher knowledges] and abandoned the fear of death.

All are sons of the Buddha,
Who have permanently removed the branches, leaves, and knots.
They pay homage to the foremost Honored One,
Who set turning the unsurpassable wheel of the Dharma.<sup>377</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

122. The Discourse at Campā<sup>378</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Campā, beside the pond of Gaggārā.

At that time, on the fifteenth of the month, at the time of the recital of the code of rules, the World-honored One sat down on a seat arranged before an assembly of monks. Having sat down, the World-honored One immediately entered a meditative concentration. By means of the knowledge of the minds of others he observed the minds of the assembly. Having observed the minds of the assembly, he sat silently until the end of the first watch of the night.<sup>379</sup>

Then a certain monk rose from his seat, arranged his robe to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, the first watch of the night has ended. The Buddha and the assembly of monks have been sitting together for a long time. 611a
May the World-honored One recite the code of rules!<sup>380</sup>

At that time the World-honored One remained silent and did not answer. Then the World-honored One remained sitting silently through the middle watch of the night. That monk again rose from his seat, arranged his robe to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, the first watch of the night has passed and the middle watch of the night is about to end. The Buddha and the assembly of monks have been sitting together for a long time. May the World-honored One recite the code of rules!

The World-honored One again remained silent. Then the World-honored One remained sitting silently through the last watch of the night.

A third time that monk rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms together towards the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, the first watch of the night has passed, the middle watch of the night has also ended, and the last watch of the night is coming to an end. It is nearly dawn. Dawn will be breaking before long. The Buddha and the assembly of monks have been sitting together for a very long time. May the World-honored One recite the code of rules!

Then the World-honored One told that monk, "Among this assembly there is one monk who is impure."

At that time Venerable Mahāmoggallāna was also seated among the assembly. Then Venerable Mahāmoggallāna thought, “About which monk does the World-honored One say that one monk in this assembly is impure? Let me enter the appropriate meditative concentration such that, through that appropriate meditative concentration I acquire the knowledge of the minds of others and can observe the minds of the assembly.”

Then Venerable Mahāmoggallāna entered the appropriate meditative concentration such that through that appropriate meditative concentration he acquired the knowledge of the minds of others and could observe the minds of the assembly. Venerable Mahāmoggallāna then knew in regard to which monk the World-honored One had said that one monk in the assembly was impure.

Thereupon Venerable Mahāmoggallāna rose from his meditative concentration, went up to that monk, pulled him by the arm, and led him out. He opened the door and sent him outside, [saying:]

Ignorant man, go far away! Don’t stay here! You can no longer participate in gatherings of the sangha. As of now you have left it. You are not a monk.<sup>381</sup>

He closed the door, locked it, and returned to the Buddha. Having paid respect with his head at the Buddha’s feet, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

I have expelled the monk about whom the World-honored One said that one monk in the assembly was impure. World-honored One, the first watch of the night has passed, the middle watch of the night has also ended, and the last watch of the night is coming to an end. It is nearly dawn. Dawn will be breaking before long. The Buddha and the assembly of monks have been sitting together for a very long time. May the World-honored One recite the code of rules!

The World-honored One said:

Mahāmoggallāna, that foolish person committed a great offense by troubling the World-honored One and the assembly of monks. Mahāmoggallāna, if the Tathāgata had recited the code of rules in an impure assembly [of monks], the head of that [impure] man would have split into seven pieces.<sup>382</sup>

For this reason, Mahāmogallāna, from now on you are to recite the code of rules [yourselves]. The Tathāgata will no longer recite the code of rules.<sup>383</sup> 611b

Why is this? It is like this, Mahāmogallāna. It may be that an ignorant man practices right comprehension when coming and going; that he is properly observant and discerning when bending, stretching, looking up, and looking down; that he has a composed manner; that he skillfully wears his outer robe and his other robes and [carries his] bowl; that he practices right comprehension when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, as well as when sleeping, waking, speaking, and keeping silent—all like a genuine practitioner of the holy life. When he approaches those who are genuinely practicing the holy life, they might not recognize [his real inner condition].

Mahāmogallāna, when his companions in the holy life come to recognize [his real inner condition], they think, “He is a pollutant among renunciants, a disgrace among renunciants, an abomination among renunciants, a thorn among renunciants.” Having recognized him [as such], they should collectively reject him. Why is that? So as not to let [him] corrupt those who are [genuinely] practicing the holy life.

Mahāmogallāna, it is just as if a householder had a good rice field or wheat field, but there were to emerge in it a kind of weed called “impure wheat,” whose roots, stem, nodes, leaves, and flowers all resembled those of [genuine] wheat. Later, once [the impure wheat] had matured, the householder would see it and think, “This is a pollutant and a disgrace to [genuine] wheat, an abomination and a thorn to [genuine] wheat.” Having recognized it, he would pull it up and throw it out [of the field]. Why is that? So as not to let it corrupt the genuine, good wheat.

In the same way, Mahāmogallāna, it may be that an ignorant man practices right comprehension when coming and going; that he is properly observant and discerning when bending, stretching, looking up, and looking down; that he has a composed manner; that he skillfully wears his outer robe and his other robes and [carries his] bowl; that he practices right comprehension when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, as well as when sleeping, waking, speaking, and keeping silent—all like a genuine practitioner of the holy life. When he approaches those who are genuinely practicing the holy life, they might not recognize [his real inner condition].

Mahāmoggallāna, when his companions in the holy life come to recognize [his real inner condition], they think, ‘He is a pollutant among renunciants, a disgrace among renunciants, an abomination among renunciants, a thorn among renunciants.’ Having recognized him [as such], they should collectively reject him. Why is that? So as not to let [him] corrupt those who are [genuinely] practicing the holy life.

Mahāmoggallāna, it is just as when a householder is winnowing the [rice] grain in autumn, the grains in the pile that are fully mature will, when tossed up, fall down again and remain there; but the grains that are not fully mature will be carried away by the wind along with the rice chaff. Seeing this, the householder takes a broom and sweeps away [the immature grains and chaff] so that [the floor] is clean. Why is that? So as not to let the remaining good clean rice be polluted.

In the same way, Mahāmoggallāna, it may be that an ignorant man practices right comprehension when coming and going; that he is properly observant and discerning when bending, stretching, looking up, and looking down; that he has a composed manner; that he skillfully wears his outer robe and his other robes and [carries his] bowl; that he practices right comprehension when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, as well as when sleeping, waking, speaking, and keeping silent, all like a genuine practitioner of the holy life. When he approaches those who are genuinely practicing the holy life, they might not recognize [his real inner condition].

611c Mahāmoggallāna, when his companions in the holy life come to recognize [his real inner condition], they think, “He is a pollutant among renunciants, a disgrace among renunciants, an abomination among renunciants, a thorn among renunciants.’ Having recognized him [as such], they should collectively reject him. Why is that? So as not to let [him] corrupt those who are [genuinely] practicing the holy life.

Mahāmoggallāna, it is just as a householder, intending to make a water chute to channel spring water, takes an ax and goes into the forest. He taps on the trees. If they are firm and solid they make little sound; if they are hollow, they make a louder sound. Having recognized [the tree he wants], the householder then chops it down and trims away its knots to make it into a water chute.

In the same way, Mahāmoggallāna, it may be that an ignorant man practices right comprehension when coming and going; that he is properly observant and discerning when bending, stretching, looking up and looking down; that he has a composed manner; that he skillfully wears his outer robe and his other robes and [carries his] bowl; that he practices right comprehension when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, as well as when sleeping, waking, speaking, and keeping silent, all like a genuine practitioner of the holy life. When he approaches those who are genuinely practicing the holy life, they might not recognize [his real inner condition].

Mahāmoggallāna, when his companions in the holy life come to recognize [his real inner condition], they think, “He is a pollutant among renunciants, a disgrace among renunciants, an abomination among renunciants, a thorn among renunciants.” Having recognized him [as such], they should collectively reject him. Why is that? So as not to let [him] corrupt those who are [genuinely] practicing the holy life.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

When assembled together you should recognize
[The one who harbors] evil desires, hatred, jealousy, anger,
The fetter of obstinate silence, malevolence, stinginess,
Jealousy, fawning, and deceit.

[The one] in the sangha who deceitfully claims to be calm,
Taking cover by claiming to be a renunciant,
[Yet] secretly does evil deeds,
[Holds] evil views, unguarded,
[The one who] cheats and lies—
You should recognize him as such.

Do not associate with him!
Reject him! Do not stay together with him!
Speaking much, he cheats and boasts,
Not calm, he claims to be calm.

Knowing the right time, [those who are] equipped with pure conduct Reject him and keep distant from him.

The pure should associate with the pure,
Always together in harmony.
Being in harmony, they will be at peace,
And thus attain the end of dukkha.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

123. The Discourse on the Renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa<sup>384</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

612a At that time the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa was also staying at Sāvathī, in the Blind [Men's] Forest.<sup>385</sup> He practiced diligently, not sleeping during the first and the last watches of the night, and was rightly established in the cultivation of the requisites of awakening.

Then, while the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa was dwelling alone quietly, sitting in meditation and reflecting, this thought came to his mind: "Among the disciples of the World-honored One who diligently practice the true Dharma and discipline, I am foremost. Yet my mind has not attained liberation from the taints. My parents are very wealthy and prosperous; they have a great deal of wealth. Should I now abandon the precepts, cease practicing the path, and engage in sensual pleasures, while practicing generosity and doing meritorious deeds?"

At that time the World-honored One, by means of knowledge of the minds of others, knew the thoughts in the mind of the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa. Then he told a certain monk, "Go and tell the renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa to come here."<sup>386</sup>

At this the monk answered, "Yes." Then he rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. Approaching the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa, he said, "The World-honored One summons you."

The venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa, having heard the monk's words, approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head [at the Buddha's feet], stepped back, and sat to one side. The World-honored One said:

Renunciant, is it true that while you were dwelling alone quietly, sitting in meditation and reflecting, this thought came to your mind: “Among the disciples of the World-honored One who diligently practice the true Dharma and discipline, I am foremost. Yet my mind has not attained liberation from the taints. My parents are very wealthy and prosperous; they have a great deal of wealth. Should I now abandon the precepts, cease practicing the path, and engage in sensual pleasures, while practicing generosity and doing meritorious deeds?”

Then the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa felt ashamed and was not without trepidation [on realizing,] “The World-honored One knows what I was thinking!”<sup>387</sup> He extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha and said, “That is true.”

The World-honored One said:

Renunciant, I will now question you. Answer according to your understanding. What do you think? When you were living at home, you were good at playing the lute harmoniously, with the lute in tune with the sound of singing and the singing in tune with the sound of the lute; is that so?

The venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa said, “That is so, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked further, “What do you think? If the strings of the lute are [too] tight, can it produce a pleasant, harmonious sound?”

The renunciant answered, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked further, “What do you think? If the strings of the lute are [too] loose, can it produce a pleasant, harmonious sound?”

The renunciant answered, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked again, “What do you think? If the strings of the lute are neither [too] tight nor [too] loose but just right, in between, can it produce a pleasant and harmonious sound?”

The renunciant answered, “That is so, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said:

In the same way, renunciant, too much effort makes the mind become restless; too little effort makes the mind indolent. Therefore, you should discriminate like this at the proper time. Observe these features! Do not be negligent! 612b

At that time the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa heard what the Buddha said, received it well, and kept it well [in mind]. Then he rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

Having received the Buddha's instruction with the simile of playing the lute, he dwelled alone in a secluded place and practiced diligently, without negligence of mind. Dwelling alone in a secluded place and practicing diligently, without negligence of mind, this son of a good family, who had shaved off his hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, left home out of faith, and become homeless to practice the path, realized in full the summit of the holy life. He dwelled having personally achieved understanding, awakening, and realization here and now. He knew as it really is: "Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence."

The venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa, having understood the Dharma, had become an arahant. At that time the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa, having become an arahant, thought, "Now is the right time. Should I approach the World-honored One and declare my attainment of final knowledge?"

Then the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head [at the Buddha's feet], he stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, if a monk has attained nonattachment and has completely destroyed the taints, [then for him] the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, the heavy burden has been cast away, the fetter of existence has been untied, and he has himself attained the good benefits with right knowledge and right liberation.

At that time he delights in these six experiences: he delights in dispassion, he delights in seclusion, he delights in nonconflict, he delights in the cessation of craving, he delights in the cessation of clinging, and he delights in imperturbability of the mind.<sup>388</sup>

World-honored One, perhaps someone may think, "This venerable one delights in dispassion because he relies on faith," [but] it should not be seen like this. It is just [due to] the cessation of desire, the cessation of hatred, and the cessation of ignorance that he delights in dispassion.

World-honored One, perhaps someone may think, “This venerable one delights in seclusion because he is greedy for material profit and fame, seeking offerings,’ [but] it should not be seen like this. It is just [due to] the cessation of desire, the cessation of hatred, and the cessation of ignorance that he delights in seclusion.

World-honored One, perhaps someone may think, “This venerable one delights in nonconflict because he relies on the precepts,’ [but] it should not be seen like this. It is just [due to] the cessation of desire, the cessation of hatred, and the cessation of ignorance that he delights in nonconflict, delights in the cessation of craving, delights in the cessation of clinging, and delights in imperturbability of the mind.

World-honored One, if a monk has attained nonattachment and exhausted the taints, [for him] the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, the heavy burden has been cast away, the fetter of existence has been untied, and he has personally attained the good benefits with right comprehension and right liberation, then at that time he delights in these six experiences.

612c

World-honored One, if a monk in training, seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana, has not yet attained his intention, at that time he has accomplished the faculties of one in training and the moral habits of one in training. At a later time he exhausts all taints and attains the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom. He dwells having personally achieved understanding, awakening, and realization here and now, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experience of existence.” At that time he has accomplished the faculties of one beyond training and the moral habits of one beyond training.

World-honored One, it is just as a young boy who at that time [in his life] has accomplished minor faculties and minor moral habits. At a later time he becomes equipped with the faculties of one in training. At that time he has accomplished the faculties of one in training and the moral habits of one in training.<sup>389</sup>

In the same way, World-honored One, if a monk in training, seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana, has not yet attained his intention, then at that time he has accomplished the faculties of one in training and the moral habits of one in training. At a later time he exhausts all taints and attains the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom. He dwells having personally achieved understanding, awakening, and realization here and now, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experience of existence.” At that time he has accomplished the faculties of one beyond training and the moral habits of one beyond training.

If his eyes encounter forms perceivable by the eyes, then these will not be able to make him lose this liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom; his mind remains established within, well controlled and guarded, and he observes the rise and fall of phenomena. If . . . sounds perceivable by the ears . . . odors perceivable by the nose . . . flavors perceivable by the tongue . . . tangibles perceivable by the body . . . mental objects perceivable by the mind, then these will not be able to make him lose this liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom; his mind remains established within, well controlled and guarded, and he observes the rise and fall of phenomena.

World-honored One, it is just as if not far from a village there is a great rocky mountain without clefts, without chasms, not easily broken, solidly fixed, without cavities, a single mass. If a strong wind and rain come from the east they cannot shake or agitate [the mountain], nor can the east wind move [the mountain aside] to the south. If a strong wind and rain come from the south they cannot shake or agitate [the mountain], nor can the south wind move [the mountain aside] to the west. If a strong wind and rain come from the west they cannot shake and agitate [the mountain], nor can the west wind move [the mountain aside] to the north. If a strong wind and rain come from the north they cannot shake and agitate [the mountain], nor can the north wind move [the mountain aside] in any direction.

In the same way, if his eyes encounter forms perceivable by the eyes, these will not be able to make him lose this liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom; his mind stays established within, well controlled and guarded, and he observes the rise and fall of phenomena. If [his senses encounter] sounds perceivable by the ears . . . odors perceivable by the nose . . . flavors perceivable by the tongue . . . tangibles perceivable by the body . . . mental objects perceivable by the mind, these will not be able to make him lose this liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom; his mind stays established within, well controlled and guarded, and he observes the rise and fall of phenomena.

613a

Then the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa uttered these verses:

One who delights in dispassion
Whose mind dwells in seclusion
Delights in being without conflict
And rejoices in the cessation of clinging.

One who also delights in the cessation of clinging
And in the imperturbability of the mind
On attaining true knowledge,
Through this his mind is liberated.

On attaining liberation of the mind,
A monk's faculties are calmed.
That accomplished, he need look no further;
There is no further seeking to be done.

Just as a rocky mountain
Is not agitated by the wind,
So too forms, sounds, odors, flavors
And tangibles,
Things lovable and unlovable,
Cannot agitate the mind.<sup>390</sup>

The venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa, having proclaimed before the Buddha his attainment of final knowledge, rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

At that time, soon after the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa had left, the World-honored One told the monks:

Sons of a good family should proclaim before me their attainment of final knowledge, just as the venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa proclaimed before me his attainment of final knowledge. Without praising himself or looking down on others, he told of the benefits here and now, according to his experience.

Let no ignorant ones, entangled in excessive conceit, come before me and proclaim attainment of final knowledge! They have obtained no benefits but instead big trouble.

The venerable renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa proclaimed before me his attainment of final knowledge without praising himself or looking down on others. He told of the benefits here and now, according to his experience.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

124. The Discourse on Eight Obstacles<sup>391</sup>

613b Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattihī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

For one who [intends to] practice the holy life, there are eight obstacles, eight untimely conditions. What are the eight?

At the time when a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one, has appeared in the world and teaches the Dharma that leads to calmness, leads to complete cessation, leads to the path of awakening expounded by the Well-gone One—at that time this person is reborn in hell. This is the first obstacle, the first untimely condition for one who [intends to] practice the holy life.

Again, at the time when a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one, has appeared in the world and teaches the Dharma that leads to calmness, leads to complete cessation, leads to the path of awakening expounded by the Well-gone One—at that time this person is reborn in the realm of animals . . . is reborn in the realm of hungry ghosts . . . is reborn in a heaven of long life . . . is reborn in a border country among barbarians who have no faith and no kindness, who are ungrateful, where there are no monks, nuns, or male and female lay disciples. This is the fifth obstacle, the fifth untimely condition for one who [intends to] practice the holy life.

Again, at the time when a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one, has appeared in the world and teaches the Dharma that leads to calmness, leads to complete cessation, leads to the path of awakening expounded by the Well-gone One—at that time this person is reborn in the Middle Kingdom, but he is deaf and dumb like a bleating sheep, only able to communicate through sign language, unable to understand whether the meaning of what is said is good or evil. This is the sixth obstacle, the sixth untimely condition for one who [intends to] practice the holy life.

Again, at the time when a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one, has appeared in the world and teaches the Dharma that leads to calmness, leads to complete cessation, leads to the path of awakening expounded by the Well-gone One—at that time this person is reborn in the Middle Kingdom, he is not deaf and not dumb like a bleating sheep, does not only communicate through sign language, is able to understand whether the meaning of what is said is good or evil, yet he possesses wrong and perverted views, holding views and doctrines such as these: there is no [merit in] giving, no offering, and no recitation of hymns; there is no [distinction between] wholesome and unwholesome actions; there is no result of wholesome and unwholesome actions; there is neither this life nor the next life; there is no [responsibility toward one's] mother or father; in this world there are no arahants who have reached a good attainment, who are well gone, well advanced, who have personally realized this world and the next world through understanding, awakening, and realization. This is the seventh obstacle, the seventh untimely condition for one who [intends to] practice the holy life.<sup>392</sup>

613c

Again, at the time when a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one, has not appeared in the world and does not teach the Dharma that leads to calmness, leads to complete cessation, leads to the path of awakening expounded by the Well-gone One—at that time this person is reborn in the Middle Kingdom, he is not deaf and not dumb like a bleating sheep, does not communicate only through sign language, is able to understand whether the meaning of what is said is good or evil, and is equipped with right views, not perverted views, holding views and doctrines such as these: there is [merit in] giving, offering, and recitation of charms; there is [a distinction between] wholesome and unwholesome actions; there are results of wholesome and unwholesome actions; there is this life and the next life; there is [responsibility toward one's] mother or father; in this world there are arahants who have reached a good attainment, who are well gone, well advanced, who have personally realized this world and the next world through understanding, awakening, and realization. This is the eighth obstacle, the eighth untimely condition for one who [intends to] practice the holy life.

For one who [intends to] practice the holy life, there is [one occasion] that is without obstacle, that is the timely condition. What is the [one occasion] for one who [intends to] practice the holy life that is without obstacle and is the timely condition? At the time when a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one, has appeared in the world and teaches the Dharma that leads to calmness, leads to complete cessation, leads to the path of awakening expounded by the Well-gone One—at that time this person is reborn in the Middle Kingdom, he is not deaf and not dumb like a bleating sheep, does not only communicate through sign language, is able to understand whether the meaning of what is said is good or evil, and is equipped with right view, not perverted views, holding such views and doctrines as these: there is [merit in] giving, offerings, and the recitation of charms; there is [a distinction between] wholesome and unwholesome actions; there is a result of wholesome and unwholesome actions; there is this life and the next life; there is [responsibility toward one's] mother or father; in this world there are arahants who have reached a good attainment, who are well gone, well advanced, who have personally realized this world and the next world through understanding, awakening, and realization. This is [the one occasion] for one who [intends to] practice the holy life that is without obstacle, that is a timely condition.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

If one has obtained a human body
 And the most sublime Dharma is being taught,
 Yet he does not attain any fruit,
 Then this is certainly because he did not encounter the [right] time for it.

Many obstacles to [practicing] the holy life have been taught.
 For a person to encounter
 The [right] time in the next life
 Is very rare in the world.

If one wishes to obtain a human body again
 And to hear the sublime Dharma,
 Then one should practice diligently,
 Out of concern for oneself.

As for talking about and hearing the good Dharma,
 Do not miss the [right] time for it.
 If [one] misses this [right] time,
 One should certainly worry about falling into hell.

614a

If one does not encounter the [right] time,
 And does not hear the good Dharma taught,
 Then [one is] like a merchant who loses his wealth;
 One will endure countless births and deaths.

If one obtains a human body,
 Hears the right and good Dharma being taught,

And respectfully follows the teaching of the World-honored One,
Then one must have encountered the [right] time for it.

If one encounters this [right] time,
And is able to practice the right holy life,
Then one will achieve the unsurpassable vision,
Taught by the Kinsman of the Sun.

Such a person constantly guards himself,
And practices in abandoning the latent tendencies.
By removing and extinguishing all fetters,
And by defeating the Evil One [Māra] and the Evil One's retinue,
He transcends the world;
That is, he achieves the cessation of the taints.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

125. The Discourse on Poverty<sup>393</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta's
Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks, "For a worldly person who has sensual desires, is poverty a great suffering?"

The monks answered, "Yes, World-honored One, it is."

The World-honored One further asked the monks:

If a person who has sensual desires is poor, he may raise a loan from another family's wealth. Is raising a loan from another family's wealth a great suffering in the world?

The monks answered, "Yes, World-honored One, it is."

The World-honored One further asked the monks:

If a person who has sensual desires raises a loan and is unable to repay it on time, the interest increases day by day. Is the increasing interest a great suffering in the world?

The monks answered, "Yes, World-honored One, it is."

The World-honored One further asked the monks:

If a person who has sensual desires is unable to pay the increasing interest the creditor asks for repayment [of the debt]. Is being asked by a creditor [for repayment of a debt] a great suffering in the world?

The monks answered, “Yes, World-honored One, it is.”

The World-honored One further asked the monks:

If a person who has sensual desires is asked by the creditor [for repayment of a debt] and is unable to repay it, the creditor pursues him and asks again and again [for repayment]. Is being pursued by a creditor and asked again and again [for repayment] a great suffering in the world?

The monks answered, “Yes, World-honored One, it is.”

The World-honored One further asked the monks:

For a person who has sensual desires, if the creditor pursues him and asks again and again [for repayment], and because of being unable to repay [the loan] he is arrested and bound by the creditor. Is being arrested and bound by a creditor a great suffering in the world? 614b

The monks answered, “Yes, World-honored One, it is.”

[The World-honored One said:]

This means that for a person who has sensual desires, poverty is a great suffering in the world; for a person who has sensual desires, raising a loan is a great suffering in the world; for a person who has sensual desires, the increasing interest from raising a loan is a great suffering in the world; for a person who has sensual desires, being asked by a creditor [for repayment of a loan] is a great suffering in the world; for a person who has sensual desires, being pursued by a creditor and asked again and again [for repayment] is a great suffering in the world; for a person who has sensual desires, being arrested and bound by a creditor is a great suffering in the world.

In the same way, if someone in this noble Dharma has no faith in [the value of] wholesome states, does not keep the precepts, is not learned, is not generous, and lacks wisdom regarding wholesome states, then for that reason he is poor and powerless, even if he possesses great amounts of gold, silver, beryl, crystal, maṇi jewels, white jade, conch shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoise shell, cornelian, green jade, ruby, and jade pearl.<sup>394</sup> This is what I speak of in my noble teaching as the unwholesomeness [resembling] poverty.

[This person] engages in evil conduct of body, speech, and mind. This is what I speak of in my noble teaching as the unwholesomeness [resembling] raising a loan. He wishes to cover up his evil bodily conduct; he does not disclose it himself, does not want to talk about it, does not want to be rebuked by others, and does not do as they ask. He wishes to cover up his evil verbal and mental conduct; he does not disclose it himself, does not want to talk about it, does not want to be rebuked by others, and does not do as they ask. This is what I speak of in my noble teaching as the unwholesomeness [resembling] the increase in interest due.

Whether he is practicing inside a village or town or outside a village or town, his companions in the holy life, on seeing him, speak like this, “Venerable friends, this man acts like this, behaves like this, is evil like this, is impure like this; he is a thorn to the village or town.” He speaks like this, “Venerable sirs, I do not act like this, do not behave like this, am not evil like this, not impure like this; I am not a thorn to the village or town.” This is what I speak of in my noble teaching as the unwholesomeness [resembling] the demand for repayment.

Whether he is dwelling in a secluded place, on a mountain, at the base of a tree in a forest, or in an open place, he thinks three kinds of unwholesome thoughts, [namely,] thoughts of sensual desire, thoughts of hatred, and thoughts of harming. This is what I speak of in my noble teaching as the unwholesomeness [resembling] repeated pursuit.

He engages in evil bodily, verbal, and mental conduct. Owing to his evil bodily, verbal, and mental conduct, because of this, at the breaking up of the body at death, he will certainly go to a bad realm of existence, and be reborn in hell. This is what I speak of in my noble teaching as the unwholesomeness [resembling] arrest and bondage.

I see no other bondage as miserable, as severe, as harsh, and as undesirable as the bondage of hell or of [rebirth] as an animal or a hungry ghost.

A monk who is an arahant, who has achieved destruction of the taints, knows that these three miserable kinds of bondage have been destroyed completely, that they have been pulled out by the roots, never 614c to grow again.<sup>395</sup>

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

In the world poverty is suffering,
[So too is] raising a loan from another's wealth.
Having raised such a loan,
Being asked [to repay it] is suffering and distress.

The creditor approaches him and asks [for repayment];
Because of this, [being unable to repay it,] he is arrested and bound.
This bondage is very severe suffering
For a worldly person who delights in sensual pleasures.

It is the same in the noble Dharma
For one who is without right faith,
Who has no sense of shame or guilt,
And performs evil, unwholesome deeds.

With his body he performs unwholesome deeds,
And also with his speech and mind.
He covers them up, does not want to talk about them,
And does not like being rightly instructed and admonished.

If someone performs [such deeds] again and again,
His mind and thoughts experience suffering.
Whether in a village or in a secluded place,
He will certainly experience regret because of it.

With body and speech he performs such deeds,
And also with the thoughts in his mind.
His evil deeds increase more and more,
[As] he performs them again and again.

[Committing] evil actions and lacking wisdom,
Having done much that is unwholesome,
Accordingly, when his life comes to its end,
He will certainly go to the bondage of hell.

This bondage is the most profound suffering.
A “hero,” [however,] is free from it.
One who obtains wealth in accordance with the Dharma
Will not incur debt but will be at peace.

Giving brings happiness;
It is profitable in both respects [in present and future lives].
In this way householders
Increase their merit through giving.

It is the same in the noble Dharma;
For one who has good and sincere faith
And is equipped with a sense of shame and guilt
Who will certainly be without stinginess or greed.

Having abandoned the five hindrances,
He always delights in practicing diligently.
Attaining the concentrative absorptions,
He is filled with lasting peace and happiness.<sup>396</sup>

Having attained an unworldly happiness,
Purified as if bathed with water,
His imperturbable mind is liberated,
And all bonds of existence are eradicated.

Nirvana is freedom from ailment;
It is called the unsurpassable lamp.<sup>397</sup>
Freedom from grief, freedom from dust, and peace:
This is called “the imperturbable.”

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

615a

126. The Discourse on Engaging in Sensual Pleasures<sup>398</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī in Jeta’s
Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the householder Anāthapiṇḍika approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. He said, "World-honored One, in the world how many kinds of persons are there who engage in sensual pleasures?"

The World-honored One said:

Householder, in the world there are altogether ten kinds of persons who engage in sensual pleasures. What are the ten?

Householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma. Having sought wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma, he does not [use it to] support himself or provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; nor does he [use it to] make offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he might ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma. Having sought wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma, he is able to support himself and provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; [yet he] does not make offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he might ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn in a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma. Having sought wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma, he is able to support himself and provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees, and he also makes offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he may ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma. Having sought wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma, he does not [use it to] support himself or provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; nor does he [use it to] make offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he might ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma. Having sought wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma, he is able to support himself and provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; [yet he] does not make offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he might ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma. Having sought wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma, he is able to support himself and provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; and he also makes offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he may ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma. Having sought wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma, he does not [use it to] support himself or provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; nor does he [use it to] make offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he might ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma. Having sought wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma, he is able to support himself and provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees, [yet he] does not make offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he might ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma. Having sought wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma, he is able to support himself and provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; and he also makes offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he may ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. Having obtained wealth, he is defiled [by it], attached, bound, and tied [to it]. Being defiled [by it], attached, bound, and tied [to it], he uses [that wealth] without seeing the danger [in it] and without knowing how to transcend it. There is this kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Again, householder, one kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures seeks wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma. Having sought wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma, he is able to support himself and provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; and he also makes offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he may ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. Having obtained wealth, he is not defiled by it, not attached, bound, and tied to it. Being not defiled by it, not attached, bound, and tied to it, he uses [that wealth] while seeing the danger in it, and knows how to transcend it. There is this [tenth] kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures.

Householder, suppose there is a person who engages in sensual pleasures and seeks wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma; who, having sought wealth in improper ways, contrary to the Dharma, does not [use it to] support himself or provide for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; and who does not [use it to] make offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he might ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. This kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures rates as the lowest among all the kinds of persons who engage in sensual pleasures.<sup>399</sup>

615c

Householder, suppose there is a person who engages in sensual pleasures and seeks wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma; and who, having sought wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma, supports himself and provides for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; and who also makes offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he may ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. This kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures is rated the highest among all the kinds of persons who engage in sensual pleasures [and who seek wealth both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma].<sup>400</sup>

Householder, suppose there is a person who engages in sensual pleasures who seeks wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma; who, having sought wealth in proper ways, in accordance with the Dharma, supports himself and provides for the comfort of his mother and father, wife and children, servants and employees; and who also makes offerings to renunciants and brahmins whereby he may ascend to higher kinds of pleasure, experiencing pleasurable results by being reborn into a heaven of long life. Having obtained wealth, he is not defiled by it, not attached, bound, and tied to it. Being not defiled by it, not attached, bound, and tied to it, he uses [that wealth] while seeing the danger in it, and knows how to transcend it. This kind of person who engages in sensual pleasures is the foremost, the greatest, the superior, the best, the most excellent. He is the most sublime of all the kinds of persons who engage in sensual pleasures.

It is just as from a cow comes milk, from milk comes cream, from cream comes butter, from butter comes ghee, from ghee comes clarified ghee—[among these] clarified ghee is the foremost, the greatest, the highest, the best, the most excellent and sublime. In the same way, householder, this [kind of] person who engages in sensual pleasures is the foremost, the greatest, the highest, the best, the most excellent, and the most sublime of all the kinds of persons who engage in sensual pleasures.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:<sup>401</sup>

If someone seeks wealth in ways contrary to the Dharma,
 And if someone seeks it both in accordance with the Dharma and contrary to the Dharma,
 [Then,] by not using [that wealth] to provide for [others] and themselves,
 And also not using it as offerings to make merit,
 Both of them are at fault;
 They are the lowest among those who engage in sensual pleasures [in such ways].

If someone seeks wealth according to the Dharma,
 And gains it through his own effort,
 By using it to provide for himself and others,
 And also as offerings to make merit,
 On both accounts this is virtuous,
 He is the highest among those who engage in sensual pleasures [with attachment].

If one attains the wisdom of transcendence
 [While] engaging in sensual pleasures and living the domestic life,
 Seeing the danger in wealth, being contented, and using it frugally— 616a
 Such a one attains the wisdom that transcends sensual pleasures.
 He is [in all respects] the highest among those who engage in sensual pleasures.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

127. The Discourse on Fields of Merit<sup>402</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī in Jeta's
 Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the householder Anāthapiṇḍika approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side.
 He said, "World-honored One, how many kinds of persons are there in the world who are fields of merit?"

The World-honored One said:

Householder, in the world there are altogether two kinds of persons who are fields of merit. What are the two? The first is the person who is in training. The second is the person who is beyond training. Of persons who are in training there are eighteen kinds, and of persons who are beyond training there are nine kinds.<sup>403</sup>

Householder, what are the eighteen kinds of persons in training? The faith follower, the Dharma follower, the one liberated by faith, the one who has attained vision, the body witness, the one who goes from clan to clan, the one-seeder,<sup>404</sup> the one on the path to stream-entry, the one who has attained stream-entry, the one on the path to once-returning, the one who has attained once-returning, the one on the path to nonreturning, the one who has attained nonreturning, the one who attains final nirvana in between, the one who attains final nirvana on being reborn, the one who attains final nirvana with effort, the one who attains final nirvana without effort, and the one who proceeds upstream to Akaniṭṭha Heaven; these are the eighteen kinds of persons in training.

Householder, what are the nine kinds of persons beyond training?<sup>405</sup> [They are] the one who is capable at will [of putting an end to existence] (cetanādharmā); the one who is capable of penetrating [without effort] (pravedhanādharmā); the one who is in an immovable condition (akopyadharman); the one who is liable to regress (parihāṇadharman); the one who is not liable to regress (aparihāṇadharman); the one who is capable of protecting (anurakṣaṇādharmā), [that is,] who while protecting himself will not regress, but if he does not protect himself he will regress; the one who is in a condition of standing firmly (sthitākampya); the one who is liberated by wisdom; and the one who is liberated on both sides. These are the nine kinds of persons who are beyond training.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

In the world those who are in training and those who are beyond training
Are worthy of respect, worthy of offerings.
They are accomplished in maintaining correct [conduct of] body,
And of speech and mind as well.

Householder, these are excellent fields [of merit];
One who makes offerings to them gains great merit.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

128. The Discourse on Male Lay Disciples<sup>406</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattṥi in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

616b

At that time the householder Anāthapiṇḍika, accompanied by a large assembly of five hundred male lay disciples, approached Venerable Sāriputta. He paid homage with his head [at the feet of Venerable Sāriputta], stepped back, and sat to one side. The five hundred male lay disciples also paid homage, stepped back, and sat to one side.

After the householder Anāthapiṇḍika and the five hundred male lay disciples had sat down to one side, Venerable Sāriputta taught them the Dharma, exhorting and inspiring them, fully delighting them. Having with countless skillful means taught them the Dharma, having exhorted and inspired them, fully delighting them, [Venerable Sāriputta] rose from his seat and approached the Buddha. He paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. Not long after Venerable Sāriputta had left, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika and the five hundred male lay disciples also approached the Buddha, paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side.<sup>407</sup>

Once Venerable Sāriputta and the [lay] assembly were properly seated, the World-honored One addressed them saying:

Sāriputta, if regarding a noble lay disciple you know that he is well guarded by practicing five principles, and that he attains easily and without difficulty four higher states of mind that are happy abodes here and now, then, Sāriputta, you can declare that for that noble disciple [rebirth] in hell is ended,<sup>408</sup> and also [rebirth] as an animal, as a hungry ghost, or into any [other] bad realm of existence. He has attained stream-entry. He will not descend into any evil condition but will certainly progress toward full awakening; and after experiencing at most seven existences, coming and going among devas and human beings [at most] seven times, he will attain the ending of dukkha.

Sāriputta, how is a noble lay disciple well guarded by practicing five principles?<sup>409</sup> A noble lay disciple abstains from killing, has given up killing, has discarded sword and club. He has a sense of shame and fears blame, and a mind [full of] loving-kindness and compassion, [wishing] to benefit all [beings], even insects. He has purified his mind with regard to killing living beings. A noble lay disciple is well guarded by practicing this first principle.

Again, Sāriputta, a noble lay disciple abstains from taking what is not given, has given up taking what is not given. He takes [only] what is given and delights in taking [only] what is given. He is always fond of generosity, rejoicing in it, without stinginess, and not expecting any reward. He constantly guards himself so as not to be overcome by [any thought of] stealing. He has purified his mind with regard to taking what is not given. A noble lay disciple is well guarded by practicing this second principle.

Again, Sāriputta, a noble lay disciple abstains from sexual misconduct, has given up sexual misconduct. If a woman is being guarded by her father, guarded by her mother, guarded by her parents, guarded by her brothers, or guarded by her sisters; or if a woman is guarded by her parents-in-law, guarded by her relatives, or guarded by her clan; or if she has been promised in marriage or is protected by threat of punishment, or has been garlanded as a sign of betrothal—[then he] does not violate such a woman. He has purified his mind with regard to sexual misconduct. A noble lay disciple is well guarded by practicing this third principle.

616c Again, Sāriputta, a noble lay disciple abstains from false speech, has given up false speech. He speaks the truth, delights in the truth, is unshakably established in the truth, is completely trustworthy, and will not deceive [anyone in] the world. He has purified his mind with regard to false speech. A noble lay disciple is well guarded by practicing this fourth principle.

Again, Sāriputta, a noble lay disciple abstains from intoxicants, has given up intoxicants. He has purified his mind with regard to intoxicants. A noble lay disciple is well guarded by practicing this fifth principle.

Sāriputta, what are the four higher states of mind that are happy abodes here and now, which a noble lay disciple attains easily and without difficulty?

A noble lay disciple recollects the Tathāgata [thus], “That is the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a Well-gone One, a knower of the world, unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called Buddha, an Exalted One.” When he recollects the Tathāgata in this way, if there are [in his mind] any evil desires they disappear right away. If there are in his mind unwholesome and defiling [states causing] distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear.

For a noble lay disciple who is established in [recollection of] the Tathāgata, his mind is pacified and attains joy. If [in his mind] there are any evil desires, then they disappear right away. [If] in his mind there are unwholesome and defiling [states causing] distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear. A noble lay disciple attains, easily and without difficulty, this first higher state of mind that is a happy abode here and now.

Again, Sāriputta, a noble lay disciple recollects the Dharma [thus], “The Dharma that is well taught by the World-honored One definitely leads to the ultimate, to freedom from vexation and affliction; it exists continuously and is immovable.”<sup>410</sup> When he contemplates in this way, understands in this way, knows in this way, and recollects the Dharma in this way, then if [in his mind] there are any evil desires, they disappear right away. If in his mind there are any unwholesome and defiling [states causing] distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear.

For a noble lay disciple who is established in [recollection of] the Dharma, his mind is pacified and attains joy. If [in his mind] there are any evil desires, then they disappear right away. [If] in his mind there are any unwholesome and defiling [states causing] distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear. A noble lay disciple attains [easily and without difficulty] this second higher state of mind [that is a happy abode here and now].

Again, Sāriputta, a noble lay disciple recollects the sangha [thus], “The noble sangha of the Tathāgata is proceeding well and proceeding rightly, progressing in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma, and conforming to the Dharma. In the sangha there are indeed arahants and those on the path to arahantship, nonreturners and those on the path to nonreturning, once-returners and those on the path to once-returning, stream-enterers and those on the path to stream-entry. These are reckoned the four pairs or the eight classes [of noble ones]. These are reckoned the sangha of the Tathāgata. They have achieved morality, they have achieved concentration, they have achieved wisdom, they have achieved liberation, and they have achieved knowledge and vision of liberation.<sup>411</sup> They are worthy of respect and esteem, worthy of offerings, and are an excellent field of merit in the world.” When [a noble lay disciple] recollects the sangha of the Tathāgata in this way, then if [in his mind] there are any evil desires, they disappear right away. If in his mind there are any unwholesome and defiling [states causing] distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear.

617a

For a noble lay disciple who is established in [recollection of] the sangha of the Tathāgata, his mind is pacified and attains joy. If [in his mind] there are any evil desires, then they disappear right away. [If] in his mind there are any unwholesome and defiling [states causing] distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear. A noble lay disciple attains, easily and without difficulty, this third higher state of mind that is a happy abode here and now.

Again, Sāriputta, a noble lay disciple recollects his own morality [thus], “This morality [of mine] is not deficient, not defective. It is free from defilement and corruption, established [firmly] like the earth, not hollow.<sup>412</sup> It is praised by the noble ones, well received and remembered.” When he recollects his own morality in this way, if [in his mind] there are any evil desires, then they disappear right away. If in his mind there are any unwholesome and defiling [states causing], distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear.

For a noble lay disciple who is established in [recollection of] morality, his mind is pacified and attains joy. If [in his mind] there are any evil desires, then they disappear right away. [If] in his mind there are any unwholesome and defiling [states causing] distress, worry, and grief, then they too disappear. A noble lay disciple attains, easily and without difficulty, this fourth higher state of mind that is a happy abode here and now.

Sāriputta, if regarding a noble lay disciple you know that he is well guarded by practicing these five principles, and that he attains easily and without difficulty these four higher states of mind that are happy abodes here and now, then, Sāriputta, you can declare that for that noble disciple [rebirth] in hell is ended, and also [rebirth] as an animal, a hungry ghost, or in any [other] bad realm of existence. He has attained stream-entry. He will not descend into any evil condition but will certainly progress toward full awakening; and after experiencing at most seven existences, coming and going among devas and human beings [at most] seven times, he will attain the ending of dukkha.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

A wise man who dwells in the household,
Discerns the fearfulness of hell.
Due to receiving and retaining the noble Dharma,
He eliminates every kind of evil.

He abstains from killing or harming living beings,
Being able to abandon this with understanding.
He speaks the truth, not what is false.
He does not steal others' property.

Satisfied with his own wife,
He does not take delight in another's wife.
He has given up intoxicants and abstains from them, [Knowing them to be] a source of mental confusion, madness, and ignorance.

[One] should often recollect the Fully Awakened One,
Reflect on the wholesome teachings,
Recollect the sangha, and contemplate [one's own] morality.
From this [one] will gain joy.

Wishing to practice giving,
One should consider the anticipated merit of it,
And give first to [those who are of] calmed mind.
Such [giving] brings [good] results.
I will now speak of [those with] calmed minds.
Sāriputta, listen attentively!

617b

[An ox] may be black or white,
Red or brown,

Mottled with delightful colors,
Or having the color of a dove,
According to its inborn state;
[But] the well-trained ox is foremost.

[If] it has adequate bodily strength
And goes at a good speed, quickly back and forth,
Then it will be selected for its capability
And not rejected for its color.

In the same way, a human being
May be born into different estates:
As warrior or brahmin
Or merchant or laborer,
According to his inborn state.

An elder who is pure and keeps the precepts,
Who is without worldly attachment, a well-gone one<sup>413</sup>—
Giving alms to him brings great fruit.
As for someone who is ignorant, who lacks knowledge,
Lacks wisdom, lacks learning—
Giving alms to him brings little fruit.<sup>414</sup>
Lacking the light [of wisdom], [such a person] illuminates no one.

If the light [of wisdom] shines
On a wise disciple of the Buddha
Whose faith in the Well-gone One
Is well rooted and firmly established,
[Then] that person will be reborn into a good estate,
In a family of his choice,
And in the end will attain nirvana.
In these ways each one has his destiny.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Venerable Sāriputta, the monks, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika, and the five hundred male lay disciples were delighted and received it respectfully.

129. The Discourse on the Enemy<sup>415</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattṥī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

There are seven states of enmity that make for the enmity that comes upon a man or a woman when they become angry. What are the seven?

An enemy does not want his enemy to be good-looking. Why is that? [Because] an enemy does not delight in his enemy being good-looking.

A person who is angry, who repeatedly becomes angry, who is overcome by anger, and whose mind does not abandon anger has an ugly appearance because of this, even if he is well bathed and his body is anointed with fine fragrance. Why is that? Because he is overcome by anger and his mind does not abandon anger. This is the first state of enmity that makes for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry.

Again, an enemy does not want his enemy to sleep in peace. Why is that? [Because] an enemy does not delight in his enemy sleeping in peace. 617c

A person who is angry, who repeatedly becomes angry, who is overcome by anger, and whose mind does not abandon anger sleeps in distress because of this, even if he is lying on a royal bed upholstered with wool textiles, draped with brocades and fine silk fabrics, with lined and quilted coverlets, and with cushions [made of] antelope hide at both ends. Why is that? Because he is overcome by anger and his mind does not abandon anger. This is the second state of enmity that makes for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry.

Again, an enemy does not want his enemy to make a large profit. Why is that? [Because] an enemy does not delight in his enemy making a large profit.

A person who is angry, who repeatedly becomes angry, who is overcome by anger, and whose mind does not abandon anger does not [try to] make a profit when he should [try to] make a profit, and [tries to] make a profit when he should not [try to] make a profit. In both cases he acts contrary [to what is appropriate], so he has a big loss. Why is that? Because he is overcome by anger and his mind does not abandon anger. This is the third state of enmity that makes for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry.

Again, an enemy does not want his enemy to have friends. Why is that? [Because] an enemy does not delight in his enemy having friends.

For a person who is angry, who repeatedly becomes angry, who is overcome by anger, and whose mind does not abandon anger, if he has good friends they leave him and go away. Why is that? Because he is overcome by anger and his mind does not abandon anger. This is the fourth state of enmity that makes for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry.

Again, an enemy does not want his enemy to have a good reputation. Why is that? [Because] an enemy does not delight in his enemy having a good reputation.

A person who is angry, who repeatedly becomes angry, who is overcome by anger, and whose mind does not abandon anger gains ill fame, a bad reputation, which becomes widely known in all directions. Why is that? Because he is overcome by anger and his mind does not abandon anger. This is the fifth state of enmity that makes for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry.

Again, an enemy does not want his enemy to be very wealthy. Why is that? [Because] an enemy does not delight in his enemy being very wealthy.

A person who is angry, who repeatedly becomes angry, who is overcome by anger, and whose mind does not abandon anger engages in conduct of body, speech, and mind that causes him to lose a great deal of wealth.<sup>416</sup> Why is that? Because he is overcome by anger and his mind does not abandon anger. This is the sixth state of enmity that makes for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry.

Again, an enemy does not want his enemy, at the breaking up of the body at death, to be certain of going to a good realm of existence, a heavenly world. Why is that? [Because] an enemy does not delight in his enemy going to a good realm of existence.

A person who is angry, who repeatedly becomes angry, who is overcome by anger, and whose mind does not abandon anger engages in evil conduct of body, speech, and mind. Having engaged in evil conduct of body, speech, and mind, at the breaking up of the body at death, he will certainly go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell. Why is that? Because he is overcome by anger and his mind does not abandon anger. This is the seventh state of enmity that makes for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry. These are the seven states of enmity that make for the enmity that comes upon a man or woman when they become angry.

618a

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

One who is angry acquires an ugly appearance,
He sleeps uneasily and in distress.
Though he should gain great wealth,
He instead incurs loss.

[Even those who were his] close good friends
Keep their distance from a person who becomes angry.
As he repeatedly becomes angry,
His bad reputation spreads in all directions.

He is angry when engaging in activities of body or speech,
And entangled in anger when engaging in activities of the mind.
A person overcome by anger
Loses all his wealth.

Anger produces disadvantage;
Anger produces defilement of the mind.
Fear arises within [such] a person,
Yet he is unable to realize this.

One who is angry does not recognize what is advantageous;
One who is angry does not know the Dharma.
Lacking sight, blind, enveloped in darkness:
Such is the person who delights in anger.

Anger first manifests as an ugly appearance,
Just as fire first starts by giving out smoke.
From this arise hatred and jealousy;
And as a consequence of this, everyone becomes angry.

What an angry person does,
Whether wholesome or unwholesome deeds,
After having become full of anger,<sup>417</sup>
He feels scorched as if burned by fire.

What I have called scorching deeds
And entangling [mental] states
I will now explain one by one.
All of you, listen attentively!

One who is angry will turn against his father and harm him,
And against his brothers too.
He will even kill his sisters.
So harmful is one who is angry.

618b [The one] who gave birth to him and raised him,
Who enabled him to see this world,
Who enabled him to survive: his mother.
Even her the angry one will harm.<sup>418</sup>

Without shame, without scruple,
For one who is entangled by anger there is nothing he will [not be ready] to say.
For a person overcome by anger,
There is nothing [bad] that his mouth will not utter.

He performs ignorant and immoral deeds,<sup>419</sup>
And takes his own life at a young age.
When doing this he lacks self-awareness;
Because of anger, terrifying things occur.

He is attached to himself,
And loves himself extremely;
Yet despite loving himself,
One who is angry also harms himself.

He stabs himself with a knife,
Or flings himself off a cliff,

Or hangs himself with a rope,
Or takes various kinds of poison.

Such is the nature of anger;
His death is due to anger.
All of this can be abandoned,
By understanding it with wisdom.
As for tiny unwholesome deeds,
A wise person is able to discard them by understanding them.

One should be patient with such behavior,
If one wishes to be free of ugliness,
To be free of anger and free of worry,
To remove the smoke of conceit and be free of it,
To tame anger and abandon it,
To eradicate it completely and be free of the taints.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

130. The Discourse on Teaching Dhammika<sup>420</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time Venerable Dhammika was an elder in his native region. He was in charge of the stupa, and he held a senior position relative to [others, but he] was irascible, impatient, and very coarse, [given to] berating and condemning other monks. Because of this, all the [other] monks of [Dhammika's] native region left and went away. They did not enjoy staying there. Then the laymen of the region, seeing that all the monks of the region were leaving and going away, because they did not enjoy staying there, thought, "Why do all the monks of the region leave and go away, not delighting in staying here?"

The laymen of the region heard about Venerable Dhammika, an elder in his native region, [as follows]. He was in charge of the stupa and he held a senior position relative to [others, but he] was irascible, impatient, and very

618c coarse, [given to] berating and condemning other monks. Because of this, all the [other] monks of [Dhammika's] native region left and went away. They did not enjoy staying there. Hearing this, the laymen of [Dhammika's] birthplace together approached Venerable Dhammika and expelled him from the monasteries of his native region.<sup>421</sup>

At this Venerable Dhammika, having been expelled from the monasteries of his native region by the laymen of his native region, took his robes and bowl and headed for Sāvattṥī. Traveling in stages, he reached Sāvattṥī and stayed in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

Then Venerable Dhammika approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. He said:

World-honored One, I did not revile the laymen of my native region, I did not berate them, I did not give offense to them. Yet the laymen of my native region have driven me from the monasteries of my native region.

Then the World-honored One told him, "Stop, Dhammika! Stop! Why do you need to say this?"<sup>422</sup>

Venerable Dhammika extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and again said:

World-honored One, I did not revile the laymen of my native region, I did not berate them, I did not give offense to them. Yet the laymen of my native region have driven me from the monasteries of my native region.

The World-honored One again addressed him:

Dhammika, long ago merchants here in Jambudīpa would set out on the ocean by boat, carrying with them a land-seeking bird of prey. Before going far on the great ocean, they would release the land-seeking bird of prey. If the land-seeking bird of prey was able to reach the coast of the great ocean, it would not return to the boat; but if the land-seeking bird of prey was not able to reach the coast of the great ocean, it would return to the boat. In the same way, Dhammika, since you have been expelled from the monasteries of your native region by the laymen of your native region, you return to me. Stop, Dhammika! Stop! Why do you need to say this again?

A third time Venerable Dhammika said:

World-honored One, I did not revile the laymen of my native region, I did not berate them, I did not give offense to them. Yet the laymen of my native region have driven me from the monasteries of my native region.

A third time the World-honored One addressed him:

Dharmika, when you were expelled from the monasteries of your native region by the laymen of your native region, did you abide by the Dharma of a renunciant?

At this Venerable Dharmika rose from his seat, extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and said, “World-honored One, how does a renunciant abide by the Dharma of a renunciant?”

The World-honored One said:

Dharmika, long ago the human life span was eighty thousand years. Dharmika, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, this continent of Jambudīpa was very wealthy and pleasant, with many inhabitants; villages and cities were as close [together] as the distance of the flight of a single rooster. Dharmika, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, women married at the age of five hundred years.

619a

Dharmika, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, there were [only] such ailments as [needing to] defecate and urinate, having desires, having nothing to eat, and growing old. Dharmika, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, there was a king called Koravya, a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a fourfold army to reign over the entire world. Being a righteous Dharma king, he possessed the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven. He had a thousand sons who were handsome, brave, fearless, and able to overcome other people. He certainly ruled over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, governing only by the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness [to all].<sup>423</sup>

Dharmika, King Koravya had a tree called Well-established, a royal banyan tree. Dharmika, the royal banyan tree Well-established had five branches: the first branch provided nourishment for the king and queen; the second one provided nourishment for the crown prince and courtiers; the third one provided nourishment for the countrymen; the fourth one provided nourishment for renunciants and brahmins; the fifth one provided nourishment for birds and beasts. Dhammika, the fruits of the royal banyan tree Well-established were as big as a two-pint bottle, and tasted like pure honeyballs.

Dhammika, the royal banyan tree Well-established was not guarded, [yet] no one stole from it. [Then one day] a man came, hungry and thirsty, very weak, with a wan and sallow appearance, wanting to eat the fruit, so he approached the royal banyan tree Well-established. After having eaten his fill of fruit he broke off a branch bearing fruit and left.

There was a deva who dwelled in dependence on the royal banyan tree Well-established. He thought, “How odd is this man of Jambudīpa! He lacks gratitude and appreciation. Why is that? Because, having eaten his fill of fruit from the royal banyan tree Well-established, he broke off a branch bearing fruit and took it away. Let me cause the royal banyan tree Well-established to become devoid of fruit and not bear [any more] fruit.” Then the royal banyan tree Well-established became devoid of fruit and did not bear [any more] fruit.

Another man came by, hungry and thirsty, very weak, with wan and sallow appearance, wanting to eat the fruit, so he approached the royal banyan tree Well-established. Seeing that the royal banyan tree Well-established had become devoid of fruit and was not producing [any more] fruit, he approached King Koravya and said, “May your majesty know that the royal banyan tree Well-established has become devoid of fruit and is not producing [any more] fruit.”<sup>424</sup>

On hearing this, just as [quickly as the time it takes for] a strong man to bend his arm or stretch it out, King Koravya disappeared from Kuru [country] and arrived in the Heaven of the Thirty-three. Standing before Sakka, ruler of the devas, he said, “May Kosiya know that the royal banyan tree Well-established has become devoid of fruit and does not produce [any more] fruit.”

619b

Then, just as [quickly as the time it takes for] a strong man to bend his arm or stretch it out, Sakka, ruler of the devas, and King Koravya disappeared from the Heaven of the Thirty-three and arrived in Kuru [country].

Standing not far from the royal banyan tree Well-established, Sakka, ruler of the devas, performed a feat of supernormal powers to create a great rainstorm. After he had created the great rainstorm, the royal banyan tree Well-established was uprooted and fell over.

Because of this, the tree deva who dwelled in the royal banyan tree Well-established was sorrowful and distressed. Weeping and shedding tears, he stood before Sakka, ruler of the devas. Sakka, ruler of the devas, asked him, “Deva, why are you sorrowful and distressed, standing before me weeping and shedding tears?”

The deva said, “May Kosiya know that, because of the great rainstorm the royal banyan tree Well-established has been uprooted and fell over.”

Then Sakka, ruler of the devas, said to the tree deva, “Tree deva, when the royal banyan tree Well-established was uprooted and fell over due to the great rainstorm, did you abide by the Dharma of a tree deva?”

The tree deva said, “Kosiya, how does a tree deva abide by the Dharma of a tree deva?” Sakka, ruler of the devas, told him: “Deva, suppose that someone wants to dig up the roots of a tree and take them away; suppose that he wants to cut the stem of the tree, the branches of the tree, the leaves of the tree, the flowers of the tree, the fruits of the tree, and take them away. The tree deva should not become angry, should not dislike him for it; he should not harbor hatred in his heart. The tree deva should abandon such states of mind and [just] dwell there as a tree deva. This is how a tree deva abides by the Dharma of a tree deva.”

The deva said further, “Kosiya, I am a tree deva who did not abide by the Dharma of a tree deva. From now on, being a tree deva, I will abide by the Dharma of a tree deva. May the royal banyan tree Well-established recover and be as it was before!”

Then Sakka, ruler of the devas, employed his supernormal powers to again create a great rainstorm. After he had created the great rainstorm, the royal banyan tree Well-established recovered and was as before.

It is the same, Dhammika, with a monk. He does not berate someone who berates him; he does not become angry with someone who becomes angry with him; he does not injure someone who injures him; and he does not beat someone who beats him. In this way, Dhammika, a renunciant abides by the Dharma of a renunciant.

Then Venerable Dhammika rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms together toward the Buddha, and, weeping and shedding tears, said:

World-honored One, I am a renunciant who did not abide by the Dharma of a renunciant. From now on, being a renunciant, I will abide by the Dharma of a renunciant.

The World-honored One said:

619c Dhammika, long ago there was a great teacher called Sunetta, a leader of heterodox seers, who had abandoned sensual desire and [sensual] craving and had acquired supernormal powers. Dhammika, the great teacher Sunetta had countless hundreds and thousands of disciples. Dhammika, the great teacher Sunetta taught his disciples the method for [attaining] the Brahmā world.

Dhammika, when the great teacher Sunetta taught [his disciples] the method for [attaining] the Brahmā world, some of the disciples who did not completely accept and practice his method were reborn after death into the Heaven of the Four Kings, some were reborn into the Heaven of the Thirty-three, some were reborn into the Yāma Heaven, some were reborn into the Tusita Heaven, some were reborn into the Heaven of Those Who Delight in Creating, and some were reborn into the Heaven of Those Who Delight in the Creations of Others.<sup>425</sup>

Dhammika, when the great teacher Sunetta taught [his disciples] the method for [attaining] the Brahmā world, those disciples who completely accepted and practiced his method developed the four divine abodes and abandoned sensual desire, and after death they attained rebirth into the Brahmā world. Then, Dhammika, the great teacher Sunetta thought, “It is not proper for me to be on the same level in the next life as my disciples by being reborn in the same place. Let me now instead practice a more developed form of loving-kindness. After practicing this more developed form of loving-kindness, after death I will attain rebirth into the Heaven of Streaming Radiance (Ābhassara).”

Dhammika, at a later time the great teacher Sunetta practiced a more developed form of loving-kindness. Having practiced that more developed form of loving-kindness, after death he attained rebirth into the Heaven of Streaming Radiance. Dhammika, the path of practice of the great teacher Sunetta and his disciples was not in vain. It yielded great fruits.

Just like the great teacher Sunetta, so too were [six other great teachers]: Mūgapakkha, the brahmin Aranemi, the teacher Kuddālaka, the young brahmin Hatthipāla, Jotipāla, [and his father] Govinda: these were the “seven [brahmin] chaplains” (satta purohita).<sup>426</sup>

Dhammika, these seven chaplains and teachers also had countless hundreds and thousands of disciples. Dhammika, these seven chaplains and teachers taught their disciples the method for [attaining] the Brahmā world. When the seven chaplains and teachers taught [their disciples] the method for [attaining] the Brahmā world, some of the disciples who did not completely accept and practice his method were reborn after death into the Heaven of the Four Kings, some were reborn into the Heaven of the Thirty-three, some were reborn into the Yāma Heaven, some were reborn into Tusita Heaven, some were reborn into the Heaven of Those Who Delight in Creating, and some were reborn into the Heaven of Those Who Delight in the Creations of Others.

When the seven chaplains and teachers taught [their disciples] the method for [attaining] the Brahmā world, those disciples who completely accepted and practiced his method developed the four divine abodes and abandoned sensual desire, and after death they attained rebirth into the Brahmā world. Dhammika, then [each of] the seven chaplains and teachers thought, “It is not proper that I, in the next life, should be on the same level as my disciples by being reborn in the same place. Let me instead practice a more developed kind of loving-kindness. After practicing that more developed kind of loving-kindness, after death I will attain rebirth into the Heaven of Streaming Radiance.”

620a

Dhammika, then subsequently the seven chaplains and teachers practiced a more developed form of loving-kindness. Having practiced that more developed form of loving-kindness, after death they attained rebirth into the Heaven of Streaming Radiance. Dhammika, the path of practice of the seven chaplains and teachers and [their] disciples was not in vain. It yielded great fruits.

Dhammika, if anyone had berated those seven teachers and their retinue of countless hundreds and thousands, if anyone had beaten them, become angry with them, or condemned them, then that person would certainly have been committing an immeasurably serious offense.

As for a disciple of the Buddha who has achieved right view, a monk who has attained [such] a lesser fruit, if anyone were to berate him, beat him, become angry with him, or condemn him, that person would be committing an even more serious offense. Therefore, Dhammika, you [and your fellow monks] should protect one another. Why is that? After you have abandoned this fault there will be no further loss [for you].

Thereupon the World-honored One uttered these verses:

Sunetta, Mūgapakkha,
The brahmin Aranemi,
The teacher Kuddālaka,
The young brahmin Hatthipāla,
Jotipāla, and [his father] Govinda—
[These were] the seven chaplains.

In the past
These seven teachers were renowned for their virtue,
Free of the bond of [sensual] craving, delighting in compassion,
And with the fetter of sensual desire completely transcended.

They had disciples,
Countless hundreds and thousands of them,
Who had also abandoned the fetter of sensual desire,
But only momentarily, not yet totally.

In the case of those heterodox seers,
Who protected themselves well when practicing asceticism,
Anyone who with hatred and jealousy in his mind
Derided them, would have been committing a serious offense.

In the case of a disciple of the Buddha who has attained right view,
Who is established in a lesser fruit,

Anyone who might deride, condemn, or attack him
Would be committing an even more serious offense.

Therefore, Dhammika,
You [and your fellow monks] should protect one another.
You should protect one another because
There is no offense more serious than this.

[It causes] suffering so severe
That the noble ones abhor it.
One will certainly receive disapproving looks
If he flagrantly adopts this position based on wrong view.

One who is the lowest grade of person,
As explained in the noble Dharma,
Namely one who has not yet abandoned sensual passion,
Has acquired to a very small degree the five faculties:<sup>427</sup>
Faith, energy, the establishment of mindfulness,
Right concentration, and right insight.

One who [derides, condemns, or attacks someone] like this will receive this suffering:

Facing the experience of one's own ruin.
One will experience one's own ruin
After harming others.

620b

[But] if one can protect oneself,
One can then protect others.
Therefore, one should protect oneself;
[In this way] the wise [achieve] lasting happiness.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Venerable Dhammika and the [other] monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

131. The Discourse on Overcoming Māra<sup>428</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying in Bhagga country, at Mount Crocodile (Sumsumāragiri) in the Fearsome Grove, the Deer Park.

At that time Venerable Mahāmoggallāna, who was supervising the construction of a meditation hut for the Buddha,<sup>429</sup> was walking back and forth out in the open. Then King Māra, transforming himself into a miniature form, entered Venerable Mahāmoggallāna's belly. Venerable Mahāmoggallāna thought, "Right now my belly feels as if I had just eaten beans. Let me enter the appropriate meditative concentration, such that through that appropriate meditative concentration I can observe my own belly."

Then Venerable Mahāmoggallāna walked to the end of the walking path, spread his sitting mat, sat down on it cross-legged, and entered the appropriate meditative concentration. Observing his own belly through the appropriate meditative concentration, Venerable Mahāmoggallāna knew that King Māra was inside his belly.

Venerable Mahāmoggallāna rose from meditative concentration and told King Māra:

Evil One, come out! Evil One, come out! Do not harass the Tathāgata, and do not harass a disciple of the Tathāgata! Do not [cause yourself] lack of prosperity and lack of benefit for a long time and the certainty of being reborn into a bad realm of existence and experiencing immeasurable suffering!

Then King Māra thought, "This renunciant does not see and know me when he says: 'Evil One, come out! Evil One, come out! Do not harass the Tathāgata, and do not harass a disciple of the Tathāgata! Do not [cause yourself] lack of prosperity and lack of benefit for a long time and the certainty of being reborn into a bad realm of existence and of experiencing immeasurable suffering!' Your venerable teacher is endowed with great supernormal power, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power, yet even he cannot see and know me so quickly. How, then, would his disciple be able to see and know me?"

Venerable Mahāmoggallāna further told King Māra:

I also know your mind. You are thinking this: "This renunciant does not see and know me when he says, 'Evil One, come out! Evil One, come out! Do not harass the Tathāgata, and do not harass a disciple of the Tathāgata! Do not [cause yourself] lack of prosperity and lack of benefit for a long time and the certainty of being reborn into a bad realm of existence and of experiencing immeasurable suffering!’ Your venerable teacher is endowed with great supernormal power, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power, yet even he cannot see and know me so quickly. How, then, would his disciple be able to see and know me?”

620c

Then Māra the Evil One thought again, “It is because this renunciant has seen and known me that he now says this.” Thereupon Māra, the Evil One, transforming himself into a miniature form, emerged from Venerable Mahāmoggallāna’s mouth and stood before him.

Venerable Mahāmoggallāna said:

Evil One, long ago there was a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, named Kakusandha. At that time I was a māra named Corrupter (Dūsī), and I had a sister named Black (Kālī). You were her son, Evil One. Therefore, you were my nephew.

Evil One, Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, had two chief disciples, one named Voice and the other named Perception. Evil One, for what reason was Venerable Voice named “Voice”? Evil One, Venerable Voice, when dwelling in the Brahmā world, often caused his voice to pervade a thousand worlds. No other disciple had a voice equal to his, similar to his, or surpassing his. Evil One, it was because of this that Venerable Voice was named “Voice.”<sup>430</sup>

Again, Evil One, for what reason was Venerable Perception named “Perception”? Evil One, Venerable Perception used to live in dependence on a village or town. When the night was over, at dawn he would put on his robes, take his bowl, and go into the village to beg for almsfood, well guarded as to his bodily [movements], well restrained as to his sense faculties, and established in right mindfulness. Having begged almsfood and after having partaken of the midday meal, he would put away his robe and bowl and wash his hands and feet. Then he would put his sitting mat over his shoulder and go to a forest, a mountain, the base of a tree, or some [other] secluded place. He would spread out his sitting mat, sit down on it cross-legged, and quickly enter the meditative concentration of the cessation of perception and knowing.

Then [it happened that] some cowherds, shepherds, woodsmen, and passersby entered the forest. Seeing him in the meditative concentration of the cessation of perception and knowing, they thought, “Now, this renunciant has died while sitting in the forest. Let us gather dry wood and grass, pile it up to cover his body, and cremate it.” So they gathered wood and grass, piled it up to cover his body, set fire to it, and departed.

When the night was over, at dawn, Venerable Perception rose from his meditative concentration, shook his robes [to remove the ashes], and went to the village or town on which he depended. Wearing his robes and carrying his bowl as usual, he entered the village to beg for almsfood, well guarded as to his bodily [movements], well restrained as to his sense faculties, and established in right mindfulness.

621a

The cowherds, shepherds, woodsmen, or passersby who had earlier entered the forest and seen him, who had thought, “Now, this renunciant has died while sitting in the forest,” [now thought,] “Yesterday we gathered dry wood and grass, piled it up to cover his body, set fire to it, and then left. Yet this venerable one has recovered his perception.” Evil One, it is for this reason that Venerable Perception was named “Perception.”<sup>431</sup>

Evil One, at that time the māra [named] Corrupter thought, “These shaven-headed renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness, their lineage is severed since they are without sons;<sup>432</sup> when practicing meditation, they muse, increasingly muse, and keep on musing, over and over.

“They are just like a donkey that has been carrying a heavy burden all day long and, on being tied up in the stable but not yet fed his wheat, muses about that wheat, increasingly muses, and keeps on musing over and over. In the same way, these shaven-headed renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness, their lineage is severed since they are without sons; when practicing meditation, they muse, increasingly muse, and keep on musing, over and over.

“They are just like a cat waiting beside a mouse hole, wanting to catch the mouse; because of that, it muses, increasingly muses, and keeps musing again and again. In the same way, these shaven-headed renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness, their lineage is severed since they are without sons; when practicing meditation, they muse, increasingly muse, and keep on musing, over and over.

“They are just like an owl or a fox that waits by a crevice in a pile of dry firewood because it wants to catch a mouse; because of that, it muses, increasingly muses, and keeps on musing over and over. In the same way, these shaven-headed renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness, their lineage is severed since they are without sons; when practicing meditation, they muse, increasingly muse, and keep on musing, over and over.

“They are just like a crane waiting on a riverbank because it wants to catch a fish; because of that, it muses, increasingly muses, and keeps on musing, over and over. In the same way, these shaven-headed renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness, their lineage is severed since they are without sons; when practicing meditation, they muse, increasingly muse, and keep on musing, over and over.

“What do they muse about? For what benefit do they muse? What are they seeking through musing? They are confused, crazy, and ruined. I do not know where they come from, where they are going to, or where they are staying. I do not know about their death or their rebirth. Let me incite the brahmin householders, ‘Come on, all of you! Revile the diligent renunciants! Beat them up and rebuke them!’ Why is this? Perhaps when [the renunciants] are reviled, beaten up, and rebuked it may stir up some unwholesome state of mind in them. Then I will get an opportunity.”

Evil One, when the māra [named] Corrupter incited the brahmin householders [in this way], the brahmin householders reviled, beat up, and rebuked the diligent renunciants. Some brahmin householders beat them with pieces of wood, some threw stones at them, some struck them with sticks, some injured the diligent renunciants’ heads, some tore their robes, and some broke their almsbowls.<sup>433</sup>

Then, because of this, conditioned by this, when those brahmin householders died, at the breaking up of the body at death, they certainly went to a bad realm, being reborn in hell. Having been reborn there, they thought, “We deserve to experience this suffering, and we will experience suffering more extreme than this. Why is that? Because we performed evil deeds toward diligent renunciants.” 621b

Evil One, the disciples of Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, having had their heads injured, their robes torn, and their almsbowls broken, approached Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened.

At that time Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, was surrounded by a retinue of countless hundreds and thousands to whom he was teaching the Dharma.<sup>434</sup> Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, saw from afar that his disciples with their heads injured, their robes torn, and their almsbowls broken, were approaching. Seeing this, he addressed the monks, “Do you see that? The māra [named] Corrupter has incited brahmin householders: ‘Come on, all of you! Revile the diligent renunciants! Beat them up and rebuke them!’ Why is that? [Because he thought,] ‘Perhaps, when they are reviled, beaten up, and rebuked, that may stir up some unwholesome state of mind in them. Then I will get an opportunity.’

“Monks, you should dwell with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, mentally pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth directions—all four directions and also the four intermediate directions, above and below, all around, everywhere. Dwell with a mind imbued with loving-kindness—without bondage, resentment, ill-will, and contention—[with a mind] that has become boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well developed, having pervaded the entire world. Dwell like this, having pervaded the entire world with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathetic joy . . . with equanimity, without bondage, resentment, ill-will, and contention—[with a mind] that has become boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well developed. Let the māra [named] Corrupter who seeks to get an opportunity be unable to get an opportunity.”

Evil One, [when] Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, taught his disciples this teaching and they had received this teaching, they dwelled mentally pervading one direction with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth directions—all four directions and also the four intermediate directions, above and below, all around, everywhere. They dwelled with a mind imbued with loving-kindness—without bondage, resentment, ill-will, and contention—[with a mind] that had become boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well developed, having pervaded the entire world. They dwelled like this having pervaded the entire world with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathetic joy . . . with equanimity, without bondage, resentment, ill-will, and contention—[with a mind] that had become boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well developed. For this reason, the māra [named] Corrupter who was seeking to get an opportunity was unable to get an opportunity.

Evil One, at that time the māra [named] Corrupter thought, “I am unable to get an opportunity with the diligent renunciants in this way. Let me now instead urge the brahmin householders, ‘Come on, all of you. Respect, revere, and serve the diligent renunciants!’ Perhaps, when the diligent renunciants are respected, revered, and served that may stir up some unwholesome state of mind in them. Then I will get an opportunity.”

Evil One, having been urged [thus] by the māra [named] Corrupter, all the brahmin householders respected, revered, and served the diligent renunciants.<sup>435</sup> [They] spread their clothes on the ground and said, “Diligent renunciants, please walk on this. The diligent renunciants practice what is difficult to practice. Grant us long-lasting benefit and gain, peace and happiness [by stepping on these clothes]!” 621c

The brahmin householders spread their hair on the ground and said, “Diligent renunciants, please walk on this. The diligent renunciants practice what is difficult to practice. Grant us long-lasting benefit and gain, peace and happiness [by stepping on this hair]!”

The brahmin householders, holding various kinds of food and drink in their hands, stood waiting by the roadside, saying, “Diligent renunciants, accept this, eat this, take it with you and use it as you wish. Grant us long-lasting benefit and gain, peace and happiness!”

The faithful brahmin householders, seeing the diligent renunciants, respectfully took them by the arm, led them inside [their houses] and, holding up various valuable objects, said to the diligent renunciants, “Accept this! Take it with you and use it as you wish!”

Then because of this, conditioned by this, when those brahmin householders died at the breaking up of the body at death, they certainly went to a good realm of existence, being reborn in a heavenly world. Having been reborn there, they thought, “We deserve to experience this happiness, and we will experience even more extreme happiness. Why is that? Because we performed good deeds toward the diligent renunciants.”

Evil One, the disciples of Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, having been respected, revered, and served, approached Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. At that time Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, was surrounded by a retinue of countless hundreds and thousands to whom he was teaching the Dharma.

Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, saw from afar that his disciples, who had been respected, revered, and served, were approaching. Seeing this, he addressed the monks, “Did you see that? The māra [named] Corrupter urged the brahmin householders, ‘Come on, all of you! Respect, revere, and serve the diligent renunciants!’ [He thought,] ‘Perhaps, when the diligent renunciants are respected, revered, and served, it may stir up some unwholesome state of mind in them, and then I will get an opportunity.’

“Monks, you should contemplate all formations as impermanent, contemplate them as of a nature to rise and fall, contemplate dispassion, contemplate abandoning, contemplate cessation, and contemplate elimination.<sup>436</sup> Let the māra [named] Corrupter, who seeks to get an opportunity, be unable to get an opportunity.”

Evil One, when Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, taught his disciples this teaching and they had received the teaching, they contemplated all formations as impermanent, they contemplated them as of a nature to rise and fall, they contemplated dispassion, they contemplated abandoning, they contemplated cessation, and they contemplated elimination, so that the māra [named] Corrupter, who was seeking to get an opportunity, was unable to get an opportunity.

622a

Evil One, at that time the māra [named] Corrupter thought, “I am unable to get an opportunity with the diligent renunciants in this way. Let me instead transform myself into a young man and, holding a large stick in my hand and standing by the roadside, I will hit Venerable Voice on the head so that [his head] is cut and blood runs down his face.”<sup>437</sup>

Evil One, at dawn Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, who was living in dependence on a village or town, put on his robes, took his bowl, and entered the village to beg for almsfood. Venerable Voice followed behind him as his attendant.

Evil One, at that time the māra [named] Corrupter, having transformed himself into a young man, was holding a large stick in his hand and standing by the roadside. He hit Venerable Voice on the head, cutting it, and blood ran down his face. Evil One, Venerable Voice, with his head cut and blood running down his face, followed behind Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, like a shadow that never left him.

Evil One, Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, having reached the village, turned his whole body around to the right to look, in the way a nāga looks around, observing in all directions without fear or trepidation.

Evil One, Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, saw that Venerable Voice, with his head cut and blood running down his face, was following behind the Buddha like a shadow that never left him. Then he said, “The māra [named] Corrupter is vicious and violent and possesses great power. This māra [named] Corrupter does not know how much is enough.”

Evil One, before Kakusandha Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, had finished speaking, at that time the body of the māra [named] Corrupter straightaway fell from that place into the Great Hell Without Omission.

Evil One, this Great Hell has four designations. The first is “Without Omission,” the second is “Hundred Nails,” the third is “Barbed Spikes,” and the fourth is “Six Contacts.”<sup>438</sup> In the Great Hell there are wardens who approached the māra [named] Corrupter. They told the māra [named] Corrupter, “Now, you should know that when nail and nail meet each other, a full hundred years have passed.”

Hearing this, Māra, the Evil One, experienced palpitations of the heart due to fear and terror, and all his bodily hair stood on end. He addressed Venerable Mahāmoggallāna in verse:

Which hell was it
 Into which the māra [named] Corrupter fell long ago,
 He who troubled and harmed practitioners of the Buddha’s holy life
 And offended against the monks?

Venerable Mahāmoggallāna answered Māra, the Evil One, in verse:<sup>439</sup>

622b Without Omission is the name of the hell
In which the māra [named] Corrupter formerly [fell],
[When he] troubled and harmed practitioners of the Buddha's holy life
And offended against the monks.

It contains a hundred iron nails,
Each of them with barbed spikes.
Without Omission is the name of the hell
That the māra [named] Corrupter was in long ago.

Those who do not understand
The [consequences of attacking] monks who are the Buddha's disciples
Will certainly suffer like this,
Experiencing the results of their black deeds.

There are various kinds of pleasure parks,
For human beings on the earth
Who eat naturally grown white rice
[While] dwelling in the northern continent (Uttarakuru),

On the peak of the great Mount Sumeru
I cultivated [my mind] well and burned up [all defilements].
Having cultivated there and [attained] liberation,
I [now] bear my last body.

Located by a great spring
Is a palace that will last for the [entire] eon,
Of delightful golden color,
And radiant like a flame.

Various kinds of music are performed
As [one] approaches the [dwelling] place of Sakka,
His single residence, which in the past,
As is well known, had been offered to him.

With Sakka walking ahead of me
I ascended to the Vejayanta Palace.

On seeing Sakka, each heavenly nymph
 Began dancing with great joy.
 On seeing that a monk was coming,
 They withdrew in shame.

On reaching the Vejayanta Palace,
 And seeing the monk, [Sakka] asked him a question,
 “Does the great seer know
 The end of craving and the attainment of liberation?”

The monk replied
 According to the inquirer’s question,
 “Kosiya, I do know
 The end of craving and the attainment of liberation.”

On hearing his answer
 Sakka gained joy and happiness.
 [He said,] “The monk benefits [me] greatly;
 What he has said is in accordance with my question.”

After reaching the Vejayanta Palace,
 [The monk] asked Sakka, ruler of the devas,
 “What is the name of this palace,
 Sakka, in the city you rule?”

Sakka answered, “Great Seer,
 It is called Vejayanta,
 Which means ‘a thousand worlds
 Among a thousand worlds.’
 Nothing surpasses or [even] resembles
 This palace Vejayanta.”

[There] the Heavenly King, Sakka, ruler of the devas,
 Can dwell at ease as he pleases.
 He enjoys a myriad pleasures,
 By transforming one [pleasure] into a hundred.
 In the Vejayanta Palace
 Sakka is able to dwell at ease.

622c

Great though the Vejayanta Palace is,
I was able to shake it with my toe,
As the Heavenly King saw with his own eyes.
Yet Sakka is [still] able to dwell [in it] at ease.

For, like the Hall of Migāra's Mother,
Its foundations are built extremely deep and solid.
It is difficult to move and shake,
[Yet] supernatural power can shake it.

It has colored glaze floors
Upon which noble ones have trodden.
Smooth and glossy, lovely to touch,
Spread with soft cotton covers.

With loving speech and harmonious company,
The Heavenly King is always happy.
He is skilled in playing music
With harmonious tone and melody.

When a stream-enterer speaks
All the devas come and assemble,<sup>440</sup>
Countless thousands
And hundreds of myriads of them.

Having gone to the Heaven of the Thirty-three,
The one endowed with the eye of wisdom taught them the Dharma.
Having heard his teaching,
[The devas] were delighted and received it respectfully.

I too have this quality,
As the seers say.
I went up to the Brahmā world
And asked Brahmā,
“Brahmā, do you [still] have this view,
Namely the view: ‘I existed in the distant past,
And I still exist, and I always will exist,
Eternal and unchanging’?”

Brahmā answered,
 “Great seer, I no longer have that view,
 Namely the view: ‘I existed in the distant past,
 I am eternal and unchanging.’
 [Instead] I see that all Brahmās
 In this realm will pass away.
 How could I now say
 That I am eternal and unchanging?

“I see that this world
 Is just as the Fully Awakened One has taught.
 It has arisen in accordance with causes and conditions,
 And will return to where it came from.

“Fire does not think:
 ‘I will burn the ignorant one.’
 When a fire is burning, if an ignorant one touches it,
 Naturally he is certain to be burned.

“In the same way, Evil One,
 If you harass a tathāgata,
 And engage in unwholesome conduct for a long time,
 You will experience the [bad] results for a long time.

“Evil One, do not dislike the Buddha!
 Do not trouble or harm monks!
 There is a monk who overcomes Māra Dwelling in the Fearsome Grove.”

The Evil One was worried and grieved,
 After being reprimanded by Moggallāna.
 Frightened and lacking wisdom,
 He immediately disappeared from that place.

623a

Thus spoke Venerable Mahāmoggallāna. Having heard what Venerable Mahāmoggallāna said, Māra the Evil One was delighted and received it respectfully.

Notes

Division 7

- <sup>1</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Upakkilesa-sutta, MN 128 at MN III 152 (see also Mv 10.2 at Vin I 342); for a comparative study see Bhikkhu Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2011), pp. 731–741. Here and elsewhere, further information on previously published comparative studies can be found in this source.
- <sup>2</sup> In the Pāli parallels a monk informs the Buddha of what is happening. The ensuing tale of the king of Kosala is found only in the Vinaya, not in the Upakkilesa-sutta.
- <sup>3</sup> In the Pāli Vinaya version King Dīghīti of Kosala immediately flees when King Brahmadatta of Kāsi attacks for the first time, as he feels unable to resist the attack.
- <sup>4</sup> The Pāli Vinaya version does not report that King Dīghīti of Kosala took to performing music and in this way came to live with the brahmin chaplain.
- <sup>5</sup> In the Pāli Vinaya version Dīghīti directly approaches the brahmin chaplain and relates his wife's request.
- <sup>6</sup> The Pāli Vinaya version does not describe the prince's training but reports that he was sent to live outside the town, out of caution regarding King Brahmadatta.
- <sup>7</sup> According to the Pāli Vinaya version, the barber of King Dīghīti had happened to see his former master and then told King Brahmadatta.
- <sup>8</sup> In the Pāli Vinaya version King Brahmadatta immediately orders the execution of Dīghīti and his wife. Their son happens to visit the town just at that time and sees them being paraded through the streets.
- <sup>9</sup> According to the Pāli Vinaya version, King Dīghīti and his wife had been executed, and it was their son who took care of their bodily remains.
- <sup>10</sup> In the Pāli Vinaya version, the son has found work in an elephant stable. He is overheard by King Brahmadatta singing and playing a lute in the stable, and the king subsequently sends for him.
- <sup>11</sup> In the Pāli Vinaya version at this point Prince Long Life again draws his sword, holds it to King Brahmadatta's throat, and recounts the harm done by the king to his parents.
- <sup>12</sup> In the Pāli Vinaya version they grant each other their lives.

- <sup>13</sup> In the Upakkilesa-sutta only one monk tells the Buddha three times to stay out of their dispute.
- <sup>14</sup> A stanza in the Upakkilesa-sutta instead has, before the line about living alone like an elephant, a line that describes a king who leaves behind a realm he has conquered. This fits the context better and suggests that the idea of “governing sternly” could be the result of some error in transmission or translation.
- <sup>15</sup> In the Upakkilesa-sutta the Buddha instead departs by walking away.
- <sup>16</sup> The Upakkilesa-sutta does not describe Bhagu’s practice.
- <sup>17</sup> In the Upakkilesa-sutta Bhagu reports only that he has no trouble getting food.
- <sup>18</sup> The Buddha’s sojourn in the Rakkhitavana Grove in the company of an elephant is also recorded at Vin I 352, according to which this took place after he had visited Anuruddha and his companions.
- <sup>19</sup> A comparable description is found in the Upakkilesa-sutta, but later, as part of a report given by Anuruddha to the Buddha.
- <sup>20</sup> The corresponding description in the Upakkilesa-sutta does not refer to their practice of meditation, and in relation to their regular meetings every five days mentions only that they discuss the Dharma, not that they might alternatively sit together in silence.
- <sup>21</sup> The Upakkilesa-sutta does not report any reply by the Buddha to the warden; here Anuruddha intervenes right away.
- <sup>22</sup> Adopting the variant 是, in accordance with the reading of this passage found in the Abhidharmakośabhāṣya; see Prahlād Pradhān, Abhidharmakośabhāṣya of Vasubandhu (Patna: K. P. Jayaswal Research Institute, 1967), p. 300: yat tat loka nāsti. This specification, not found in the Upakkilesa-sutta, helps explain why doubt can arise, namely because of unfamiliarity with the mental experience of an inner light (as the result of deepening concentration).
- <sup>23</sup> 身病, literally “bodily disease,” which might render an Indic original comparable to the Pāli kāyaduṭṭhulla, hence the rendering “bodily inertia.”
- <sup>24</sup> The Upakkilesa-sutta illustrates excessive energy, the seventh upakkilesa in its listing, with the example of grasping a quail so tightly that it will die; the same simile, but with grasping the quail too loosely, then illustrates lack of energy.
- <sup>25</sup> The corresponding simile in the Upakkilesa-sutta describes searching for one entrance to a treasure and finding five entrances.
- <sup>26</sup> Conceit is not mentioned in the Upakkilesa-sutta.
- <sup>27</sup> The Upakkilesa-sutta instead speaks of excessive meditation on forms. Whereas the rest of the list, in spite of some variations in sequence, appears to be on the whole similar, in the case of this last item in both lists the two versions stand in direct contrast to each other. The instruction in MĀ 72 makes it appear recommendable to contemplate forms, but MN 128 warns against excessively contemplating forms.

- <sup>28</sup> These three types of concentration occur only at the end of the Upakkilesa-sutta as part of a summary statement in which the Buddha describes his practice of concentration with vitakka and vicāra, without vitakka but still with vicāra, and without either.
- <sup>29</sup> Here and below, the translation is based on an emendation, given in brackets. The text speaks rather of “knowledge” of forms. Since otherwise the passage is about “vision” of forms and “knowledge” of light, it seems probable that the formulation here is the result of a textual error.
- <sup>30</sup> Instead of exclusive, diversified, limited, and vast concentrations, the Upakkilesa-sutta mentions concentration with and without rapture, with enjoyment, and with equanimity.
- <sup>31</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Gayā-sutta, AN 8.64 at AN IV 302, which has Gayāsīsa at Gayā as its location.
- <sup>32</sup> According to the Gayā-sutta, the Buddha did perceive light, but did not see forms.
- <sup>33</sup> In the Gayā-sutta the item that follows being able to converse with the devas is knowing which order (nikāya) of devas they belong to.
- <sup>34</sup> In the Gayā-sutta knowing the karma that led the devas to their rebirths precedes knowing their pleasure or pain and knowing their life spans.
- <sup>35</sup> Recognition of individual devas is not mentioned in the Gayā-sutta.
- <sup>36</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Anuruddha-sutta, AN 8.30 at AN IV 228.
- <sup>37</sup> Instead of the ability to wander freely in the four directions, the Anuruddha-sutta compares the medicine made out of fermented cow’s urine to various medications made of ghee, butter, oil, honey, and molasses. The Anuruddha-sutta also does not report any prediction about increasing in wholesome states or attaining one of two fruits; it instead directly continues with the Buddha’s advice that Anuruddha should spend the rainy season in the same place.
- <sup>38</sup> In the Anuruddha-sutta the Buddha addresses the monks immediately on his return, without asking Ānanda to gather them.
- <sup>39</sup> The Anuruddha-sutta additionally mentions contentment with lodgings and medicine.
- <sup>40</sup> Instead of bodily and mental seclusion, the Anuruddha-sutta describes a detached attitude toward visitors.
- <sup>41</sup> Instead of the four satipaṭṭhānas, the Anuruddha-sutta just mentions mindfulness of the type that enables recalling what was said and done long ago.
- <sup>42</sup> The Anuruddha-sutta only mentions inclining the mind toward the extinction of proliferation.

- <sup>43</sup> The Anuruddha-sutta specifies that the Buddha had come through his mind-made body (manomayena kāyena).
- <sup>44</sup> The next two stanzas in MĀ 74 are not found in the Anuruddha-sutta; the last has a counterpart in Th 919.
- <sup>45</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Āneñjasappāya-sutta, MN 106 at MN II 261; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 613–623; Madhyama-āgama Studies, (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2012), pp. 195–222.
- <sup>46</sup> Instead of sensual pleasures and material forms, the Āneñjasappāya-sutta takes up sensual pleasures and sensual perceptions.
- <sup>47</sup> In addition to material forms, the Āneñjasappāya-sutta mentions sensual pleasures and sensual perceptions.
- <sup>48</sup> In addition to the corresponding perceptions, the Āneñjasappāya-sutta also mentions sensual pleasures and material forms; and it commends that the cessation of all these is to be viewed as peaceful.
- <sup>49</sup> The translation is based on an emendation of the text. For the words given in angle brackets (< >) the text instead has, in each case, “imperturbability.” The context shows that these must be textual errors.
- <sup>50</sup> The second approach to nothingness in the Āneñjasappāya-sutta is just about being empty of a self and of what belongs to a self, without an explicit mention of being empty of permanence.
- <sup>51</sup> In the Āneñjasappāya-sutta the third approach to nothingness is to contemplate: “I am not anything belonging to anyone anywhere,” etc.
- <sup>52</sup> According to the Āneñjasappāya-sutta, the cessation of all these perceptions is to be viewed as peaceful.
- <sup>53</sup> In the Āneñjasappāya-sutta Ānanda highlights that the Buddha taught the crossing of the flood in dependence on one support after another.
- <sup>54</sup> The Pāli parallels are the Bhikkhu-sutta, SN 47.3 at SN V 142, which has Jeta’s Grove at Sāvathī as its location, and the Saṅkhitta-sutta, AN 8.63 at AN IV 299, which does not specify the location.
- <sup>55</sup> In the two Pāli versions, the Buddha first rebuffs the monk before giving an instruction.
- <sup>56</sup> The injunction to settle the mind within has a counterpart in the Saṅkhitta-sutta (where this is followed by instructions on the brahmavihāras); practice of the four satipaṭṭhānas internally and externally is described in the Bhikkhu-sutta (where it is preceded by the need to purify morality and have straight view).
- <sup>57</sup> The implication of this expression is unclear; to judge from the Pāli parallels, it could be a textual error.

- <sup>58</sup> The Saṅkhitta-sutta recommends cultivating concentration with vitakka and vicāra, without vitakka but with a remainder of vicāra, without vitakka or vicāra, with rapture, without rapture, with enjoyment, and with equanimity.
- <sup>59</sup> The Saṅkhitta-sutta takes up the brahmavihāras first and only afterward the four satipaṭṭhānas (which are not explicitly shown to require internal and external practice), and in relation to both it enjoins that such concentration should be with vitakka and vicāra, without vitakka but with a remainder of vicāra, without vitakka or vicāra, with rapture, without rapture, with enjoyment, and with equanimity. Only in relation to the four satipaṭṭhānas does the Saṅkhitta-sutta mention being at ease in any bodily posture.
- <sup>60</sup> Such a prediction of attainment is not found in the two Pāli parallels, although both report that the monk who received the respective instructions, after practice in seclusion, became an arahant.
- <sup>61</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Naḷakapāna-sutta, MN 68 at MN I 462, which has Naḷakapāna in the Kosalan country as its location; for a comparative study, see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 370–373.
- <sup>62</sup> In the Naḷakapāna-sutta the Buddha instead asks if they thought he practiced restraint because he had not yet eradicated the taints.
- <sup>63</sup> According to the Naḷakapāna-sutta, it is because the Buddha has eradicated the taints that he practices restraint.
- <sup>64</sup> The Buddha's secluded lifestyle is not taken up in the Naḷakapāna-sutta.
- <sup>65</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta, MN 49 at MN I 326; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 294–299.
- <sup>66</sup> According to the Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta, Māra had actually taken possession of a member of the assembly.
- <sup>67</sup> The Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta does not report that Māra disappeared.
- <sup>68</sup> In the Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta the Buddha adds that Brahmā had previously passed away from the Ābhassarā heavenly realm and in the meantime had forgotten about it.
- <sup>69</sup> In the Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta the Buddha also refers to the nonmanifestative or invisible consciousness, anidassana viññāṇa.
- <sup>70</sup> The text gives the impression that Brahmā is still the speaker. The Pāli editions differ and only some mark the corresponding part as spoken by the Buddha; for a discussion see Anālayo, “The Luminous Mind in Theravāda and Dharmaguptaka Discourses”, Journal of the Oxford Centre for Buddhist Studies 13 (2017): 10–50.
- <sup>71</sup> According to the Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta, the Buddha spoke the stanza on seeing fear in becoming while he had made himself invisible.

- <sup>72</sup> The reference to joining the assembly “up to three times” is not clear. According to the earlier narration he had departed once, so for him to come back now would constitute only a second joining of the assembly.
- <sup>73</sup> Instead of telling Māra to keep away from the topic of the Buddha’s teaching activities, in the Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta the Buddha affirms his eradication of the taints, comparing it to a palm tree that has been cut down.
- <sup>74</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Anuruddha-sutta, MN 127 at MN III 144; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 726–731.
- <sup>75</sup> The protagonist in the Anuruddha-sutta is instead the householder Pañcakaṅga.
- <sup>76</sup> Adopting the variant 料 instead of 斷.
- <sup>77</sup> In the Anuruddha-sutta those who have taught him are instead elder monks, therā bhikkhū. Similarly later in Anuruddha’s description, those who practice these liberations are monks, not renunciants and brahmins.
- <sup>78</sup> The Anuruddha-sutta does not report a question-and-answer exchange at this juncture. Another difference is that in the preceding part it first takes up the immeasurable and then the exalted liberation of the mind.
- <sup>79</sup> Instead of these three, the Anuruddha-sutta distinguishes four types: devas of limited radiance, immeasurable radiance, defiled radiance, and pure radiance.
- <sup>80</sup> The fly simile in the Anuruddha-sutta, where the fly is on a carrying pole or basket, illustrates that the devas do not consider themselves to be permanent.
- <sup>81</sup> In the Anuruddha-sutta Kaccāna instead asks if the devas are all of limited radiance or if some are rather of immeasurable radiance, and later on he asks the same question for those of defiled and pure radiance.
- <sup>82</sup> The Anuruddha-sutta does not have a reference to the Buddha’s position on this matter.
- <sup>83</sup> The lotus simile is not found in the Anuruddha-sutta.
- <sup>84</sup> In the Anuruddha-sutta the simile of the impure oil lamp illustrates devas of defiled radiance.
- <sup>85</sup> In the Anuruddha-sutta Kaccāna instead addresses Anuruddha, and apparently in a discourteous way.
- <sup>86</sup> The Anuruddha-sutta reports neither the meal offering nor the delight of the audience.
- <sup>87</sup> Adopting the variant 墩 instead of 塹.
- <sup>88</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kāyagatāsati-sutta, MN 119 at MN III 88, which has Jeta’s Grove at Sāvathī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 673–678.

- <sup>89</sup> The sequence of body contemplation in the Kāyagatāsati-sutta differs, proceeding from mindfulness of breathing to bodily postures, bodily activities, anatomical parts, elements, cemetery contemplations, and the four absorptions.
- <sup>90</sup> The Kāyagatāsati-sutta does not mention falling asleep or waking up as part of the contemplation of bodily postures.
- <sup>91</sup> The Kāyagatāsati-sutta states that memories and intentions related to the household life are abandoned and the mind becomes concentrated.
- <sup>92</sup> The Kāyagatāsati-sutta also mentions eating, drinking, consuming food, tasting, defecating, and urinating.
- <sup>93</sup> This and the following exercise are not mentioned in the Kāyagatāsati-sutta.
- <sup>94</sup> Adopting the variant 拏 instead of 拏.
- <sup>95</sup> The translation is based on emending what in the original is a reference to “verbal activities” when exhaling, clearly a textual error.
- <sup>96</sup> In the case of each of the four absorptions, the Kāyagatāsati-sutta also describes the actual attainment of the corresponding absorption before depicting how it affects the body.
- <sup>97</sup> The Kāyagatāsati-sutta does not give the size of the cloth, which it qualifies as being white.
- <sup>98</sup> This and the following exercise are not mentioned in the Kāyagatāsati-sutta.
- <sup>99</sup> Guanxiang 觀相, which perhaps is equivalent to the paccavekkhaṇanimitta.
- <sup>100</sup> This list of seeds differs from the seeds in the same simile in MĀ 98, the parallel to the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta.
- <sup>101</sup> The Kāyagatāsati-sutta lists only the four elements of earth, water, fire, and wind.
- <sup>102</sup> Cremation or burial are not mentioned in the Kāyagatāsati-sutta.
- <sup>103</sup> In the Kāyagatāsati-sutta this and the following descriptions are rather about monks who have or have not established mindfulness of the body. The Pāli version also has a different sequence: it first has the three similes of throwing a ball, fire sticks, and the water pot that illustrate lack of being established in mindfulness of the body, and then their three counterparts that illustrate the presence of mindfulness of the body.
- <sup>104</sup> Adopting the variant 搏 instead of 闢.
- <sup>105</sup> The Kāyagatāsati-sutta has three more similes, which describe tilting a full water jug, loosening the embankment of a pond full of water, and driving a chariot wherever one wishes.
- <sup>106</sup> The Kāyagatāsati-sutta announces and lists ten benefits. It does not refer to not getting stuck in the three unwholesome thoughts, nor to attaining stream-entry, once-returning, nonreturning, and the four immaterial attainments.

- <sup>107</sup> Adopting a variant that does not have a reference to this being also “the fifth, sixth and seventh benefit,” 五六七. Since overcoming three types of unwholesome thought cannot result in four benefits, the reference to the fifth, sixth, and seventh benefits must be misplaced, probably belonging with the next item in the list.
- <sup>108</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 第五至.
- <sup>109</sup> Adopting a variant that speaks of “seven” instead of “one” existence.
- <sup>110</sup> Adopting a variant that only mentions the twelfth benefit at this point and accordingly deleting a redundant passage on the eradication of the taints.
- <sup>111</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Hatthisāriputta-sutta, AN 6.60 at AN III 392, which has the Isipatana at Vārāṇasī as its location.
- <sup>112</sup> The Hatthisāriputta-sutta mentions not just association with laypeople but associating with other monastics, lay disciples, kings, and ministers, as well as non-Buddhist practitioners and their disciples.
- <sup>113</sup> In the Hatthisāriputta-sutta the simile of no longer seeing animals in a lake illustrates the effect of having attained the second absorption, whereas the simile of the dust at a crossroads becoming mud after rain illustrates the effect of the first absorption.
- <sup>114</sup> Adopting a variant that reads 咸 instead of 減.
- <sup>115</sup> In the Hatthisāriputta-sutta the simile of the lake without waves illustrates the effect of having attained the fourth absorption, whereas the simile related to food illustrates the third absorption.
- <sup>116</sup> The simile in the Hatthisāriputta-sutta depicts a person who has just finished a delicious meal and is offered leftover food from the day before.
- <sup>117</sup> In the Hatthisāriputta-sutta Mahākoṭṭhita affirms that he knew the mind of Citta and had also been informed about it by devas. The Pāli discourse continues by reporting that Citta’s friends also informed the Buddha of Citta’s disrobing, who then predicted that Citta would soon go forth again. This indeed happened, Citta went forth again and eventually became an arahant.
- <sup>118</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Pacalāyamāna-sutta, which is the first part of AN 7.58 at AN IV 85; the second part of this discourse in the PTS edition, beginning at AN IV 88, is a different discourse which is rather a parallel to MĀ 138.
- <sup>119</sup> Instead of these three means related to the teachings—recitation, teaching others, and reflection—the Pacalāyamāna-sutta only recommends two, reflection and recitation.
- <sup>120</sup> The Pacalāyamāna-sutta combines this and the preceding one into a single remedy of washing the eyes with water and looking at the constellations. The next recommendation in the Pacalāyamāna-sutta is to cultivate ālokasaññā, “perception of light” (or “clarity of perception”?), a method not mentioned in MĀ 83.

- <sup>121</sup> The Pacalāyamāna-sutta does not recommend resuming sitting meditation after having done walking meditation. According to its presentation, if after doing walking meditation one still feels tired, it is time to lie down and take a rest.
- <sup>122</sup> In total the Pacalāyamāna-sutta lists only eight recommendations: to avoid the perception that has led to the drowsiness, to reflect on the teachings, to recite the teachings, to pull on the earlobes, to rinse the eyes with water and look at the constellations, to develop perception of light, to practice walking meditation, and to lie down.
- <sup>123</sup> After its list of methods to overcome drowsiness, the Pacalāyamāna-sutta warns against pride when begging alms, engaging in contentious talk, and being bound to monastics or laypeople.
- <sup>124</sup> In the Pacalāyamāna-sutta the Buddha introduces this instruction with the dictum that “nothing in the world is worth adhering to.”
- <sup>125</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kaṇṭaka-sutta, AN 10.72 at AN V 133, which has as its location the Gabled Hall in the Great Wood at the same location, Vesālī.
- <sup>126</sup> The reconstruction of the last four of these six names is only tentative.
- <sup>127</sup> The Kaṇṭaka-sutta does not report the actual visit by the Licchavis.
- <sup>128</sup> The Kaṇṭaka-sutta announces and then describes ten thorns: socializing as a thorn for seclusion, pursuit of (physical) beauty as a thorn for cultivation of asubha, entertainments as a thorn for sense restraint, female company as a thorn for celibacy (for males), sound as a thorn for the first absorption, vitakka-vicāra as a thorn for the second absorption, rapture as a thorn for the third absorption, inhalation and exhalation as a thorn for the fourth absorption, perception and feeling as a thorn for the attainment of cessation, and finally lust (sensual passion), hatred (anger), and delusion (ignorance) as thorns in general.
- <sup>129</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Sappurisa-sutta, MN 113 at MN III 37; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 639–643.
- <sup>130</sup> The Sappurisa-sutta takes up several types of distinguished families, which in its presentation become four different grounds for pride.
- <sup>131</sup> The Sappurisa-sutta does not mention being handsome and agreeable as a potential ground for pride.
- <sup>132</sup> A related quality in the Sappurisa-sutta is being a preacher of the Dharma (dhamma-kathika).
- <sup>133</sup> In addition to fame, similarly highlighted in the Sappurisa-sutta, another related ground for pride in its presentation is the gain of requisites, not mentioned in MĀ 85.

- <sup>134</sup> The Sappurisa-sutta reckons being learned and being versed in the Vinaya as two separate potential grounds for pride; it also does not refer to the Abhidharma.
- <sup>135</sup> The Sappurisa-sutta only mentions wearing rag robes as a potential ground for pride.
- <sup>136</sup> The Sappurisa-sutta reckons begging alms and taking only one meal as two potential grounds for pride.
- <sup>137</sup> The corresponding grounds for pride in the Sappurisa-sutta are dwelling in a forest, at the base of a tree, in a cemetery, and out in the open; additional grounds for pride, not mentioned in MĀ 85, are the practices of never lying down to rest and accepting any bed.
- <sup>138</sup> Adopting the variant 受 instead of 愛. In the Sappurisa-sutta the true person reflects that the Buddha had recommended nonidentification (atammayatā) with the first absorption; the same holds for the other absorptions and immaterial attainments.
- <sup>139</sup> The Sappurisa-sutta additionally takes up the attainment of cessation, which it implicitly shows to be no longer within reach of the untrue person.
- <sup>140</sup> This discourse is not a parallel to the Chachakka-sutta, MN 148 at MN III 280; cf. Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 838, n. 96.

Division 8

- <sup>141</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 穢 before 經. The Pāli parallel is the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta, MN 5 at MN I 24, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvattihī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 42–45.
- <sup>142</sup> In the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta the one who asks this question is Mahāmoggallāna.
- <sup>143</sup> Here and below, the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta has no statement about the realm of one's rebirth.
- <sup>144</sup> The Anaṅgaṇa-sutta has this as four distinct topics, namely the wish to be the one who gives teachings to each of the four assemblies.
- <sup>145</sup> This wish has no counterpart in the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta.
- <sup>146</sup> The Anaṅgaṇa-sutta has being respected by each of the four assemblies as four distinct wishes.
- <sup>147</sup> In the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta the corresponding four wishes are for excellent robes, excellent food, excellent resting places, and excellent medicine. The wish for others not to get the same is therefore only for such excellent requisites, not for others not to get any requisites at all. Since it seems implausible that a monastic would wish for his companions not to receive any requisites, the qualification "[excellent]" has been added to the translation of MĀ 87.
- <sup>148</sup> The Anaṅgaṇa-sutta notes that others will not respect such a monk even if he engages in various types of ascetic practice; conversely a monk without defilements will be respected even if he does not adopt an ascetic living style.

- <sup>149</sup> Instead of feces, in the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta the carcass of a dead animal or a human is put into the dish.
- <sup>150</sup> Such a warning is not found in the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta.
- <sup>151</sup> In the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta the onlookers are just curious to know what is inside, without expecting it to contain something repulsive.
- <sup>152</sup> The Anaṅgaṇa-sutta speaks of the ājīvika Paṇḍuputta who observes Samīti, the son of a cartwright, at work; it does not refer to a house of Paṇḍuputta.
- <sup>153</sup> The original here refers to a “renunciant,” presumably a mistake caused by the recurrent reference to the same term in a preceding passage.
- <sup>154</sup> The simile of receiving a flower garland in the Anaṅgaṇa-sutta concerns a woman or a man.
- <sup>155</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dhammadāyāda-sutta, MN 3 at MN I 12, which has Jeta’s Grove at Sāvatthī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 34–37.
- <sup>156</sup> The Dhammadāyāda-sutta does not list by name the monks present on this occasion.
- <sup>157</sup> In the Dhammadāyāda-sutta being heirs in the Dharma is contrasted with being heirs in material things in general, not just in food and drink.
- <sup>158</sup> A comparable exposition in the Dhammadāyāda-sutta has Sāriputta as its speaker.
- <sup>159</sup> In the Dhammadāyāda-sutta the Buddha had already withdrawn earlier, without any reference to having a backache and without asking Sāriputta to continue the teaching.
- <sup>160</sup> In the Dhammadāyāda-sutta Sāriputta expounds the matter himself, without asking the monks to express their understanding of it.
- <sup>161</sup> Here and below, the translation is based on emending 捨離 to read 遠離, in line with the expression used elsewhere in the discourse.
- <sup>162</sup> The Dhammadāyāda-sutta concludes with the monks rejoicing in what Sāriputta had said, without any further reference to the Buddha.
- <sup>163</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Anumāna-sutta, MN 15 at MN I 95, which has Bhesakalā Grove in Bhagga country as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 124–127.
- <sup>164</sup> The Anumāna-sutta does not refer to the rains retreat.
- <sup>165</sup> The list of qualities in the Anumāna-sutta shows several differences, see the survey in Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 126, table 2.8.
- <sup>166</sup> The Anumāna-sutta takes up the case of someone who is easy to admonish before turning to a comparable reflection regarding one’s own qualities that make one difficult to admonish.

- <sup>167</sup> The Anumāna-sutta does not have a reflection regarding one's own qualities that make one easy to admonish.
- <sup>168</sup> The Anumāna-sutta does not have a counterpart to the ensuing description of how delight leads on to other awakening factors, to dispassion, and to liberation.
- <sup>169</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahācunda-sutta, AN 10.24 at AN V 41, which has Sahajāti among the Cetis as its location.
- <sup>170</sup> The Mahācunda-sutta cites three related proclamations. The first is a proclamation of one's knowledge, ñāṇavāda, namely a claim to know and see the Dharma. The second is a proclamation of one's cultivation, bhāvanāvāda, namely a claim to have cultivated the body, virtue, the mind, and wisdom. The third combines the previous two into a single claim.
- <sup>171</sup> Here and below, the translation is based on emending 無惡欲 to 惡欲. The latter is the version found immediately afterward in the same sentence.
- <sup>172</sup> The Mahācunda-sutta does not mention uncommunicativeness, deceit, flattery, and lack of shame and scruples. Qualities mentioned only in the Mahācunda-sutta are delusion, denigration, and insolence.
- <sup>173</sup> A statement by the relatives and friends is not reported in the Mahācunda-sutta, which concludes its description of the poor person by saying that he will be known for being poor despite his claims.
- <sup>174</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Sallekha-sutta, MN 8 at MN I 40, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvathī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 59–66.
- <sup>175</sup> This and several other qualities mentioned in MĀ 91 are not in the list in the Sallekha-sutta; for a comparison of the two lists see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 62, table 1.9.
- <sup>176</sup> As in the Pāli version, the present reference to “extinction” involves the term pari-nirvāṇa, 般涅槃; see the discussion in Bhikkhu Ñāṇamoli, The Middle Length Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Majjhima Nikāya (Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1995, reprint 2005), p. 1184, n. 111.
- <sup>177</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Vatthūpama-sutta, MN 7 at MN I 36, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvathī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 49–59.
- <sup>178</sup> The Vatthūpama-sutta does not associate this discourse with the time soon after the Buddha's awakening.
- <sup>179</sup> The Vatthūpama-sutta does not introduce the brahmin at this point and does not mention that the Buddha's exposition of defilements was related to him.
- <sup>180</sup> The Vatthūpama-sutta lists sixteen defilements; for a comparison of the lists of defilements see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 51, table 1.7.

- <sup>181</sup> The simile in the Vatthūpama-sutta describes a dirty cloth that does not take dye properly. In the Vatthūpama-sutta this simile and the next one together precede the exposition of defilements.
- <sup>182</sup> The simile in the Vatthūpama-sutta describes a clean cloth that takes dye properly.
- <sup>183</sup> Before turning to the brahmavihāras, the Vatthūpama-sutta mentions confidence in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, and detachment in regard to food. It continues from the brahmavihāras to the topic of liberation, which in its presentation corresponds to the inner bathing.
- <sup>184</sup> In the Vatthūpama-sutta the brahmin goes forth and eventually becomes an arahant.
- <sup>185</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Adhikaraṇa-sutta, AN 10.87 at AN V 164.
- <sup>186</sup> The Adhikaraṇa-sutta does not report that the monk, on account of whom the Buddha delivers the discourse, had approached the Buddha.
- <sup>187</sup> The Adhikaraṇa-sutta lists ten such bad qualities: being a maker of disciplinary issues, not being desirous of training, having evil wishes, being angry, denigrating others, being crafty, being deceitful, not paying attention to the teachings, not being secluded, and not showing kindness towards other monastics. In the Pāli discourse the list of unbeneficial results does not refer to the attainment of nirvana.
- <sup>188</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Thīti-sutta, AN 10.53 at AN V 96.
- <sup>189</sup> In the Thīti-sutta the Buddha instead proclaims that he praises only growth in wholesome states, not their mere maintenance, much less their decline.
- <sup>190</sup> The qualities listed in the Thīti-sutta are faith, virtue, learning, generosity, wisdom, and eloquence.
- <sup>191</sup> The Thīti-sutta introduces its list of mental states with the simile of a young woman or man who looks in a mirror; the actual list then comprises ten mental states, which are the five hindrances (the fourth is just restlessness), as well as irritation, defiled mental states, bodily agitation, laziness, and lack of concentration.
- <sup>192</sup> According to the Thīti-sutta, one who is free of those states should make an effort to progress to nirvana. The Thīti-sutta does not employ the simile of the burning head or clothes to illustrate this case, which it only has to illustrate the case of one under the influence of defiled mental states.
- <sup>193</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Parihāna-sutta, AN 10.55 at AN V 102.
- <sup>194</sup> In the Parihāna-sutta Sāriputta first announces the topic of “a person subject to decline” and then, at the request of the other monks, expounds it.
- <sup>195</sup> The Parihāna-sutta introduces its list of mental states with the simile of a young woman or man who looks in a mirror; the actual list then comprises ten mental states, which are being free of the five hindrances (the fourth is just being without restlessness), as well as not being irritable, not having defiled mental states, delighting in the Dharma, gaining internal tranquility of the mind, and gaining higher wisdom and insight into phenomena.

- <sup>196</sup> According to the Parihāṇa-sutta, one who is free of these states should make an effort to progress to nirvana. The Parihāṇa-sutta does not employ the simile of the burning head or clothes to illustrate this case, which it only has to illustrate the case of one under the influence of defiled mental states.

Division 9

- <sup>197</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahānidāna-sutta, DN 15 at DN II 55.
- <sup>198</sup> Adopting the variant 令 instead of 念.
- <sup>199</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta continues further, via feeling, contact, and name-and-form, up to consciousness.
- <sup>200</sup> Adopting the variant reading 蚊 instead of 蚊.
- <sup>201</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta also mentions the birth of quadrupeds.
- <sup>202</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta instead lists the three types of becoming: sense sphere, material, and immaterial.
- <sup>203</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta mentions the four types of clinging to sensuality, to views, to rules and observances, and to doctrines of a self.
- <sup>204</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta lists the six types of craving, according to the six sense objects.
- <sup>205</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta proceeds further to the topic of feeling.
- <sup>206</sup> The translation here and below is based on an emendation. MĀ 97 links contact with the name group by way of “resistance” 對, and with the form group by way of “designation” 增語. The Mahānidāna-sutta instead links contact with the name group by way of “designation,” adhivacana, and with the form group by way of “resistance,” paṭigha. The presentation in the Mahānidāna-sutta is clearly the more appropriate one, whereas the present passage in MĀ 97 seems to have resulted from an erroneous exchange of the two terms.
- <sup>207</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta also reckons being born, growing old, dying, etc., as results of the reciprocal conditionality between consciousness and name-and-form.
- <sup>208</sup> In the Mahānidāna-sutta the Buddha first examines different notions of a self as being material or immaterial, limited or unlimited, before discussing the three ways of relating views of a self to feeling.
- <sup>209</sup> In the Mahānidāna-sutta the holder of the view of self concludes that the self has departed once the particular type of feeling identified as the self ceases.
- <sup>210</sup> Adopting the variant reading 雜 instead of 離.

- <sup>211</sup> The Mahānidāna-sutta, where this is the second of the three types of view of self in relation to feeling, instead argues that the notion “I am this” would no longer exist.
- <sup>212</sup> The reason given in the Mahānidāna-sutta is more detailed, pointing out that a liberated one is freed from the pathways of designation and conceptualization, yet it would be inappropriate to view such a liberated monk as one who does not know and does not see.
- <sup>213</sup> Since the Mahānidāna-sutta has the corresponding exposition earlier, before the examination of the three types of view of a self in relation to feeling, at this point it instead continues by listing the seven stations of consciousness, the two spheres, and the eight liberations, also found later in MĀ 97.
- <sup>214</sup> In the Mahānidāna-sutta one who upholds a certain type of self instead expects to realize that type of self after death.
- <sup>215</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta, MN 10 at MN I 55; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 73–97, and Perspectives on Satipaṭṭhāna (Cambridge: Windhorse, 2013).
- <sup>216</sup> A statement on past, future, or present tathāgatas is not found in the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta.
- <sup>217</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta additionally mentions that such contemplation is undertaken diligently, clearly knowing, and free from desire or discontent toward the world.
- <sup>218</sup> The sequence of the body contemplations in the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta differs, proceeding from mindfulness of breathing to bodily postures, bodily activities, anatomical parts, elements, and the cemetery contemplations.
- <sup>219</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta does not mention falling asleep or waking up as part of the contemplation of bodily postures.
- <sup>220</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta also mentions the contemplation of impermanence and refers to dwelling independently, without clinging to anything.
- <sup>221</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta also mentions eating, drinking, consuming food, tasting, defecating, and urinating.
- <sup>222</sup> This and the following exercise are not mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta.
- <sup>223</sup> Adopting the variant 𑖦 instead of 𑖦.
- <sup>224</sup> The translation is based on emending what in the original is a reference to “verbal activities” when breathing out, clearly a textual error. The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta has a simile of a turner at work at a lathe to illustrate mindfulness of breathing.
- <sup>225</sup> Whereas the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta does not mention this and the subsequent three exercises, the Kāyagatāsati-sutta, MN 119 at MN III 92, does reckon the bodily experience of each of the four absorptions as modes of body contemplation.
- <sup>226</sup> This and the following exercise are not mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta.

- <sup>227</sup> 觀相, which perhaps is an equivalent to the paccavekkhaṇanimitta.
- <sup>228</sup> This list of seeds differs from the one given in the same simile in MĀ 81, the parallel to the Kāyagatāsati-sutta.
- <sup>229</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta only lists the four elements of earth, water, fire, and wind.
- <sup>230</sup> Cremation or burial are not mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta.
- <sup>231</sup> Nuns are not explicitly mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta, although the same would be implicit, in as much as the term “monk” can represent monastics of either gender; see Alice Collett and Bhikkhu Anālayo, “Bhikkhave and Bhikkhu as Gender-inclusive Terminology in Early Buddhist Texts,” Journal of Buddhist Ethics 21 (2014): 760–797.
- <sup>232</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta does not mention a distinction between bodily and mental feelings, or between feelings related or not related to sensuality.
- <sup>233</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta does not mention mental states that are defiled or undefiled, inferior or superior, or developed or undeveloped.
- <sup>234</sup> Contemplation of dhammas in the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta also covers contemplating the five aggregates of clinging and the Four Noble Truths, which are the second and fifth exercises in its version of the fourth satipaṭṭhāna.
- <sup>235</sup> In the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta, where contemplation of the six sense spheres is the third exercise under contemplation of dhammas, the task is also to know the senses and their objects as such, in addition to knowing the fetter that arises in dependence on both.
- <sup>236</sup> Adopting a variant reading that adds 擇.
- <sup>237</sup> The Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta proceeds from a period of seven years of practice step by step down to seven days, but no further than that.
- <sup>238</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahādukkhakkhandha-sutta, MN 13 at MN I 83; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 117–121.
- <sup>239</sup> In the Mahādukkhakkhandha-sutta the monks themselves, on their way into town to collect alms, had approached the heterodox wanderers.
- <sup>240</sup> The Mahādukkhakkhandha-sutta treats what has been mentioned so far as three distinct cases illustrating the danger of sensual pleasures, namely the suffering experienced when working, when such work does not succeed, and when what has been gained is lost again.
- <sup>241</sup> According to the Mahādukkhakkhandha-sutta, family members may even go so far as to take up weapons and harm one another.
- <sup>242</sup> 男女, “men and women,” which in the present context presumably means “people.”
- <sup>243</sup> The regret experienced by an evildoer is not mentioned in the Mahādukkhakkhandha-sutta, which therefore does not have the simile of a mountain’s shadow. A version of this simile can be found in the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta, MN 129 at MN III 164.

- <sup>244</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta, MN 14 at MN I 91; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 121–124.
- <sup>245</sup> This request, which has no counterpart in the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta, implies that Mahānāma was still a worldling at the time of this discourse. According to the commentary on the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta, Ps II 61, however, he was a once-returner at that time.
- <sup>246</sup> In the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta the Buddha first relates how he overcame sensuality in the period before his awakening. The ensuing exposition of sensual pleasures is the same as in the Mahādukkhakkhandha-sutta.
- <sup>247</sup> The Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta treats what has been mentioned so far as three distinct cases illustrating the danger in sensual pleasures, namely the suffering experienced when working, when such work does not succeed, and when what has been gained is lost through theft, etc.
- <sup>248</sup> According to the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta, family members may even go so far as to take up weapons and harm one another.
- <sup>249</sup> See note 242.
- <sup>250</sup> The regret experienced by an evildoer is not mentioned in the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta, which therefore does not have the simile of a mountain's shadow. A version of this simile can be found in the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta, MN 129 at MN III 164.
- <sup>251</sup> In the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta the Buddha relates his insight into sensual pleasures to the time before his awakening, explaining that despite this insight he transcended the attraction of sensual pleasures only after he had experienced superior forms of happiness, such as those available through absorption attainment.
- <sup>252</sup> The location in the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta is Mount Vulture Peak.
- <sup>253</sup> According to the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta, the Nigaṇṭhas attributed omniscience to their teacher.
- <sup>254</sup> In the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta the Buddha instead inquires if the Nigaṇṭhas had knowledge of former evil deeds done by them and if they were aware of the degree to which these deeds were now being eradicated.
- <sup>255</sup> The Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta specifies that such deeds were acts of murder.
- <sup>256</sup> The Buddha's rebuke in the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta is less strongly worded; he simply points out that they spoke rashly and should have asked him about it.
- <sup>257</sup> In the Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta the Buddha's ability to remain motionless in joy and happiness for up to seven days takes the form of an affirmation instead of being a question.
- <sup>258</sup> The Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta concludes at this point.

- <sup>259</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Vitakkasaṇḥhāna-sutta, MN 20 at MN I 118; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 140–143.
- <sup>260</sup> Adopting the variant 拏 instead of 拏.
- <sup>261</sup> The Vitakkasaṇḥhāna-sutta instead describes a carpenter who removes a coarse peg with the help of a finer peg.
- <sup>262</sup> Adopting the variant 正 instead of 政.
- <sup>263</sup> The Vitakkasaṇḥhāna-sutta continues with a description of the attainment of liberation.
- <sup>264</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dvedhāvitakka-sutta, MN 19 at MN I 114; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 138–140.
- <sup>265</sup> The Dvedhāvitakka-sutta does not follow the description of frequent thinking leading to a tendency of the mind to delight in such thoughts with a statement about freedom from dukkha. Instead, in the Pāli version the simile of the cowherd comes at this point.
- <sup>266</sup> The expected description of the first absorption is lacking here, but is present in the Dvedhāvitakka-sutta. It could be restored as follows: “Secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, he dwells having attained the first absorption, which is with directed awareness and sustained contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of separation.”
- <sup>267</sup> The Dvedhāvitakka-sutta mentions recollection of past lives and the divine eye before turning to the destruction of the taints. Another difference in the Pāli version is that the one who attains the absorptions and the three higher knowledges is the Buddha himself.
- <sup>268</sup> Here and below, the Dvedhāvitakka-sutta only identifies the path with the eightfold wrong or right path, not with the three unwholesome or wholesome thoughts.
- <sup>269</sup> The simile in the Dvedhāvitakka-sutta contains no watchman; hence its explanation of the simile also has no reference to the retinue of Māra.
- <sup>270</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷasīhanāda-sutta, MN 11 at MN I 63, which has Jeta’s Grove at Sāvathī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 99–105.
- <sup>271</sup> This would refer to the four levels of awakening; see AN 4.239 at AN II 238.
- <sup>272</sup> The Cūḷasīhanāda-sutta has craving and clinging as two separate topics. The next topics it discusses are being without vision, favoring and opposing, and enjoying conceptual proliferation, papañca. It does not sum up all the qualifications of the final goal thus covered.
- <sup>273</sup> In the Cūḷasīhanāda-sutta the fourth type is clinging to “a doctrine of self” rather than to “a self.”
- <sup>274</sup> The Cūḷasīhanāda-sutta relates the four types of clinging to ignorance via the intervening seven links of dependent arising, paṭicca samuppāda.

- <sup>275</sup> The Cūḷasīhanāda-sutta does not repeat the reference to the lion's roar.
- <sup>276</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Udumbarika-sutta, DN 25 at DN III 36 (following the Asian editions for the title; in the PTS edition the title is Udumbarika-sīhanāda-sutta).
- <sup>277</sup> In the Udumbarika-sutta the householder's name is Sandhāna.
- <sup>278</sup> 無恚, literally, "no anger," apparently mistaking nigrodha for ni + krodha.
- <sup>279</sup> 鳥論, literally "bird talk"; elsewhere the Madhyama-āgama employs the expression 畜生之論 as its counterpart to tiracchānakathā.
- <sup>280</sup> The Udumbarika-sutta does not report Nigrodha making any statement about how the Buddha should be offered a seat.
- <sup>281</sup> In the Udumbarika-sutta Nigrodha and his followers had indeed been intending to ask the Buddha this question if he should join them. Consequently, the Pāli version does not report a reflection by the householder Sandhāna that Nigrodha is speaking a falsehood.
- <sup>282</sup> One of several differences is that the Udumbarika-sutta does not mention shaving off the hair and beard (a practice that is in fact followed by Buddhist monastics themselves).
- <sup>283</sup> The partly different list of defilements of self-mortification in the Udumbarika-sutta does not mention absorbing the energy of the sun, a reference whose implications are not clear.
- <sup>284</sup> Adopting a variant that adds another 子.
- <sup>285</sup> "Views" is another topic that is not included in the Udumbarika-sutta's list of defilements of self-mortification.
- <sup>286</sup> The four restraints in the Udumbarika-sutta are not killing, not stealing, not speaking falsehoods, and not yearning for sensual pleasures (following the commentarial explanation for the last). The Pāli version goes on to describe withdrawal into seclusion and overcoming the five hindrances.
- <sup>287</sup> Here and below, according to the Udumbarika-sutta, Nigrodha thinks that by now the practice of self-mortification has reached the essence.
- <sup>288</sup> In the Udumbarika-sutta they instead exclaim that they are lost, as they do not know this higher attainment. Right after that the householder Sandhāna intervenes, reminding Nigrodha of his earlier dismissive remarks about the Buddha and of his boast that he would defeat the Buddha with a single question.
- <sup>289</sup> The Udumbarika-sutta does not contain the account of the gradual path to awakening.
- <sup>290</sup> In the Udumbarika-sutta Nigrodha formally confesses his transgression of speaking like this about the Buddha.
- <sup>291</sup> The Udumbarika-sutta lists various time periods from seven years down to seven days within which a disciple may reach the goal.

- <sup>292</sup> In the Udumbarika-sutta the Buddha also points out that he does not require heterodox practitioners to abandon their rules and way of life, to do what they consider unwholesome, or to abstain from doing what they consider wholesome. The Pāli version does not mention the suspicion that the Buddha might be interested in capturing and destroying them or in obtaining offerings or fame.
- <sup>293</sup> The Udumbarika-sutta records no comment or teaching given by the Buddha to the householder, who returns to Rājagaha on his own.
- <sup>294</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Ākhaṅkheyya-sutta, MN 6 at MN I 33; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 45–49.
- <sup>295</sup> Adopting the variant 住 instead of 任.
- <sup>296</sup> The Ākhaṅkheyya-sutta does not have an introductory narration recording the monk's reflection. It begins with the Buddha addressing the monks, emphasizing the need to maintain virtuous conduct, seeing danger in the slightest fault.
- <sup>297</sup> In the Ākhaṅkheyya-sutta the wish to be taught by the Buddha is not in the list of wishes, which includes the following: to be dear to other monks, to receive requisites, to be a source of merit for supporters, to be a source of merit for relatives, to bear discontent, to bear fear, and to attain the four absorptions, the immaterial attainments, stream-entry, once-returning, nonreturning, and each of the six higher knowledges.
- <sup>298</sup> The Ākhaṅkheyya-sutta does not report that the monks put the Buddha's instruction into practice.
- <sup>299</sup> Chizen Akanuma, The Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas & Pāli Nikāyas (Delhi: Sri Satguru, 1990, reprint), p. 15, lists as a parallel for MĀ 106 the Mūla-pariyāya-sutta, MN 1 at MN I 1. However, these two discourses differ considerably and do not seem to be “parallels,” properly speaking; see the discussion in Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 23.

Division 10

- <sup>300</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Vanapattha-sutta, MN 17 at MN I 104; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 132–134.
- <sup>301</sup> The Vanapattha-sutta first examines the case of a monk who has no improvement in his practice and scarce requisites; then the cases of no improvement and ample requisites, improvement and scarce requisites, and improvement and ample requisites.
- <sup>302</sup> As in the case of the preceding discourse, MĀ 107, the Pāli parallel to the present MĀ 108 is the Vanapattha-sutta, MN 17 at MN I 104; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 132–134.
- <sup>303</sup> This reflection differs from the one in MĀ 107, which is closer to the Vanapattha-sutta, both of which refer to cultivating mindfulness and concentration, as well as achieving the destruction of the taints.

- <sup>304</sup> The Vanapattha-sutta first examines the case of a monk who has no improvement of his practice and scarce requisites; then the cases of no improvement and ample requisites, improvement and scarce requisites, and improvement and ample requisites.
- <sup>305</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Samatha-sutta, AN 10.54 at AN V 98.
- <sup>306</sup> The Samatha-sutta likens this to a young woman or a young man examining her or his face in a mirror.
- <sup>307</sup> The Samatha-sutta concludes after the case of the person, having no counterpart for the general statement that follows in MĀ 109.
- <sup>308</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 法, in accordance with earlier instances of the same phrase.
- <sup>309</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Sacitta-sutta, AN 10.51 at AN V 92.
- <sup>310</sup> The Sacitta-sutta likens this to a young woman or a young man examining her or his face in a mirror.
- <sup>311</sup> The Sacitta-sutta does not mention faith, mindfulness, and wisdom. As already noted by Bhikkhu Bodhi, The Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, p. 1844, n. 2061, these, together with energy and concentration (mentioned in both versions), would constitute the five faculties.
- <sup>312</sup> The Sacitta-sutta concludes at this point, having no counterpart for the discussion of robes, etc.
- <sup>313</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Nibbedhika-sutta, AN 6.63 at AN III 410.
- <sup>314</sup> The Nibbedhika-sutta has two minor differences in sequence: (1) it begins with sensual pleasures, discussing the taints only later at the point where MĀ 111 refers to sensual pleasures; (2) in each case it discusses the diversity before the results.
- <sup>315</sup> In the Nibbedhika-sutta the result of feelings is rather the coming to an individual existence partaking of merit or demerit.
- <sup>316</sup> The present description corresponds to the instruction on contemplation of feeling in the parallel to the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta, MĀ 98. Like the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta, the Nibbedhika-sutta does not mention bodily and mental feelings, and feelings related or not related to sensual pleasures.
- <sup>317</sup> The Nibbedhika-sutta lists six types of perception according to the six sense objects.
- <sup>318</sup> The Nibbedhika-sutta presents a threefold distinction of karma according to it being experienced in this life, the next, or later.
- <sup>319</sup> Instead of association with what is disliked and dissociation from what is liked, the Nibbedhika-sutta mentions sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair.
- <sup>320</sup> Adopting the variant reading 集 instead of 習.

- <sup>321</sup> The Nibbedhika-sutta locates the search for help from outsiders under the “result of dukkha,” and the fourfold distinction into minor or intense dukkha that passes away quickly or slowly under the “diversity of dukkha.”
- <sup>322</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Purisindriyañāṇa-sutta (or Udaka-sutta), AN 6.62 at AN III 402, which has Daṇḍakappa in Kosala as its location.
- <sup>323</sup> The Purisindriyañāṇa-sutta reports that Ānanda had gone with a group of monks to bathe and one monk had asked the question about Devadatta, which Ānanda then reported to the Buddha.
- <sup>324</sup> No such reaction by Ānanda is reported in the Purisindriyañāṇa-sutta.
- <sup>325</sup> The Purisindriyañāṇa-sutta only illustrates this case with the example of good seeds placed in fertile soil (which in MĀ 112 appears a little later); it has the simile of the sunrise in relation to one who manifests wholesomeness and whose unwholesome roots will soon become extinct.
- <sup>326</sup> The second case in the Purisindriyañāṇa-sutta is rather someone whose unwholesome qualities have disappeared but who still has the roots of unwholesomeness, comparable to seeds deposited on a rock.
- <sup>327</sup> The fourth case in the Purisindriyañāṇa-sutta is rather someone whose wholesome qualities have disappeared and whose roots of wholesomeness will also disappear, likened to burning coals deposited on a rock or the onset of darkness at sunset.
- <sup>328</sup> At this point the Purisindriyañāṇa-sutta ends, with no counterpart for the final injunction in MĀ 112.
- <sup>329</sup> The Pāli parallels are the Mūlaka-suttas, AN 8.83 at AN IV 338 and AN 10.58 at AN V 106. These differ in having eight and ten topics respectively; MĀ 113 has nine.
- <sup>330</sup> These practices are not mentioned in the Mūlaka-suttas themselves, but a comparable description can be found in the discourse after the second Mūlaka-sutta, AN 10.59 at AN V 106.
- <sup>331</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Uddaka-sutta, SN 35.103 at SN IV 83.
- <sup>332</sup> In the Uddaka-sutta his proclamation takes the form of a stanza worded differently.
- <sup>333</sup> Instead of omniscience, the claim in the Uddaka-sutta is to have conquered everything.
- <sup>334</sup> The translation of 狸 follows the indication in Hirakawa, Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary, p. 814, that this can render jambuka. This entire paragraph with the description of Uddaka’s attainment and rebirth has no counterpart in the Uddaka-sutta.
- <sup>335</sup> The three feelings are not discussed in the Uddaka-sutta.
- <sup>336</sup> The three cravings are not discussed in the Uddaka-sutta; nor are the six taints related to the senses.

- <sup>337</sup> Instead of an exhortation to practice, the Uddaka-sutta repeats the earlier quoted stanza, attributed to Uddaka, together with the Buddha's comment on it.
- <sup>338</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Madhupiṇḍika-sutta, MN 18 at MN I 108; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 134–138.
- <sup>339</sup> Adopting the variant 行 instead of 志.
- <sup>340</sup> The Madhupiṇḍika-sutta speaks of not delighting in the source of perceptions and notions (related to) conceptual proliferation, papañca.
- <sup>341</sup> 分別, whereas the Madhupiṇḍika-sutta speaks of conceptual proliferation, papañca.
- <sup>342</sup> The Madhupiṇḍika-sutta adopts the opposite sequence, discussing first the presence of the sense organs and then their absence.
- <sup>343</sup> In the Madhupiṇḍika-sutta it is Ānanda who delivers the simile of the honeyball, which involves a hungry person.
- <sup>344</sup> Adopting the variant 道 instead of 通.
- <sup>345</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Gotamī-sutta, AN 8.51 at AN IV 274; for a comparative study see Anālayo, Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 449–488, 2016a.
- <sup>346</sup> Gotamī's request in the Pāli discourse does not refer to the four fruits of a renunciant, which represent the four levels of awakening; she also makes three requests one right after the other.
- <sup>347</sup> According to the Gotamī-sutta, they had shaved off their hair and put on yellow robes.
- <sup>348</sup> The Gotamī-sutta has a comparable set of similes at its end, after Ānanda has told the Buddha that Gotamī has become a nun. The similes describe robbers easily assailing a house with many females and few males, and two types of disease afflicting a rice field or a sugar field, respectively. These are followed by a version of the simile of the dike, which in MĀ 116 introduces the eight garudhammas.
- <sup>349</sup> In the Gotamī-sutta Ānanda inquires about women's ability to awaken and reminds the Buddha of his debt of gratitude to his foster mother Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī. The Buddha affirms the first and does not reply to the second, but next promulgates the eight garudhammas. A clarification by the Buddha that he has already settled his debt of gratitude to his foster mother can be found in the Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142 at MN III 254.
- <sup>350</sup> The eight garudhammas in the Gotamī-sutta come in a different sequence. The garudhamma on higher ordination refers to the probationary training and stipulates that ordination is to be given by both communities.
- <sup>351</sup> The corresponding garudhamma in the Gotamī-sutta does not mention questions about the discourses, Vinaya, or Abhidharma.

<sup>352</sup> The remainder of MĀ 116 has no counterpart in the Gotamī-sutta; Gotamī's request for the garudhamma on respect to be abolished can be found at Vin II 257.

<sup>353</sup> This refers to becoming a buddha, not to becoming an arahant.

Division 11

<sup>354</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Sukhumāla-sutta, AN 3.38 at AN I 145.

<sup>355</sup> The identification of some flower names is tentative.

<sup>356</sup> The Sukhumāla-sutta does not report the young prince's attainment of the first absorption.

<sup>357</sup> MĀ 117 refers not only to old age and illness, but also to death in the stanzas that follow. This makes it safe to conclude that the prose section in MĀ 117 has lost an exposition on the topic of death; in fact the same topic is found also in the Sukhumāla-sutta. The apparently lost text could be supplemented as follows: "Again, I thought, 'Unlearned ignorant worldlings are themselves subject to death, not exempt from death. On seeing other people die, they feel disgust and slight them as undesirable and unpleasant, not observing their own condition.' Again I thought, 'I am myself subject to death, not exempt from death. If on seeing other people die I were to feel disgust and were to slight them as undesirable and unpleasant, then that would not be appropriate for me, since I too am subject to this condition.' On my having contemplated in this way, the pride caused by life naturally vanished."

<sup>358</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Nāga-sutta, AN 6.43 at AN III 344, which has Jeta's Grove, also in Sāvathī, as its location.

<sup>359</sup> In the Nāga-sutta the Buddha goes to bathe with Ānanda, after both have spent the day meditating in the Hall of Migāra's Mother.

<sup>360</sup> 念. In the Nāga-sutta the elephant is called Seta.

<sup>361</sup> Bhikkhu Bodhi, The Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, p. 1756, n. 1317, explains that the corresponding statement in the Pāli version (on not doing evil by body, speech, and mind) involves a pun based on a playful etymology of nāga as na āgum, "no evil." That the Tathāgata is such a nāga is not explicitly stated in the Nāga-sutta.

<sup>362</sup> On this stanza see Bhikkhu Bodhi, The Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, p. 1756, n. 1319.

<sup>363</sup> In the Nāga-sutta the elephant's tusks represent equanimity and its tail represents seclusion.

<sup>364</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kathāvatthu-sutta, AN 3.67 at AN I 197.

<sup>365</sup> The Kathāvatthu-sutta proceeds directly from the initial statement of three grounds for talk to the analysis of past, present, and future.

<sup>366</sup> The Kathāvatthu-sutta does not at this juncture describe arrival at liberation.

- <sup>367</sup> The Kathāvatthu-sutta discusses questions to be answered in four ways: categorically, by making a distinction, by asking a counter-question, and by setting the question aside.
- <sup>368</sup> The Kathāvatthu-sutta continues by further analyzing types of talk.
- <sup>369</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Arahanta-sutta, SN 22.76 at SN III 82.
- <sup>370</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 三十. The Arahanta-sutta instead describes how insight into the three characteristics in relation to the five aggregates leads to disenchantment and dispassion toward them, resulting in liberation.
- <sup>371</sup> 七善法, with its counterpart in the seven saddhammas in the Arahanta-sutta; these seven wholesome states are listed in the Saṅgīti-sutta, DN 33 at DN III 252, as faith, shame, fear of wrongdoing, learning, energy, mindfulness, and wisdom.
- <sup>372</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Pavāraṇā-sutta, SN 8.7 at SN I 190, which has the Hall of Migāra's Mother at Sāvathī as its location.
- <sup>373</sup> In the Pavāraṇā-sutta the Buddha makes no statement about his own attainments and instead invites the monks to point out any censurable deeds of his.
- <sup>374</sup> The Pavāraṇā-sutta makes no reference to one monk who has yet to attain the final goal.
- <sup>375</sup> In the Pavāraṇā-sutta the Buddha, without being asked to do so, lists sixty monks who have the three higher knowledges, sixty who have the six direct knowledges, and sixty who are liberated both ways; the remainder of the five hundred monks are liberated by wisdom. The Pavāraṇā-sutta does not report a statement by the Buddha comparing the assembled monks to heartwood.
- <sup>376</sup> The three stanzas beginning with “shining with pure light” up to the present one have no counterpart in the Pavāraṇā-sutta.
- <sup>377</sup> In the final stanza of the Pavāraṇā-sutta Vaṅgīsa pays homage to the Kinsman of the Sun (i.e., the Buddha), who has destroyed the arrow of craving.
- <sup>378</sup> The Pāli parallel to the first part of MĀ 122 is the Uposatha-sutta, AN 8.20 at AN IV 204, which has the Hall of Migāra's Mother at Sāvathī as its location. The second part of MĀ 122 has a parallel in the Kāraṇḍava-sutta, AN 8.10 at AN IV 168.
- <sup>379</sup> The Uposatha-sutta reports that the Buddha sat in silence, without stating that he had entered concentration and observed the minds of the monks in the assembly. Only the commentary, Mp IV 112, states that the Buddha had observed the minds of the monks and discerned one without virtue.
- <sup>380</sup> According to the Uposatha-sutta, the one who asked the Buddha to recite the pātimokkha (code of rules) was Ānanda.
- <sup>381</sup> In the Uposatha-sutta Mahāmoggallāna first tells the monk three times to leave, and only when the monk keeps sitting silently does he take him by the arm and lead him outside.

- <sup>382</sup> The Upasatha-sutta does not refer to the head of the monk possibly splitting into seven pieces, a danger mentioned only in the commentary, Mp IV 112.
- <sup>383</sup> The Upasatha-sutta continues with the eight extraordinary qualities of the ocean comparable to eight extraordinary qualities of the Buddha's teaching. The exposition in the remainder of MĀ 122 on a monk who pretends to be genuine by acting with right comprehension has a parallel in the Kāraṇḍava-sutta, AN 8.10 at AN IV 168.
- <sup>384</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Soṇa-sutta, AN 6.55 at AN III 374, which has Mount Vulture Peak at Rājagaha as its location.
- <sup>385</sup> The Soṇa-sutta says that Soṇa Kolivīsa stayed in the Sītavana at Rājagaha. It reports only that he was living in seclusion and gives no further details about his practice.
- <sup>386</sup> In the Soṇa-sutta the Buddha instead uses supernormal means to disappear from Mount Vulture Peak and reappear before Soṇa in the Sītavana.
- <sup>387</sup> The Soṇa-sutta does not report Soṇa's embarrassment or his realization that the Buddha knew his thoughts.
- <sup>388</sup> In the Soṇa-sutta the six experiences are being determined on renunciation, seclusion, nonaffliction, the destruction of craving, the destruction of clinging, and nonconfusion.
- <sup>389</sup> The Soṇa-sutta does not discuss the topic of one in training and thus has no counterpart to the simile of a young boy's faculties and habits.
- <sup>390</sup> The Soṇa-sutta concludes with this last stanza and has no counterpart to the remainder of MĀ 124.
- <sup>391</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Akkhaṇa-sutta, AN 8.29 at AN IV 225.
- <sup>392</sup> The Akkhaṇa-sutta has the last two in the opposite sequence, first the problem of holding wrong views and then the problem of being unable to understand.
- <sup>393</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Iṇa-sutta, AN 6.45 at AN III 351.
- <sup>394</sup> The Iṇa-sutta lists lack of faith, of shame, of fear of wrongdoing, of energy, and of wisdom, all in relation to wholesome states. It does not mention that such a person might possess gold and precious stones.
- <sup>395</sup> The Iṇa-sutta does not refer to the arahant at this juncture.
- <sup>396</sup> Adopting the variant 安 instead of 棄.
- <sup>397</sup> The comparison to a lamp is not found in the Iṇa-sutta.
- <sup>398</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kāmaḥhogī-sutta, AN 10.91 at AN V 176.
- <sup>399</sup> The Kāmaḥhogī-sutta takes up all of the ten types introduced earlier and points out in each case on how many grounds these are to be criticized or praised.
- <sup>400</sup> One who seeks wealth by partially improper means could hardly qualify as being superior to one who does so by entirely proper means. The added part in brackets is therefore intended to clarify that this refers only to those who similarly seek wealth through mixed means. Judging from the ensuing verse, this passage seems to be the result of a textual error and would originally have been about one who seeks wealth by proper means but is attached to it.

- <sup>401</sup> The Kāmaḥhogī-sutta contains no verses.
- <sup>402</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dakkhiṇeyyā-sutta, AN 2.4.4 at AN I 62.
- <sup>403</sup> A distinction of the two types of persons into eighteen and nine kinds is not found in the Dakkhiṇeyyā-sutta, which instead continues after the twofold distinction with verses spoken by the Buddha.
- <sup>404</sup> “One-seeder” refers to a stream-enterer who will experience only one more life.
- <sup>405</sup> Whereas the previous list of those in training represents material common to the early discourses in different reciter traditions, the present list of those beyond training reflects later ideas held in the Sarvāstivāda reciter tradition, which transmitted the Madhyama-āgama. A similar list can be found in the Abhidharmakośavyākhyā; see Wogihara, Sphuṭārthā Abhidharmakośavyākhyā by Yaśomitra, Part II, p. 566.
- <sup>406</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Gihī-sutta, AN 5.179 at AN III 211.
- <sup>407</sup> The Gihī-sutta does not report a meeting between Sāriputta and the group headed by Anāthapiṇḍika. Instead it begins with the arrival of the group in the Buddha’s presence.
- <sup>408</sup> In the Gihī-sutta such a declaration is to be made by the noble disciple him- or herself.
- <sup>409</sup> The Gihī-sutta merely lists the five precepts, without going into details.
- <sup>410</sup> The Gihī-sutta highlights that the Dharma is directly visible, not involving time, inviting one to come and see, leading onward, and to be experienced personally by the wise. Here and in relation to the other three pleasant mental abidings, the Gihī-sutta mentions only that they serve to purify the impure mind and cleanse the unclean mind.
- <sup>411</sup> The Gihī-sutta only refers to the four pairs (of noble ones), the eight persons, without listing them individually and without noting that they are accomplished in morality, concentration, wisdom, liberation, and the knowledge and vision of liberation.
- <sup>412</sup> The Gihī-sutta does not have the comparison to the earth.
- <sup>413</sup> The Gihī-sutta describes such a person in more detail, qualifying him in various ways as a liberated one.
- <sup>414</sup> In the Gihī-sutta those who give to outsiders are considered fools.
- <sup>415</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kodhana-sutta, AN 7.60 at AN IV 94.
- <sup>416</sup> In the Kodhana-sutta, where loss of wealth is the fourth in the list, such loss comes about through confiscation in the king’s name.
- <sup>417</sup> Adopting the variant 盛 instead of 止.

- <sup>418</sup> Besides parents, the Kodhana-sutta also mentions killing a brahmin (which according to the commentary means an arahant) or a worldling.
- <sup>419</sup> Adopting the variant 業 instead of 逆.
- <sup>420</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dhammika-sutta, AN 6.54 at AN III 366, which has Mount Vulture Peak at Rājagaha as its location.
- <sup>421</sup> In the Dhammika-sutta Dhammika several times leaves one monastery and goes to another one, where the same events happen, until eventually the lay disciples tell him to leave all seven monasteries of the region.
- <sup>422</sup> The discussion in the Dhammika-sutta proceeds differently. On seeing Dhammika, the Buddha asks him where he is coming from, in reply to which Dhammika explains that he has been banished. In response to that, the Buddha delivers the simile of the bird and right away continues with the story of King Koravya's banyan tree.
- <sup>423</sup> The Dhammika-sutta does not describe the general conditions at the time of King Koravya, nor does it speak of him as a wheel-turning monarch.
- <sup>424</sup> The Dhammika-sutta does not report how King Koravya came to know that the banyan tree no longer bore fruit; this information is found only in the commentary, Mp III 386. It also merely reports that King Koravya approached Sakka, without explicitly stating that he did so by supernormal means or that both returned to Jambudīpa by the same means.
- <sup>425</sup> In relation to Sunetta and the other teachers, the Dhammika-sutta only mentions that those who had no confidence in their teaching were reborn in a lower realm. A description of Sunetta's disciples being reborn in different heavenly realms and his own superior practice and rebirth can be found in AN 7.62 at AN IV 103, and its parallel MĀ 8 at T I 429b.
- <sup>426</sup> The Dhammika-sutta does not mention Jotipāla's father, Govinda, and therefore speaks of only six teachers, although it does refer to Govinda and Jotipāla in its verse part. The Mahāgovinda-sutta, DN 19 at DN II 230, reports that Govinda had been chaplain to King Disampatī, and Govinda's son Jotipāla served as chaplain to the son of Disampatī, King Reṇu (and of his companions). Unlike Jotipāla, Govinda did not go forth to cultivate the brahmavihāras and thus did not become a "teacher" of this practice to others. Therefore, the reference to seven brahmin chaplains but rather six teachers in the Dhammika-sutta correctly reflects the description in DN 19.
- <sup>427</sup> Adopting the variant 微 instead of 妙.
- <sup>428</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Māratajjanīya-sutta, MN 50 at MN I 332; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 300–307.
- <sup>429</sup> The Māratajjanīya-sutta does not mention supervision of the construction of a hut or that Māra made himself smaller.

- <sup>430</sup> According to the Māratajjanīya-sutta, the corresponding monk Vidhura had acquired his name for being without equal in teaching the Dharma (vidhura can mean “unequaled”).
- <sup>431</sup> 想; in the Māratajjanīya-sutta the corresponding monk Sañjīva is so-called because he has been “revived,” patisañjīva.
- <sup>432</sup> Māra’s reflection in the Māratajjanīya-sutta has no reference to the lineage being severed due to the renunciants’ lack of sons. Instead it describes his plans to get the householders to abuse the monks in order to upset their minds. The denigration about musing, etc., appears in the Pāli version only as part of the actual abuse of the householders. This abuse begins with the simile of an owl wanting to catch a mouse, followed by a jackal wanting to catch a fish, a cat wanting to catch a mouse, and an unburdened donkey.
- <sup>433</sup> In the Māratajjanīya-sutta the householders abuse them only verbally; they do not attack them physically. On being reborn in hell, they are not shown to realize that this happened in retribution for abusing the monks.
- <sup>434</sup> The Māratajjanīya-sutta gives no information about the size of the crowd taught by Kakusandha.
- <sup>435</sup> The Māratajjanīya-sutta merely reports that the householders behaved respectfully and reverentially, without detailing in what way they did so. On being reborn in heaven, they are not shown to realize that this happened as a reward for their respectful behavior toward the monks.
- <sup>436</sup> The advice in the Māratajjanīya-sutta is to contemplate the lack of beauty of the body, to perceive the repulsiveness of food, to perceive the whole world as without delight, and to contemplate the impermanence of all formations.
- <sup>437</sup> The Māratajjanīya-sutta does not report Māra’s plan; the actual attack was achieved by way of taking possession of a boy.
- <sup>438</sup> The Māratajjanīya-sutta gives three names for hell; the period for stake to meet stake is a thousand years; and the form of rebirth taken by the past māra was a human body with the head of a fish.
- <sup>439</sup> The verses in the Māratajjanīya-sutta show several differences and tend to be less detailed.
- <sup>440</sup> Adopting the variant 諸 instead of 謂.

Bibliography

- Akanuma, Chizen. The Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas & Pāli Nikāyas (1929). Delhi: Sri Satguru, 1990.
- Anālayo, Bhikkhu. A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2011.
- . Madhyama-āgama Studies. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2012.
- . Perspectives on Satipaṭṭhāna, Cambridge: Windhorse, 2013.
- . “Selected Madhyama-āgama Discourse Passages and their Pāli Parallels,” Dharma Drum Journal of Buddhist Studies 19 (2016): 1–61.
- . The Foundation History of the Nuns’ Order. Bochum: Projektverlag, 2016.
- . “The Luminous Mind in Theravāda and Dharmaguptaka Discourses,” Journal of the Oxford Centre for Buddhist Studies 13 (2017): 10–50.
- Anālayo, Bhikkhu, and Roderick S. Bucknell. “Correspondence Table for Parallels to the Discourses of Majjhima Nikāya: Toward a Revision of Akanuma’s Comparative Catalogue,” Journal of the Centre for Buddhist Studies, Sri Lanka 4 (2006): 215–238.
- Bareau, André. Recherches sur la Biographie du Buddha dans les Sūtrapīṭaka et les Vinayapīṭaka Anciens: De la Quête de l’Éveil à la Conversion de Śāriputra et de Maudgalyāyana. Paris: École Française d’Extrême-Orient, 1963.
- Bingenheimer, Marcus. Studies in Āgama Literature, With Special Reference to the Shorter Chinese Saṃyuktāgama. Taiwan: Shin Weng Feng Print Co., 2011.
- Bodhi, Bhikkhu. The Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Anguttara Nikāya. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2012.
- Bucknell, Roderick S. “Catalogues of Parallel Buddhist Sūtras in Pali, Chinese, Sanskrit, and Other Languages,” in Proceedings of the 13th Wuyue Buddhist Academic Forum, pp. 427–441. Hangzhou: Hangzhou Buddhist Academy, 2016.
- . “Ekottarika-type Material in the Chinese Madhyama-āgama,” in Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Madhyama-āgama, pp. 77–112. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2017.
- . “Taking Account of the Indic Source-text,” in Konrad Meisig ed., Translating Buddhist Chinese, Problems and Prospects, pp. 45–52. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2010.

Bibliography

- . “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama from Gilgit vis-à-vis the Pali Dīgha-nikāya,” in Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Dīrgha-āgama, pp. 57–101. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2014.
- Collett, Alice, and Bhikkhu Anālayo. “Bhikkhave and Bhikkhu as Gender-inclusive Terminology in Early Buddhist Texts,” Journal of Buddhist Ethics 21 (2014): 760–797.
- Chung, Jin-il, and Takamichi Fukita. A Survey of the Sanskrit Fragments Corresponding to the Chinese Madhyamāgama, Including References to Sanskrit Parallels, Citations, Numerical Categories of Doctrinal Concepts and Stock Phrases. Tokyo: Sankibo Press, 2011.
- Hartmann, Jens-Uwe, and Klaus Wille. “The Manuscript of the Dīrghāgama and the Private Collection in Virginia,” in Paul Harrison and Jens-Uwe Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research, pp. 137–155. Wien: Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 2014.
- Hirakawa, Akira. Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary. Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1997.
- Honjō, Yoshifumi. A Table of Āgama Citations in the Abhidharmakośa and the Abhidharmakośopāyikā. Kyoto: n.p., 1984.
- Meisig, Konrad. Das Sūtra von den vier Ständen, Das Aggañña-Sutta im Licht seiner chinesischen Parallelen. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1988.
- Ñāṇamoli, Bhikkhu. The Middle Length Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Majjhima Nikāya (1995) Bhikkhu Bodhi, ed. Boston: Wisdom Publications, reprint 2005.
- Norman, K. R. A Philological Approach to Buddhism: The Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai Lectures, 1994. London: School of Oriental and African Studies, 1997.
- Pannasiri, Bhadanta. “Sigālovāda-Sutta,” Visva-Bharati Annals 3 (1950): 150–228.
- Pradhan, Prahlad. Abhidharmakośabhāṣya of Vasubandhu. Patna: K. P. Jayaswal Research Institute, 1967.
- Rhys Davids, T. W., and William Stede. Pali-English Dictionary (1921). Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1993.
- Silverlock, Blair Alan. An Edition and Study of the Gosiga-sutra, The Cow-horn Discourse (Senior Collection Scroll no. 12): An Account of the Harmonious Aṇarudha Monks. Ph.D thesis, University of Syney, 2015.
- Strauch, Ingo. “The Bajaur Collection of Kharoṣṭhī Manuscripts: Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī and the Order of Nuns in a Gandhāran Version of the Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra,” in Alice Collett ed., Women in Early Indian Buddhism: Comparative Textual Studies, pp. 17–45. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2014.

- . “The Indic versions of the *Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra: Some Thoughts about the Early Transmission of Buddhist Āgama Texts,” in Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Madhyama-āgama, pp. 327–373. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2017.
- Watanabe, Fumimaro. “Logical Arguments in the Dialogues (Suttas),” Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies 20/2 (1972): 988–976.
- Wogihara, Unrai. Sphuṭārthā Abhidharmakośavyākhyā by Yaśomitra, Part II. Tokyo: The Publishing Association of Abhidharmakośavyākhyā, 1936.

Index

A

- Abhidharma, 129–130, 337, 338,
426n134, 440n351
Abhidharmakośavyākhyā, 443n405 absorption(s), 127, 127, 184, 290, 291,
292, 378, 423n96, 426n138, 433n251,
434n267
four, 38, 137, 423nn89, 96; 431n225,
436n297
first, xvi, 103, 116, 117, 127, 131, 221,
222, 229, 344, 424n113, 425n128,
426n138, 434n266, 440n356
fourth, 38, 42, 93, 104–105, 113, 119,
120, 127, 131, 137, 184, 230, 245,
262, 286, 291, 424n113, 425n128
second, 103, 117, 118, 127, 131, 229,
262, 424n113, 425n128
third, 104, 118, 119, 127, 131, 229,
262, 424n113, 425n128
See also concentration(s); meditation(s) action(s), 95, 101, 227, 295, 310 bodily and verbal, 185, 189 evil/unwholesome, 371, 372, 373, 377
right, 147
wholesome, 371, 372, 373
See also deed(s); karma affliction(s), 20–28, 31, 57 absence of, 93–94, 95, 98, 286, freedom from, 39, 53, 387
See also nonaffliction
Āgamas, xv, 129–130, 200–201
See also Nikāyas aggregate(s), 92, 93, 133
five, 133, 311, 354, 432n234, 441n370
See also consciousness(es); form(s); formation(s); feeling(s); perception(s) agitation, 93, 124–125, 270, 304, 305,
429n191
See also restlessness alcoholic beverages/liquor/wine, 91, 127, 274
See also intoxicants alms/almsfood, 17, 39, 77, 87, 99, 124,
130, 156, 161, 165, 324, 325, 390, 405,
406, 410, 425n123, 426n136, 432n239
almsbowls, 407, 408
Ānanda, 167, 419n38, 420n53, 438nn323,
324; 439n343, 440n359, 442n380
and Anuruddha, 87–88, 97–98
and the Buddha/World-honored One,
40–41, 47–50, 132–149, 190–191,
205–226, 316–321, 332, 334–337,
340–342
and Mahāpajāpati Gotamī, 334, 337,
339–340, 439nn348, 349
Anāthapiṇḍika, 379, 383, 385, 390,
443n407
See also grove(s)/park(s), Anāthapiṇ-ḍika's Park
anger, 16, 44, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 236, 363, 391, 392,
393–394, 435n278
abandoning/eradication/extinguishing, 128, 129, 130, 131, 187, 189, 190,
395

anger (continued):

- appeased/attenuated/reduced, 15, 60, 62, 63, 64, 113, 291
- and enmity, 391–393
- as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193
- as unwholesome thought/state, 113, 127
- Aṅguttara Book of Eights (Aṭṭhakanipāta)*, xvii animal(s), 107, 232, 244, 255, 277, 281, 424n113, 427n149

camel(s), 117, 118, 346

cat, 406, 445n432

cattle/cow(s), 14, 91, 106, 117, 118, 232, 260, 261, 382, 419n37

deer, 117, 118, 263–264, 344

dog, 255, 274

donkey(s), 8, 117, 118, 241, 250, 346, 406, 445n432

elephant(s), 3, 4, 8, 14, 15, 16, 91, 97, 117, 118, 120, 121, 240, 249, 346, 347, 397, 417n10, 418nn14, 18; 440nn360, 363

Sati/Seta, 346, 440n360

fish, 116, 117, 206, 207, 274, 407, 445n432

fox, 407

horse(s), 8, 14, 91, 117, 118, 120, 121, 197–198, 199–200, 240, 249, 346, 397

jackals, 107, 232, 244

lion, 125, 348, 358

mouse, 406, 407, 445n432

ox, 115, 272, 287, 288, 346, 389, 390 serpents/snakes, 206, 207, 241, 250, 255, 346

sheep, 91, 371, 372

toads, 116, 117

turtles, 116, 117

water buffalo, 117, 118

wolves, 107, 232, 244

See also bird(s); insect(s)

animal talk, 271, 435n279

Anuruddha, 37, 43, 44, 54, 88, 167 and the Buddha, 18, 19–32, 37–40, 43, 55–65, 88, 98–99, 418nn18, 19, 21
and Ānanda, 87–88, 97–98
and Isidatta, 75–76, 77–80, 86–87
and Kaccāna, 76–77, 80–86

arahant(s), 43, 54, 75, 127, 225, 226, 292, 347, 353, 366, 371, 372, 373, 376, 387, 421n60, 424n117, 429n184, 440n353, 442n395, 444n418

arahantship, 139, 387

See also four fruits

Aranemi, 401, 402

See also brahmin chaplains, seven

argumentation, 350, 351

See also disputatious(ness); quarrel(s)/quarreling

Ariṭṭha, 125

army, fourfold, 3–4, 5–8, 11, 397

arrogance, 173, 184, 185, 186, 187, 201, 202, 203

as mental defilement, 192, 193, 194

ascetic(s)/asceticism/ascetic practice(s), 165, 166, 251, 275–282, 348, 402, 426n148

See also self-mortification aspiration(s), 15, 16, 93, 158, 159, 164, 165

attachment, 173, 225, 226, 347, 348, 353, 390

abandoning/freedom from, 72, 173, 190, 226, 227, 264, 265, 269, 286, 287, 288, 342, 353, 356, 370, 371, 372, 387, 390, 405, 407, 408, 410, 411

as condition for miserliness, 208, 209–210

and desire/sensual pleasures, 208, 209, 210, 383

See also clinging avarice, 180, 181, 182, 183, 189, 190, 196, 198, 199

as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193, 194
awakening, 43, 50, 54, 99, 173, 174, 332, 345 of Buddha, 191, 428n178, 433nn246, 251 factors of (seven)/seven treasures of,
146, 226, 227, 236, 354, 428n168
four levels of, 434n271, 439n346 full/right/true/unsurpassable, 20, 32, 36, 37, 61, 62, 63, 65, 113, 226,
227, 259, 288, 291, 385, 389 path of/to, 255, 288, 370, 371, 372,
436n289
requisites of (thirty-seven), 353, 364 states that pertain to (bodhipakkhiya), 109
See also penetration, awakening, and nirvana; understanding, awakening, and realization awareness, directed, xvi, 28–30, 31, 51,
52, 53, 127, 184, 262, 344, 434n266
āyatana. See bases
B
barbarians, 371
bases, 132, 133, 147, 148
See also sense(s)/sense faculties/sense spheres; sense bases/objects, six bathing, 17, 55, 103, 194, 195, 229 inner mind, 194, 429n183 purification by, 191 becoming, 57, 72, 135, 206, 207, 212,
317, 318, 421n71, 430n202
See also dependent arising bewildered/bewilderment, 138, 239, 247, 248
See also confused/confusion
Bhadda, 125
Bhagu, 15–16, 418nn16, 17

Bimbisāra, King, 252–253
Bingenheimer, Marcus, xv, xvi bird(s), 93, 206, 207, 344, 396, 398,
444n422
chicken(s), 91, 142, 143 144, 145 crows, 107, 232
hawks, 244
owl, 407, 445n432
partridge, 344
pheasant, 344
wild goose, 92
See also animal(s); animal talk birth(s), 32, 36, 43, 49, 50, 54, 59, 60, 61, 62, 64, 94, 95, 114, 125, 135, 140,
141, 171, 180, 206, 207, 217, 263,
270, 284, 287, 292, 350, 353, 356, 366, 367, 368
among devas, 33–36 in a heavenly realm, 192, 193
in a hell realm, 191, 192
See also dependent arising; rebirth birth and death, 95, 97, 98, 113, 205, 292, 358, 373
See also death; rebirth birth, old age, disease, and death, 49, 55, 57, 89, 214, 260, 263, 268, 317, 318,
354, 358
Black (Kālī), 405
See also māra(s)
bliss, 173–174
See also rapture
bodily, verbal, and mental conduct/deeds,
18, 19, 242, 250, 251, 285
See also body, speech, and mind body(ies), 6, 9, 12, 14, 16, 24, 41, 43, 51, 55, 56, 57, 75, 80, 92, 93, 101–108,
112, 123, 188, 189, 194, 213, 221, 223,
227, 228–233, 235, 242, 243, 247, 250,
255, 261, 262, 263, 309, 312, 324, 346,
349, 354, 355, 373, 377, 384, 393, 406,
411, 412, 423n96, 445n438

body(ies) (continued):

adorn/ing/anooint/perfuming, 55, 166, 255, 339, 343, 391 becoming passionate, 115–121 breaking up of, at death, 45, 46, 47, 67, 73, 74, 83, 84, 85, 95, 218, 219, 220, 221, 242, 251, 285, 290, 317, 318, 320, 323, 376, 392, 393, 407, 409 contemplating, 42, 50, 106, 136, 227–233, 332, 423n89, 431nn218, 225; 445n436
 cultivating, 189–190, 428n170
 and dependent arising, 133–135, 329, 330 mental/mind-made, 93, 420n43 tranquil/tranquility of/untroubled, 20, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 46, 147, 148, 180
See also mindfulness, of the body; sense bases/objects, six; tangible(s) body, speech, and mind, 346, 347, 376, 377, 392–393, 440n361
See also bodily, verbal, and mental conduct/deeds bondage, 8, 12, 14, 307, 376, 377, 378, 408, 409
 Brahmā(s), 36, 37, 65–73, 75, 239, 293, 294, 3131, 325, 326, 342, 346, 414–415, 421nn68, 70
deva(s), 221, 222
 world, 65, 66, 73, 93, 400, 401, 405, 414
 Brahmadatta, King, 417nn6–8, 10 and King Long Life Span, 3–10 and Master/Prince Long Life, 9–13, 417n11
brahmavihāras, 420n56, 421n59, 429n183, 444n426
See also four divine abodes/four immeasurable/four pleasant mental abidings brahmin(s), 36, 37, 67, 68, 69, 71, 73, 74–75, 78, 79, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 157, 158,

163, 166, 194, 195, 239, 240, 243, 245, 246, 248, 263, 265, 267, 268, 269, 270, 27, 277, 278, 280, 281, 282, 293, 311, 313, 325, 326, 339, 341, 346, 347, 355, 390, 398, 401, 402, 407, 408, 409, 410, 422n77, 428n179, 444n418
 making offerings to, 379, 380, 381, 382 practices of:
     four, 283–284, 285
     purification by bathing, 191, 194
     self-mortification, 274–275 brahmin chaplain(s), 5, 6, 7, 10, 417nn4, 5
 seven, 401, 402, 444n426
 breath(s)/breathing, 102–103, 228, 348, 431n224
See also mindfulness, of breathing
 Bucknell, Roderick S., xvi buddha(s), 43, 269, 286, 287, 288, 370, 371, 372, 440n353
See also tathāgata(s)
 Buddha, xvii, 3, 13, 15, 32, 37, 40, 41, 43, 44, 50, 54, 59–65, 75–76, 87, 99–100, 101, 109–113, 114, 122, 125, 126, 128, 132, 149, 151, 156, 161, 167, 168, 169, 170, 174, 175, 180, 183, 188–190, 191, 195, 196, 200, 202, 205, 226, 237, 238, 239, 243–246, 247, 253, 256, 258, 259, 264, 270, 271–272, 273, 290, 292, 293, 294, 295, 299, 302, 304, 306, 312, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 331, 332, 334, 337, 340, 342, 343, 345, 346, 347, 349, 352, 354, 357, 358, 359, 360, 364, 366, 369, 370, 374, 378, 379, 383, 385, 387, 390, 391, 395, 400, 402, 403, 404, 411, 412, 415, 417n2, 418nn13, 15, 18, 19, 21; 419nn28, 32, 37, 38; 420nn43, 53, 55; 421nn62–64, 68–71; 422nn73, 82; 424n117, 425n124, 426n138, 427n159, 162; 428nn178, 179; 429nn186, 189; 430n208, 433nn246, 251, 254, 256; 433–434n257, 434n267, 435nn280,

- 281, 288; 436nn290, 292, 293, 296–298; 438n323, 439nn337, 348, 349; 440n359, 441nn373, 375, 377, 379; 442nn380, 383, 386, 387; 443nn403, 407; 444n422
- and Ānanda, 40, 47–48, 88, 132–149, 190–191, 205–226, 312, 314–321, 332, 334–337, 340–342
- and Anāthapiṇḍika, 379–383, 383–385
- and Anuruddha, 18–32, 37–40, 55–65, 99
- and Bhagu, 15–16
- and Brahmā, 65, 72, 75
- and Cunda/Mahācunda, 183–188
- and Daṇḍapāṇi, 325
- and Dhammika, 396–403
- and Kimbila, 18, 19, 32
- and the Licchavis, 126–127
- and Mahāmoggallāna, 88, 12–125
- and Mahānāma, 246–253
- and Mahāpajāpati Gotamī, 332–334
- and Nandiya, 18, 32
- and Sāriputta, 355–357, 385–390
- and Soṇa Kolivisa, 364–369
- and Sundarika, 194–195
- and Udayin, 346–349
- and Vaṅgīsa, 357
- See also* Tathāgata; World-honored One
- Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, 335, 336, 429n183
- C
- Cāla, 125
- caste, 166, 243
- cause(s) and condition(s), 95, 270, 285, 415
- cave(s), 93, 124
- Sattapaṇṇi Cave, 251
- See also* mountain(s)
- celibacy/celibate, 89, 127, 184, 185, 186, 187, 348, 425n128,
- cemetery(ies), 93, 131, 299, 301, 426n137
- contemplation, 423n89, 431n218
- See also* charnel ground(s); corpse
- cessation, 45, 46, 47, 49, 135, 136, 137, 224, 225, 226, 262, 410, 420n48
- attainment of, 425n128, 426n139
- of clinging/covetousness, 135, 181, 183, 366, 367, 369
- complete/without remainder/remainderless, 49, 183, 355, 370, 371, 372
- of contact, 135, 310, 311
- of craving, 312, 323, 366
- of dukkha, 42, 95, 137, 262, 268, 286, 307, 311, 312
- of feeling(s), 125, 135, 245, 306, 308
- of form/formations, 135, 245, 420n48
- of ignorance, 135, 366, 367
- of karma, 307, 311
- of perception(s), 45, 46, 47, 125, 221, 223, 225, 306, 309, 420n52
- of perception and knowing, 127, 226, 405, 406
- of the self, 215
- of stations of consciousness, 222–224
- of the taints, 95, 263, 287, 295, 296, 297, 298, 306, 307, 374
- of the three defilements, 246, 366–367
- of views, 182, 183, 268
- charnel grounds, 107, 108, 232, 233, 244
- See also* cemetery(ies); corpse; cremate(d)/cremation
- Chinese, xv, xvi–xvii
- Chu, William, xvi
- Chunyin, Shi, xvi
- Citta Hatthisāriputta, 114–115, 121–122, 424n117
- city(ies)/town(s)/village(s), 5, 10, 79, 81, 82, 96, 116, 124, 156, 161, 241, 249, 299, 301, 303, 305, 313, 368, 376, 377, 397, 405, 406, 410, 411, 413, 417nn6, 8; 432n239 city(ies)/town(s)/village(s) (continued):

Anupiya, 312
 Āpaṇa, 99
 Bālakaḷaṇakāra, 15
 Benares/Vārāṇasī, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 193, 424n111
 Campā, 358
 Daṇḍakappa, 438n322
 Gayā/Gayāsīsa, 419n31
 Kallavāḷamutta, 122
 Kammāsadhamma, 44, 205, 226, 264, 306
 Kapilavatthu, 246, 324, 332
 Kosambī, 3, 13, 14, 16, 180, 183
 Pañcasāla, 167
 Rājagaha, 114, 165, 175, 251, 270, 354, 436n293, 442nn384–385, 444n420
 Sāvattḥī, 65, 66, 75, 77, 87, 128, 132, 188, 196, 200, 202, 237, 253, 259, 290, 293, 295, 299, 302, 304, 320, 323, 343, 346, 349, 352, 364, 370, 374, 378, 383, 385, 391, 395, 396, 420n54, 422n88, 426n141, 427n155, 428nn174, 177; 434n270, 440n358, 441nn372, 378
 Ukkācelā, 50
 Uruvelā, 191
 Vesālī, 44, 125–127, 425n125
 clan/clansman/clansmen, 16, 17, 18, 43, 50, 54–55, 59, 99, 174, 191, 239, 247–248, 292, 331–332, 333, 384, 386 clinging, 40, 48, 54, 125, 131, 132, 135, 206, 207–208, 237, 266, 267, 268–269, 270, 434n272, 442n388
 cessation of, 366, 367, 369
 five aggregates of, 133, 311, 432n234 four types, 268–270, 430n203, 435nn273, 274 views conducive to, 278, 281–282
See also attachment; dependent arising compassion, 58, 76, 77, 167, 169, 170, 171, 313, 328, 329, 348, 402

 great, 49, 148, 188, 264, 321, 324 mind imbued with/mind of, 53, 79, 89, 138, 194, 283, 386, 408, 409 conceit, 26, 27, 28, 31, 173, 185, 186, 187, 188, 304, 305, 326, 353, 370, 395, 418n26
 as mental defilement, 191–192, 193, 194
 underlying tendency of, 326, 327, 329, 331 concentration, 37–38, 40, 43, 51–54, 66, 83–84, 93–95, 103–104, 113, 122, 124, 125, 127, 136, 141, 146, 166, 185, 186, 187, 188, 201, 202, 203, 204, 229, 236, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 261, 262, 264, 292, 295, 296, 297, 298, 304, 305, 321, 322, 348, 388, 418n22, 419nn28, 30; 421nn58, 59; 429n191, 437nn303, 311; 441n379, 443n411 and afflictions, 20–28 attainment of, 173, 174 diversified, 31, 419n30 exclusive, 31, 419n30 established, 31–32
 limited, 30, 31, 419n30
 meditative, 359, 360, 404, 405, 406
 of the mind, 101–108, 120, 121, 140, 141
 right, 41, 147, 174, 264, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 347, 350, 403
 signless, 120, 121
 signs for 140–141 three levels/types, 28–31, 53, 419n28 vast, 31, 32, 419n30
See also five faculties; meditation concept(s)/conceptualization, 207, 213, 431n212 of self, 217–221
See also view(s), related to personal-ity/of self

- conceptual proliferation. See proliferation, conceptual
- confidence, 429n183, 444n425
- confused/confusion, 20, 71, 252, 351, 389, 407
See also bewildered/bewilderment; nonconfusion/unconfused
- consciousness(es), 133, 135, 148, 213, 214, 353, 421n69, 430nn199, 207
- boundless/infinite, sphere of, 127, 131, 221, 223–224, 225, 293, 294
- element, 106, 135, 232
- seven stations of, 221–226, 431n213
- six types (eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind), 133–134, 329, 330
See also dependent arising
- contact, 135, 148, 212–213, 308, 309, 310, 321, 322, 329, 330, 430nn199, 206
- cessation of, 308, 309, 310, 311
- six bases/types, 134, 212, 323, 324
See also dependent arising
- contemplation, 49, 89, 148, 149, 188, 197, 199, 321, 323, 324, 431nn217, 220; 432nn234, 235; 437n316
- body/bodily, 423nn89, 90; 431nn218, 219, 225
- cemetery, 423n89, 431n218
- sustained, xvi, 28–30, 31, 51, 52, 53, 127, 184, 262, 344, 434n266
- thorough, 99 100
See also meditation; mindfulness
- contentment, 37, 38, 41, 168, 169, 419n39
- supreme, 92–93
- continent(s), 397, 412
- Jambudīpa, 396, 397, 398, 444n424
- Uttarakuru, 412
- corpse, 107, 232, 244, 255
See also cemetery(ies); charnel grounds; skeleton(s)
- Corrupter (Dūsī), 405–412
See also māra(s)
- country(ies)/region(s), 3, 9–16, 79, 82, 157, 158, 163, 240, 241, 248, 249, 271, 371, 395, 396, 397, 444n421
- Aṅga, 99
- Bhagga(s), 37, 40, 122, 151, 403, 427n163
- Ceti, 32, 37, 40, 43, 428n169
- Kāsi, 3–5, 7, 9–14, 417n3
- Kosala, 3–5, 7–14, 167, 417nn2–4, 421n61, 438n322
- Kuru, 44, 205, 226, 264, 306, 398
- Magadha, 122
See also city(ies)/town(s)/village(s)
- covetousness, 44, 50, 51, 52–53, 56, 92, 93, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 189, 190, 201, 202, 203, 304, 305
- as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193
- craving, 135, 148, 173, 206, 208, 211–212, 266, 267, 268, 308, 309, 311, 322, 358, 434n272, 441n377
- cessation/destruction/end of, 312, 323, 366, 367, 413, 442n388
- for becoming/existence, 212, 353, 354
- for sensual pleasure, 212, 309, 324, 400, 402
- six types of, 134–135, 430n204
- three/threefold, 324, 439n336
See also dependent arising; desire(s)
- cremate(d)/cremation, 9, 10, 406, 423n102
See also charnel grounds
- cruelty, thought(s) of, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 291
- Cunda, 180–183, 183–188

D

- Daṇḍapāṇi, 325–326
- danger, 138, 239, 243, 247, 254, 255, 436n296, 442n382
- in feelings, 238, 245–246
- in heterodox views, 268
- in material form, 238, 243–245

Index

- danger (continued):
   in sensual pleasures, 238, 239–242,
     243, 247, 432n240, 433n247
   in wealth, 381, 382, 383
 death, 12, 43, 135, 206, 207, 217, 242,
   250, 251, 322, 348, 395, 400, 401,
   407, 431n214, 440n357
   auspicious, 153, 154 bad/inauspicious/unwholesome, 152, 153, 154, 242, 251
   breaking up of the body at, 67, 73, 74, 83, 84, 85, 95, 218, 219, 220, 221,
     242, 285, 290, 317, 318, 320, 323,
     376, 392, 393, 407, 409
   See also birth and death; birth, old age, disease, and death; old age, and death deathless, 49
 debt(s), 55, 90, 375, 378
   See also poverty deceit/deceitful, 166, 173, 175, 176, 177, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185,
   186, 187, 189, 190, 196, 198, 199,
   208, 209, 278, 282, 288, 363,
   428n172, 429n187
   end of, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331
   as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193, 194
 deed(s), 34, 35, 36, 95, 242, 252, 285, 377,
   433nn254, 255
   black/dark/evil/unwholesome, 194,
     195, 242, 250, 251, 252, 363, 377,
     394, 395, 407, 412, 433n254
   bright/good/meritorious/wholesome, 195, 242, 250, 364, 365, 394, 409
   censurable/ignorant/immoral, 394,
     441n373
   of loving-kindness, 18, 19
   See also action(s); bodily, verbal, and mental conduct/deed(s)
 defilement(s), 57, 89, 93, 94, 95, 151–
   155, 175, 176, 177, 179, 187, 195,
   262, 275, 279, 283, 286, 383, 388,
   412, 426n148, 428nn179, 180; 428–
   429n181
   by desire, 208, 210
   mental/of the mind, 101–108, 175–177, 179, 393
   twenty-one, 191–194
   of the practitioner of asceticism/of selfmortification, 275–279, 433nn283, 285 three, of greed, hatred, and delusion, 246 delusion, 37, 38, 41, 42, 69, 93, 94, 234,
   246, 266, 267, 268, 351, 428n172
   See also ignorance; sensual passion, anger/hatred, and delusion/ignorance
 dependent arising, 135, 148, 205, 435n274
 designation(s), 212, 214, 217, 430n206,
   431n212
 desire(s), 37, 38, 39, 41, 56, 57, 71, 92, 94, 113, 115–121, 148, 153–163, 168, 169,
   175–178, 184, 185, 208, 210, 234, 247,
   275, 277, 279, 281, 289, 326, 327, 329,
   331, 366, 367, 397, 431n217
   contrary to the Dharma, 191–193
   evil, 175–178, 180–183, 184–187, 189,
     190, 196, 198, 275, 279, 363, 387–
     388
   as root of phenomena, 321–322
   sensual/sexual, 38, 42, 49, 56, 89, 93,
     95, 113, 137, 142, 173, 184, 235–
     236, 245, 259–264, 266–268, 286,
     287, 291, 307, 309, 325, 326, 345,
     349, 351, 353, 374–376, 400, 401,
     402, 434n266
   See also craving; sensual passion,
     anger/hatred, and delusion/ignorance; sensual pleasure(s)
 Devadatta, 312, 313–314
 devas, 32–37, 67, 69, 71, 72, 76, 86, 169,
   170, 171, 206, 207, 239, 269, 286,
   293, 294, 313, 323, 325, 326, 342,

- 346, 347, 370, 371, 372, 386, 387,
389, 398, 399, 413, 414, 419nn33–35;
422n81, 424n117
four types of, 422n79 of defiled radiance, 422nn79, 84
higher, 75, 86
rebirth/once-returning among, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65
of the royal banyan tree, 398–399 of seven stations of consciousness and two spheres, 221–225
three classes of, 70–71, 80 of pervasive pure radiance, 70, 80, 84–86
of pure radiance, 70, 80, 83–84
of radiance, 70, 80–81, 82
See also Sakka
Dhammika, 395–403, 444nn421, 422
dharma(s), 42, 52–53, 136, 146, 227–
228, 235–237, 432nn234, 235
Dharma, 16, 17, 40, 43, 50, 54, 56, 57, 58,
59, 73, 74, 75, 86, 87, 90, 98, 101, 114,
124, 125, 126, 128, 129, 130–131, 132,
139, 140, 141, 156, 161, 166, 167, 169,
170–171, 173–174, 185, 186, 187, 188,
214, 217, 218, 219, 247, 261–262, 288,
289, 290, 292, 306, 328, 331, 345, 350,
351, 352, 355, 366, 370, 371, 372, 378,
379–382, 383, 384, 385, 387, 393, 397,
399, 400, 410, 414, 418n20, 425n132,
427n157, 428n170, 430n195, 443n410,
445n430
desire contrary to, 191, 192, 193
noble, 184, 311, 375, 377, 378, 389, 403
path of, 269, 286, 370, 371, 372, 387
quest for, 167–169 sublime/superb, 178, 179, 180, 373
summit of, 147, 148
true, 43, 54, 55, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64,
65, 96, 97, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132,
226, 270, 332, 333, 335, 337, 339,
340, 341, 356, 364, 365
wheel of, 356, 358
See also Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha
Dharma master/teacher, 13, 56, 57, 58,
59, 101, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 214,
217, 218, 219, 328
Dighiti, King, 417nn3–5, 7–9 diligence, 168, 169, 201, 202, 203, 204 utmost, 50, 51, 52, 53, 302, 303, 305
Disampatī, King, 444n426 disciple(s), 49, 58, 59, 65, 73–74, 75, 148, 167, 168, 169, 188, 239, 252,
264, 271, 273, 285–286, 287, 288,
289, 321, 324, 331, 350, 355, 358,
364, 365, 390, 400, 401, 402, 404,
405, 407, 408, 410, 412, 424n112,
436n291, 444n425
chief, 167, 405
great, 125–127
intermediate, 171, 172, 173
lay, 386–388, 389, 424n112, 444n421
female, 64–65, 158, 163, 371 male, 62–63, 158, 163, 195, 371, 385–390
new, 169, 170, 171, 172–173
noble, 44–47, 49, 142–146, 148, 180,
251, 253, 353, 385, 388, 443n408
senior, 169, 170, 171–172
See also laymen; laypeople; monk(s);
nun(s)
discontent/disenchantment, 56, 112, 140,
141, 180, 291, 431n217, 436n297,
441n370
discrimination/discriminative understanding, 42, 71, 208, 210–211 disease(s), 6, 56, 112, 242, 243, 250,
290, 311, 344, 345, 418n23, 439n348
See also birth, old age, disease, and death

Index

dispassion, 136, 137, 140, 141, 142, 180,
345, 347, 366, 369, 410, 428n168,
441n370

See also equanimity

disputatious(ness), 124, 173, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 189, 190, 201,
202, 203, 267, 268, 304, 305

See also argumentation; quarrel(s)/ quarreling

divine beings, four classes of, 67, 69, 70, 71 divine might, 69, 73, 86, 93, 98, 99

donor(s), 274, 290

doubt(s), 93, 97, 98, 184, 185, 186, 187, 201, 202, 203, 236, 247, 252, 304,
305, 313, 335, 336, 358, 418n22
affliction of, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31

as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193

underlying tendency to, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331

drowsiness, 122–123, 425nn122, 123

See also sloth-and-torpor

dukkha, 45, 46, 49, 95, 139, 148, 214,
260, 262, 263, 286, 307, 311, 322,
352–353, 434n265, 438n321

cessation/end(ing) of, 42, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 95, 113, 137, 262, 268, 286,
291, 307, 311, 312, 322, 326, 327,
329–330, 331, 335, 336, 364, 386 diversity of, 307, 311, 312, 438n321 four truths of, 137, 335, 336

mass of, 55, 89, 206, 208, 209, 237–242, 246, 248–251

See also suffering

E

ear(s), 90, 92, 133, 134, 153, 154, 212, 235, 241, 247, 250, 263, 309, 324,
329, 330, 332, 350, 368

divine, 94, 97–98, 108, 113, 272, 292

See also sense bases/objects, six;
sound(s)

effacement, 184–185, 188

effort(s), 37, 38, 41, 42, 97, 136, 152, 153, 171, 172, 173, 384

right, 147

four, 136

to attain nirvana, 384, 429n192, 430n196

to obtain wealth, 239, 247–248, 383 eight garudhammas/rules of respect,

336–337, 338–339, 439nn348, 349;
440nn350–352

See also nun(s); woman/women

eightfold path, 147, 174, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312

right, 264, 434n268

wrong, 264, 434n268

See also action(s), right; concentration, right; effort(s), right; intention(s), right; livelihood, right; mindfulness, right; speech, right; view(s),
right/straight

elation, affliction of, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31

elder(s), 43, 115, 116, 122, 125–127, 129, 167, 171, 390, 395

monks, 114, 422n77

nuns, 339–340

element(s), 67, 106, 148, 232, 423n89,
431n218

four, 45, 69, 324, 423n101, 432n229 earth, 67, 69, 71–72, 106, 135, 232,

422n101, 432n229

fire, 67, 69, 71, 72, 106, 135, 232,
422n101, 432n229

water, 67, 69, 71, 72, 106, 135, 232,
422n101, 432n229

wind, 67, 69, 71, 72, 106, 135, 232, 422n101, 432n229

six, 135

- consciousness, 106, 135, 232 space, 106, 135, 232 eloquence/eloquent, 129, 200, 201, 429n190
See also lion's roar energy, 136, 141, 146, 168, 169, 201, 202, 203, 204, 236, 304, 305, 403, 437n311, 441n371 excessive, 23, 24, 25–26, 27, 28, 31, 418n24 lack of, 23–24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 418n24, 442n394
See also five faculties enmity, 173,
   seven states of, 391–393
 envy, 173, 180, 181, 182, 183, 189, 190, 196, 198, 199
   as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193, 194
 equanimity, 47–48, 53, 79, 138, 194, 262, 283, 408, 409, 440n363 concentration conjoined with, 51, 52, 53, 419n30, 421nn58, 59
   as factor of awakening, 146, 236
See also awakening, factors of (seven)/ seven treasures of; dispassion evil(s), 4, 15, 57, 58, 124, 173, 184, 194, 242, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 264, 352, 371, 372, 376, 389, 433nn243, 250; 440n361 conditions, 113, 291, 385, 389 conduct/deed(s), 95, 185, 186, 187, 188, 242, 250, 251, 252, 278, 282, 285, 363, 376, 377, 392, 407, 433n254 of covetousness, 180, 181, 182, 190
 desire(s), 175–178, 180–187, 189, 190, 196, 198, 275, 279, 363, 387, 388 intention/wishes, 13, 429n187
 mental aspirations, 158–159
 qualities, 197, 198, 303, 306, 317, 318
 speech/words, 56, 290
 state(s), 38, 42, 44, 56, 57, 61, 62, 63, 65, 92, 93, 113, 136, 137, 155, 190, 201–202, 203, 208, 209, 245, 259, 260, 261, 262, 286, 291, 303, 304, 305, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331, 344, 434n266 thought(s), 102, 155, 156–158, 160–163, 173, 227–228, 254–258, 291
   three, 264, 291
 view(s), 180, 181, 183, 189, 190, 363
 Evil One. See Māra existence, 32, 36, 37, 43, 46, 48, 49, 50, 54, 59, 61, 95, 113, 114, 125, 140, 141, 171, 180, 217, 263, 270, 287, 291, 292, 307, 309, 323, 325, 326, 350, 353, 354, 356, 358 bonds/fetter of, 356, 366, 367, 378366, 367, 368, 384, 424n109, 437n315 further/future/repeated, 49, 354, 357 seven (more), 61, 62, 63, 65, 113, 291, 385, 389, 424n109 realm(s) of, 49
   bad, 95, 152, 153, 154, 186, 285, 307, 312, 313, 314, 317, 318, 320, 376, 385, 389, 393, 404–405
   good, 95, 153, 154, 285, 290, 307, 320, 392, 409
 underlying tendency to, 326, 327, 329, 331
 view of, 267–268
See also nonexistence extinction, 49, 188, 428n176
See also nirvana eye(s), 92, 123, 133, 134, 153, 154, 212, 235, 247, 256, 263, 309, 324, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 368, 414, 424–425n120, 425n122
 consciousness, 133, 329, 330
 divine/of wisdom, 95, 285, 414, 434n267
 inner, 20–28, 30–31
See also form(s); sense bases/objects, six

F

- faith, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 146, 147, 166, 201, 202, 203, 252, 304, 395,
314, 335, 336, 348, 366, 384, 390,
429n190, 441n371, 442n394
and asceticism, 278–279, 282 faculty of, 141, 403, 437n311 firm/great/right, 59, 200, 201, 378 lack of/without, 166, 3185, 186, 187, 188, 201, 203, 304, 371, 375, 377 leaving home/household life out of, 13,
43, 50, 54, 55, 89, 99, 174, 191,
246, 247, 292, 332, 333, 334, 335, 337, 339, 341, 366
power of, 141, 146
in the teacher and the teachings, 265, 266, 269, 270
See also five faculties fame, 124, 367, 392, 425n133 family(ies), 89, 124, 335, 374, 390,
432n241, 433n248
distinguished/high/noble, 5, 9, 10, 128,
425n130
good, 366, 369
name(s), 33, 34, 35, 36, 94, 284
See also parents; relatives fear(s)/fearful(ness), 9, 12, 55, 72, 112, 226, 242, 250, 277, 281, 291, 354,
358, 389, 393, 411
affliction of, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31
of wrongdoing, 441n371, 442n394 fearless, 288, 397
feeling(s), 42, 51, 125, 133, 135, 136,
142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 148, 212,
215, 216, 217, 222, 224, 227, 234,
245, 246, 306, 308, 329, 330, 352–
353, 425n128, 430nn199, 205;
432n232, 437nn315, 316
gratification and danger in, 238, 245, 246 knowing/knowledge of, 238, 306, 308
as root of phenomena, 321, 322
as self, 215–217, 430nn208, 209;
431nn211, 213
six types of, 134
three types of, 212, 308, 323, 439n335 neutral, 125, 212, 215, 234, 308 painful, 125, 212, 215, 234, 308 pleasant, 125, 212, 215, 234, 308
See also aggregate(s), five; dependent arising fetter(s), 53, 79, 138, 194, 235, 283, 322,
347, 348, 352, 357, 358, 363, 374,
402, 432n235
of existence, 356, 366, 367
five lower, 60, 61, 62, 64, 113, 291
of ill-will, 186, 187
three, 60, 62, 63, 64, 65, 113, 291
five faculties, 141, 403, 437n311 five hindrances, 93, 226, 227, 235–236,
286, 378, 429n191, 429n195, 435n286
flattery, 173, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184,
185, 186, 187, 189, 190, 196, 198,
199, 208, 209, 288, 326, 327, 329,
330, 331, 428n172
as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193, 194
See also speech flavor(s), 92, 247, 263, 309, 324, 368, 369
See also taste(s); sense bases/objects, six; tongue
food(s), 17, 41, 92, 94, 119, 120, 130, 138, 156, 157, 158, 159, 161, 162,
163, 164, 166, 167, 168–169, 271,
274, 284, 303, 305, 324, 341, 344,
348, 409, 418n17, 423n92, 424nn115,
116; 427n157, 429n183, 431n221
repulsiveness of, 322, 445n436
as requisite, 158, 163, 290, 295–296,
297–298, 299, 300, 301, 336,
426n147
See also alms/almsfood

- forest(s), 16, 49, 57, 58, 78, 79, 81, 82, 83, 85, 93, 99, 120–121, 124, 131, 149, 188, 264, 271, 272, 274, 287, 288, 295–299, 299–301, 321, 324, 325, 328, 331, 362, 376, 405, 406, 426n137
 Añjana Forest, 54
 Bhesakaḷa Forest, 37, 40
 Blind [Men's] Forest, 364
 Great Wood, 425n125
 Sandbank Forest, 32, 37, 40, 43
 udumbara, 270–271, 272
See also grove(s)/park(s); tree(s) form(s) 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 45, 49, 76, 92, 113, 127, 133, 144, 145, 184, 213, 225, 235, 256, 292, 310, 324, 329, 330, 346, 349, 353, 368, 369, 404, 405, 418–419n27, 419nn29, 32; 430n206 material/visible, 44, 45, 47, 238, 243, 245, 247, 256, 263, 309, 420nn46–48 not contemplating, affliction of, 27–28, 31 perception(s) of, 45, 46, 47, 49, 128, 138, 184, 221, 223, 225
 vision of, 20–28, 30, 31, 419n29
See also eye(s); sense bases/objects, six formation(s), 133, 135, 136, 212–213, 353, 410, 445n436
See also aggregate(s), five; dependent arising formless, 113, 145, 184, 292, 324
See also four formless/immaterial attainments four assemblies, 158, 163, 371, 426nn144, 146
See also disciple(s), lay, female, male; monk(s); nun(s) four divine abodes/four immeasurables/four pleasant mental abidings, 137–138, 400, 401, 443n410
See also brahmavihāras four establishments of mindfulness/four satipaṭṭhānas, 136, 226–227, 237, 419n41, 420n56, 421n59, 432n234
See also mindful/mindfulness four formless/immaterial attainments, 138, 423–424n106 four fruits, 139, 439n346
See also arahantship; awakening, four levels of; nonreturner(s)/nonreturning; once-returner(s)/once-returning; stream-enterer(s)/stream-entry four noble traditions (ariyavaṃsa), 138–139
 Four Noble Truths, 137, 432n234
 four practices/restraints, 283, 284, 285, 435n286
See also restraint
 four ways of answering questions, 441n367
 Fully Awakened One, 347, 389, 415
See also Buddha
- ## G
- Gabled Hall, 125–126, 425n125 generosity, 9, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 146, 200, 201, 364, 365, 386, 429n190
See also giving Giṇṇakāvasatha Hall, 333 giving, 335, 336, 367i, 372, 378, 389
See also generosity goal(s), 436n291
 final, 266–267, 434n272, 441n374
 of the renunciant, 299–301
 gold/golden, 13, 91, 181, 182, 347, 376, 412, 442n394
 Gotama, 73, 74, 194, 238, 266, 271
 with Daṇḍapāṇi, 325 with the Nigaṇṭhas, 251–253
 and Nigrodha, 271, 272–275, 279, 283–289
See also Buddha

Govinda, 401, 402, 444n426
See also brahmin chaplains, seven grain(s), 181, 182, 315, 317, 344, 362 crops, five kinds of, 277, 281 gratification, 238, 268
   in feelings, 238, 245, 246
   in material form, 238, 243, 245
   in sensual pleasures, 238, 239, 243, 247 gratitude, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 398, 439n349
 greed, 138, 246, 367, 378
   as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193, 246
   See also defilement(s), three, of greed, hatred, and delusion grief, 160, 165, 378, 387, 388, 438n319 grove(s)/park(s), 44, 18, 270, 271, 272, 344, 412
   Anāthapiṇḍika's Park, 65, 66, 75, 87,
     128, 132, 188, 200, 202, 237, 253,
     259, 290, 293, 295, 299, 302, 304,
     321, 323, 343, 349, 352, 364, 370, 374, 378, 383, 385, 391, 395, 396 bamboo, 44, 325, 325
   Bamboo Grove, 114, 175, 270, 354
   Bhesakaḷā Grove, 122, 151, 427n163
   Deer Park/Isipatana, 37, 40, 122, 151,
     403, 424n111
   Eastern Park, 196, 346
   Fearsome Grove, 403, 415
   Ghosita's Park, 3, 180, 183
   Gosiṅga Grove, 126, 127
   Jeta's Grove, 65, 66, 75, 87, 128, 132,
     188, 200, 202, 237, 253, 259, 290,
     293, 295, 299, 302, 304, 321, 323,
     343, 349, 352, 364, 370, 374, 378,
     383, 385, 391, 395, 396, 420n54,
     422n88, 426n141, 427n155,
     428nn174, 177; 434n270, 440n358
   Nigrodha Park/Nigrodhārāma, 246, 332
   Pācīnavamṣa Grove, 17, 18
   Rakkhitavana Grove, 16, 17, 418n18

rosewood, 167
 Squirrels' Sanctuary, 114, 175, 270, 354
 Sītavana, 77, 442nn385, 386
See also forest(s); tree(s)

H

Hall of Migāra's Mother, 196, 346, 414,
   440n359, 441nn372, 378
 happiness, 49, 73, 74, 76, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141,
   142, 143, 144, 145–146, 147, 148,
   160, 165, 166, 169, 170, 171, 188,
   245, 252–253, 262, 263, 264, 313,
   341, 347, 352, 378, 397, 403, 409,
   413, 433–434n257
 and concentration. 51, 52, 53, 140, 141, 262 foremost/extreme/higher/superior/un-worldly, 252, 253, 353, 378, 409,
   433n251
 of relinquishment, 251, 253
 of renunciation, 56, 57
 of seclusion/separation, 344, 434n266 and sensual pleasures, 251, 253, 433n251 and speech, 90, 352
 and wholesome qualities, 320
 hatred, 16, 94, 201, 202, 203, 234, 246,
   304, 305, 349, 351, 363, 376, 393,
   399, 402, 425n128
 cessation of, 246, 366, 367
 underlying tendency to, 326, 327, 329, 331
See also defilement(s), three; enmity
 Hatthipāla, 401, 402
See also brahmin chaplains, seven heaven(s), 35, 36, 95, 307, 311, 445n435
 Akaniṭṭha Heaven, 384 Heaven of Streaming Radiance (Ābhāssarā), 221, 222–223, 400, 401,
   421n68
 Heaven of the Four Kings, 400, 401

- Heaven of the Thirty-three, 398, 400, 401, 414
- Heaven of Those Who Delight in Creating, 400, 401
- Heaven of Those Who Delight in the Creations of Others, 400, 401
- of long life, 371, 379, 380, 381, 382
- of pervasive pure radiance, 85
- of pure radiance, 83–84
- Refulgent Glory (Subhakiṇṇa), 221, 223
- Tusita Heaven, 400, 401
- Yāma Heaven, 400, 401
- Heavenly King. See Sakka
- heavenly realm(s)/world, 113, 192, 193, 285, 290, 291, 409, 445n435
- hell, 95, 242, 251, 285, 307, 310, 312, 313, 314, 317, 318, 320, 373, 376, 385, 389, 393, 407, 411, 412, 445nn433, 438
- bondage of, 376, 377
- Great Hell Without Omission, 411–412
- realm, 191, 192
- heterodox, 265, 270
- practitioner(s)/wanderers, 238, 265, 266–267, 270–274, 275, 279, 283, 286, 287–288, 289, 321, 341, 432n239, 436n292
- seers, 400, 402
- See also* Nigaṇṭhas; worship/worshiper
- Highest Physician/King of Physicians, 355, 358
- See also* Buddha
- holy life, 50, 54, 125, 289, 306, 335, 353, 372, 373, 374
- basis/root of, 98–99, 174, 191, 332
- companions in, 18, 19, 115, 116, 140, 158–160, 165, 167, 171, 175–177, 181–183, 197–200, 327–329, 361–363, 376
- eight obstacles to, 370–372
- establishment of, 32, 36, 37, 43, 49, 50, 54, 59, 61, 95, 114, 125, 140, 141, 171, 180, 217, 263, 270, 287, 292, 350, 353, 355, 356, 366, 367, 368
- foremost/supreme/ultimate, 43, 125, 354
- fulfilling, 306–312
- practice of/practicing/practitioner(s) of, 54, 55, 89, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 141, 142, 146, 147, 148, 273, 285–286, 333, 325–326, 334, 345, 361, 362, 363, 370, 373, 411, 412
- and nuns/women, 332–335, 340
- summit of, 43, 50, 5, 292, 366
- homage, 124
- to Ānanda, 340
- to Anuruddha, 76, 77
- to the Buddha, 40, 50, 54, 75, 76, 126, 127, 132, 183, 195, 205, 238, 246, 270, 292, 331, 332, 333, 334, 337, 340, 358, 364, 366, 369, 379, 383, 385, 396, 441n377
- to nuns, 340
- to Sāriputta, 385
- to the sun and moon, 275
- See also* worship
- household/household life, 77, 89, 266, 423n91
- giving up/leaving, 174, 191, 246, 247, 292, 295, 296, 300, 326, 327, 330, 343, 344, 348, 389
- See also* renunciation
- householder(s), 119–120, 240, 246–247, 248, 270–271, 272, 273, 287, 289, 315, 317, 339, 341, 361, 362, 378, 379, 380–383, 383–385, 390, 422n75, 435nn277, 281, 288; 436n293
- brahmin, 407–410
- and monks, 124, 157–158, 162–163, 445nn432, 433, 435
- See also* Anāthapiṇḍika; laypeople; Pañcakaṅga; Sandhāna; True Mind

Index

humility, 115, 116, 125 hungry ghost(s), 307, 310, 370, 376, 385, 388 hypocrisy, 325, 326

I

“I”-conceit, 353
    See also self; view(s), related to personality/of self identity, 145–146, 323
ignorance, 49, 66, 68, 95, 113, 127, 135, 263, 264, 269, 287, 291, 307, 345, 349, 350, 353, 425n128, 435n274
    cessation of, 135, 366–367
    and clinging, 269, 435n274
    underlying tendency to, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331
    See also delusion; dependent arising; sensual passion, anger/hatred, and delusion/ignorance ill-will, 53, 56, 79, 93, 138, 143, 173, 175, 176, 177, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 189, 190, 194, 196, 198, 199, 266, 267, 268, 283, 408, 409
    as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193 thought(s) of, 259–260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 291
    See also malice immaterial/immateriality, 219, 221, 430n202 beings, 221, 222, 223–224
    self, 430n208
        boundless/unlimited, 218, 219, 220, 221, 430n208
        limited, 218, 219, 220, 430n208
    See also four formless/immaterial attainments; material/materiality impermanence/impermanent, 44, 45, 46, 47, 49, 66, 68, 125, 139, 148, 215, 216,

245, 324, 352–353, 410, 431n220, 445n436
    perception of, 139, 322 insect(s), 89, 386 beetles, 116, 117
    fleas, 56, 112, 274, 290
    flies/gadflies, 56, 112, 239, 247, 290
    mosquitoes, 56, 112, 239, 247, 290
    See also animal(s) insight, 113, 290, 291, 292, 403, 403, 433n251, 441n370 into phenomena, 302–303, 429–430n194 intention(s), 168, 169, 170, 270, 293, 294, 310, 321, 322, 326, 327, 329, 330, 367, 423n91 evil/harmful, 13, 245
    right, 147
    six types of, 134
    See also eightfold path; karma, two types of intoxicants, 335, 336, 386, 389
    See also alcoholic beverages/liquor/wine invitation ceremony (pavāraṇā), 354–355 irritation, 56, 429n191
Isidatta, 75–77, 80, 86–87

J

jealous/jealousy, 278, 282, 351, 363, 393, 402
Jotipāla, 401, 402, 444n426
    See also brahmin chaplains, seven joy, 140, 141, 146, 171, 236, 239, 243, 252, 253, 387, 388, 389, 413, 433–434n257 empathetic, 53, 79, 138, 194, 283, 408, 409
    See also awakening, factors of (seven)/seven treasures of; happiness

K

Kaccāna, 76–77, 80–86, 422nn81, 85
 Kakusandha, 405, 407–408, 410–411, 445n434
 Kālaka, 196
 karma, 34, 307, 310–311, 438n318 black/evil/unwholesome, 251–252, 320
   cessation of, 307, 311
   knowing, 307, 310–311, 419n34
   two types of, 310
 Kassapa, 167
 Keṇiya, 99
 killing/murder, 89, 186, 187, 283, 284, 285, 335, 336, 386, 389, 433n255, 435n286, 444n418
   See also four practices/restraints
 Kimbila, 17, 18, 19, 32, 54
 Kinsman of the Sun, 374, 441n377.
   See also Buddha knowledge(s), 42, 71, 99, 100, 177, 180, 238, 265, 269, 270, 286, 328, 331, 335, 336, 354, 390, 428n170, 433n254 and conduct, 269, 286, 370, 371, 372, 387 final, 40, 54, 59, 61, 171, 237, 289, 356, 366, 369–370
   of gratitude, 177–178
   higher, 357
     six, 436n297, 441n375 three, 358, 434n267, 441n375 of inner light, 30–31
   of liberation, 57, 140, 141, 180, 388, 443n411 and mindfulness of body, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232–233 and mindfulness of dharmas, feelings, states of mind, 234–236 penetrative, types of, 238 of people's faculties, 314, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321 right/true, 352, 356, 366, 367 scholarly, 239, 247

 supernormal (six), 37, 94, 97 of birth and death, 95, 97, 98, 113, 292
   of destruction of the taints, 95, 97, 98, 262, 286, 303, 305
   of the divine ear, 94, 97, 98, 113, 292
   of the minds of others, 16, 37, 66, 94, 97, 113, 115, 121, 292, 313, 314, 315–316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 359, 360, 364 of past lives, 94, 97, 98, 113, 292 and vision, 28, 29–30, 31, 32–33, 34, 35, 36, 70, 71, 93, 265, 388, 419n29, 443n411
 Koravya, King, 397–398, 444nn422–424
 Kuddālaka, 401, 402
   See also brahmin chaplains, seven

L

lake(s)/pond(s), 50, 116–117, 118–119, 343, 423n105, 424nn113, 115 Monkey Pond, 125–126 pond of Gaggara, 358
 laymen, 395–397
   See also disciple(s), lay, male laypeople, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 424n112, 425n123
   See also disciple(s), lay; householder(s) laziness, 304, 429n191 learning, 146, 148, 185, 186, 187, 188, 390, 429n190, 441n371 broad/vast/wide, 5, 10, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 200, 201 through hearing, 5, 10 liberation(s), 36, 37, 45, 46, 47, 49, 57, 78, 79–80, 81, 139, 1540, 141, 180, 225, 226, 263, 272, 288, 289, 295, 296, 297, 298, 321, 322, 348, 357, 364, 365, 388, 412, 413, 422n77, liberation(s) (continued):

- 428n168, 429n183, 434n263,
- 441nn366, 370; 443n411
- eight, 225–226, 431n213
- five bases of, 139–141
- of the mind, 49, 8–79, 81, 82, 114, 292,
- 350, 367, 368, 369, 422n78
- peaceful, 113, 184, 292
- right, 356, 366, 367
- vision of, 388, 443n411
- by wisdom, 114, 225, 292, 357, 367,
- 368–369
- Licchavis, 126, 425n127
- lion's roar, 264–265, 270, 354, 435n275
- See also* eloquence/eloquent
- livelihood, 239, 247
- right, 147
- Long Life, Master/Prince, 8–13, 417n6
- Long Life Span, King/Master, 3–7, 8–9,
- 10, 11, 12, 13
- wife of, 4, 5, 6–8, 10
- loving-kindness, 8, 12, 13, 18, 19, 53,
- 79, 85, 137, 138, 127, 167, 194, 283,
- 386, 400–401, 408

M

Madhyama-āgama, 435n279

- Pāli parallels, xvii
- translation of, xv–xvii
- transmission of, 443n405

Madhyama-āgama Studies (Anālayo),

- xvii, 420n45, 439n345

Mahācunda. See Cunda

Mahākaccāna, 167, 327–329, 331

Mahākoṭṭhita, 114–122, 424n117

Mahāmogallāna, 88, 122–125, 165, 167,

- 175, 180, 360–363, 426n142, 442n381
- and Māra, 404–405, 411–412, 415

Mahānāma, 246–253, 433n245

Mahāpajāpati Gotamī, 439n349

- and Ānanda, 334, 335, 337, 339–340

and the Buddha, 332–334, 337,

See also nun(s); woman/women malice, 175, 176, 177, 179

See also ill-will

māra(s), 36, 37, 239, 313, 325, 326, 346,

- 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411,
- 412, 445n438

See also Black (Kālī); Corrupter (Dūsī)

Māra, 44, 66, 67–68, 73, 74–75, 109–

- 112, 263–264, 289, 342, 374, 403–
- 411, 412, 415, 421nn66, 67; 422n73,
- 434n269, 444n429, 445nn432, 437

material/materiality, 218, 220, 225, 341,

- 367, 427n157, 430n202

beings, 221, 222, 223, 224

form(s), 44, 45, 47, 238, 243, 245,

- 420nn46–48

self, 218–219, 220, 430n208

See also immaterial/immateriality medicine, 158, 163, 290, 295, 296, 297,

- 298, 299, 300, 301, 336, 419nn37, 39;
- 426n147

See also requisite(s)

meditation, 17, 37, 38, 49, 50, 76, 100,

- 122, 123, 126, 127, 132, 149, 168,
- 169, 183, 188, 197, 199, 205, 251,
- 264, 370, 271, 272, 287, 288, 290,
- 292, 312, 321, 324, 325, 326, 327,
- 330, 331, 364, 365, 404, 418n20,
- 425n121

excessive, on forms, 418–419n27

musing during, 123, 425n121 places conducive to, 57, 58, 124 walking, 123, 425nn121, 122

See also contemplation

mental, 136, 159, 389, 418n22

aspiration(s), 93, 158, 159, 164, 165

attitude/disposition, 45, 46, 47, 322

conduct/deeds, 18, 19, 95, 242, 250,

- 251, 252, 285, 356, 357, 376

feeling(s), 234, 308, 432n232, 437n316

- intentions, 293, 294
- object(s), 92, 133, 324, 329, 330, 368, 369
- purity, 104–105, 230
- resolve, 78–79, 81, 82, 83–84, 85
- seclusion, 42, 419n40
- stability, 173–174
- See also* mind(s); thought(s)
- merit/meritorious, 194, 242, 250, 251, 319–320, 383, 436n297, 437n315
- acts/deeds, 242, 250, 364, 365
- field(s) of, 383–385, 388
- of generosity/giving, 9, 371, 372, 378, 389
- great, 69, 73, 86, 93, 98, 99, 129, 274, 290, 341, 385, 404, 405
- Middle Kingdom, 371, 372
- middle way, 173–174
- mind(s), xvi, 5, 6, 16, 18, 19, 37, 42, 43, 44, 54, 55, 56, 79, 88, 90, 92, 93, 94, 98, 99, 105, 109, 123, 124, 133–134, 140, 142–143, 148, 160–163, 166, 167, 170, 171, 180–181, 182, 183, 185–186, 188, 190, 193, 194, 195, 226, 227, 228, 230, 234–235, 239, 246, 247, 248, 257, 258, 260, 261, 262, 270, 276, 278, 279, 280, 281–282, 286, 291, 293, 294, 295–298, 322, 330, 331, 332, 348, 351, 354, 364, 365, 366, 369, 377, 391–392, 393, 419n42, 434n265
- afflictions/defilements/unwholesome states in, 20, 21–28, 31, 44, 56, 92, 93, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 112–113, 115–121, 124, 125, 142–145, 153, 154, 155–158, 180–181, 182, 190, 234–235, 239, 246, 247, 248, 260, 304, 351, 365, 387, 388, 391–393, 402, 407, 408, 409, 410
- agitation/lack of ease in/restless/troubled/upset, 124–125, 261, 365, 445n432
- boundless/broad/expansive, 44, 53, 79, 94, 109, 110, 111, 112, 138, 194, 234, 283, 408, 409
- calmed/established/settled/pacified/untroubled, 50, 123, 132–139, 141, 142, 146–148, 226, 227, 237, 261, 368, 369, 387, 388, 389, 420n56
- concentrated/concentration of, 28, 29, 37, 38, 41, 42, 43, 94, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 120, 121, 136, 140, 141, 180, 234, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 262, 286, 295, 296, 297, 298, 348, 350, 354, 423n91
- consciousness, 137, 329, 330
- contact, 134, 212
- control of/guarding/taming, 44, 50, 51, 52, 53, 92, 102, 153–154, 228, 257, 258
- cultivating, 189–190, 412, 428n170
- defiled/impure, 152, 153, 154, 191–192, 201, 203, 234, 304, 305, 443n410
- of deva(s), 82, 84, 86, 399
- distracted, 37, 38, 41, 42, 234
- examining one's own, 302–304, 304–306
- free of indolence/negligence, 21–28, 32–36, 43, 50, 54, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 259, 260, 292, 366
- full of/imbued with compassion, 53, 79, 89, 194, 283, 386, 408–409
- full of/imbued with loving-kindness, 53, 79, 89, 137–138, 194, 283, 386, 408
- higher state(s) of, four, 38–40, 184, 253–258, 385, 386–388
- imperturbability of, 94, 95, 366, 367, 369, 378
- liberated/liberation of, 43, 49, 78–79, 81–82, 94, 95, 114, 139, 140, 141, 143, 235, 263, 287, 292, 350, 353, 367, 368, 369, 378, 422n78
- narrow, 94, 109, 110, 111, 234

mind(s) (continued):

- and objects (mental/mind), 92, 235, 324, 329, 330, 368, 369
- purified/purifying/purity of, 28, 31, 45, 46, 47, 89–92, 93–94, 95, 247, 262, 286, 386
- and sense of identity, 145–146
- single/unified, 19, 99, 100, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258
- tranquility, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 429–430n195
- undefiled/without defilement(s), 94, 95, 105, 152, 153, 154, 155, 192–193, 202, 203, 225, 226, 230, 234, 353
- without dejection, 50, 51, 52, 53
- without desire(s), 38, 39, 94, 142, 160–163, 182, 183, 234, 262
- See also* body, mental/mind-made; body, speech, and mind; knowledge(s), supernormal (six), of the minds of others; sense bases/ objects, six; sense organs; thought(s)
- mindful/mindfulness, 92, 93, 105, 141, 146, 148, 170, 185, 186, 187, 188, 201, 202, 203, 204, 226, 228, 230, 231, 234–237, 261, 262, 304, 305, 321, 322, 348, 403, 419n41, 437nn303, 311; 441n371
- of the body, 99–114, 227–237, 423nn89, 103; 431n218
- of breathing, 102, 228, 423n89, 431nn218, 224
- as factor of awakening, 146, 236
- right, 20, 37, 38, 41, 42, 43, 50, 51, 52, 83, 88, 124, 147, 159–160, 164–154, 166, 195, 201, 202, 203, 204, 262, 278, 279, 282, 295–298, 302–303, 305, 353, 405, 406
- wrong, 37, 38, 41, 42
- See also* awakening, factors of (seven)/ seven treasures of; eightfold path; five faculties; four establishments of mindfulness/four satipaṭṭhānas
- miserliness, 208, 209–210
- monastic(s), 424n112, 425n123, 426n147, 429n187, 432n231, 435n282
- See also* monk(s); nun(s)
- monk(s), xvii, 13–14, 17, 32, 37, 40–48, 50, 54–56, 59–63, 65, 87–89, 97–99, 109–115, 122, 124–126, 128, 132, 136–141, 156–158, 160–170, 174, 175, 180, 184, 188–191, 195, 196, 200–202, 204, 217, 222–228, 235–238, 243–246, 253–260, 262–264, 269, 270, 288, 290–312, 314, 321–326, 331–333, 342, 343, 345, 349–350, 352, 354–360, 364, 366, 367, 369–371, 374–375, 378, 383, 385, 390, 391, 395, 402, 403, 408, 410–413, 415, 417n2, 419n38, 420n53, 421n60, 422n77, 426n148, 427nn156, 160; 429n186, 431n212, 433n231, 436nn296–298, 301; 437n304, 441nn373–375, 379; 442nn382, 383
- and Ānanda, 313, 438n323
- arahant, 225, 226, 376
- and Cunda, 180–183
- and Dhammika, 395–396, 399
- elder, 114, 422n77
- and heterodox practitioners, 238, 265–267, 432n239
- and householders, 124, 157, 162, 445nn433,435
- of Kosambī, quarreling among, 3, 13–14, 16, 418n13
- and Mahākaccāna, 327, 328, 329–331
- and Mahāmoggallāna, 175–180, 360, 442n381
- and Mahāpajāpati Gotamī, 337–339
- and Māra, 66–67, 415, 445n432
- and mindfulness of the body, practice/ cultivation of, 99–108, 112–114, 227–234, 423n103

and nuns, 336–337, 340
 and Sāriputta, 151, 155–158, 160, 161–
 165, 170, 173–174, 202–204,
 427n162, 429n193
 younger, teaching to, 132–139, 141, 146–149, 340
See also disciple(s); four assemblies; monastic(s)
 moral habits, 367, 368
See also precepts morality, 127, 146, 189–190, 195, 388,
 389, 420n56, 443n411
 mountain(s), 57, 58, 66, 87, 88, 93, 97,
 99, 103, 104, 118, 119, 124, 131, 149,
 188, 229, 242, 250, 251, 264, 271,
 272, 287, 288, 321, 324, 331, 347,
 368, 369, 376, 405, 433nn243, 250
 Crocodile Hill/Mount Crocodile/Sumsumāragiri/Sumsumāra Mountain,
 37, 40, 122, 151, 122, 403
 Mount Sumeru, 412
 Mount Vebhāra, 251
 Mount Vulture Peak, 165, 433n252,
 442nn384, 386; 444n420
See also cave(s)
 Mūgapakkha, 401, 402
See also brahmin chaplains, seven music, 5, 6, 10, 11, 346, 412, 414, 417n4

N

Nāḍika, 333
 Naḷakapāna, 421n61
 name-and-form, 135, 212, 213–214,
 430nn199, 207
See also dependent arising
 Nandiya, 17, 18, 19, 32, 54
 Nātaputta, 251, 433n253 negligence, 20, 173, 259, 260, 292, 366
 as mental defilement, 192, 193, 194
 Niṅaṇṭhas, 251–253, 433nn253, 254
See also heterodox, practitioner(s)/ wanderers

Nigrodha, 271–289, 435nn280, 281, 287,
 288; 436n290
 Nikāyas, xv, xvii
Āṅguttara-nikāya, xvii
Saṃyutta-nikāya, xvii
See also Āgamas
 nirvana, 99, 168, 169, 217, 255, 259, 260,
 261, 295, 296, 297, 298, 322, 332, 347,
 367, 390, 429nn187, 192; 430n196
 acts/attitudes/qualities conducive to, 198, 199
 acts/attitudes/qualities not conducive to, 196, 197, 198
 final/remainderless/without remainder, 42, 44, 47–48, 49, 113, 125, 181,
 182, 183, 270, 291, 320 in the Pure Abodes, 60, 61, 62, 64
 unsurpassable, 139, 140, 141, 171
See also extinction; penetration, awakening, and nirvana
 noble one(s), 75–76, 95, 262, 285, 350, 351, 352, 388, 403, 414
 four pairs/eight classes of, 387–388,
 443n411
 noble silence, 17
 nonaffliction, 442n388 devas of, 71, 72, 293, 294
See also affliction(s) nonanxiety/nonvexation, 71, 72, 293, 294 nonconfusion/unconfused, 352, 442n388 nonexistence, 267–268, 325, 326 nonperception, 323, 325, 326
See also sphere(s), of neither-perception-nor-nonperception
 nonreturners/nonreturning, 40, 54, 60, 61, 62, 64, 113, 139, 237, 291, 384,
 387, 423–424n106, 436n297
See also four fruits nose, 92, 133, 134, 235, 241, 247, 250, 263, 309, 324, 329, 330, 332, 368
See also odors; sense bases/objects, six no-self/not-self, 139, 148, 322, 352–353

Numerical Discourses of the Buddha
 (Bodhi), 437n311, 440nn361, 362
 nun(s), 61–62, 138, 139, 140, 141, 158,
 163, 202, 203, 233, 234, 235, 236,
 237, 336–340, 371, 432n231, 439n348
 ordination of, 336, 337, 338, 339
See also eight garudhammas/rules of respect; four assemblies; Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī; monastic(s); woman/women nymph(s), 67, 73, 74, 413

O

obstacle(s), eight, 370–372 obstruction(s), 44, 142, 143, 144, 145, 357 odors, 92, 133, 247, 263, 309, 310, 324, 368, 369
See also nose; sense bases/objects, six offense(s), 360, 396, 397 serious (saṅghādisesa), 337, 338, 402, 403
See also transgression(s) offering(s), 124, 276, 277, 280, 281, 289,
 336, 348, 367, 371, 372, 379, 380,
 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 388, 422n86,
 436n292
 old age, 311, 344, 345, 440n357 and death, 135, 206–207, 345
See also birth, old age, disease, and death; dependent arising omniscience, 323, 433n253, 438n333
 once-returner(s)/once-returning, 60, 62,
 63, 64, 113, 139, 291, 384, 387, 423–
 424n106, 433n245, 436n297
See also four fruits
 one-seeder, 384, 443n404
See also stream-enterer(s)/stream-entry

P

pain, 94, 174, 206, 215, 216, 239, 242,

243, 250, 251, 252, 262, 268, 284,
 438n319
 of devas, 33, 34, 35, 36, 419n34 extreme/severe, 112, 242, 243, 250,
 251, 290, 311
See also feeling(s), three types of Pajāpati, 67, 69, 71, 72, 293, 294
 Pāli, xvi, xvii, 418n23, 420n55
 discourses/parallel(s)/versions, xv, xvii, 417nn1, 2; 419nn31, 36; 420nn45,
 54, 57; 421nn60, 61, 65, 70;
 422nn74, 88; 423n103, 424nn111,
 117, 118; 425nn125, 129; 426n141,
 427nn155, 163; 428nn169, 174, 176,
 177; 429nn185, 187, 188, 193;
 430n197, 431n215, 432n238,
 433n244, 434nn259, 264, 265, 267,
 270; 435nn276, 281, 286; 436nn292,
 294, 300; 437nn302, 305, 309, 313;
 438nn322, 329, 331; 439nn338, 345,
 346; 440nn354, 358, 361; 441nn364,
 369, 372, 378; 442nn384, 391, 393;
 443nn398, 402, 406; 444nn415, 420;
 445nn428, 432
 Vinaya, 417nn3–12
See also sutta(s)
 Pali Text Society, xvii
 Pañcakaṅga, 422n75
 Paṇḍuputta, 427n152 parents, 55, 364, 365, 386, 417n11,
 444n418
See also family(ies); relatives parinirvāṇa. See nirvana, final/remainder-less/without remainder Pasenadi, King, 346
 path, 15, 16, 37, 38, 41–42, 55, 226, 247, 264, 266, 306–307, 308, 309, 310,
 311, 332, 335, 347, 355, 384, 387,
 401, 434n268
 of/to awakening, 255, 288, 370, 371,
 372, 435n289

- bad/evil/false/wrong, 186, 263, 264, 434n268
- ceasing/stopping practice of, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 364, 365
- to the cessation of dukkha, 95, 137, 262, 286, 307, 312
- to the cessation of taints, 95, 263, 287, 306, 307
- companions on, 265, 286, 269, 270
- of Dharma, leader on, 269, 286, 370, 371, 372, 387
- going forth/becoming homeless/leaving home to train in, 13, 43, 50, 54, 55, 89, 99, 128, 174, 191, 246, 247, 292, 295, 296, 299, 300, 301, 322, 326, 327, 329, 330, 332, 333, 334, 335, 337, 339, 341, 343, 366
- heterodox, 265, 270
- to pure imperturbability, pure neither-perception-nor-nonperception, pure nothingness, 44–49
- requisites of/what is needed for, 15, 16, 32, 295–301
- right, 186, 263, 264, 434n268
- tenfold, 354
- See also* eightfold path
- patience, 3, 13, 14, 148
- pātimokkha*. See rules, code of; Vinaya
- peace, 166, 169, 170, 171, 195, 251, 253, 272, 287, 288, 341, 352, 353, 364, 378, 391, 397, 409
- of dispassion, 345
- of nirvana, 295, 296, 297, 298, 367
- of tranquility, 56, 57
- penetration, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 238
- penetration, awakening, and nirvana, 173, 174, 191, 255
- See also* understanding, awakening, and realization
- perception(s), 45–46, 47, 49, 71, 81, 82, 133, 148, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 293, 306, 308–309, 321, 322, 326, 327, 329, 330, 345, 353, 405, 406, 420nn48, 52; 424–425n120, 425nn122, 128; 439n340
- bodily inertia affecting, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 418n23
- of diversity, 27, 28, 31
- five, 139
- of form(s), 45, 46, 47, 49, 127, 138, 184, 221, 223, 225, 309
- of foulness/impurity, 127, 139, 159, 164, 322
- four, 137, 308
- of imperturbability, 45, 47, 49
- of light, 81, 82, 88, 105, 123, 170, 230, 424–425n120, 425n122
- of nothingness, 46, 47, 49, 127, 138, 308
- of purity, 159, 164, 293
- sensual, 45, 46, 47, 49, 420nn46, 47
- six, 134, 437n317
- Perception (disciple), 405, 406
- phenomena, 183, 321–322, 326, 327, 329, 331
- impermanent/rise and fall of, 215, 216, 368, 369
- insight into, 302–303, 429–430n195
- pleasure(s), 94, 180, 215, 216, 239, 243, 245, 262, 284, 379, 380, 381 382, 412
- born of the absence of rapture, 104, 229–230
- born of concentration, 103, 104, 229
- born of seclusion, 103, 229
- of devas, 33, 34, 35, 36, 413, 419n34
- See also* sensual pleasure(s)
- poverty, 55, 374–377
- power(s), 126, 265, 270, 341, 344, 347, 404, 405, 411
- five, 141–142
- seven, 146

power(s) (continued):

- supernormal, 15, 69, 72, 86, 93, 97–98, 99, 113, 136, 274, 289, 292, 399, 400, 404, 405, 414
  - four bases of, 136–137
- See also* will-power
- precepts, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 89, 96, 97, 196, 198, 200–201, 266, 290, 291, 292, 335, 336, 367, 375, 390
- abandoning, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 364, 365
- breach of/breaking/transgressing, 96–97, 155, 160, 196, 198
- five, 443n409
- virtue(s) of, 265, 266, 269, 270
- See also* moral habits; rules, code of; Vinaya
- pride, 173, 185, 186, 187, 188, 344, 345, 351, 352, 358, 425n123, 440n357
- ground(s) for, 425nn130–132; 426nn134–137
  - as mental defilement, 192, 193, 194
- proliferation, 38, 41, 42, 43, 419n42
  - conceptual, 434n272, 439nn340, 341
- Puṇṇaputta, 165–166
- Pure Abodes, 60, 61, 62, 64
- purification, by bathing, 191, 194, 195
  - See also* heterodox
- purity, 31, 71, 72, 125, 127, 225, 262, 273, 293, 294, 306, 319, 333, 334
  - of conduct, 168, 169
  - mental/of the mind, 45–47, 104–105, 230
  - perception(s) of, 159, 160, 293

Q

- qualities, 175, 176, 303–304, 305–306, 414, 425n132, 427n165, 428nn172, 175; 429n190
  - attractive and repulsive, 106, 231
  - bad/evil, 197, 198, 317, 318, 429n187

- eight extraordinary, 442n383
- pure, 315, 316, 318, 320,
  - roots of, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320
- that make a person difficult/easy to admonish, 175–177, 427n166, 428n167
- unwholesome, 315–320, 438n325
- wholesome, 199, 200, 315–320, 438n327
- quarrel(s)/quarreling, 3, 14, 16, 44, 138, 208, 209, 240, 248–249, 325, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331
  - See also* argumentation; disputatious(ness)

R

- rains retreat, 40, 43, 175, 332, 333, 354, 427n164
  - and nuns, 336, 338
- rapture, 103, 104, 127, 180, 229–230, 262, 344, 425n128, 434n266
  - concentration conjoined with, 51, 52, 53, 262, 419n30, 421nn58, 59
- realization, 286, 287, 292, 323, 366, 367, 368, 371, 372, 373
  - of awakening, 20, 32, 36, 37, 226, 227
  - of destruction of the taints, 286
  - of higher/of supernormal knowledge, powers, 92, 93, 97, 98, 262
- realm(s), 65, 66, 68, 113, 291, 415, 418n14, 426n143
- bad, 95, 152, 153, 154, 186, 191, 192, 242, 251, 285, 307, 312, 313, 314, 317, 318, 320, 376, 385, 389, 393, 404, 405, 407
- Brahmā, 73
- desire, 221, 222
  - of devas of radiance, 80–81, 82–83, 84, 86
- good, 95, 153, 154, 192, 193, 285, 290, 291, 307, 320, 392, 409

- heavenly, 113, 192, 193, 285, 290, 291,
     421n68, 444n425
 hell, 191, 192
 human, 113, 252, 291 lower, 444n425
     of animals, 370
     of hungry ghosts, 370
     of nothingness, 224
 rebirth, 43, 345, 407, 419n34, 426n143,
     438n334, 444n425, 445n438
     among/as animal(s), 307, 310, 376, 385, 388 in bad realms, 385
     in the Brahmā world, 400, 401 in heaven, 307, 311
     in the Heaven of Streaming Radiance, 400, 401
     in hell, 307, 310, 385, 388
     among/as human being(s), 307, 311 among/as hungry ghost(s), 307, 310, 376, 385, 388
     among nymphs, 73, 74
     See also birth recitation, 355, 371, 372, 424n119 refuge, 242, 250 in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, 195, 335–336
 regret, 49, 149, 188, 242, 251, 264, 321,
     324, 377, 433n250
 relatives, 55, 89, 181, 182, 240, 248, 290,
     386, 428n173, 436n297
     See also family(ies); parents release, 65–66, 68–69
     five elements of, 142–146
 Reṇu, King, 444n426
 renunciant(s), 18, 36, 37, 67, 68, 69, 71,
     73, 74–75, 78, 79, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85,
     158–159, 164–165, 239, 243, 245,
     246, 263, 274, 285, 293, 311, 313,
     325, 326, 341, 346, 397, 398, 399,
     400, 406, 407, 422n77, 427n153
 acts/attitudes conducive for, 198–199 acts/attitudes not conducive for, 196–197 and ascetic practices, 276–277, 278, 280, 281–282
 corrupt/disgraced, 361, 362, 363 and types of clinging, 268–269
 Dharma of, 397, 399, 400
 diligent, 341, 407, 408, 409, 410 four fruits of, 139, 439n346 women's attainment of, 332–333, 334 four levels of, 265, 270 four practices of, 283, 284, 285 goal of, 299–301
 and Māra, 404–405, 445n432
 and the māra Corrupter, 406–408, 409– 410 and mindfulness of the body, 109–112 offerings to, 379–382
 true, 265, 270
 and views, 267–268
 wise, 158–159, 160, 164, 165
See also disciple(s); Gotama; monastic(s); monk(s); nun(s); Perception; Soṇa Kolivīsa
 renunciation, 242–243, 442n388
     happiness of, 56, 57
     See also household/household life, giving up/leaving reputation, 277, 281
     bad, 392, 393
     good/high, 167, 271, 392
 requisite(s), 15, 16, 32, 93, 158, 163,
     290, 295–296, 297–298, 299, 300,
     301, 336, 425n133, 426n147,
     436nn297, 301; 437n304
 resentment, 8, 12, 14, 53, 79, 138, 173,
     175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 194, 283,
     326, 327, 329, 330, 331, 408, 409 resistance, 213, 221, 223, 225, 430n206

restlessness, 184, 185, 186, 187, 201,
202, 203, 429n191, 429–430n195
See also agitation restlessness-and-worry, 85, 93, 236, 358

as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193

restraint, 14, 92, 168, 169, 196, 197, 198,
199, 200–201, 271, 421nn62, 63;
425n128
See also four practices/restraints

Revata, 167

right comprehension, 20, 43, 50, 51, 52, 53, 88, 92, 93, 124, 138, 139, 159,
160, 164, 165, 166, 195, 201, 202,
203, 204, 262, 302, 303, 305, 361,
362, 363, 367, 442n383
and practice of asceticism, 278, 279, 282

river(s), 109, 407
Aciravatī River, 312
Bāhukā River, 194, 195
Eastern River, 346
Ganges River, 50
Nerañjarā River, 191

robe(s), 17, 41, 87, 88, 92, 99, 101, 125, 130, 138, 152, 155, 165, 227, 247,
272, 275, 290, 295, 296, 299, 300,
303, 305, 312, 326, 346, 355, 357,
359, 361, 362, 363, 396, 400, 405,
406, 407, 408, 410, 437n312
of Anuruddha, 38, 43, 77, 87, 87–88, 97, 99
of the Buddha/World-honored One, 15, 17, 18, 88, 99, 170, 324, 325, 333 cloth for, 87, 88, 98–99
coarse/patchwork/rag, 38, 130, 138,
274–275, 426n135
excellent, 158, 163, 426n147
three, 87, 88, 130
inner, 88, 123, 170
outer, 15, 18, 88, 92, 101, 123, 170, 227, 361, 362, 363

yellow, 43, 50, 54, 55, 89, 174, 191,
292, 332, 333, 334, 366, 439n347
See also requisite(s)

rules, 268, 269, 430n205, 436n292 code of, 89, 355, 359, 360, 361, 442n380
See also eight garudhammas/rules of respect

S

Sahajāti, 428n169

Sāketa, 54

Sakka, 342, 398–399, 412–414, 444n424

Sakyan(s), 15, 246, 247, 253, 324, 325,
326, 332, 333
See also Bhagu; Daṇḍapāṇi; Mahānāma

Samīti, 427n152

Sandhāna, 435nn277, 281, 288

sangha, 14, 100, 155, 160, 325, 360, 363, 387–388, 389
See also Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha

Sañjīva, 445n431

Sāriputta, 167, 174, 385, 390, 427nn158–
160, 162; 443n407
and the Buddha/World-honored One, 355–357, 385–389
on defilements, 151–155
and Mahāmoggallāna, 165–167
on middle way, 173–174
on pure states, 202–204, 429n193
on a teacher of the Dharma, 170–173

Sarvāstivāda, 443n405

seclusion, 37, 38, 41–42, 68, 93, 166,
168, 169–171, 172–173, 205, 290,
346, 369, 419n40, 421n60, 425n128,
435n286, 440n363, 442nn385, 388
delight in/rapture and happiness/pleasure born of, 103, 171, 172, 173, 229, 344, 348, 366, 367
See also solitary place(s)

- self, 46, 71–72, 183, 214, 215–221, 293–294, 420n50, 430nn203, 208, 209; 431nn211, 213, 214
- clinging to, 268–270, 430n208, 434n273
- immaterial and material, boundless/unlimited and limited, 218–221
- See also* “I”-conceit; view(s), related to personality/of self
- self-mastery/self-restraint, 258, 271
- See also* restraint
- self-mortification, 273–275, 279, 283–285, 292, 435nn283, 285, 287
- See also* asceticism/ascetic practice(s)
- sense(s)/sense faculties/sense spheres, 92, 93, 123, 127, 166, 243, 368, 405, 406, 430n202, 432n235, 439n336
- six, 57, 133, 135, 148, 432n235
- See also* sense bases/objects, six; sense organs
- sense bases/objects, six, 133, 324, 368, 430n204, 432n235, 437n317
- See also* bases; consciousness(es), six types; dependent arising
- sense organs, 439n342
- See also* body(ies); ear(s); eye(s); mind(s); nose; tongue
- sensual passion, anger/hatred, and delusion/ignorance, 60, 62, 63, 64, 113, 128, 129, 130, 131, 291, 350, 425n128
- See also* defilement(s), three, of greed, hatred, and delusion
- sensual pleasure(s), 44, 45, 47, 238–239, 240–243, 247, 248–251, 253, 268–269, 306–307, 309–310, 324, 344, 345, 347, 349, 364, 365, 377, 378–383, 420nn46, 48; 432n240, 433nn246, 247, 251; 435n286, 437nn314, 316
- five cords of, 239, 263
- See also* sensual passion, anger/hatred, and delusion/ignorance; sexual
- seven treasures:
of awakening, 354
of kings, 97, 397
- seven wholesome states, 354, 441n371
- sexual, 89
desire(s), 89, 349
misconduct, 335, 336, 386
- See also* desire(s); sensual pleasure(s)
- shame and scruple(s), 89, 173, 175, 176, 177, 179, 180, 181, 182–183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 196, 197, 198, 199, 394, 428n172
- sign(s), 20, 30, 194, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 386 for concentration/meditation, 123, 140–141
five, 254–258
language, 371, 372
reviewing, 105, 231
- silence, 238, 252, 253, 271, 418n20, 441n379 obstinate, 351, 363
- See also* noble silence
- skeleton(s), 107–108, 233, 244
- See also* cemetery(ies); charnel grounds; corpse
- skillful means, 16, 40, 87, 289, 385
- sloth-and-torpor, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 56, 85, 93, 184, 185, 186, 187, 201, 202, 203, 236, 304, 305
as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193
- See also* drowsiness
- solitary place(s), 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 43, 50, 54
- See also* seclusion
- Soṇa Kolivīsa, 364–366, 369–370, 442nn385–387
- sound(s), 6, 8, 92, 94, 114, 120–121, 133, 247, 263, 309, 310, 324, 362, 365, 368, 369, 425n128
- See also* ear(s); sense bases/objects, six

- speech, 56, 90, 91, 188, 189, 352, 377, 393, 414 divisive, 90, 185, 186, 187, 188, 208, 209, 278, 282, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331 false, 89–90, 185, 186, 187, 187, 188, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331, 335, 336, 386 frivolous, 90, 185, 186, 187, 188, 278, 282 harsh, 90, 185, 186, 187, 188, 278, 282
 right, 147
See also body, speech, and mind; eight-fold path
- sphere(s), 45, 46, 47, 70, 221–222, 224–225, 431n213 of boundless/infinite consciousness, 127, 131, 221, 223, 224, 225, 293, 294 of boundless/infinite space, 127, 131, 221, 223, 224, 293, 294 of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, 47, 48, 127, 131, 132, 138, 184, 222, 224–225, 293, 294, 323, 353
 of nothingness, 46, 47, 48, 49, 127, 131, 221, 222, 224, 225, 293, 294, 308
See also sense(s)/sense faculties/sense spheres
- spirit(s), 67, 69, 71, 72, 206, 207, 275, 293, 294
- stealing, 283, 284, 285, 386, 435n286
See also taking what is not given
- stingy/stinginess, 278, 282, 351, 363, 378, 386
- stream-enterer(s)/stream-entry, 60, 62, 63, 65, 113, 139, 291, 384, 385, 387, 414, 423–424n106, 436n297, 443n404
See also four fruits; one-seeder
- stupidity, 278–279, 282
See also ignorance
- Suddhodana, 343, 344
- suffering, 39, 53, 57, 90, 160, 165, 168, 226, 239, 247, 317, 318, 377, 403, 407, 432n240, 433n247 extreme/immeasurable, 240, 241, 242, 249, 250, 251, 253, 275, 290, 312, 404, 405
See also dukkha
- Sundarika, 194–195
- Sunetta, 400–401, 402, 444n425
See also brahmin chaplain(s), seven
- superhuman state, 19–20
- supernormal means, 442n386, 444n424
See also knowledge(s), supernormal; power(s), supernormal
- suttas:*
Adhikaraṇa-sutta, 429nn185–187
Ākhaṇḍikheyya-sutta, 436nn294, 296–298
Akkhaṇḍa-sutta, 442nn391–392
Anaṅgaṇa-sutta, 426nn141–149; 427nn150–152, 154
Āneñjasappāya-sutta, 420nn45–48, 50–53
Anumāna-sutta, 427nn163–167, 428n168
Anuruddha-sutta, 419nn36–42, 420n43, 422nn74–75, 77–86
Arahanta-sutta, 441nn369–371
Bālapaṇḍita-sutta, 433nn243, 250
Bhikkhu-sutta, 420nn54, 56
Brahmanimantaṇika-sutta, 421nn65–69, 71; 422n73
Chachakka-sutta, 426n140
Cūḷadukkhakkhandha-sutta, 433nn244–248, 250–256; 433–434n257, 434n258
Cūḷasīhanāda-sutta, 434nn270, 272; 435nn273–275
Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta, 439n349
Dakkiṇeyyā-sutta, 443nn402, 403
Dhammadāyāda-sutta, 427nn155–160, 162

Dhammika-sutta, 444nn420–426
Dvedhāvitakka-sutta, 434nn264–269
Gayā-sutta, 419nn31–35
Gihī-sutta, 443nn406–414
Gotamī-sutta, 439nn345, 347–349;
 440nn350–352
Hatthisāriputta-sutta, 424nn111–113, 115–117
Iṇa-sutta, 442nn393–395, 397
Kāmahogī-sutta, 443nn398, 399, 401
Kaṇṭaka-sutta, 425nn125, 127, 128
Kāraṇḍava-sutta, 441n378, 442n383
Kathāvatthu-sutta, 441nn364–368
Kāyagatāsati-sutta, 422n88, 423nn89–
 93, 96–98, 101–103, 105; 423–
 424n106, 431n225, 432n228
Kodhana-sutta, 444nn415, 416, 418
Madhupiṇḍika-sutta, 439nn338, 340– 343
Mahācunda-sutta, 428nn169, 170, 172, 173
Mahādukkhakkandha-sutta, 432nn238–
 241, 433nn243, 246
Mahāgovinda-sutta, 444n426
Mahānidāna-sutta, 430nn197, 199,
 201–209; 431nn211–214
Māratajjaniya-sutta, 445nn428–439
Mūlaka-suttas, 438nn329, 330
Mūlapariyāya-sutta, 436n299
Nāga-sutta, 440nn358–361, 363
Naḷakapāna-sutta, 421nn61–64
Nibbedhika-sutta, 437nn313–317,
 438nn318, 319, 221
Pacalāyamāna-sutta, 424nn118, 119;
 424–425n120, 425nn121–124
Parihāna-sutta, 429nn193–195;
 430n196
Pavāraṇā-sutta, 441nn372–377
Purisindriyañāna-sutta, 438nn322–328
Sacitta-sutta, 437nn309–312

Sallekha-sutta, 428nn174, 175
Samatha-sutta, 437nn305–307
Saṅgīti-sutta, 441n371
Saṅkhitta-sutta, 420nn54, 56; 421nn58, 59
Sappurisa-sutta, 425nn129–133;
 426nn134–139
Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta, 423n100, 431nn215–
 222, 224, 225; 432nn226, 229–235,
 237; 437n316
Soṇa-sutta, 442nn384–390
Sukhumāla-sutta, 440n354, 356, 357
Ṭhīti-sutta, 429nn188–192
Uddaka-sutta, 438nn331–334;
 439nn335–337
Udumbarika-sutta, 435nn276, 277,
 280–283, 285–289; 436nn290–293
Upakkilesa-sutta, 417n1, 2; 418nn13–17,
 19–21, 22, 24–26; 418–419n27,
 419nn28, 30
Uposatha-sutta, 441nn378–380;
 442nn381–383
Vanapattha-sutta, 436nn300, 301; 436–
 437n302, 437nn303, 304
Vatthūpama-sutta, 428nn177–180;
 429nn181–184
Vitakkasaṅṭhāna-sutta, 434n259, 261, 263
See also Pāli, discourses/parallel(s)/ versions sword(s), 5–6, 7–8, 11, 89, 208, 209,
 240, 241, 249, 386, 397, 417n11

T

taint(s), 57, 95, 113, 127, 142–146, 226,
 262–263, 287, 292, 295, 296, 297,
 298, 306, 307, 349, 352, 354, 356,
 358, 366, 367, 368, 395, 421nn62, 63;
 437n314
 cessation of, 95, 263, 287, 295, 296, 297, 298, 306, 307, 374

taint(s) (continued):

destruction/eradication of, 95, 97, 98,
139, 140, 141, 262, 286, 303, 305,
351, 349, 376, 422n73, 424n110,
434n267, 436n303

freedom/liberation from, 353, 364, 365

and six sense bases, 324, 438n336 three, of existence, ignorance, and sensual desire, 49, 95, 263, 287, 307, 387, 353, 358

taking what is not given, 89, 186, 187, 195, 335, 336, 386

See also stealing tangible(s), 92, 133, 247, 263, 309, 310, 324, 368–369

See also body(ies); sense bases/objects,
six

taste(s), 133, 309, 310, 331–332

See also flavor(s); sense bases/objects,
six; tongue

tathāgata(s.) 72, 190, 226, 227, 265, 269, 287, 288, 342, 370, 371, 372, 405,
415, 431n216

See also buddha(s)

Tathāgata, 38, 57, 58, 59, 65, 88, 147,
189–190, 217, 239, 264, 286, 288,
313, 314–320, 347, 360–361, 387,
388, 404, 440n361

See also Buddha; World-honored One

teaching(s), 41, 43, 49, 56, 57, 58, 59,
114, 123, 149, 161, 166, 170, 171, 180,
181, 182, 183, 188, 197, 199, 202, 203,
214, 217, 218, 219, 246, 264, 266,
269, 273, 292, 306, 321, 324, 325,
328, 332, 348, 352, 374, 408, 410,
414, 422n73, 424n119, 425n122,
426n144, 427n159, 429n187, 444n425
eight extraordinary qualities of, 442n383 faith in, 265, 266, 269, 270 to householders, 157, 162, 436n293 on the nature of the cloth for robes, 98– 99 noble/true/wholesome, 195, 340, 376, 389

wrong, 191, 192, 193

thought(s), 293, 294, 329, 330, 377,
434n265

evil/unwholesome, 102, 113, 155–158, 160–163, 227–228, 254–258

three, 113, 269, 291, 376

of anger/ill-will, 113, 259, 260, 263, 291, 376

of cruelty/harming, 113, 259, 262, 263, 269, 291, 376

of (sensual) desire, 92, 113, 173, 175,
176, 177m 178, 184, 185, 259,
260, 263, 269, 279, 291, 376 inclined toward Dharma, 261–262 mastery over, 258

two types, wholesome and unwholesome, 259–261, 264, 434n268

See also mental; mind(s); sense bases/objects, six

three characteristics, of impermanent nature, dukkha, and subject to cessation, 45, 46, 47, 49, 441n370 tongue, 92, 133, 134, 212, 235, 247, 263, 309, 324, 329, 330, 332, 368

See also flavor(s); sense bases/objects, six; taste(s)

training, 14, 15, 44–47, 89, 92, 195, 274,
275, 340, 367–368, 384, 417n6,
429n187, 439n350, 442n389,
443n405

acts/qualities conducive to, 198–199

acts/qualities not conducive to, 196–197

beyond, 354, 367, 368, 384, 443n405 in the Dharma, 178, 179, 180 in the path, 55, 295–301, 330

threefold, 354

with utmost diligence, 302, 303, 305

tranquility, 38, 39, 56, 57, 83, 84 abiding/dwelling in, 19–20, 29–32 awakening factor of, 146, 236 of the body, 140, 141 inner/internal, 254–258, 261, 302–303,
 429–430n195
See also awakening, factors of (seven)/ seven treasures of transgression(s), 175, 176, 177, 178, 179,
 337, 338, 436n290
See also offense(s)
 tree(s), 16, 39, 49, 57, 58, 67, 78–79, 81–
 82, 83, 85, 93, 99, 124, 131, 149, 188,
 264, 271, 187, 288, 321 324, 325,
 346, 362, 376, 399, 405, 426n137
ajapāla-nigrodha, 191
 banyan/royal banyan, 444nn422, 424
 Well-established, 397–399 palm, 422n73
 rose-apple, 344
sāla, 16, 87, 88, 97, 99
See also forest(s)
 True Mind, 270–273, 287, 289
 turbidity, 142, 143, 144, 145
See also sloth-and-torpor

U

Udāyin, 346–347, 349
 Uddaka Rāmaputta, 323
 understanding, awakening, and realization, 366, 367, 368, 371, 372, 373
See also penetration, awakening, and
 nirvana
 unwholesome/unwholesomeness, 167,
 253, 318, 350, 376, 377, 436n28
 action(s)/conduct/deeds/karma, 189,
 195, 251, 252, 371, 372, 373, 377,
 394, 395, 415
 qualities, 303, 306, 315–316, 317, 318,
 319–320, 438n326
 roots, 318, 319, 320, 438nn325, 326

states, 38, 42, 44, 92, 93, 113, 136, 137,
 138, 155–158, 184, 201–202, 203,
 208–209, 245, 253, 259, 260, 261,
 262, 286, 291, 303, 304, 305, 326,
 327, 329, 330, 331, 344, 387, 388,
 407, 408, 409, 410, 434n266

thought(s), 227, 228, 254–258
 three, 264, 291, 376, 423–424n106,
 424n107, 434n268

See also wholesome

Upacāla, 125

Upariṭṭha, 125

V

Vajjīs, 312

Vaṅgīsa, 357, 441n377

Vejayanta Palace, 412, 413–414

Vidhura, 445n430

view(s), 49, 183–184, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 267, 351, 371, 372, 414–415,
 435n285

clinging to/conducive to clinging, 268,
 269, 270–271, 278, 281, 282,
 430n203

evil, 180–183, 189, 190, 363

extreme 278, 281–282, false/perverted/wrong, 65, 95, 264,

 278, 281, 282, 285, 371, 372, 403,
 442n392

as mental defilement, 191, 192, 193

related to personality/of self, 214, 215–
 217, 218–219, 220–221, 278, 282,
 282, 430nn208, 209; 431nn211, 213

right/straight, 95, 147, 174, 264, 285,
 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 372,
 402, 420n56

two, of existence and nonexistence,
 267–268

underlying tendency to, 326, 327, 329, 330, 331

See also eightfold path

Index

Vinaya, 417nn2–12, 426n134, 439n351 virtue(s), 271, 348, 351, 402, 428n170,
     429n190, 441n379
     great, 69, 73, 86, 93, 98, 99, 274, 341, 404, 405
     noble aggregate of, 92, 93 of precepts, 265, 266, 269, 270
 Voice (disciple), 405, 410–411 volition/volitional, 148, 256, 257, 258, 353

W

wealth/wealthy, 9, 10, 11, 12, 89, 93, 181, 182, 183, 239, 247, 248, 364, 365,
     373, 374, 377, 379, 381, 382, 383,
     392, 393, 397, 442–443n400, 443n416
   in accordance with and contrary to the Dharma, 378–383
   seven types of, 146
 Well-gone One, 18, 68, 133, 147, 195,
     314, 347, 357, 370, 371, 372, 387, 390
   See also Buddha; Tathāgata; World-honored One wheel-turning monarch(s), 342, 356, 358,
     397, 444n423
 wholesome, 15, 167, 254, 255, 256, 257,
     258, 288, 289, 315, 316, 350, 436n292
   actions/deeds, 189, 371, 372, 373 factors/dharmas, 50, 227, 228
   mental aspirations, 164–165
   qualities, 199, 200, 303, 306, 315–316,
     317, 318, 319–320, 438n327
   roots, 42, 315, 316, 317m 438n327
   state(s), 39–40, 42, 53–54, 55, 93, 102,
     109, 136, 138, 160–163, 185, 186,
     187, 188, 200–202, 204, 302, 303,
     305, 375, 419n37, 429n189, 442n394
   seven, 354, 441n371
   teachings, 195, 389
   thoughts, three, 264, 434n268
   wisdom, 186, 187, 188

will-power, 102, 228
 wisdom, 37, 38, 41, 42, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63,
     64, 65, 93, 113, 141, 146, 166, 189,
     200, 201, 202, 203, 226, 227, 259,
     267, 268, 272, 286, 292, 321, 322,
     323, 335, 336, 348, 356, 375, 377,
     383, 388, 390, 395, 415, 429n190,
     437n311, 441n371, 442n394, 443n411
   cultivating/developing, 166, 189–190,
     260, 261, 428n170
   eye of, 414
   faulty, 185, 186, 187, 188, 201, 202, 203, 204, 304, 305
   higher/supreme, of insight into phenomena, 302–303, 429–430n195 liberation by/for the sake of liberation,
     45, 46, 47, 112, 225, 292, 357, 367,
     368, 369, 384, 441n375
   noble/true/unsurpassable, 42, 96, 97, 356 penetrating/penetrative, 43, 356
   power of, 141, 146
   wholesome, 186, 187, 188
   See also five faculties
 woman/women, 77, 271, 274, 339, 344,
     386, 391, 392, 393, 397, 427n154,
     429n191, 429–430n195, 432n242,
     437n310
   arahantship/awakening of, 332, 333, 334,
     439n349
   eight rules of respect for, 336–337, 338–339
   five positions not attainable by, 342 and leaving home to practice the path,
     332–333, 334–335, 337, 341
   See also Mahāpajāpati Gotamī; nun(s) world(s), 8, 20, 36, 37, 43, 46, 53, 60, 61,
     63, 64, 70, 71, 79, 90, 97, 113, 125,
     138, 139, 151, 169, 170, 171, 183, 190,
     194, 205, 217, 239, 269, 283, 286, 291,
     293, 294, 313, 322, 323, 325, 326, 346,
     349, 353, 354, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374,

- 375, 377, 379, 383, 386, 387, 388, 394, 397, 405, 408, 413, 415, 425n124, 431n217, 445n436
 Brahmā, 65, 73, 93, 400, 401, 405, 414
 eon(s), of contraction and expansion, 94, 284
 heavenly, 392, 409
 World-honored One, 17–18, 32, 44, 50, 54, 55, 82, 84, 86, 98, 99–101, 109, 110, 111, 112, 115, 116, 126–128, 131–132, 156, 161, 167–171, 174, 188–190, 191, 196, 200, 226, 238, 253, 259, 264–265, 270–272, 287, 290, 293, 295, 299, 302, 304, 306, 321, 323–332, 337–339, 343, 345, 349, 351, 352, 355, 359–360, 363, 364, 369, 370, 373–377, 383, 384, 389, 391, 393
 and Ānanda, 40–41, 47–49, 87–88, 97, 132–149, 190, 205–214, 217–218, 219, 312–321, 334–337, 340
 and Anāthapiṇḍika, 379–382, 383–384
 and Anuruddha, 18–32, 37–40, 55–65, 88, 97–98
 and Bhagu, 15–16
 and Brahmā, 66, 68–73
 and Cunda, 183
 and Daṇḍapāṇi, 325
 and Dhammika, 396–402
 and Isidatta, 75–76
 and the Kosambī monks, 3–15
 and the Licchavis, 126
 and Mahāmoggallāna, 88, 122–125, 360–363
 and Mahānāma, 246–253
 and Mahāpajāpati Gotamī, 332–334
 and Māra, 66, 67–68, 73–75
 and Nigrantha, 272–289
 and Sāriputta, 170, 174, 355–357, 385–390
 and Soṇa Kolivīsa, 364–368
 and Sundarika, 1912–195
 and True Mind, 270, 289 and Udāyin, 346–347
 and Vaṅgīsa, 357
See also Buddha; Tathāgata worldly/worldliness, 44, 124, 190, 234, 271, 308, 390 worldly person/worldling(s), 311, 344, 345, 374, 377, 433n245, 440n357, 444n418 worship/worshiper:
   of fire/fire-, 99, 275
   of the sun and moon, 275
   of water, 275
See also ascetic(s)/asceticism/ascetic practice(s); heterodox, practitioner(s)/wanderers

Y

- Yasa, 125
 Yaśomitra, 443n405

Z

- Zhong ahan jing. See Madhyama-āgama*

BDK English Tripiṭaka (First Series)

Abbreviations

Ch. :	Chinese
Skt. :	Sanskrit
Jp. :	Japanese
Eng. :	Published title

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Chang ahan jing (長阿含經)	1
Skt. Dīrghāgama
Eng. The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume I, 2015)
The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume II, 2016)
The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume III, 2018)
Ch. Zhong ahan jing (中阿含經)	26
Skt. Madhyamāgama
Eng. The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume I, 2013)
The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume II, 2020)
Ch. Dasheng bensheng xindi guan jing (大乘本生心地觀經)	159
Ch. Fo suoxing zan (佛所行讚)	192
Skt. Buddhacarita
Eng. Buddhacarita: In Praise of Buddha's Acts (2009)
Ch. Zabao zang jing (雜寶藏經)	203
Eng. The Storehouse of Sundry Valuables (1994)
Ch. Faju piyu jing (法句譬喻經)	211
Eng. The Scriptural Text: Verses of the Doctrine, with Parables (1999)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Xiaopin banruo boluomi jing (小品般若波羅蜜經) Skt. Aṣṭasāhasrikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra	227
Ch. Jingang banruo boluomi jing (金剛般若波羅蜜經) Skt. Vajracchedikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra	235
Ch. Daluo jingang bukong zhenshi sanmoye jing (大樂金剛不空眞實三麼耶經) Skt. Adhyardhaśatikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra Eng. The Sutra of the Vow of Fulfilling the Great Perpetual Enjoyment and Benefiting All Sentient Beings Without Exception (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)	243
Ch. Renwang banruo boluomi jing (仁王般若波羅蜜經) Skt. *Kāruṇikārājā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra	245
Ch. Banruo boluomiduo xin jing (般若波羅蜜多心經) Skt. Prajñāpāramitāhṛdaya-sutra	251
Ch. Miaofa lianhua jing (妙法蓮華經) Skt. Saddharmapuṇḍarīka-sutra Eng. The Lotus Sutra (Revised Second Edition, 2007)	262
Ch. Wuliangyi jing (無量義經) Eng. The Infinite Meanings Sutra (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)	276
Ch. Guan Puxian pusa xingfa jing (觀普賢菩薩行法經) Eng. The Sutra Expounded by the Buddha on Practice of the Way through Contemplation of the Bodhisattva All-embracing Goodness (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)	277
Ch. Dafangguang fo huayan jing (大方廣佛華嚴經) Skt. Avataṃsaka-sutra	279
Ch. Shengman shizihou yisheng defang bianfang guang jing (勝鬘師子吼一乘大方便方廣經) Skt. Śrīmālādevīsīmhanāda-sutra Eng. The Sutra of Queen Śrīmālā of the Lion's Roar (2004)	353
Ch. Wuliangshou jing (無量壽經) Skt. Sukhāvatīvyūha Eng. The Larger Sutra on Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)	360

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Guan wuliangshou fo jing (觀無量壽佛經)	365
Skt. *Amitāyurdhyāna-sutra
Eng. The Sutra on Contemplation of Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Amituo jing (阿彌陀經)	366
Skt. Sukhāvativyūha
Eng. The Smaller Sutra on Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Da banniepan jing (大般涅槃經)	374
Skt. Mahāparinirvana-sutra
Eng. The Nirvana Sutra (Volume I, 2013)
Ch. Fochuibo niepan lüeshuo jiaojie jing (佛垂般涅槃略說教誡經)	389
Eng. The Bequeathed Teaching Sutra (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Ch. Dizang pusa benyuan jing (地藏菩薩本願經)	412
Skt. *Kṣitigarbhapraṇidhāna-sutra
Ch. Banzhou sanmei jing (般舟三昧經)	418
Skt. Pratyutpanna-buddhasammukhāvasthita-samādhi-sutra
Eng. The Pratyutpanna Samādhi Sutra (1998)
Ch. Yaoshi liuli guang rulai benyuan gongde jing (藥師琉璃光如來本願功德經)	450
Skt. Bhaiṣajyaguru-vaiḍūrya-prabhāsa-pūrvapraṇidhāna-viśeṣavistara
Eng. The Scripture of Master of Medicine, Beryl Radiance Tathāgata (2018)
Ch. Mile xiasheng chengfo jing (彌勒下生成佛經)	454
Skt. *Maitreyavyākaraṇa
Eng. The Sutra that Expounds the Descent of Maitreya Buddha and His Enlightenment (2016)
Ch. Wenshushili wen jing (文殊師利問經)	468
Skt. *Mañjuśrīparipṛcchā
Eng. The Sutra of Mañjuśrī's Questions (2016)
Ch. Weimojie suoshuo jing (維摩詰所說經)	475
Skt. Vimalakīrtinirdeśa-sutra
Eng. The Vimalakīrti Sutra (2004)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Yueshangnü jing (月上女經)	480
Skt. Candrottārādārikā-paripṛcchā
Eng. The Sutra of the Girl Candrottārā (2018)
Ch. Zuochan sanmei jing (坐禪三昧經)	614
Eng. The Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation (2009)
Ch. Damoduoluo chan jing (達磨多羅禪經)	618
Ch. Yuedeng sanmei jing (月燈三昧經)	639
Skt. Samādhirāja-candrapradīpa-sutra
Ch. Shoulengyan sanmei jing (首楞嚴三昧經)	642
Skt. Śūraṅgamasamādhi-sutra
Eng. The Śūraṅgama Samādhi Sutra (1998)
Ch. Jinguang ming zuishengwang jing (金光明最勝王經)	665
Skt. Suvarṇaprabhāsa-sutra
Ch. Dasheng rulengqie jing (大乘入楞伽經)	672
Skt. Laṅkāvatāra-sutra
Ch. Jie shenmi jing (解深密經)	676
Skt. Saṃdhinirmocana-sutra
Eng. The Scripture on the Explication of Underlying Meaning (2000)
Ch. Yulanpen jing (盂蘭盆經)	685
Skt. *Ullambana-sutra
Eng. The Ullambana Sutra (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Ch. Sishierzhang jing (四十二章經)	784
Eng. The Sutra of Forty-two Sections (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Ch. Dafanguang yuanjue xiuduoluo liaoyi jing (大方廣圓覺修多羅了義經)	842
Eng. The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Ch. Da Biluzhena chengfo shenbian jiachi jing (大毘盧遮那成佛神變加持經)	848
Skt. Mahāvairocanaḥśambodhi-vikurvitādhiṣṭhāna-vaipulyasūtreन्द्रa- rājanāma-dharmaparyāya
Eng. The Vairocanaḥśambodhi Sutra (2005)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Jinggangding yiqie rulai zhenshi she dasheng xianzheng dajiao wang jing (金剛頂一切如來真實攝大乘現證大教王經)	865
Skt. Sarvatathāgata-tattvasaṃgraha-mahāyānā-bhisamaya-mahākālparāja
Eng. The Adamantine Pinnacle Sutra (in Two Esoteric Sutras , 2001)
Ch. Suxidi jieluo jing (蘇悉地羯囉經)	893
Skt. Susiddhikara-mahātantra-sādhanaopāyika-pāṭala
Eng. The Susiddhikara Sutra (in Two Esoteric Sutras , 2001)
Ch. Modengqie jing (摩登伽經)	1300
Skt. *Mātāṅgī-sutra
Eng. The Mātāṅga Sutra (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)
Ch. Mohe sengqi lü (摩訶僧祇律)	1425
Skt. *Mahāsāṃghika-vinaya
Ch. Sifen lü (四分律)	1428
Skt. *Dharmaguptaka-vinaya
Ch. Shanjianlü piposha (善見毘婆沙)	1462
Pāli Samantapāsādikā
Ch. Fanwang jing (梵網經)	1484
Skt. *Brahmajāla-sutra
Eng. The Brahmā's Net Sutra (2017)
Ch. Youposaijie jing (優婆塞戒經)	1488
Skt. Upāsakaśīla-sutra
Eng. The Sutra on Upāsaka Precepts (1994)
Ch. Miaofa lianhua jing youbotishe (妙法蓮華經憂波提舍)	1519
Skt. Saddharmapuṇḍarīka-upadeśa
Eng. The Commentary on the Lotus Sutra (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Shizha piposha lun (十住毘婆沙論)	1521
Skt. *Daśabhūmika-vibhāṣā
Ch. Fodijing lun (佛地經論)	1530
Skt. *Buddhabhūmisutra-śāstra
Eng. The Interpretation of the Buddha Land (2002)
Ch. Apidamojushe lun (阿毘達磨俱舍論)	1558
Skt. Abhidharmakośa-bhāṣya

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Zhonglun (中論) Skt. Madhyamaka-śāstra	1564
Ch. Yüqie shidilun (瑜伽師地論) Skt. Yogācārabhūmi-śāstra	1579
Ch. Cheng weishi lun (成唯識論) Eng. Demonstration of Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1585
Ch. Weishi sanshilun song (唯識三十論頌) Skt. Triṃśikā Eng. The Thirty Verses on Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1586
Ch. Weishi ershi lun (唯識二十論) Skt. Viṃśatikā Eng. The Treatise in Twenty Verses on Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1590
Ch. She dasheng lun (攝大乘論) Skt. Mahāyānasamgraha Eng. The Summary of the Great Vehicle (Revised Second Edition, 2003)	1593
Ch. Bian zhongbian lun (辯中邊論) Skt. Madhyāntavibhāga	1600
Ch. Dasheng zhuangyanjing lun (大乘莊嚴經論) Skt. Mahāyānasūtrālaṃkāra	1604
Ch. Dasheng chengye lun (大乘成業論) Skt. Karmasiddhiprakaraṇa Eng. A Mahayana Demonstration on the Theme of Action (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1609
Ch. Jiuqing yisheng baoxing lun (究竟一乘寶性論) Skt. Ratnagotravibhāga-mahāyānottaratantra-śāstra	1611
Ch. Yinming ruzheng li lun (因明入正理論) Skt. Nyāyapraveśa	1630
Ch. Dasheng ji pusa xue lun (大乘集菩薩學論) Skt. Śikṣāsamuccaya	1636
Ch. Jingangzhen lun (金剛針論) Skt. Vajrasūcī	1642

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Zhang suozhi lun (彰所知論) Eng. The Treatise on the Elucidation of the Knowable (2004)	1645
Ch. Putixing jing (菩提行經) Skt. Bodhicaryāvatāra	1662
Ch. Jingangding yuqie zhongfa anouduoluo sanmiao sanputi xin lun (金剛頂瑜伽中發阿耨多羅三藐三菩提心論) Eng. The Bodhicitta Śāstra (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)	1665
Ch. Dasheng qixin lun (大乘起信論) Skt. *Mahāyānaśraddhotpāda-śāstra Eng. The Awakening of Faith (2005)	1666
Ch. Shimoheyan lun (釋摩訶衍論)	1668
Ch. Naxian biqu jing (那先比丘經) Pāli Milindapañhā	1670
Ch. Banruo boluomiduo xin jing yuzan (般若波羅蜜多心經幽贊) Eng. A Comprehensive Commentary on the Heart Sutra ( Prajñāpāramitā-hṛdaya-sutra ) (2001)	1710
Ch. Miaofalianhua jing xuanyi (妙法蓮華經玄義)	1716
Ch. Guan wuliangshou fo jing shu (觀無量壽佛經疏)	1753
Ch. Sanlun xuanyi (三論玄義)	1852
Ch. Dasheng xuan lun (大乘玄論)	1853
Ch. Zhao lun (肇論) Eng. Essays of Sengzhao (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1858
Ch. Huayan yisheng jiaoyi fenqi zhang (華嚴一乘教義分齊章)	1866
Ch. Yuanren lun (原人論) Eng. Treatise on the Origin of Humanity (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1886
Ch. Mohe zhiguan (摩訶止觀)	1911
Ch. Xiuxi zhiguan zuochan fayao (修習止觀坐禪法要)	1915
Ch. Tiantai sijiao yi (天台四教儀) Eng. A Guide to the Tiantai Fourfold Teachings (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)	1931

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Guoqing bai lu (國清百錄)	1934
Ch. Zhenzhou Linji Huizhao chanshi wulu (鎮州臨濟慧照禪師語錄) Eng. The Recorded Sayings of Linji (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)	1985
Ch. Foguo Yuanwu chanshi biyan lu (佛果圓悟禪師碧巖錄) Eng. The Blue Cliff Record (1998)	2003
Ch. Wumen guan (無門關) Eng. Wumen's Gate (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)	2005
Ch. Liuzu dashi fabao tan jing (六祖大師法寶壇經) Eng. The Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch (2000)	2008
Ch. Xinxin ming (信心銘) Eng. The Faith-Mind Maxim (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)	2010
Ch. Huangboshan Duanji chanshi chuanxin fayao (黃檗山斷際禪師傳心法要) Eng. Essentials of the Transmission of Mind (in Zen Texts , 2005)	2012A
Ch. Yongjia Zhengdao ge (永嘉證道歌)	2014
Ch. Chixiu Baizhang qinggui (勅修百丈清規) Eng. The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations (2007)	2025
Ch. Yibuzonglun lun (異部宗輪論) Skt. Samayabhedoparacanacakra Eng. The Cycle of the Formation of the Schismatic Doctrines (2004)	2031
Ch. Ayuwang jing (阿育王經) Skt. Aśokāvadāna Eng. The Biographical Scripture of King Aśoka (1993)	2043
Ch. Maming pusa zhuan (馬鳴菩薩傳) Eng. The Life of Aśvaghōṣa Bodhisattva (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)	2046
Ch. Longshu pusa zhuan (龍樹菩薩傳) Eng. The Life of Nāgārjuna Bodhisattva (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)	2047
Ch. Posoupandou fashi zhuan (婆藪槃豆法師傳) Eng. Biography of Dharma Master Vasubandhu (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)	2049

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Datang Daciensi Zanzang fashi zhuan (大唐大慈恩寺三藏法師傳) Eng. A Biography of the Tripiṭaka Master of the Great Ci'en Monastery of the Great Tang Dynasty (1995)	2053
Ch. Gaoseng zhuan (高僧傳)	2059
Ch. Biqiuni zhuan (比丘尼傳) Eng. Biographies of Buddhist Nuns (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)	2063
Ch. Gaoseng Faxian zhuan (高僧法顯傳) Eng. The Journey of the Eminent Monk Faxian (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)	2085
Ch. Datang xiyu ji (大唐西域記) Eng. The Great Tang Dynasty Record of the Western Regions (1996)	2087
Ch. Youfangjichao: Tangdaheshangdongzheng zhuan (遊方記抄: 唐大和上東征傳)	2089-(7)
Ch. Hongming ji (弘明集) Eng. The Collection for the Propagation and Clarification of Buddhism (Volume I, 2015) The Collection for the Propagation and Clarification of Buddhism (Volume II, 2017)	2102
Ch. Fayuan zhulin (法苑珠林) Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume I, 2019) Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume II, 2019) Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume III, 2020)	2122
Ch. Nanhai jigui neifa zhuan (南海寄歸內法傳) Eng. Buddhist Monastic Traditions of Southern Asia (2000)	2125
Ch. Fanyu zaming (梵語雜名)	2135
Jp. Shōmangyō gisho (勝鬘經義疏) Eng. Prince Shōtoku's Commentary on the Śrīmālā Sutra (2011)	2185
Jp. Yuimakyō gisho (維摩經義疏) Eng. The Expository Commentary on the Vimalakīrti Sutra (2012)	2186
Jp. Hokke gisho (法華義疏)	2187
Jp. Hannya shingyō hiken (般若心經秘鍵)	2203

Title	Taishō No.
Jp. Daijō hossō kenjin shō (大乘法相研神章)	2309
Jp. Kanjin kakumu shō (觀心覺夢鈔)	2312
Jp. Risshū kōyō (律宗綱要)	2348
Eng. The Essentials of the Vinaya Tradition (1995)
Jp. Tendai hokke shūgi shū (天台法華宗義集)	2366
Eng. The Collected Teachings of the Tendai Lotus School (1995)
Jp. Kenkairon (顯戒論)	2376
Jp. Sange gakushō shiki (山家學生式)	2377
Jp. Hizōhōyaku (秘藏寶鑰)	2426
Eng. The Precious Key to the Secret Treasury (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Benkenmitsu nikyō ron (辨顯密二教論)	2427
Eng. On the Differences between the Exoteric and Esoteric Teachings (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Sokushin jōbutsu gi (即身成佛義)	2428
Eng. The Meaning of Becoming a Buddha in This Very Body (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Shōji jissōgi (聲字實相義)	2429
Eng. The Meanings of Sound, Sign, and Reality (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Unjigi (吽字義)	2430
Eng. The Meanings of the Word Hūṃ (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Gorin kuji myōhimitsu shaku (五輪九字明秘密釋)	2514
Eng. The Illuminating Secret Commentary on the Five Cakras and the Nine Syllables (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Mitsugonin hotsuro sange mon (密嚴院發露懺悔文)	2527
Eng. The Mitsugonin Confession (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Kōzen gokoku ron (興禪護國論)	2543
Eng. A Treatise on Letting Zen Flourish to Protect the State (in Zen Texts , 2005)
Jp. Fukan zazengi (普勸坐禪儀)	2580
Eng. A Universal Recommendation for True Zazen (in Zen Texts , 2005)

Title	Taishō No.
Jp. Shōbōgenzō (正法眼藏)	2582
Eng. Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume I, 2007)
Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume II, 2008)
Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume III, 2008)
Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume IV, 2008)
Jp. Zazen yōjin ki (坐禪用心記)	2586
Eng. Advice on the Practice of Zazen (in Zen Texts , 2005)
Jp. Senchaku hongan nenbutsu shū (選擇本願念佛集)	2608
Eng. Senchaku Hongan Nembutsu Shū: A Collection of Passages on the Nembutsu Chosen in the Original Vow (1997)
Jp. Kenjōdo shinjitsu kyōgyō shōmon rui (顯淨土真實教行証文類)	2646
Eng. Kyōgyōshinshō: On Teaching, Practice, Faith, and Enlightenment (2003)
Jp. Tannishō (歎異抄)	2661
Eng. Tannishō: Passages Deploring Deviations of Faith (1996)
Jp. Rennyo shōnin ofumi (蓮如上人御文)	2668
Eng. Rennyo Shōnin Ofumi: The Letters of Rennyo (1996)
Jp. Ōjōyōshū (往生要集)	2682
Jp. Risshō ankoku ron (立正安國論)	2688
Eng. Risshōankokuron or The Treatise on the Establishment of the Orthodox Teaching and the Peace of the Nation (in Two Nichiren Texts , 2003)
Jp. Kaimokushō (開目抄)	2689
Eng. Kaimokushō or Liberation from Blindness (2000)
Jp. Kanjin honzon shō (觀心本尊抄)	2692
Eng. Kanjinhonzonshō or The Most Venerable One Revealed by Introspecting Our Minds for the First Time at the Beginning of the Fifth of the Five Five Hundred-year Ages (in Two Nichiren Texts , 2003)
Ch. Fumu enzhong jing (父母恩重經)	2887
Eng. The Sutra on the Profundity of Filial Love (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)

Jp.	Hasshūkōyō (八宗綱要)	extracanonial
Eng.	The Essentials of the Eight Traditions (1994)
Jp.	Sangō shīki (三教指帰)	extracanonial
Jp.	Mappō tōmyō ki (末法燈明記)	extracanonial
Eng.	The Candle of the Latter Dharma (1994)
Jp.	Jūshichijō kenpō (十七條憲法)	extracanonial

THE MADHYAMA ĀGAMA
(MIDDLE-LENGTH DISCOURSES)
VOLUME III

dBET PDF Version

© 2022

All Rights Reserved

BDK English Tripiṭaka Series

THE MADHYAMA ĀGAMA
(MIDDLE-LENGTH DISCOURSES)
VOLUME III

(Taishō Volume 1, Number 26)

Edited by

Bhikkhu Anālayo and Roderick S. Bucknell

BDK America, Inc.
2022

The dBET version of the original publication is distributed according to the Creative Commons “Attribution-ShareAlike 4.0 International (CC BY-SA 4.0)” license agreement and the provisions stated on the website at <https://bdkamerica.org>.

This PDF file may be printed and distributed according to the terms of use established on the website. The file is formatted with certain security provisions in place that disallow modification. Any organization or individual with legitimate reason to modify and/or adapt the contents of this file (such as for inclusion of the contents in a publically available online database of Buddhist sources) may contact us for permission and access to an unrestricted copy.

Copyright © 2022 by Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai and
BDK America, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transcribed in any form or by any means —electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise—without the prior written permission of the publisher.

First Printing, 2022
ISBN: 978-1-886439-84-9
Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 2013943512

Published by
BDK America, Inc.
1675 School Street
Moraga, California 94556

Printed in the United States of America

A Message on the Publication of the English Tripiṭaka

The Buddhist canon is said to contain eighty-four thousand different teachings. I believe that this is because the Buddha's basic approach was to prescribe a different treatment for every spiritual ailment, much as a doctor prescribes a different medicine for every medical ailment. Thus his teachings were always appropriate for the particular suffering individual and for the time at which the teaching was given, and over the ages not one of his prescriptions has failed to relieve the suffering to which it was addressed.

Ever since the Buddha's Great Demise over twenty-five hundred years ago, his message of wisdom and compassion has spread throughout the world. Yet no one has ever attempted to translate the entire Buddhist canon into English throughout the history of Japan. It is my greatest wish to see this done and to make the translations available to the many English-speaking people who have never had the opportunity to learn about the Buddha's teachings.

Of course, it would be impossible to translate all of the Buddha's eighty-four thousand teachings in a few years. I have, therefore, had one hundred thirty-nine of the scriptural texts in the prodigious Taishō edition of the Chinese Buddhist canon selected for inclusion in the First Series of this translation project.

It is in the nature of this undertaking that the results are bound to be criticized. Nonetheless, I am convinced that unless someone takes it upon himself or herself to initiate this project, it will never be done. At the same time, I hope that an improved, revised edition will appear in the future.

It is most gratifying that, thanks to the efforts of more than a hundred Buddhist scholars from the East and the West, this monumental project has finally gotten off the ground. May the rays of the Wisdom of the Compassionate One reach each and every person in the world.

NUMATA Yehan
Founder of the English
Tripiṭaka Project

August 7, 1991

Editorial Foreword

In the long history of Buddhist transmission throughout East Asia, translations of Buddhist texts were often carried out as national projects supported and funded by emperors and political leaders. The BDK English Tripiṭaka project, on the other hand, began as a result of the dream and commitment of one man. In January 1982 Dr. NUMATA Yehan, founder of Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai (Society for the Promotion of Buddhism), initiated the monumental task of translating the complete Taishō shinshū daizōkyō edition of the Chinese Tripiṭaka (Buddhist canon) into the English language. Under his leadership, a special preparatory committee was organized in April 1982. By July of the same year the Translation Committee of the English Tripiṭaka was officially convened.

The initial Committee included the following members: (late) HANAYAMA Shōyū (Chairperson), (late) BANDŌ Shōjun, (late) ISHIGAMI Zennō, (late) KAMATA Shigeo, (late) KANAOKA Shūyū, MAYEDA Sengaku, (late) NARA Yasuaki, (late) SAYEKI Shinkō, (late) SHIOIRI Ryōtatsu, (late) TAMARU Noriyoshi, (late) TAMURA Kwansei, (late) URYŪZU Ryūshin, and (late) YUYAMA Akira. Assistant members of the Committee were as follows: KANAZAWA Atsushi, WATANABE Shōgo, Rolf Giebel of New Zealand, and Rudy Smet of Belgium.

After holding planning meetings on a monthly basis, the Committee selected one hundred and thirty-nine texts for the First Series of the project, estimated to be one hundred printed volumes in all. The texts selected were not limited to those originally written in India but also included works composed in China and Japan. While the publication of the First Series proceeds, the texts for the Second Series will be selected from among the remaining works; this process will continue until all the texts, in Japanese as well as in Chinese, have been published. Given the huge scope of this project, accomplishing the English translations of all the Chinese and Japanese texts in the Taishō canon may take as long as one hundred years or more. Nevertheless, as Dr. NUMATA wished, it is the sincere hope of the Committee that this project will continue until completion, even after all the present members have passed away.

Dr. NUMATA passed away on May 5, 1994, at the age of ninety-seven. He entrusted his son, Mr. NUMATA Toshihide with the continuation and completion of the English Tripiṭaka project. Mr. Numata served for twenty-three years, leading the project forward with enormous progress before his sudden passing on February 16, 2017, at the age of eighty-four. The Committee previously lost its able and devoted first Chairperson, Professor HANAYAMA Shōyū, on June 16, 1995, at the age of sixty-three. In October 1995 the Committee elected Professor MAYEDA Sengaku (then Vice President of Musashino Women's College) as Chairperson, and upon the retirement of Professor Mayeda in July 2016, the torch was passed to me to serve as the third Chairperson. Despite these losses and changes we, the Editorial Committee members, have renewed our determination to carry out the noble ideals set by Dr. NUMATA. Present members of the Committee are Kenneth K. Tanaka (Chairperson), MAYEDA Sengaku, ICHISHIMA Shōshin, KATSURA Shōryū, MINOWA Kenryō, SAITŌ Akira, SHIMODA Masahiro, WATANABE Shōgo, and YONEZAWA Yoshiyasu.

The Numata Center for Buddhist Translation and Research was established in November 1984, in Berkeley, California, U.S.A., to assist in the publication of the translated texts. The Publication Committee was organized at the Numata Center in December 1991. In 2010, the Numata Center's operations were merged with Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai America, Inc. (BDK America), and BDK America continues to oversee the publication side of the English Tripiṭaka project in close cooperation with the Editorial Committee in Tokyo.

At the time of this writing, in July 2017, the project has completed about sixty-five percent of the seven thousand one hundred and eighty-five Taishō pages of texts selected for the First Series. Much work still lies ahead of us but we are committed to the completion of the remaining texts in order to realize the grand vision of Dr. Numata, shared by Mr. Numata and Professor Hanayama, to make the Buddhist canon more readily accessible to the English-speaking world.

Kenneth K. Tanaka
Chairperson
Editorial Committee of
the BDK English Tripiṭaka

Publisher's Foreword

On behalf of the members of the Publication Committee, I am happy to present this volume as the latest contribution to the BDK English Tripiṭaka Series. The Publication Committee members have worked to ensure that this volume, as all other volumes in the series, has gone through a rigorous process of editorial efforts.

The initial translation and editing of the Buddhist scriptures found in this and other BDK English Tripiṭaka volumes are performed under the direction of the Editorial Committee in Tokyo, Japan. Both the Editorial Committee in Tokyo and the Publication Committee, headquartered in Moraga, California, are dedicated to the production of accurate and readable English translations of the Buddhist canon. In doing so, the members of both committees and associated staff work to honor the deep faith, spirit, and concern of the late Reverend Dr. Yehan Numata, who founded the BDK English Tripiṭaka Series in order to disseminate the Buddhist teachings throughout the world.

The long-term goal of our project is the translation and publication of the texts in the one hundred-volume Taishō edition of the Chinese Buddhist canon, along with a number of influential extracanonical Japanese Buddhist texts. The list of texts selected for the First Series of this translation project may be found at the end of each volume in the series.

As Chair of the Publication Committee, I am deeply honored to serve as the fifth person in a post previously held by leading figures in the field of Buddhist studies, most recently by my predecessor, John R. McRae.

In conclusion, I wish to thank the members of the Publication Committee for their dedicated and expert work undertaken in the course of preparing this volume for publication: Managing Editor Marianne Dresser, Dr. Hudaya Kandahjaya, Dr. Carl Bielefeldt, Dr. Robert Sharf, and Rev. Brian Kensho Nagata, Director of the BDK English Tripiṭaka Project.

A. Charles Muller
Chairperson
Publication Committee

Contents

A Message on the Publication of the English Tripiṭaka
	NUMATA Yehan	v
Editorial Foreword	Kenneth K. Tanaka	vii
Publisher's Foreword	A. Charles Muller	ix
Translation Editors' Introduction	Bhikkhu Anālayo and Roderick S. Bucknell	xv
The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses), Volume III
Division 11. The [First] Great Division ( continued )
132. The Discourse on Raṭṭhapāla		3
133. The Discourse on Upāli		25
134. The Discourse on the Questions of Sakka		46
135. The Discourse on Sujāta		75
136. The Discourse on Merchants Who Searched for Property		91
137. The Discourse on the World		102
138. The Discourse on Meritorious Deeds		104
139. The Discourse on the Path of Stillness		108
140. The Discourse on the Lowliest		110
141. The Discourse with Similes		112
Division 12. On Brahmins
142. The Discourse to Vassakāra		115
143. The Discourse to Saṅgārava		126
144. The Discourse to Gaṇaka Moggallāna		133
145. The Discourse to Gopaka Moggallāna		141
146. The Discourse on the Simile of the Elephant's Footprint		151
147. The Discourse on the Virtues of Learning		162
148. The Discourse on What Is Suffering		167
149. The Discourse on What One Desires		173

Contents

150. The Discourse to Esukārī	174
151. The Discourse to Assalāyana	185
152. The Discourse to Suka	200
153. The Discourse to Māgandīya	215
154. The Discourse to Vāseṭṭha at the Hall [of Migāra's Mother]	230
155. The Discourse about Velāma	247
156. The Discourse to the Pārāyana Brahmins	251
157. The Discourse in the Yellow Reed Park	257
158. The Discourse to Doṇa	262
159. The Discourse to Aggilāyana	268
160. The Discourse on Araka	271
161. The Discourse to Brahmāyu	281
Division 13. On Basic Analysis
162. The Discourse on an Analysis of the Six Elements	305
163. The Discourse on an Analysis of the Six Sense Spheres	315
164. The Discourse on an Analytical Contemplation of Dharmas	324
165. The Discourse on a Deva at the Hot Spring Grove	334
166. The Discourse on a Venerable One in a Meditation Hut among the Sakyans	344
167. The Discourse Spoken by Ānanda	350
168. The Discourse on Mental Practice	353
169. The Discourse [Spoken among] the Kurus on Nonconflict	358
170. The Discourse to [a Brahmin Named] Parrot	368
171. The Discourse on a Great Analysis of Karma	380
Division 14. On the Mind
172. The Discourse on the Mind	393
173. The Discourse to Bhūmija	396
174. The Discourse on Ways of Practice (1)	404
175. The Discourse on Ways of Practice (2)	409
176. The Discourse on Practitioners of the Absorptions	415
177. The Discourse on [Four Modes of] Explanation	428
178. The Discourse on the Hunter	438
179. The Discourse to the Carpenter Pañcakaṅga	446
180. The Discourse to Gotamī	453
181. The Discourse on Many Elements	459

Contents

Notes	469
Bibliography	497
Index	501
A List of the Volumes of the BDK English Tripiṭaka (First Series)	515

As an act of Dhammadāna, Bhikkhu Anālayo has waived
payment for the translation of The Madhyama Āgama
(Middle-length Discourses), Volumes II–IV.

Introduction to Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) Volume III

This volume represents the third installment of The Madhyama-āgama (Middle-Length Discourses). The eventually resulting four-volume set is one of the texts identified for translation for the BDK English Tripiṭaka (First Series). Volume I of this set appeared in 2013 and Volume II in 2018. The present third installment covers fifty discourses found in Divisions 11 to 14 of the collection; the remaining Divisions 15 to 18 will be published in Volume IV.

Discourse Parallels

Comparing the Madhyama-āgama version of a discourse with its parallel(s) in the Pāli canon and elsewhere reveals varying degrees of closeness, as regards both their essential message and the details of their wording. Such closeness is the main criterion by which researchers identify discourse parallels; and because there are varying degrees of closeness, researchers sometimes disagree in their identifications. Further complicating the notion of parallels is the occasional existence of “partial parallels,” cases where, for example, a certain Chinese discourse is matched by just one part of a Pāli discourse—or the converse of this situation. In the endnotes to each volume and in the tables of parallels that will appear in Volume IV such cases are marked with an asterisk (*).

What the phenomenon of discourse parallels signifies in terms of the historical development of the texts remains a controversial question. A common interpretation is that a given discourse and its parallel(s) are divergent descendants of what was originally a single ancestral discourse; that is, that they are variously remembered records of a teaching delivered on a certain occasion by the Buddha or one of his immediate disciples. Wide geographical separation of monastic communities, perhaps combined with translation into different dialects, could have eventually led to the development of regional variants of imperfectly memorized oral texts.

In such ways the vicissitudes of oral transmission could have resulted in the splitting of a formerly unitary discourse into two or more related but distinct parallel versions. This is probably an oversimplification; but despite such uncertainties, there is no denying that comparison of discourse parallels is both a valuable aid in translating difficult texts and a powerful tool in researching early Buddhism.

A good example is the last discourse in the present volume, the “Discourse on Many Elements” (MĀ 181). It differs from its Pāli parallel, the Bahudhātuka-sutta (MN 115), which stipulates that a woman cannot be a buddha. Closer inspection of the context makes it fair to conclude that the Madhyama-āgama discourse has preserved an earlier version of this exposition, when the notion of what is impossible for a woman had not yet impacted this discourse; see Bhikkhu Anālayo, Madhyama-āgama Studies (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2012), pp. 249–288. Several other discourses in the Madhyama-āgama offer similarly significant indications (a survey can be found in Bhikkhu Anālayo, “Selected Madhyama-āgama Discourse Passages and Their Pāli Parallels,” Dharma Drum Journal of Buddhist Studies 19 [2016]: 1–61). This makes it fruitful to consult the translations provided in this and the other volumes alongside their Pāli counterparts.

For the convenience of researchers, relevant information on known discourse parallels to the Madhyama-āgama is summarized in two tables (Tables 1 and 2, compiled by Roderick S. Bucknell), which will be placed at the back of Volume IV. These tables bring together the principal data on parallels contained in the endnotes to the translations. Table 1 is designed for finding the Pāli parallel(s) to a given Chinese Madhyama-āgama discourse; Table 2 is for finding the Chinese Madhyama-āgama parallel(s) to a given Pāli discourse. More detailed information on these tables will be provided in Volume IV.

THE MADHYAMA ĀGAMA
(MIDDLE-LENGTH DISCOURSES)
VOLUME III

Division 11

The [First] Great Division (continued)

132. The Discourse on Raṭṭhapāla<sup>1</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was traveling among the Kurus together with a large company of monks. Having reached Thullakoṭṭhita, he stayed in a rosewood grove north of Thullakoṭṭhita village.

At that time the brahmin householders of Thullakoṭṭhita heard this:

The renunciant Gotama, the son of the Sakyans who left the Sakyan clan and went forth to train in the path, has been traveling among the Kurus together with a large company of monks and, having reached Thullakoṭṭhita, is staying in a rosewood grove north of Thullakoṭṭhita village. That renunciant Gotama has great fame, being well known in the ten directions. The renunciant Gotama is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one.

In this world with its devas, māras, Brahmas, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, he dwells having personally achieved understanding, awakening, and realization. He teaches the Dharma, which is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and he reveals the holy life. If [one] visits the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, reveres, pays respect, and offers support and honor to [him], then one quickly obtains good benefits. We should go together to visit the renunciant Gotama, to pay our respects and offer our support to [him].

On hearing that, the brahmin householders of Thullakoṭṭhita, each accompanied by the members of his family group, went out of Thullakoṭṭhita and headed north to a rosewood grove, wishing to visit the World-honored One, to pay their respects and offer their support to him. Having approached the Buddha, some of the brahmin householders of Thullakoṭṭhita paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side; some exchanged greetings with the Buddha, then stepped back and sat to one side; some extended their hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, then stepped 623b back and sat to one side; and some, having seen the Buddha from afar, sat down silently.

At that time, when all of the brahmin householders of Thullakoṭṭhita were seated, the Buddha taught them the Dharma, exhorted and encouraged them, accomplishing their delight. Having taught them the Dharma with countless skillful means, having exhorted and inspired them, fully delighting them, he remained silent. Then, after the Buddha had taught them the Dharma, exhorted and inspired them, fully delighting them, the brahmin householders of Thullakoṭṭhita rose from their seats, paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated the Buddha three times, and left.

At that time there was present a young householder named Raṭṭhapāla, who intentionally remained seated without rising. Then, soon after the brahmin householders of Thullakoṭṭhita had left, the young householder Raṭṭhapāla rose from his seat, arranged his clothes so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, as I understand the Dharma taught by the Buddha, if I live the home life, then I am chained with chains, unable to practice the holy life in purity for my whole life. World-honored One, may I receive from the World-honored One the going forth to train in the path, receive the full ordination and become a monk, to practice the holy life in purity!

The World-honored One asked:

Young householder, have your parents allowed you to give up the household life out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline and become a homeless one to train in the path?

The young householder Raṭṭhapāla said:

World-honored One, my parents have not yet allowed me to give up the household life out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline and become a homeless one to train in the path.

The World-honored One told him:

Young householder, if your parents have not allowed you to give up the household life out of faith and become a homeless one to practice the path in the true Dharma and discipline, then I cannot let you go forth to train in the path, and also cannot give you the full ordination.

The young householder Raṭṭhapāla said:

World-honored One, I shall make effort in requesting this of my parents and will certainly get them to allow me to give up the household life and, out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline, become a homeless one to train in the path.

The World-honored One told him, “Young householder, do as you wish.”

Thereupon the young householder Raṭṭhapāla, having heard what the Buddha said, having received it well and kept it [in mind], paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and returned home.

He said [to his parents]:

Honored [parents], as I understand the Dharma taught by the Buddha, if I live the household life then I am chained with chains, unable to practice the holy life in purity for my whole life. May my honored [parents] allow me to give up the household life and, out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline, become a homeless one to train in the path!

Raṭṭhapāla’s parents said:

Raṭṭhapāla, you are now our only son, whom we very much love and for whom we have tender regard; our minds always delight in you and we never get enough of seeing [you]. Even if you died, we would still not want to give you up, let alone be separated from you while you are alive and not see you [any longer].

Three times the young householder Raṭṭhapāla said:

623c

Honored [parents], as I understand the Dharma taught by the Buddha, if I live the household life, then I am chained with chains, unable to practice the holy life in purity for my whole life. May my honored [parents] allow me to give up the household life and, out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline, become a homeless one to train in the path!

And three times the parents of the young householder Raṭṭhapāla's said:

Raṭṭhapāla, you are now our only son, whom we very much love and for whom we have tender regard; our minds always delight in you and we never get enough of seeing [you]. Even if you died, we would still not want to give you up, let alone be separated from you while you are alive and not see you [any longer].

Then the young householder Raṭṭhapāla right away lay down on the ground [and said]:

From now on I will not get up, neither drink nor eat, until my parents allow me to give up the household life out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline and become a homeless one to train in the path.

Then the young householder Raṭṭhapāla took no food for one day; for two, three, four, several days he took no food.

At this the parents of the young householder Raṭṭhapāla went to their son and said:

Raṭṭhapāla, you are very delicate, with a very fine body, and always [accustomed to] sitting or lying on fine beds. Are you not feeling pain now? Get up, Raṭṭhapāla! Quickly! Engage in sensual pleasures and in generous giving! Joyfully practice meritorious deeds! Why is that? Raṭṭhapāla, [living] conditions with the World-honored One are very difficult, very difficult. Going forth to train in the path is also very difficult.

At that time the young householder Raṭṭhapāla remained silent and did not reply.<sup>2</sup>

At this the parents of the young householder Raṭṭhapāla went to his intimate friends and attendants and said, "All of you together, come to Raṭṭhapāla and persuade him to get up off the ground!"

The young householder Raṭṭhapāla's intimate friends and attendants went together to Raṭṭhapāla and said:

Raṭṭhapāla, you are very delicate, with a very fine body, and always [accustomed to] sitting or lying on fine beds. Are you not feeling pain now? Get up, Raṭṭhapāla! Quickly! Engage in sensual pleasures and in generous giving! Joyfully practice meritorious deeds! Why is that? Raṭṭhapāla, [living] conditions with the World-honored One are very difficult, very difficult. Going forth to train in the path is also very difficult.

At that time the young householder Raṭṭhapāla remained silent and did not reply.

Then the parents of the young householder Raṭṭhapāla went to his good friends, companions, and contemporaries and said this, "All of you together, come as a group to Raṭṭhapāla and persuade him to get up off the ground!"<sup>3</sup>

Then the young householder Raṭṭhapāla's good friends, companions, and contemporaries went together to Raṭṭhapāla and said:

624a

Raṭṭhapāla, you are very delicate, with a very fine body, and always [accustomed to] sitting or lying on fine beds. Are you not feeling pain now? Get up, Raṭṭhapāla! Quickly! Engage in sensual pleasures and in generous giving! Joyfully practice meritorious deeds! Why is that? Raṭṭhapāla, [living] conditions with the World-honored One are very difficult, very difficult. Going forth to train in the path is also very difficult.

At that time the young householder Raṭṭhapāla remained silent and did not reply.

At this the young householder Raṭṭhapāla's good friends, companions, and contemporaries went to the young householder Raṭṭhapāla's parents and said:

Allow Raṭṭhapāla to give up the household life out of faith, and to become a homeless one to practice the path in the true Dharma and discipline! If he delights in it, you can still meet each other in this life; if he does not delight in it, he will certainly return of his own accord to his parents. If you do not allow [him] now, he will certainly die, without doubt. Of what benefit is that?

On hearing this, the parents of the young householder Raṭṭhapāla told the good friends, companions, and contemporaries of the young householder Raṭṭhapāla:

We now allow Raṭṭhapāla to give up the household life out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline and become a homeless one to train in the path. When he has trained in the path, he must come back and visit [us].

Then the good friends, companions, and contemporaries of the young householder Raṭṭhapāla went together to Raṭṭhapāla and said:

Young householder, your parents allow you to give up the household life out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline and become a homeless one to practice the path. When you have finished training in the path, return to visit your parents.

On hearing this, the young householder Raṭṭhapāla was very joyful; delight and happiness arose in him. He got up off the ground and gradually nourished his body. After his body had recovered, he went out of Thullakoṭṭhita and went to where the Buddha was. He paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet and said:

World-honored One, my parents have allowed me to give up the household life out of faith in the true Dharma and discipline and become a homeless one to train in the path. World-honored One, may I receive from the World-honored One the going forth to train in the path, receive the full ordination, and become a monk!

Then the World-honored One let the young householder Raṭṭhapāla go forth to train in the path by giving him the full ordination. Having given him the full ordination, [the Buddha,] after staying on for some time in Thullakoṭṭhita, took his robes and bowl and went wandering. Traveling by stages, he reached Sāvattṭhī and stayed in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park. The venerable Raṭṭhapāla, having gone forth to train in the path and having received the full ordination, lived alone in a secluded place, practicing diligently and with a mind that is without negligence.

Having lived alone in a secluded place, practicing diligently and with a mind that is without negligence, [this] son of good family who had shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and gone forth to practice the path, attained fully the summit of the holy life. He dwelled having personally achieved understanding, awakening, and realization here and now. He knew as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done. There will not be another experiencing of existence.” The venerable Raṭṭhapāla, having understood the Dharma . . . up to . . . had become an arahant. 624b

Then, after having been an arahant for nine or ten years,<sup>4</sup> the venerable Raṭṭhapāla thought, “Long ago I promised that, after going forth and training in the path, I would return to visit my parents. Let me now return to keep that promise of long ago.”

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side, he said:

World-honored One, long ago I promised that after having gone forth and trained in the path, I would return to see my parents. World-honored One, I now ask leave to go and visit my parents and keep my promise of long ago.

At that time the World-honored One thought, “It is definitely not possible that the clansman Raṭṭhapāla might abandon the precepts, cease practicing the path, or indulge in sensual pleasures as before.” Knowing this, the World-honored One told him:

Go and rescue those who have not yet been rescued, liberate those who have not yet been liberated, [lead to] complete extinction those who have not yet attained complete extinction!<sup>5</sup> Raṭṭhapāla, now do as you wish.

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, having heard what the Buddha said, received it well and kept it well [in mind]. He rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. Going to his quarters, he stowed away his bedding, put on his robes, took his bowl, and went wandering. Traveling in stages, he approached Thullakoṭṭhita and stayed in a rosewood grove north of Thullakoṭṭhita village.

Then, when the night was over, at dawn, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla put on his robes, took his bowl, and entered Thullakoṭṭhita to beg for almsfood. The venerable Raṭṭhapāla thought, “The World-honored One praises begging for almsfood in [uninterrupted] sequence. Let me now beg for almsfood in Thullakoṭṭhita in [uninterrupted] sequence.” Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla begged for almsfood in Thullakoṭṭhita in [uninterrupted] sequence, and in turn reached his former home.

At that time the venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father was standing at the central gate, dressing his hair and beard. The venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father, seeing the venerable Raṭṭhapāla coming in the distance, said:

These bald-pated renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness. They have severed their lineage since they are without sons. They broke up our family. We had only one son, whom we loved very much and for whom we had tender regard. Our minds always delighted in him and we never got enough of seeing him. [But] he was taken away by [one of you]. I will not give you food.

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla received no alms at his own father’s house; he got only abuse:

624c These bald-pated renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness. They have severed their lineage since they are without sons. They broke up our family. We had only one son, whom we loved very much and for whom we had tender regard. Our minds always delighted in him and we never got enough of seeing him. [But] he was taken away by [one of you]. I will not give you food.

Having understood that, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla quickly went away.

At that time a maidservant in the household of the venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father was about to discard a basketful of smelly stale food and drink on a garbage heap. The venerable Raṭṭhapāla, seeing that his father’s maidservant was about to discard a basketful of smelly stale food and drink on a garbage heap, said, “Sister, if this stale food and drink is of a nature to be discarded, then put it into my bowl! I will eat it.”

Then the maidservant in the household of the venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father poured the smelly stale food and drink from the basket into the bowl. While pouring it into the bowl, she recognized [Raṭṭhapāla] by noticing two of his physical features, namely his voice and his hands and feet. Having noticed these two features, she went to the venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father and said,<sup>6</sup>

“Master, now you should know that your son, Master Raṭṭhapāla, has returned here to Thullakoṭṭhita. Go and see him!”

On hearing that, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father leapt up with great joy. Gathering up his garments with his left hand and smoothing down his hair and beard with his right hand, he hurried to the venerable Raṭṭhapāla.

At that time the venerable Raṭṭhapāla was [sitting] facing a wall and eating the smelly stale food. The venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father, seeing the venerable Raṭṭhapāla [sitting] facing a wall and eating the smelly stale food, said:

Raṭṭhapāla, you are very delicate, with a very fine body, and you have always had fine food. Raṭṭhapāla, why are you eating this smelly stale food? Raṭṭhapāla, having come here to Thullakoṭṭhita, why can you not return to your parents’ home?

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla replied:

Householder, I went to my father’s home, but got no alms. I got [only] abuse: “These bald-pated renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness. They have severed their lineage since they are without sons. They broke up our family. We had only one son, whom we loved very much and for whom we had tender regard. Our minds always delighted in him and we never got enough of seeing him. [But] he was taken away by [one of you]. I will not give you food.” On hearing this, I quickly went away.

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father immediately apologized, saying:

Bear with me, Raṭṭhapāla! Bear with me, Raṭṭhapāla! I truly did not know that it was you, Raṭṭhapāla, who had returned and come to his father’s home.<sup>7</sup>

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s father respectfully took Raṭṭhapāla by the arm, led him inside, prepared a seat, and asked him to sit down. Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla sat down.

625a

Then, seeing that the venerable Raṭṭhapāla was seated, the father approached his wife and said, “Now, you should know that the clansman Raṭṭhapāla has returned home. Quickly prepare food and drink!”

On hearing this, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla’s mother leapt up with great joy and quickly prepared food and drinks. Having prepared food and drink, she quickly had coins brought out with a handcart and placed on the floor of the central room. They were piled up in such a great heap that a person standing on one side could not see another person sitting on the other side.

Having made this great heap of coins, she approached the venerable Raṭṭhapāla and said:<sup>8</sup>

Raṭṭhapāla, this is your mother's part of the property; [besides this,] your father's property is immeasurable, countless hundreds and thousands of it. All this we now hand over to you, Raṭṭhapāla. Abandon the precepts, cease practicing the path, engage in sensual pleasures and generous giving, and joyfully practice meritorious deeds! Why is that? [Living] conditions with the World-honored One are very difficult, very difficult. Going forth to train in the path is also very difficult.

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said to his mother, "I would like to say something now. Would you agree to listen to it?"

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla's mother said, "Young householder, if you have something to say, I will listen to it."

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said to his mother:

You should make new cloth bags, fill them with these coins, carry them by cart to the Ganges River, and then pour them into it at a deep spot. Why is that? Because of these coins people will be made to grieve, worry, and weep. They will not attain happiness.

At this the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's mother thought, "Since I cannot, by this means, get my son Raṭṭhapāla to abandon the precepts and cease practicing the path, let me approach his former wives and say this:

Daughters-in-law, decorate yourselves with the necklaces of jade and pearls that you used to wear previously, which highly delighted the clansman Raṭṭhapāla in the past when he was living at home. Having quickly decorated yourselves with these necklaces of jade and pearls, go together to the clansman Raṭṭhapāla. Each of you clasp one of his feet and say this: 'We are wondering what kind of heavenly maidens are so much better than we are, that our worthy husband abandons us to practice the holy life for their sake.'"

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's mother approached his former wives and said:

Daughters-in-law, decorate yourselves with the necklaces of jade and pearls that you used to wear previously, which highly delighted the clansman Raṭṭhapāla in the past when he was living at home. Having quickly decorated yourselves with these necklaces of jade and pearls, go together to the clansman Raṭṭhapāla. Each of you clasp one of his feet and say this: 625b
 “We are wondering what kind of heavenly maidens are so much better than we are, that our worthy husband abandons us to practice the holy life for their sake.”

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla's former wives decorated themselves with the necklaces of jade and pearls that they used to wear previously, which highly delighted the clansman Raṭṭhapāla in the past when he was living at home. Having decorated themselves with these necklaces of jade and pearls, they went together to the clansman Raṭṭhapāla. Each clasped one of his feet and said this:

We are wondering what kind of heavenly maidens are so much better than we are, that our worthy husband abandons us to practice the holy life for their sake.

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla told his former wives:

Sisters, you should know that I did not practice the holy life for the sake of heavenly maidens. The benefit of practicing the holy life has already been attained. What has to be done according to the Buddha's instruction has now already been achieved.<sup>9</sup>

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla's [former] wives stood back to one side. Weeping and shedding tears, they said, “We are not our worthy husband's sisters; yet our worthy husband addresses us as ‘sisters.’”

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, turning his head to look at his parents, said, “Householders, if food is to be offered, then let it be offered on time. Why trouble one another?”

Then his parents rose from their seats and personally offered water for washing. With their own hands they served various kinds of most delicious dishes, making sure that there was enough to eat, savor, and digest. After the meal was finished, the utensils had been cleared away, and water for washing had been offered, [they] took a low seat and sat down to one side to listen to the Dharma. The venerable Raṭṭhapāla taught his parents the Dharma, exhorting and inspiring them, fully delighting them. Having with countless skillful means taught them the Dharma, having exhorted and inspired them, fully delighting them, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla rose from his seat, and uttered these verses:

Behold this body adorned
With jewelry, necklaces of jade and pearls,
Entwined hair made to curl to the right,
Eyes and brows painted deep purple and black—
This deceives a fool,
But not one who is crossing to the farther shore.

Using fine silks of varied colors,
To adorn this smelly defiled body—
This deceives a fool,
But not one who is crossing to the farther shore.

Smearing the whole body with various perfumes,
Dyeing the feet yellow with orpiment—
This deceives a fool,
But not one who is crossing to the farther shore.

A body dressed in pure fine clothes,
Adorned like an illusion—
This deceives a fool,
But not one who is crossing to the farther shore.

625c

Severed is the deer snare,
Destroyed the deer [trap] gate.
I have abandoned the bait and left.
Who would enjoy being in a deer's trap?

Having uttered these verses, the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, using his supernatural powers, rose into the air and left.<sup>10</sup> Arriving at the Thullakoṭṭhita forest, he entered the forest, spread his sitting mat beneath a terminalia tree (vibhītaka), and sat down cross-legged.

At that time King Koravya was sitting in the main hall [of his palace], surrounded by his courtiers. [Earlier he had] expressed his admiration and praise for the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, saying, “If I were to hear that the clansman Raṭṭhapāla had come here to Thullakoṭṭhita, I would certainly go to see him.”

Then King Koravya told a hunter, “Go and clean up the Thullakoṭṭhita forest. I want to go out hunting.” Having received the order, the hunter went off to clean up the Thullakoṭṭhita forest. Then while the hunter was cleaning up the Thullakoṭṭhita forest, he saw the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, who had spread his sitting mat beneath a terminalia tree and was sitting there cross-legged. He thought, “The one who was admired and praised by King Koravya and his courtiers when they were sitting together in the main hall is now already here.”

Then the hunter, after having cleaned up the Thullakoṭṭhita forest, returned and approached King Koravya. He said:

Your Majesty should know that I have gone and cleaned up the Thullakoṭṭhita forest according to Your Majesty’s wish. Before, when Your Majesty was sitting together with the courtiers in the main hall, he expressed his admiration and praise of the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, saying, “If I were to hear that the clansman Raṭṭhapāla had come here to Thullakoṭṭhita, I would certainly go to visit him.” The venerable Raṭṭhapāla, the clansman, has spread his sitting mat beneath a terminalia tree in the Thullakoṭṭhita forest and is now sitting [there] cross-legged. If Your Majesty wishes to visit him, let him go there.

Hearing this, King Koravya told his charioteer, “Prepare the vehicles quickly. I want to go now to see Raṭṭhapāla.”

The charioteer, having received the order, immediately prepared the vehicles. That done, he returned and said, “Your Majesty should know that the chariots have been prepared, according to Your Majesty’s wish.” Then King Koravya mounted the chariot and went out toward the Thullakoṭṭhita forest. Seeing the venerable Raṭṭhapāla from afar, he descended from his chariot and approached the venerable Raṭṭhapāla on foot.

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla, seeing that King Koravya had come, said: “Your Majesty has now come. Would you like to seat yourself?”<sup>11</sup>

626a King Koravya said: “Although I have now arrived at a place [that belongs] to my own realm, still I would like the clansman Raṭṭhapāla to invite me to sit down.”

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla invited King Koravya, saying: “Now there is a separate seat. May Your Majesty be seated.”

Then King Koravya exchanged greetings with the venerable Raṭṭhapāla, stepped back, and sat to one side. He said to Raṭṭhapāla:

Did you go forth to train in the path because of some deterioration in your household? If you went forth to train in the path because of some lack of property, Raṭṭhapāla, since King Koravya’s household is endowed with much property, I would give property to Raṭṭhapāla and persuade Raṭṭhapāla to abandon the precepts, cease practicing the path, engage in sensual pleasures and generous giving, and joyfully practice meritorious deeds. Why is that? Raṭṭhapāla, because the teaching of your master is very difficult; it is also very difficult to go forth to train in the path.<sup>12</sup>

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla, hearing that, said, “Your Majesty is now inviting me with what is impure. He is not inviting me with what is pure.”

Hearing that, King Koravya asked, “How should I invite Raṭṭhapāla with what is pure, not with what is impure?”

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:

Your Majesty could speak like this: “Raṭṭhapāla, the people of my country are peaceful, happy, without fear, without conflict, without the thorn of violence, without obligation to serve with hard labor, and there is abundant rice, making it easy to beg for alms. Raṭṭhapāla, stay in my country; I will protect you in accordance with the Dharma.” In this way Your Majesty would be inviting me with what is pure, not with what is impure.

Hearing that, King Koravya said:

I now invite Raṭṭhapāla with what is pure, not with what is impure. The people of my country are peaceful, happy, without fear, without conflict, without the thorn of violence, without obligation to serve with hard labor, and there is abundant rice, making it easy to beg for alms. Raṭṭhapāla, stay in my country; I will protect you in accordance with the Dharma.

Again, Ratṭhapāla, there are four kinds of deterioration. Because of one or another of these [kinds of] deterioration, some people shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path. What are the four? They are deterioration by disease, deterioration by aging, deterioration of property, and deterioration of relatives.<sup>13</sup>

Ratṭhapāla, what is deterioration by disease? Suppose there is a person who has been ill for a long time with extremely severe pain. He thinks, “I have been ill for a long time with extremely severe pain. I certainly have sensual desires but I am unable to indulge in sensuality. Let me now shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path.” Later, because of deterioration by disease, he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robe, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path. This is what is called deterioration by disease.<sup>14</sup>

Ratṭhapāla, what is deterioration by aging? Suppose there is a person who is old with worn-out faculties, excessively aged, and nearing the end of life. He thinks, “I am old with worn-out faculties, excessively aged, and nearing the end of life. I certainly have sensual desire but I am unable to indulge in sensuality. Let me now shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path.” Later, because of deterioration by aging, he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robe, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path. This is what is called deterioration by aging.

626b

Ratṭhapāla, what is deterioration of property? Suppose there is a person who is poor and powerless. He thinks, “I am poor and powerless. Let me now shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path.” Later, because of deterioration of property, he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robe, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path. This is called deterioration of property.

Ratṭhapāla, what is deterioration of relatives? Suppose there is a person whose [family] lineage has been severed, whose relatives have died and disappeared. He thinks, “My [family] lineage has been severed, my relatives have died and disappeared. Let me now shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path.” Later, because of deterioration of relatives, he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robe, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path. This is what is called deterioration of relatives.

Raṭṭhapāla [however,] was without disease in the past, at ease and comfortable. His digestion was balanced—neither too cold nor too hot, correctly balanced and comfortable, all in order and without problems. Consequently, he was able to digest and savor [food] at ease. It was not because of deterioration by disease that Raṭṭhapāla shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

In the past Raṭṭhapāla was a young lad, with pure black hair and a strong body. At that time he entertained himself much with singing and music, adorned his body, and always liked recreation. At that time none of his relatives wanted to let him train in the path. His parents wept and shed tears of grief and distress as they refused to allow him to go forth to train in the path. Yet he shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path. It was not because of deterioration by aging that Raṭṭhapāla shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

Raṭṭhapāla is from the foremost, the biggest, the best, the supreme household with property in Thullakoṭṭhita. It was not because of deterioration of property that Raṭṭhapāla shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

626c Raṭṭhapāla has great and eminent relatives and clans living in Thullakoṭṭhita and its forest [surroundings]. It was not because of deterioration of relatives that Raṭṭhapāla shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

Raṭṭhapāla, regarding these four kinds of deterioration, some people, because of such deterioration, shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path.

I see Raṭṭhapāla as having been free of all these deteriorations that could have caused him to shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path. Raṭṭhapāla, what did you come to know and see, what did you hear, that [made] you shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robe, leave home out of faith, and go forth to train in the path?

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla answered:

Your Majesty, the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, who sees and knows, teaches four things. It was after I had accepted these [four],<sup>15</sup> approved them, and delighted in them, after I had known, seen, and heard them, that I shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path. What are the four? Your Majesty, they are these:

This world is without protection; there is nothing on which one can depend.

This entire world inclines toward aging.

This world is impermanent, and one will have to leave it.

This world is insufficient, unsatisfying, and driven by craving.<sup>16</sup>

King Koravya asked:

Raṭṭhapāla just said, “Your Majesty, this world is without protection; there is nothing on which one can depend.” Raṭṭhapāla, I have sons and grandsons, brothers, and retainers; [I have] elephant troops, chariot troops, cavalry, and infantry, each able to shoot and drive, awe-inspiring, resolute, and courageous. [I have] princes, mighty men, conquerors, great heroes; I have diviners, strategists, calculators, scholars, and orators. I have courtiers and attendants, memorizers, and knowers of charms. They accompany me everywhere and are able to avert anything threatening.<sup>17</sup>

As to what Raṭṭhapāla just said—“Your Majesty, this world is without protection; there is nothing on which one can depend”—Raṭṭhapāla, what is the meaning of this?

Venerable Raṭṭhapāla answered, “I shall now ask Your Majesty [a question], which he may answer according to his understanding. Does this body of your majesty have any disease?”

King Koravya answered, “Raṭṭhapāla, my body now constantly has a disease related to wind.”

Venerable Raṭṭhapāla asked:

Your Majesty, when this disease related to wind manifests, if there is very severe pain, is the king able to tell his sons, grandsons, and brothers; his 627a elephant troops, cavalry, chariot troops, and infantry, each of whom is able to shoot and drive and is awe-inspiring, resolute, and courageous; his princes, mighty men, conquerors, great heroes; his diviners, strategists, calculators, scholars, and orators; his courtiers and attendants, memorizers and knowers of charms, “Come, all of you, and relieve me of this very severe pain! Make me free of disease and at ease!”?

King Koravya answered, “No. Why is that? This is due to my own [former] deeds. Caused and conditioned by those deeds, I myself must experience the severe pain alone.”<sup>18</sup>

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:

Your Majesty, it was on account of this that the World-honored One said, “This world is without protection; there is nothing on which one can depend.” I accepted this [teaching], approved it, and delighted in it. It was after knowing, seeing, and hearing this that I shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

King Koravya said:

As to what Raṭṭhapāla said—“Your Majesty, this world is without protection; there is nothing on which one can depend”—Raṭṭhapāla, I too accept it, approve it, and delight in it. Why is that? This world is indeed without protection; there is nothing on which one can depend.

King Koravya asked further, “As to what Raṭṭhapāla said, ‘Your Majesty, this entire world inclines toward aging.’ Again, Raṭṭhapāla, what is the meaning of what you just said?”

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla answered:

Your Majesty, I shall now ask the king [a question], which he may answer according to his understanding. Does Your Majesty consider that when he was aged twenty-four or twenty-five, his speed at that time was as it is now, that his physical strength, bodily figure, and complexion at that time were as they are now?

King Koravya answered:

Raṭṭhapāla, I recall that when I was aged twenty-four or twenty-five, nobody surpassed me in speed, physical strength, bodily physique, and complexion. Raṭṭhapāla, I am now very old, with degenerated faculties, excessively aged and near death, a full eighty years old, and [sometimes] unable to get up [by myself].

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:

Your Majesty, it was on account of this that the World-honored One said, “This entire world inclines toward aging.” I accepted [this teaching], approved it, and delighted in it. It was after knowing, seeing, and hearing this that I shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

King Koravya said:

As to what Raṭṭhapāla said—“Your Majesty, this entire world inclines toward aging”—I too accept it, approve it, and delight in it. Why is that? This entire world does indeed incline toward aging.

King Koravya asked further:

As to what Raṭṭhapāla said, “Your Majesty, this world is impermanent and one will have to leave it.” Again, Raṭṭhapāla, what is the meaning of what you just said?

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:

I shall now ask Your Majesty [a question], which he may answer according to his understanding. Does Your Majesty possess the rich Kuru country, along with a rich inner palace and a rich treasury?

King Koravya answered, “That is so.”

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla asked further:

Although Your Majesty possesses this rich Kuru country, along with a rich inner palace and a rich treasury, there comes a time when such things prove unreliable and one’s happiness is destroyed. The entire world inevitably ends in death. At that time will Your Majesty be able to take the rich Kuru country, the rich inner palace, and the rich treasury along with him from this life into the next life?

627b

King Koravya answered, “No. Why is that? I alone, without a second, without any companion, will pass on from this life to the next life.”<sup>19</sup>

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:

Your Majesty, it was on account of this that the World-honored One said, “This world is impermanent; one will have to leave it.” I accepted it, approved it, and delighted in it. It was after knowing, seeing, and hearing this that I shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

King Koravya said:

As to what Raṭṭhapāla said—“Your Majesty, this world is impermanent; one will have to leave it”—I too accept it, approve it, and delight in it. Why is that? This world is indeed impermanent, and one will have to leave it.

King Koravya asked further:

As to what Raṭṭhapāla said, “Your Majesty, this world is insufficient, unsatisfying, and driven by craving.” Again, Raṭṭhapāla, what is the meaning of what you said?

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla answered:

I shall now ask Your Majesty [a question], which he may answer according to his understanding. Does Your Majesty possess the rich Kuru country, a rich inner palace, and a rich treasury?

King Koravya answered, “That is so.”

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla asked further:

Although Your Majesty possesses the rich Kuru country, a rich inner palace, and a rich treasury, suppose a person were to come from the east, reliable and trustworthy, not one to deceive the world, and were to tell the king, “I have come from the east and there I saw a country, great, rich, and very populous. Your Majesty could acquire that country and its resources, people, and labor.” Would Your Majesty wish to acquire that country and rule over it?

King Koravya answered:

Raṭṭhapāla, if I knew that there was such a rich country with its resources, people, and labor, and that I could rule over its people, I would definitely seize it.

[The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:]

Suppose that, in the same way, a person were to come from the south, or from the west, or from the north, or [even] from the other side of the great ocean, reliable and trustworthy, not one to deceive the world, and were to tell the king, “I have come from the other shore of the great ocean and there I saw a country, great, rich, and very populous. Your Majesty could acquire that country and its resources, people, and labor.” Would Your Majesty wish to acquire that country and rule over it?

King Koravya answered:

Raṭṭhapāla, if I knew that there was such a rich country with its resources, people, and labor, and that I could rule over its people, I would definitely seize it. 627c

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:

Your Majesty, it was on account of this that the World-honored One said, “This world is insufficient, unsatisfying, and driven by craving.” I accepted it, approved it, and delighted in it. It was after knowing, seeing, and hearing this that I shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

King Koravya said:

Raṭṭhapāla, as to what Raṭṭhapāla said—“Your Majesty, this world is insufficient, unsatisfying, and driven by craving”—I too accept it, approve it, and delight in it. Why is that? This world is indeed insufficient, unsatisfying, and driven by craving.

The venerable Raṭṭhapāla said:

Your Majesty, these four things were taught by the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, who sees and knows. I accepted them, approved them, and delighted in them. It was after I had known, seen, and heard them that I shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and went forth to train in the path.

Then the venerable Raṭṭhapāla uttered these verses:

I see people in the world
Who have property but foolishly do not give generously,
Having obtained property, they again seek even more.
Stingy and greedy, they accumulate property.

A king who has acquired the entire known world
And rules it according to his power,
Is not satisfied with [ruling only] on this side of the sea,
But further seeks [to rule] overseas.

For both king and people
Life ends before they have abandoned their desires.
With hair disheveled, their wives and children cry,
“Alas! Dukkha is hard to overcome!”

Wrapped in a shroud and buried,
Or cremated on a pile of firewood,
[People] pass on to the next life according to their deeds.
Cremated, they are without wisdom or mindfulness.

After death, their property does not follow them,
Nor do their wives, children, or servants.
For the poor and the rich it is the same;
For the foolish and the wise it is also thus.

The wise do not nurture grief;
Only the foolish harbor depression and worry.
Therefore, the wise are victorious,
Attaining the path to full awakening.

Deeply attached to continued existence,
The foolish do evil deeds.
In regard to the Dharma, they act contrary to the Dharma,
Seizing from others by force.

One with little wisdom imitates others;
Being ignorant he does many evil deeds.
Going to a womb and into the next life,
He will repeatedly endure birth and death.

628a

Having been born into this life,
And having done many evil deeds alone,
He is like a robber tied up by others,
Suffering for his own evil deeds.

Thus these sentient beings,
Passing on to the next life,
Suffer for their own deeds,
Harmed by the evil that they themselves have done.

It is just as fruit falls of itself when ripe;
[All people] young and old are like this.
They desire dignity and love happiness;
Their minds incline according to the beauty or ugliness of forms.

[The mind is] bound and harmed by sensual desire;
Because of sensual desire fear arises.
King, I have seen this and become awakened;
And I have understood the excellence of [the way of] the renunciant.

Thus spoke the venerable Raṭṭhapāla. Having heard what the venerable Raṭṭhapāla said, King Koravya was delighted and received it respectfully.<sup>20</sup>

133. The Discourse on Upāli<sup>21</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Nāḷandā in Pāvārika's Mango Grove.

At that time the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin, who was wandering about in the afternoon, approached the Buddha. After exchanging greetings, he stepped back and sat to one side. Then the World-honored One asked him, “Tapassin, how many [types of] actions does the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta designate for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin answered:

Gotama, my honored master, the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, does not designate to us “[types] of actions” for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions; instead he designates to us “restraints” for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions.<sup>22</sup>

The World-honored One asked again, “Tapassin, how many restraints does the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta designate for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin answered:

628b Gotama, my honored master, the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, designates to us three restraints for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions. What are the three? They are bodily restraint, verbal restraint, and mental restraint.

The World-honored One asked further, “Tapassin, do bodily restraint, verbal restraint, and mental restraint differ from one another?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin answered, “Gotama, for us bodily restraint, verbal restraint, and mental restraint do differ from one another.”

The World-honored One asked further:

Tapassin, of these three restraints like this, which restraint does the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta designate as the most serious one for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions: bodily restraint, verbal restraint, or mental restraint?

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin answered:

Gotama, of these three restraints like this, my honored master, the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, designates bodily restraint as the most serious for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions. Verbal restraint is less serious; mental restraint is the least serious, in contrast to bodily restraint, which is extremely serious.

The World-honored One asked further, “Tapassin, did you say that bodily restraint is the most serious one?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin answered, “Gotama, bodily restraint is the most serious.”

The World-honored One asked a second and a third time, “Tapassin, did you say that bodily restraint is the most serious one?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin also answered a second and a third time, “Gotama, bodily restraint is the most serious one.”

Then the World-honored One, having thus three times ascertained the standpoint of the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin, remained silent.

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin asked, “How many restraints does the renunciant Gotama designate for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions?”

Then the World-honored One answered:

Tapassin, I do not designate “restraints” for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions; instead I designate “actions” for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions.

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin asked, “How many actions does Gotama designate for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions?”

The World-honored One answered again:

Tapassin, I designate three actions for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions. What are the three? They are bodily action, verbal action, and mental action.

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin asked, “Gotama, do bodily action, verbal action, and mental action differ from one another?”

The World-honored One answered again, “Tapassin, to me, bodily action, verbal action, and mental action do differ from one another.”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin asked:

Gotama, of these three actions like this, which action do you designate as the most serious one for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions: bodily action, verbal action, or mental action?

The World-honored One answered again:

Tapassin, of these three actions like this, I designate mental action as the 628c most serious one for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions.

Bodily action and verbal action are not like that.

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin asked, “Gotama, you designate mental action as the most serious one?”

The World-honored One answered again, “Tapassin, I designate mental action as the most serious one.”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin asked a second and a third time, “Gotama, you designate mental action as the most serious one?”

The World-honored One answered a second and a third time, “Tapassin, I designate mental action as the most serious one.”

Then the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin, having three times ascertained the standpoint of the World-honored One, rose from his seat, circumambulated the World-honored One three times, and left. He approached the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta.

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, on seeing the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin coming in the distance, asked him, “Tapassin, where are you coming from?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin answered, “Honored One, I am coming from Nālandā, Pāvārika’s Mango Grove, where the renunciant Gotama is staying.”

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta asked, “Tapassin, did you have any discussion with the renunciant Gotama?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin answered, “We did have a discussion together.”

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said, “Tapassin, if you had a discussion with the renunciant Gotama, tell me about it in full. Perhaps I can come to understand what he proclaims.”

Then the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin told him in full what he had discussed with the World-honored One. After hearing it, the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta praised him, saying:

It is well, Tapassin, in that you have performed a disciple’s duty toward the master. What you did was to debate wisely, intelligently, and decisively. You have achieved great mastery in argument with calmness and fearlessness. You have acquired the banner of ambrosia. You have personally attained the realm of ambrosia and are abiding in it.

Why is that? Because you have, before the renunciant Gotama, designated bodily restraint as the most serious one for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions, verbal restraint as less serious, and mental restraint as the least serious—in contrast to bodily restraint, which is extremely serious.

At this time the householder Upāli was together with five hundred householders who had gathered in the assembly. He extended his hands with joined palms toward the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta. Then the householder Upāli said to the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin, “Honored one, you ascertained the standpoint of the renunciant Gotama three times—is that so?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin answered, “Householder, I ascertained the standpoint of the renunciant Gotama three times—that is so.”

The householder Upāli said to the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatāpassin:

I too am able to ascertain the standpoint of the renunciant Gotama up to three times, and having done so in this matter, drag him around at will.

Just as a strong man might seize a long-haired sheep and drag it around at will, in the same way I will be able to ascertain the standpoint of the renunciant Gotama up to three times and then drag him around at will.

629a

Just as a strong man might take hold of a fur cloak with his hands and shake it to remove any dust, in the same way I will be able to ascertain the standpoint of the renunciant Gotama up to three times and then drag him around at will.<sup>23</sup>

Just as a master brewer or his apprentice might put a brewing filter deep into the water and drag it around at will, however he wishes, in the same way I will be able to ascertain the standpoint of the renunciant Gotama up to three times and then drag him around at will.

Just as a great royal elephant, fully sixty years old, a proud mahānāga, with fully grown tusks, feet, and body, with abundant muscular strength might be led away by a strong man who washes its hips, its back, its flanks, its belly, its tusks, and its head with water, and makes it play in the water,<sup>24</sup> in the same way I will be able to ascertain the standpoint of the renunciant Gotama up to three times and then wash him around at will. I will approach the renunciant Gotama and debate with him; and having defeated him, I will come back here.

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta told the householder Upāli, “I too could defeat the renunciant Gotama. You too could do it, and the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin too could do it.”

Then the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin said to the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta:

I do not want to have the householder Upāli approach the renunciant Gotama. Why is that? The renunciant Gotama knows a magic spell that enables him to convert people so that they become his disciples as monks, nuns, laymen, or laywomen. I fear that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple.

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said:

Tapassin, it is impossible that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple. It is, however, certainly possible that the renunciant Gotama might be converted by the householder Upāli and become his disciple.

A second and a third time the householder Upāli said to the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, “I will now approach the renunciant Gotama and debate with him and, having defeated him, I will come back here.”

A second and a third time the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta answered, “You can quickly go there. I too could defeat the renunciant Gotama. You too could do it and the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin too could do it.”

A second and a third time the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin said:

I do not want to have the householder Upāli approach the renunciant Gotama. Why is that? The renunciant Gotama knows a magic spell that enables him to convert people so that they become his disciples as monks, nuns, laymen, or laywomen. I fear that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple.

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said:

629b Tapassin, it is impossible that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama to become his disciple. It is, however, certainly possible that the renunciant Gotama might be converted by the householder Upāli to become his disciple. Householder Upāli, go according to your wish!

Then the householder Upāli paid homage with his head at the feet of the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached the Buddha, exchanged greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side. He asked, “Gotama, did the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin come here today?”

The World-honored One answered, “He did, householder.”

The householder Upāli asked, “Gotama, did you have any discussion with the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin?”

The World-honored One answered, “Yes, there was some discussion.”

The householder Upāli said, “Gotama, if you tell me in full what you discussed with the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin, perhaps I can understand it after having heard it.” Then the World-honored One told him in full what he had discussed with the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin.

Then the householder Upāli, having heard this, expressed praise:

It is well that Tapassin has performed a disciple’s duty toward the master. What he did was to debate wisely, intelligently, and decisively. He has achieved great mastery in argument with calmness and fearlessness. He has acquired the banner of ambrosia. He has attained the realm of ambrosia and is abiding in it. Why is that?

Because he has, before the renunciant Gotama, designated bodily restraint as the most serious one for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions, verbal restraint as less serious, and mental restraint as the least serious—in contrast to bodily restraint, which is extremely serious.

Then the World-honored One said, “Householder, I am willing to discuss this matter with you if you will take a stance on truth and answer according to truth.”

The householder Upāli replied, “Gotama, I will take a stance on truth and answer according to truth. Renunciant Gotama, you may feel free to discuss this matter with me.”

The World-honored One asked:

Householder, what do you think? Suppose that a Nigaṇṭha comes by who is fond of giving and delights in giving, who does not [engage in] merry-making and delights in not [engaging in] merrymaking, who is of the highest purity and highest performance in his vows, [yet] in going and coming he kills many big and small insects.<sup>25</sup> Householder, what result does the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta designate for this kind of killing of living beings?

The householder Upāli answered, “Gotama, if it is intentional, it is a great offense; if it is unintentional, it is not a great offense.”

The World-honored One asked, “Householder, what do you mean by intention?”

The householder Upāli answered, “Gotama, I mean mental action.”
The World-honored One said:

629c Householder, you should answer only after consideration. Of what you have said, the earlier disagrees with the latter, and the latter disagrees with the earlier; they do not correspond. Householder, you yourself have proclaimed in this assembly, “Gotama, I will take a stance on truth and answer according to truth. Renunciant Gotama, you may feel free to discuss this matter with me.”

Householder, what do you think? Suppose that a Nigaṇṭha comes by who drinks [only] boiled water and refuses unboiled water. When there is no boiled water [available], he has a desire to drink unboiled water. Not obtaining [even] unboiled water he dies.<sup>26</sup> Householder, according to the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, where would this Nigaṇṭha be reborn?

The householder Upāli answered, “Gotama, there is a heaven called Mind with Attachment. If the Nigaṇṭha died with attachment in his mind, he would certainly be reborn there.”

The World-honored One said:

Householder, you should answer only after consideration. Of what you have said, the earlier disagrees with the latter, and the latter disagrees with the earlier; they do not correspond. You yourself have proclaimed in this assembly, “Gotama, I will take a stance on truth and answer according to truth. Renunciant Gotama, you may feel free to discuss this matter with me.”

Householder, what do you think? Suppose that a man comes by carrying a sharp knife and he says, “In a single day I will chop, cut, split up, and slice up all the living beings here in Nālandā to make one heap of flesh, to make one pile of flesh.” Householder, what do you think? Would that man be able, in a single day, to chop, cut, split up, and slice up all the living beings here in Nālandā to make one heap of flesh, to make one pile of flesh?

The householder Upāli answered:

No, [he could not]. Why is that? This Nālandā is very large, flourishing, and opulent, with many inhabitants. For this reason, that man would certainly not be able, in a single day, to chop, cut, split up, and slice up all the living beings here in Nālandā to make one heap of flesh, to make one pile of flesh. Gotama, that man would be making a great deal of trouble for himself in vain.

[The World-honored One said:]

Householder, what do you think? Suppose that a renunciant or a brahmin comes by who is endowed with great bases of supernormal power, great power, great merit, great might, who has attained mastery of the mind, and he says, “I shall burn this entire Nālandā to ashes by sending out one thought of hatred.” Householder, what do you think? Would that renunciant or brahmin be able to burn this entire Nālandā to ashes?

The householder Upāli answered:

Gotama, not just one Nālandā; not just two, three, or four [Nālandās]. Gotama, since that renunciant or brahmin is endowed with great bases of supernormal power, great power, great merit, great might, and has attained mastery of the mind, if he sent out one thought of hatred, he could burn entire countries and entire populations to ashes. What, then, of one Nālandā? 630a

The World-honored One said:

Householder, you should answer only after due consideration. Of what you have said, the earlier disagrees with the latter, and the latter disagrees with the earlier; they do not correspond. You yourself have proclaimed in this assembly, “Gotama, I will take a stance on truth and answer according to truth. Renunciant Gotama, you may feel free to discuss this matter with me.”

The World-honored One asked:

Householder, have you heard how certain forests became forests, namely the Great Marshy Forest, the Unicorn Forest, the Deer Forest, the Tranquil Forest, and the Empty Field Forest?<sup>27</sup>

The householder Upāli answered, “Gotama, I have heard about that.”
[The World-honored One said:]

Householder, what do you think? Who made those forests become forests, namely the Great Marshy Forest, the Unicorn Forest, the Deer Forest, the Tranquil Forest, and the Empty Field Forest?

The householder Upāli remained silent.<sup>28</sup> The World-honored One said:

Householder, answer quickly! Householder, answer quickly! Now is not the time for silence. Householder, you yourself proclaimed in this assembly, “Gotama, I will take a stance on truth and answer according to truth. Renunciant Gotama, you may feel free to discuss this matter with me.”

Then the householder Upāli, after remaining silent for a while, replied:

Gotama, I was not just keeping silence; I was thinking about this matter. Gotama, the foolish Nigaṇṭhas do not clearly understand; they are not able to realize; they do not recognize what is a fertile field; they do not examine themselves. They have cheated me for a long time. I have been misled by them into proclaiming before the renunciant Gotama that bodily restraint is the most serious one for not performing evil actions, not doing evil actions, and that verbal restraint and mental restraint cannot match it.

As I understand the meaning, from what the renunciant Gotama has said, [it is not the case that bodily restraint is more serious, since] a seer sending out a thought of hatred is what made those forests become forests, namely the Great Marshy Forest, the Unicorn Forest, the Deer Forest, the Tranquil Forest, and the Empty Field Forest.<sup>29</sup>

World-honored One, I have come to know. Well-gone One, I have understood. I now personally take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One receive me as a lay disciple, from this day forth, until life ends. I personally take refuge for my whole life.

The World-honored One said, “Householder, you had better keep quiet and not announce it. For a highly placed person like yourself it is good to keep quiet.”<sup>30</sup>

The householder Upāli said:

World-honored One, because of this, I am even more delighted and pleased with the World-honored One. Why is that? Because the World-honored One speaks like this: “Householder, you had better keep quiet and not announce it. For a highly placed person like yourself it is good to keep quiet.”

World-honored One, if I were to become a disciple of another renunciant or brahmin, they would take flags, banners, and parasols and parade all around Nālandā announcing, “The householder Upāli has become a disciple of mine! The householder Upāli has become a disciple of mine!” Yet the World-honored One speaks like this: “Householder, you had better keep quiet and not announce it. For a highly placed person like yourself it is good to keep quiet.”

630b

The householder Upāli said:

World-honored One, from this day forth I will not allow Nigaṇṭhas to enter my house. I will allow only the four assemblies of disciples of the World-honored One to enter, that is, monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen.

The World-honored One said:

Householder, the Nigaṇṭhas have been respected by all in your household for a long time. If they come, you should support them according to your ability.

The householder Upāli said:

World-honored One, because of this, I am even more delighted and pleased with the World-honored One. Why is that? Because the World-honored One speaks like this: “Householder, those Nigaṇṭhas have been respected by all in your household for a long time. If they come, you should support them according to your ability.”

World-honored One, earlier I heard a report that the World-honored One speaks like this: “You should give alms to me; do not give alms to others! You should give alms to my disciples; do not give alms to others' disciples! If you give alms to me, you will receive great merit; if you give alms to others, you will not receive great merit. If you give alms to my disciples, you will receive great merit; if you give alms to others' disciples, you will not receive great merit."

The World-honored One said:<sup>31</sup>

Householder, I do not speak like this: "You should give alms to me; do not give alms to others! You should give alms to my disciples; do not give alms to others' disciples! If you give alms to me, you will receive great merit; if you give alms to others, you will not receive great merit. If you give alms to my disciples, you will receive great merit; if you give alms to others' disciples, you will not receive great merit." Householder, I speak like this: "You should give alms to all people according as your mind delights. However, if you give alms to those who do not practice diligently, you will not receive great merit; if you give alms to those who do practice diligently, you will receive great merit."

The householder Upāli said:

World-honored One, I wish to be independent. I myself will know whether I should give alms to Nigaṇṭhas or not give alms to Nigaṇṭhas. World-honored One, I now again personally take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One receive me as a lay disciple from this day forth until life ends. I personally take refuge for my whole life.

630c Then the World-honored One taught the Dharma to the householder Upāli, to exhort and inspire him, fully delighting him. Having taught him the Dharma with countless skillful means, having exhorted and inspired him, fully delighting him, he did as all buddhas do when they first give instruction in the proper and true Dharma to gladden their listeners. That is, he spoke about generosity, he spoke about moral discipline, and he spoke about the conditions for rebirth in heaven; he warned of the dangers in sensual desire and the defilements in birth and death; and he praised the sublime nature of dispassion and the purity of the requisites of awakening. The World-honored One taught him such teachings.

[Then] the Buddha knew that his mind had become gladdened, contented, malleable, receptive, uplifted, concentrated, free from doubt, and free from the hindrances, [and that he had] the ability and power to receive the true Dharma, that is, the essential teaching of all buddhas. Then the World-honored One taught him the [truths of] dukkha, of its arising, of its cessation, and of the path [leading to its cessation].

Then the householder Upāli, as he sat there, immediately saw the four noble truths of dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path [leading to its cessation]. Just as white silk is easily dyed with colors, in the same way the householder Upāli, as he sat there, immediately saw the four noble truths of dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path [leading to its cessation].

Thereupon the householder Upāli saw the Dharma, attained the Dharma, realized the pure white Dharma. He discarded doubt and overcame perplexity; [henceforth] he would venerate no other [teacher], would no longer follow others. He was without uncertainty, having attained the fruit of realization and attained unshakability in the Dharma of the World-honored One.

Then he rose from his seat, paid homage to the Buddha [and said]:

World-honored One, now for the third time I personally take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One receive me as a lay disciple, from this day forth until life ends. I personally take refuge for my whole life.

Then the householder Upāli, having heard what the Buddha said, received it well and kept it well [in mind]. He paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and returned [home]. He gave orders to his gatekeeper:

You should know that I am now a disciple of the World-honored One. From now on, when Nigaṇṭhas come, do not allow them to enter the gate. Allow only the four assemblies of disciples of the World-honored One to enter; that is, monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen.

If a Nigaṇṭha comes, you should tell him, "Venerable Sir, the householder Upāli has been converted by the Buddha and is now his disciple. He does not allow Nigaṇṭhas to enter the gate; he allows only the four assemblies of disciples of the World-honored One to enter: monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen. If you need food, then stand here and food will be brought out to you.”

Then the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin heard that the householder Upāli had been converted by the renunciant Gotama and become a disciple and that he was therefore not allowing Nigaṇṭhas to enter the gate, but allowing only the four assemblies of disciples of the renunciant Gotama to enter, that is monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen. Having heard this, the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin approached the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta and said, “Honored One, this is as I said earlier.”

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta asked, “Tapassin, what did you say earlier?”<sup>32</sup>
The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin answered:

631a Honored One, earlier I said, “I do not want to have the householder Upāli approach the renunciant Gotama. Why is that? The renunciant Gotama knows a magic spell that enables him to convert people so that they become his disciples as monks, nuns, laymen, or laywomen. I fear that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple.”

Honored One, the householder Upāli has now been converted by the renunciant Gotama. Having been converted and become a disciple, he does not allow Nigaṇṭhas to enter his gate, allowing only the four assemblies of disciples of the renunciant Gotama to enter: monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen.

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said:

Tapassin, it is impossible that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple; it is, however, certainly possible that the renunciant Gotama might be converted by the householder Upāli and become his disciple.<sup>33</sup>

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin spoke again, “If the Honored One does not believe what I have said, then let the Honored One go himself or dispatch a messenger.”<sup>34</sup>

Then, the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said:

Tapassin, you yourself go and see whether the householder Upāli has been converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple, or whether the renunciant Gotama has been converted by the householder Upāli and become his disciple.

Having received this instruction from the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin approached the house of the householder Upāli. The gatekeeper saw the Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin coming in the distance and said:

Venerable one, the householder Upāli has been converted by the Buddha and is now his disciple. He therefore does not allow Nigaṇṭhas to enter the gate, allowing only the four assemblies of disciples of the World-honored One to enter, that is, monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen. If you wish to receive food, then stand here and food will be brought out to you.

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin said, “Gatekeeper, I do not need food.”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin, knowing this, raised his head and left. He approached the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta and said, “Honored One, it is as I said earlier.”

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta asked, “Tapassin, what did you say earlier?”

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin answered:

Honored One, earlier I said, “I do not wish to have the householder Upāli approach the renunciant Gotama. Why is that? The renunciant Gotama knows a magic spell that enables him to convert people so that they become his disciples as monks, nuns, laymen, or laywomen. I fear that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple.”

Honored One, the householder Upāli has now been converted by the renunciant Gotama. Having been converted and become his disciple, he does not allow Nigaṇṭhas to enter the gate. He allows only the four assemblies of disciples of the renunciant Gotama to enter: monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen.

631b

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said:

Tapassin, it is impossible that the householder Upāli might be converted by the renunciant Gotama and become his disciple; it is, however, certainly possible that the renunciant Gotama might be converted by the householder Upāli and become his disciple.

The Nigaṇṭha Dīghatapassin said, “If the Honored One does not believe what I have said, then let the Honored One go there himself.”

Then the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, together with a large company of five hundred Nigaṇṭhas, approached the house of the householder Upāli. The gatekeeper saw the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, together with a large company of five hundred Nigaṇṭhas, coming in the distance and said:

Venerable one, the householder Upāli has been converted by the Buddha and become his disciple. He therefore does not allow Nigaṇṭhas to enter the gate, allowing only the four assemblies of disciples of the World-honored One to enter, that is, monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen. If you wish to receive food, then stand here and food will be brought out to you.

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said, “Gatekeeper, I do not need food, but I wish to see the householder Upāli.”

The gatekeeper said, “May the Honored One stand here. I will go in now and tell the honorable householder, honorable Upāli.”

Then the gatekeeper went in and said:

Householder, you should know that the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, together with a large company of five hundred Nigaṇṭhas, is standing outside the gate. He says, “I wish to see the householder Upāli.”

The householder Upāli told the gatekeeper, “Go to the central gate and prepare seats. That done, come back and tell me.”

Having received this instruction, the gatekeeper went to the central gate. Having prepared seats, he returned and said, “Householder, you should know that the seats have been prepared. May the householder himself know the [right] time.”

The householder Upāli went to the central gate followed by the gatekeeper. There was a seat, very high and broad, very clean and nicely prepared, which the householder Upāli formerly used to offer to the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta to sit on.<sup>35</sup> The householder Upāli took it himself and sat down cross-legged. He told the gatekeeper, “Go out to the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta and say this: ‘Honored

One, the householder Upāli says that if the Honored One would like to enter, then let him do as he wishes.””

The gatekeeper, having received this instruction, went out to the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta and said, “Honored One, the householder Upāli says that if the Honored One would like to enter, then let him do as he wishes.” Then, the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, together with the large company of five hundred Nigaṇṭhas, entered by the central gate. 631c

The householder Upāli saw from afar the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta entering, together with a large company of five hundred Nigaṇṭhas, and said, “Honored One, there are seats. Sit where you like!”

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said:

Householder, is it appropriate for you to mount to a high seat, sit down cross-legged, and speak to others as if you were no less than one who has gone forth to train in the path?<sup>36</sup>

The householder Upāli said:

Honored One, these are my possessions. If I want to give, I give; if I do not want to give, I do not give. Because the seats are mine, I speak like this: “There are seats. Sit where you like!”

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta sat on a prepared seat and said:

Householder, what is the reason for this? You wanted to defeat the renunciant Gotama, but instead you yourself have been defeated. You are just like a person who goes into the forest in search of “eyes” (myrobalan fruit), but returns having lost his [own] eyes.<sup>37</sup> In the same way, householder, you wanted to defeat the renunciant Gotama, but instead you yourself have been defeated by the renunciant Gotama. You are just like a person who goes into a pool because he is thirsty, but instead returns still thirsty. In the same way, householder, you wanted to defeat the renunciant Gotama, but instead you yourself return defeated. Householder, what is the reason for this?<sup>38</sup>

The householder Upāli said:

Honored One, allow me to speak a simile. A wise man, on hearing a simile, understands its implications. Honored One, there was once a brahmin with a young wife. The wife was pregnant, and she told her husband, “Sir, I am now pregnant. Go to the market and buy a nice plaything for the child!”

Then the brahmin said to his wife, “Let us just hope that you have a safe delivery. Why worry about having no [plaything right now]? If you give birth to a boy, I will buy a boy’s plaything for you. If you give birth to a girl, I will buy a girl’s plaything for you.” The wife told her husband three times, “Sir, I am now pregnant. Quickly, go to the market and buy a nice plaything for the child!” The brahmin also told his wife a second and a third time, “Let us just hope that you have a safe delivery. Why worry about having no [plaything right now]? If you give birth to a boy, I will buy a boy’s plaything for him. If you give birth to a girl, I will buy a girl’s plaything for her.”

632a The brahmin, being very fond of his wife, asked, “What kind of plaything do you want me to buy for the child?” His wife answered, “Sir, go and buy a monkey as a nice plaything for the child.” On hearing that, the brahmin went to the market to buy a monkey as a plaything, brought it back, and told his wife, “I have come back after buying a monkey as a plaything for the child.”

His wife, on seeing [the monkey], disliked the color, [finding it] unattractive. Then she told her husband, “Sir, take this monkey plaything to a dyer and have him dye it yellow, so as to be very attractive, and have him pound it so that it becomes shiny.” On hearing that, the brahmin immediately took the monkey plaything to a dyer and said, “Dye this monkey plaything a nice yellow color for me to make it very attractive and pound it so that it becomes shiny!” Then the dyer said to the brahmin, “I can dye the monkey plaything yellow and make it very attractive, but I cannot make it become shiny by pounding it.” Then, the dyer recited these verses:<sup>39</sup>

A monkey can endure being dyed,
But it cannot endure being pounded.
If pounded, it will die.

It simply cannot take a hammering.
This monkey is [just] a foul stinking bag
Full of impurities.

Honored One, you should know that what the Nigaṇṭhas proclaim is also like this. It cannot endure questioning by others. It cannot take reflection and examination. It takes the dye of foolishness; it does not take the dye of wisdom.

Honored One, listen again. It is just like a clean piece of Benares cloth. The owner took it to that dyer and said, “Dye this cloth for me. Make it a very nice color, make it very attractive. Also pound it thoroughly to make it become shiny!” Then the dyer told the owner of the cloth, “This cloth can be dyed, made to have a very nice color, made very attractive, and it can also be pounded thoroughly and made to become shiny.” Then, the dyer recited these verses:

Benares cloth like this,
White and clean, can endure being dyed.
On being pounded, it becomes soft,
Shiny, colorful, and increasingly attractive.

Honored One, you should know that what is proclaimed by tathāgatas, those free from attachment and fully awakened, is also like this. It can endure questioning by others, it can take reflection and examination. It takes the dye of wisdom; it does not take the dye of foolishness.

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said, “Householder, you have been converted by the magic spell of the renunciant Gotama.”

The householder Upāli said:

Honored One, that magic spell is good; that magic spell is extremely good. Honored One, that magic spell [will] lead my parents to obtain profit, benefit, peace, and happiness for a long time; and it [will] lead my wife, my servants, my employees, the king of Nālandā, and the entire world with its devas, māras, Brahmas, renunciants and brahmins, from human beings to devas, to obtain profit, benefit, peace, and happiness for a long time.

632b

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta said, “Householder, all the people of Nālandā know that the householder Upāli is a disciple of the Nigaṇṭhas. Whose disciple is he now?”

Then the householder Upāli rose from his seat, placed his right knee on the ground, extended his hands with palms together in the direction of the Buddha, and said:

Honored One, please listen to what I shall say.
Mighty and powerful, free from ignorance,
Having abandoned the defilements and subdued them totally;
Without opponents, [engaging] in subtle reflection,
Having practiced moral discipline, meditative concentration, and wisdom;
At peace and without defilement—
[Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

A great noble one who has completed the practice,
And attained virtue and mastery in teaching;
Well [established] in mindfulness, with subtle right contemplation,
Not [judging] as high or low;
Imperturbable, always at ease—
[Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

Free from distortion, always contented,
Having discarded stinginess and attained satisfaction;
A renunciant who has attained awakening,
[Bearing] his last body, to be honored as a Great Person;
Incomparable, free from the dust [of passion]—
[Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

Free from disease, immeasurable,
Very profound, having become a seer;
Always at peace, courageous,
Abiding in the Dharma, with subtle reflection;
Tamed, happy without entertainment—
[Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

A great nāga, happily abiding in a high position,
The fetters exhausted, liberation attained;
Appropriately eloquent in debate, pure,
With wisdom arisen, free from distress and grief;
The Sakyan, who will not return to this existence—
[Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

Having fared rightly, meditating and reflecting,
 Without disturbance, pure;
 Always smiling, without hatred,
 Delighting in seclusion, having attained the highest;
 Fearless, always focused on the essence—
 [Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

The seventh Seer, without equal,
 Endowed with the threefold knowledge, attained to the holy [life];
 Washed clean, like a bright lamp,
 Attained to stillness, the fetter of hatred ended;
 Courageous and supremely pure—
 [Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

Attained to stillness, with wisdom [wide as] the earth,
 Great wisdom that removes worldly greed;
 Worthy of offerings,<sup>40</sup> [endowed with] the supreme eye,
 A superior person, without equal;
 A leader, devoid of hatred—
 [Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

632c

With desire abandoned, the unsurpassable good [attained],
 Well tamed, an incomparable leader;
 The supreme one, always joyous,
 Without perplexity, possessing [inner] light;
 With self-conceit abandoned, unsurpassably awakened—
 [Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

With craving abandoned, incomparably awakened,
 Without the “smoke,” without the “flame” of existence;
 Thus gone is the Well-gone One,
 Incomparable, without equal;
 Named “Attainer of Perfection”—
 [Such is] the Buddha, whose disciple is Upāli.

This is the Buddha [worthy of] a hundred praises,<sup>41</sup>
 [With qualities] not previously contemplated;
 When Upāli spoke [of them],

The devas came to him,
To help him well and add eloquence,
In accordance with the Dharma and in accordance with his person.
To the question of the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta,
[He replied, “I am] a disciple of the Buddha with ten powers.”

The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta asked, “Householder, from what motive do you praise the renunciant Gotama?”

The householder Upāli answered:

Honored One, allow me to speak a simile. On hearing a simile, a wise person understands its implications. Just as a skilled garland maker or their apprentice plucks various kinds of flowers and ties them with long strings to make various kinds of garlands, in the same way, Honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, has innumerable titles of praise. It is in order to honor him that I speak these praises.

When this teaching [by the Buddha] had been delivered, [the mind of] the householder Upāli had become aloof from the dust of defilements, and [in regard] to all phenomena the Dharma eye arose [in him]. The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta [however], vomited hot blood. He went to Pāvā where, because of this serious affliction, he soon died.<sup>42</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the householder Upāli was delighted and received it respectfully.

134. The Discourse on the Questions of Sakka<sup>43</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling in the Magadha country, staying in the Indasāla cave on Mount Vediya, north of Mango Grove village to the east of Rājagaha.

633a At that time Sakka, the ruler of the devas, heard that the Buddha was dwelling in the Magadha country, staying in the Indasāla cave on Mount Vediya, north of Mango Grove village in the Magadha country to the east of Rājagaha. Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, told the gandhabba Pañcasikha:

I have heard that the World-honored One is dwelling in the Magadha country, staying in the Indasāla cave on Mount Vediya, north of Mango Grove village in the Magadha country to the east of Rājagaha. Pañcasikha, you come along with me to visit the Buddha.

The gandhabba Pañcasikha answered, “Very well.” Then the gandhabba Pañcasikha, carrying a glazed lute, went together with Sakka, the ruler of the devas. The devas of the Thirty-three heard that Sakka, the ruler of the devas, had again the wish to go and visit the Buddha; so the devas of the Thirty-three also accompanied Sakka, the ruler of the devas.

Then, just as quickly as a strong man might flex his arm or stretch it out, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, the devas of the Thirty-three, and the gandhabba Pañcasikha suddenly vanished from the Heaven of the Thirty-three and reappeared at a place not far from the cave on Mount Vediya, north of Mango Grove village, in the Magadha country to the east of Rājagaha. Then Mount Vediya shone with a light as bright as fire. Seeing this, the people living around the mountain thought, “Mount Vediya is on fire, burning everywhere.”

Then, having come to stay there at a certain place, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Pañcasikha, the World-honored One stays like this in secluded places, under the trees in some mountain forest. He is happy to dwell on some high mountain ridge, which is quiet, without sound, remote, without anything bad and without people. There he sits in solitude at his ease, impressive in his virtue. [We] devas have gathered here, enjoying his remoteness, sitting peacefully in seclusion, and abiding in happiness. Since we have not yet notified him, we should not go ahead directly. Pañcasikha, you approach him first to notify him. After that we will move forward.

The gandhabba Pañcasikha answered, “Very well.” Then, the gandhabba Pañcasikha, having received this instruction from Sakka, the ruler of the devas, took up his glazed lute and went ahead to the Indasāla cave. Then he thought, “I know that this spot is neither too far from the Buddha nor too near to him. Let the Buddha know I am here by hearing my voice!” Remaining at that spot, he tuned his glazed lute and sang verses associated with desire, verses associated with nāgas, verses associated with renunciants, and verses associated with arahants. He sang these verses:<sup>44</sup>

Bhaddā, I pay homage to your parents:

Moon and Timbaru.

They gave birth to you, the beautiful one
Who makes my heart rejoice.

Oppressed by heat, one seeks a cool breeze,
Thirsty, one desires to drink cold water.
Similarly I cherish you,
As an arahant cherishes the Dharma.

633b As difficult as gathering up spilled water—
Such is my clinging and desire
To be together [with you] for countless lifetimes,
As [a reward for past] offerings made to those free from attachment.

The pool has clear, cool water,
With golden grains of sand on the bottom.
Like an elephant oppressed by heat
Entering this pool to bathe,
Or like an elephant spurred on with a goad—
So has my mind surrendered to you.

You do not realize what I will do,
[If] I do not obtain you, graceful one.
My mind is so attached to you,
Impatience and discontent burn my heart.
Hence I am unhappy
Like a man in a tiger's mouth.

Like the Sakyan son practicing meditation,
Constantly happy in [mental] unification.
Like a sage on attaining awakening,
Just as wonderful [for me] would it be to obtain you.

Just as a sage enjoys
The unsurpassable right awakening,
Similarly what I would enjoy
Is to obtain you, whom I constantly desire.

Like medicine, which a sick person desires to get,
 Like food, which a hungry person desires to get,
 Like water, which [can] extinguish a fire,
 Are you, Bhaddā, who [could] calm my mind.

Whatever merit I have made
 By offering to those free from attachment,
 To all those who are superbly pure,
 May you and I receive the reward!

I wish I could be with you until the end,
 Never separated from you nor living alone.<sup>45</sup>
 Let me die together with you,
 Rather than live separated [from you].

May Sakka, honored by the devas of the Thirty-three,
 Grant me my wish!
 You, the person I honor most,
 Are my most constant wish.

Therefore I salute the Great Hero,
 Bowing my head to the supreme human being,
 Who has discarded all the thorns of craving.
 I salute the Kinsman of the Sun (the Buddha).

At this the World-honored One rose from his meditative concentration and praised the gandhabba Pañcasikha:

Well done! Well done, Pañcasikha! The sound of your singing was in harmony with the sound of your lute; and the sound of your lute was in harmony with the sound of your singing. The sound of your singing did not go beyond the sound of your lute; and the sound of your lute did not go beyond the sound of your singing. Pañcasikha, do you remember having in the past recited these verses associated with desire, verses associated with nāgas, verses associated with renunciants, and verses associated with arahants?

The gandhabba Pañcasikha answered:

633c World-honored One, the Great Seer would know that himself. Great Seer, in the distant past when the World-honored One had just attained the path of awakening, he was dwelling at Uruvela, on the bank of the Nerañjarā River, under the goatherds' banyan tree. At that time the daughter of the gandhabba king Timbaru, named Bhaddā, was being courted by a deva named Sikha, a son of the royal charioteer Mātali. Great Seer, while he was courting that girl, I too was courting a girl. However, Great Seer, I was unable to obtain the girl I was courting.

At that time I stood behind the girl and sang the verses associated with desire, the verses associated with nāgas, the verses associated with renunciants, and the verses associated with arahants. Great Seer, when I sang these verses, the girl turned around happily and, with a smile, told me, “Pañcasikha, I have not yet seen the Buddha, the World-honored One. However, I have heard from the devas of the Thirty-three that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, perfect in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, a buddha, an exalted one. Pañcasikha, if you are able to praise the World-honored One frequently, I can go with you to pay homage to the Great Seer. But I will meet with you only this once. After that we will not meet again.”

At this point Sakka, the ruler of the devas, thought, “The gandhabba Pañcasikha has caused the World-honored One to emerge from his concentration, enabling me to get through to the Well-gone One.” Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Pañcasikha, approach and in my name bow your head in homage at the Buddha's feet. Inquire from the World-honored One whether the Noble One is healthy in body, whether he is at peace, happy, and without disease, whether he is at ease, and whether his energy is as usual. Say this: “Great Seer, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, pays homage at the Buddha's feet, and inquires from the World-honored One whether he is healthy in body, whether he is at peace, happy, and without disease, whether he is at ease, and whether his energy is as usual. Great Seer, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, together with the Thirty-three devas would like to see the World-honored One.”

The gandhabba Pañcasikha answered, “Very well.”

Then the gandhabba Pañcasikha put down his glazed lute, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, Great Seer, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, pays homage at the Buddha’s feet, and inquires from the World-honored One whether the Noble One is healthy in body, whether he is at peace, happy, and without disease, whether he is at ease, and whether his energy is as usual. Great Seer, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, together with the Thirty-three-devas, wishes to see the World-honored One.

Then the World-honored One said:

Pañcasikha, may Sakka, the ruler of the devas, be now at peace and happy, and may all the devas, human beings, asuras, gandhabbas, yakkhas, as well as the various other groups [of beings] be at peace and happy. Pañcasikha, if Sakka, the ruler of the devas, wishes to see me, then let him do as he wishes.

Then the gandhabba Pañcasikha, having heard what the Buddha said, received it well and kept it [in mind]. He paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached Sakka, the ruler of the devas, and told him, “Your Majesty, I have spoken on your behalf with the World-honored One. The World-honored One is now waiting for Your Majesty. May Your Majesty know the right time.” 634a

Thereupon, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, along with the devas of the Thirty-three and the gandhabba Pañcasikha, approached the Buddha. Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet and announced his name three times, “Indeed, Great Seer, I am Sakka, the ruler of the devas; I am Sakka, the ruler of the devas.”

Then the World-honored One said, “It is like this, Kosiya, it is like this. You are Sakka, the ruler of the devas.”

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having announced his name three times, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and stood to one side. The devas of the Thirty-three and the gandhabba Pañcasikha also paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and stood to one side. Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said, "Great Seer, how far away should I sit from the World-honored One?"

The World-honored One said, "You may sit near to me. Why is that? Because you have a large retinue of divine retainers." Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. The devas of the Thirty-three and the gandhabba Pañcasikha also paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. At that time the Indasāla cave suddenly became wider. Why was that? It happened owing to the majesty of the Buddha and the power of the devas.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having sat down, said:

Great Seer, for a long time I have wanted to visit the World-honored One, wanting to ask questions about the Dharma. Great Seer, once in the distant past the World-honored One was dwelling at Sāvattī, staying in a cave. Great Seer, at that time, on account of myself and the devas of the Thirty-three, a chariot drawn by a thousand elephants was being driven toward the dwelling of the Great [Heavenly] King Vessavaṇa.

At that time there was a concubine named Bhuñjati in the household of King Vessavaṇa. At that time the World-honored One had entered quiet meditative concentration. The concubine was extending her hands with joined palms in reverence toward the feet of the World-honored One.

Great Seer, I told her, "Sister, now is not the right time for me to visit the World-honored One, [since] the World-honored One has entered meditative concentration.<sup>46</sup> Sister, when the World-honored One emerges from meditative concentration, pay homage in my name at the Buddha's feet and inquire from the World-honored One whether the Noble One is healthy in body, whether he is at peace, happy, and without disease, whether he is at ease, and whether his energy is as usual. Say this: 'Great Seer, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, pays homage at the Buddha's feet, and inquires of the World-honored One whether he is healthy in body, whether he is at peace, happy, and without disease, whether he is at ease, and whether his energy is as usual.'"

Great Seer, did that sister pay homage in my name at the Buddha's feet and greet the World-honored One? Does the World-honored One remember that?

The World-honored One said:

Kosiya, I do remember that sister paying homage with her head at my feet in your name and greeting me as you had intended. Kosiya, I also remember hearing the noise made at the time of your departure, which roused me from my meditative concentration.

[Sakka said:]

Great Seer, in the distant past I heard that when there appears in the world a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one, at that time the devas increase [in number], and the asuras decrease.

634b

Great Seer, with my own eyes I have seen disciples of the World-honored One, and monks who had followed the World-honored One and practiced the holy life, who having [temporarily] discarded sensual desire, becoming secluded from sensual desire, on the breaking up of the body after death reappeared in a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven.

Great Seer, the Sakyan woman Gopikā was such a disciple of the World-honored One. She too followed the World-honored One and practiced the holy life. She detested her female body and desired to have a male appearance, to move out of her female body and acquire a male form. Having [temporarily] discarded sensual desire and become secluded from sensual desire, on the breaking up of the body after death, [she/he] reappeared in a sublime realm of existence, among the devas of the Thirty-three, as my son. Since he was reborn [there], all the devas knew that the deva Gopaka is endowed with great bases of supernormal power, great power, great merit, and great authoritative power.

Again, Great Seer, I have seen three monks, disciples of the World-honored One, who also had followed the World-honored One and practiced the holy life [but] had not discarded sensual desire nor become secluded from sensual desire. On the breaking up of the body after death they were reborn in another lowly gandhabba palace. After rebirth, they came to the devas of the Thirty-three every day to serve all the devas and attend on Gopaka, a son of devas.

On seeing them, the son of devas [Gopaka] spoke these verses:<sup>47</sup>

I was a laywoman possessing the eye [of Dharma],
My name was Gopikā.
I extended respect to the Buddha and the Dharma,
And served the Sangha [of monks] with pure intention.

By grace of the Buddha's favor,
The great merit of the Sakyan son,
I came to sublime birth among the Thirty-three,
Known to them as a fortunate son of devas.

Seeing those former monks,
[Now] reborn as gandhabbas,
Standing before me, extending their hands with joined palms,
I, Gopaka, spoke to them in verses:

[You] were formerly disciples of Gotama,
While I was formerly a human being.
You came to my house
And I offered you fine food and drink.

You were formerly equal to noble ones,
Practicing the unsurpassable holy life.
Yet now you are subservient to others,
Coming daily to serve the devas.

Formerly I served you.
I heard the Noble One teaching the Dharma well.
I gained faith, became accomplished in morality,
And came to sublime birth [among] the Thirty-three.

You were formerly served,
Practicing the unsurpassable holy life.

Yet now you are subservient to others,
Coming daily to serve the devas.

634c

In which direction will you head,
After having received the Buddha's Dharma?
Have you turned your backs on the Dharma,
Well taught by the one who certainly has awakened vision?

I saw you all in the distant past;
Now you are reborn as lowly gandhabbas.
By yourselves you practiced inappropriately,
By yourselves you took rebirth inappropriately.<sup>48</sup>

I was formerly a householder.
Look at me now, endowed with excellent merit!
Transformed from a female into a son of devas,
Freely enjoying the five kinds of sensual pleasure.

Being scolded as sons of Gotama,<sup>49</sup>
They wearily lamented, "Gotama,
We should now advance in practice,
As the son of devas (Gopaka) has rightly said."

Two of them practiced energetically,
Remembering Gotama's Dharma and discipline.
Knowing the perils of desire,
They promptly discarded desire, became separated from it.

Having been bound by the fetter of desire,
They promptly succeeded in discarding it and leaving it far behind.
Like an elephant breaking out of its harness,
They went beyond the devas of the Thirty-three
And the devas Indra and Brahmā,
Who had all come together in an assembly.

Seated on their [meditation] seats, they promptly left [the devas behind],
Having heroically discarded the dust of sensual desire.

Seeing this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, became dismayed [and exclaimed],

“They have outdone the devas, the devas among devas!
Formerly born into a lowly [sphere],
They have gone beyond the devas of the Thirty-three!”
In subtle quiet words [he had expressed his] dismay.

After that Gopaka said:

Among human beings, the Buddha is supreme,
The Sakyan Sage, who knows about sensual desire.
Among his sons [these ones] had lost mindfulness,
[But] after my scolding, they recovered it again.

One of the three
Has been reborn among the gandhabbas.
[The other] two attained the right path,
Being in heaven they delight in the faculty of concentration.

The Dharma you have taught is like this,
Disciples become free of perplexity,
Overcome the taints, discard erroneous doubt,
And pay homage to the Buddha, the supreme one with subdued faculties.

They awakened to the teachings
And were both able to ascend to a better realm.
After having ascended,
They were reborn among the Brahmā devas.
We know that Dharma,
Great Seer, [therefore] we have come here.

At that time the World-honored One thought, “This spirit has for a long time been free of flattery; he is without deception, without delusions, and is of upright character. If he asks, it is because he wants to know fully; he does not [just] want to get in touch and be entertained. It is the same with the questions he will ask. Let me explain the profound higher Dharma [to him].”

Having understood this, the World-honored One spoke these verses to Sakka, the ruler of the devas:

635a

For the sake of present happiness,
And for happiness in future existences,
Kosiya, you may ask without restriction
According to what pleases your mind.

Each question asked,
Will be completely resolved for you.
The World-honored One allows it
Saying, “The deva’s request is seen as merited.”
In this Magadha country,
Let the worthy Vāsava (Sakka) pose his questions!<sup>50</sup>

At this Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

World-honored One, as to devas, human beings, asuras, gandhabbas, yakkhas, as well as the various other kinds and groups [of beings], how many fetters does each of them have?

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, as to devas, human beings, asuras, gandhabbas, yakkhas, as well as the various other kinds and groups [of beings], each of them has two fetters, namely, stinginess and jealousy. Each of them thinks, “May I be without bonds, without fetters, without resentment, without hatred, without conflict, without fighting, without dukkha, and let me dwell at ease!” Yet, despite thinking like this, each of them has bonds, has fetters, has resentment, has conflict, has fighting, has dukkha, and does not dwell at ease.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. Each god, human being, asura, gandhabba, yakkha, as well as each of the various other kinds and groups [of beings] has these two fetters. Each of them thinks, “May I be without bonds, without fetters, without resentment, without hatred, without conflict, without fighting, without dukkha, and let me dwell at ease!” Yet, despite thinking like this, each of them has bonds, has fetters, has resentment, has conflict, has fighting, has dukkha, and does not dwell at ease.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and gone beyond perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further:

Great Seer, as to stinginess and jealousy, what is their cause, what is their condition? From where do they arise, by what do they exist; and by what cause is there no stinginess and jealousy?

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, as to stinginess and jealousy, their cause is liking and disliking, their condition is liking and disliking. From liking and disliking they arise, by liking and disliking they exist; if there is no liking and disliking, then there is no stinginess and jealousy.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. As to stinginess and jealousy, their cause is liking and disliking, their condition is liking and disliking. From liking and disliking they arise, by liking and disliking they exist; if there is no liking and disliking, then there is no stinginess and jealousy.

635b Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further:

Great Seer, as to liking and disliking, what is their cause, what is their condition? From where do they arise, by what do they exist, and by what cause is there no liking and disliking?

On hearing this, the World-honored One answered:

Kosiya, as to liking and disliking, their cause is desire, their condition is desire. From desire they arise, by desire they exist; if there is no desire, then there is no liking and disliking.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. As to liking and disliking, their cause is desire, their condition is desire. From desire they arise, by desire they exist; if there is no desire, then there is no liking and disliking.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further:

Great Seer, as to desire, what is its cause, what is its condition? From where does it arise, by what does it exist; and by what cause is there no desire?

On hearing this, the World-honored One answered:

Kosiya, as to desire, its cause is [desirous] thinking, its condition is [desirous] thinking. From [desirous] thinking it arises, by [desirous] thinking it exists; if there is no [desirous] thinking, then there is no desire.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. As to desire, its cause is [desirous] thinking, its condition is [desirous] thinking. By [desirous] thinking it arises, by [desirous] thinking it exists; if there is no [desirous] thinking, then there is no desire.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further:

Great Seer, as to [desirous] thinking, what is its cause, what is its condition? From what does it arise, by what does it exist; and by what cause is there no [desirous] thinking?

On hearing this, the World-honored One answered:

Kosiya, as to [desirous] thinking, its cause is [desirous] intention, its condition is [desirous] intention.<sup>51</sup> From [desirous] intention it arises, because of [desirous] intention it exists; if there is no [desirous] intention, then there is no [desirous] thinking. Because of [desirous] thinking, there is desire; because of desire, there is liking and disliking; because of liking and disliking, there is stinginess and jealousy; because of stinginess and jealousy, there is [the using of] sword and club, dissension and quarreling, hatred and jealousy, flattery and deception, false speech and divisive speech. Thus countless evil and unwholesome states arise in the mind. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha arises.

If there is no [desirous] intention, then there is no [desirous] thinking; if there is no [desirous] thinking, then there is no desire; if there is no desire, then there is no liking and disliking; if there is no liking and disliking, then there is no stinginess and jealousy; if there is no stinginess and jealousy, then there is no [using of] sword and club, no dissension and quarreling, no hatred and jealousy, no flattery and deception, and no false speech and divisive speech. Thus countless evil and unwholesome states do not arise in the mind. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha ceases.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. As to [desirous] thinking, its cause is [desirous] intention, its condition is [desirous] intention. From [desirous] intention it arises, because of [desirous] intention it exists; if there is no [desirous] intention, then there is no [desirous] thinking. Because of [desirous] thinking, there is desire; because of desire, there is liking and disliking; because of liking and disliking, there is stinginess and jealousy; because of stinginess and jealousy, there is [the using of] sword and club, dissension and quarreling, hatred and jealousy, flattery and deception, false speech and divisive speech. Thus countless evil and unwholesome states arise in the mind. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha arises.

If there is no [desirous] intention, then there is no [desirous] thinking; if there is no [desirous] thinking, then there is no desire; if there is no desire, then there is no liking and disliking; if there is no liking and disliking, then there is no stinginess and jealousy; if there is no stinginess and jealousy, then there is no [using of] sword and club, no dissension and quarreling, no hatred and jealousy, no flattery and deception, and no false speech and divisive speech. Thus countless evil and unwholesome states do not arise in the mind. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha ceases.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

At that time Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further, “Great Seer, what is the path leading to the cessation of illusion? How does a monk practice to progress on the path leading to the cessation of illusion?”

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, as to the path leading to the cessation of illusion, it is what is called the noble eightfold path, the eight [factors] being right view . . . up to . . . right concentration. Kosiya, this is the path leading to the cessation of illusion. A monk practices this path leading to the cessation of illusion.<sup>52</sup>

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. As to the path leading to the cessation of illusion, it is what is called the noble eightfold path, the eight [factors] being right view . . . up to . . .

right concentration. Great Seer, this is the path leading to the cessation of illusion. A monk practices this path leading to the cessation of illusion.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

636a Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further, “Great Seer, as to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, how many factors does he discard, and how many factors does he practice?”

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, as to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, he discards three factors and practices three factors. What are the three? The first is thinking; the second is speech; the third is seeking.<sup>53</sup>

Kosiya, as to thinking, I say there are two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. If [a line of] thinking should not be undertaken, I [say]: discard it immediately. If [a line of] thinking should be undertaken, I [say]: know the right time in order to actualize such thinking, with mindfulness and comprehension.

As to speech it is the same.

Kosiya, as to seeking, I say it is again of two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. If seeking should not be undertaken, I [say]: discard it immediately. If seeking should be undertaken, I [say]: know the right time in order to actualize such seeking with mindfulness and comprehension.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. As to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, he discards three factors and practices three factors. What are the three? The first is thinking; the second is speech; the third is seeking.

The Great Seer has said that, as to thinking, there are two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken.

If [a line of] thinking increases evil and unwholesome states and decreases wholesome states, then the Great Seer [says]: discard it immediately. If [a line of] thinking decreases evil and unwholesome states and increases wholesome states, then the Great Seer [says]: know the right time in order to accomplish such [a line of] thinking with mindfulness and comprehension. As to speech, it is the same.

The Great Seer has said that as to seeking there are again two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. If seeking increases evil and unwholesome states and decreases wholesome states, then the Great Seer [says]: discard it immediately. If seeking decreases evil and unwholesome states and increases wholesome states, then the Great Seer [says]: know the right time in order to actualize such seeking with mindfulness and comprehension.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further:

Great Seer, as to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, how many factors is he endowed with, and how many factors does he practice to preserve the code of rules?<sup>54</sup>

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, as to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, he is endowed with six factors, and he practices six factors to preserve the code of rules. What are the six? They are: seeing forms with the eyes, hearing sounds with the ears, smelling odors with the nose, tasting flavors with the tongue, sensing tangibles with the body, and cognizing mental objects with the mind.

Kosiya, as to seeing forms with the eyes, I say this is of two kinds, namely: that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. In the case of seeing forms with the eyes that should not be undertaken, I [say]: discard it immediately. In the case of seeing forms with the eyes that should be undertaken, I [say]: know the right time in order to accomplish it with mindfulness and comprehension.

636b

It is the same with hearing sounds with the ears . . . smelling odors with the nose . . . tasting flavors with the tongue . . . sensing tangibles with the body. As to cognizing mental objects with the mind, I say this too is of two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. In the case of cognizing mental objects with the mind that should not be undertaken, I [say]: discard it immediately. In the case of cognizing mental objects with the mind that should be undertaken, I [say]: know the right time in order to accomplish it with mindfulness and comprehension.<sup>55</sup>

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. As to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, he is endowed with six factors, and he practices six factors to preserve the code of rules. What are the six? They are: seeing forms with the eyes, hearing sounds with the ears, smelling odors with the nose, tasting flavors with the tongue, sensing tangibles with the body, and cognizing mental objects with the mind.

The Great Seer has said that, as to seeing forms with the eyes, this is of two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. In the case of seeing forms with the eyes that increases evil and unwholesome states and decreases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: discard it immediately. In the case of seeing forms with the eyes that decreases evil and unwholesome states and increases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: know the right time in order to accomplish it with mindfulness and comprehension.

It is the same with hearing sounds with the ears . . . smelling odors with the nose . . . tasting flavors with the tongue . . . sensing tangibles with the body. The Great Seer has said that cognizing mental objects with the mind is again of two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. In the case of cognizing mental objects with the mind that increases evil and unwholesome states and decreases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: abandon it immediately.

In the case of cognizing mental objects with the mind that decreases evil and unwholesome states and increases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: know the right time in order to accomplish it with mindfulness and comprehension.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further:

Great Seer, as to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, whose duration of existence is a single moment,<sup>56</sup> how many factors should he discard, and how many factors should he practice?

On hearing this, the World-honored One answered:

Kosiya, as to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, whose duration of existence is a single moment, he should discard three factors, and he should practice three factors. What are the three? The first is joy; the second is sadness; the third is equanimity.

Kosiya, as to joy, I say that there are two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. As to joy of the kind that should not be undertaken, I [say]: discard it immediately. As to joy of the kind that should be undertaken, I [say]: know the right time in order to accomplish it with mindfulness and comprehension. As to sadness, it is the same. . . . 636c Kosiya, as to equanimity, I say that there are again two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. As to equanimity of the kind that should not be undertaken, I [say]: discard it immediately. As to equanimity of the kind that should be undertaken, I [say]: know the right time in order to accomplish it with mindfulness and comprehension.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer.

As to a monk on the path leading to the cessation of illusion, whose duration of existence is a single moment, he should discard three factors, and he should practice three factors. What are the three? The first is joy; the second is sadness; the third is equanimity.

The Great Seer said that, as to joy, there are two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. As to joy of the kind that increases evil and unwholesome states and decreases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: discard it immediately. As to joy of the kind that decreases evil and unwholesome states and increases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: know the right time in order to accomplish it with mindfulness and comprehension. As to sadness, it is the same. . . .

The Great Seer has said that, as to equanimity, there are two kinds, namely that which should be undertaken and that which should not be undertaken. As to equanimity of the kind that increases evil and unwholesome states and decreases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: eliminate it immediately. As to equanimity of the kind that decreases evil and unwholesome states and increases wholesome states, the Great Seer [says]: know the right time in order to accomplish such equanimity with mindfulness and comprehension.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further, “Great Seer, do all renunciants and brahmins have the same teaching, desire, liking, pleasure, and intention?”

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied, “Kosiya, renunciants and brahmins do not all have the same teaching, desire, liking, pleasure, and intention.”

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, asked further, “Great Seer, for what reason do renunciants and brahmins not all have the same teaching, desire, liking, pleasure, and intention?”

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, in this world there are different types of elements, countless elements. Each [renunciant or brahmin], according to the element he knows, and according to his ability and means in relation to that element, argues exclusively, “This is true; anything else is false.” Therefore, Kosiya, renunciants and brahmins do not all have the same teaching, desire, liking, pleasure, and intention.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. In this world there are different types of elements, countless elements. Each [renunciant or brahmin], according to the element he knows, and according to his ability and means in relation to that element, argues exclusively, “This is true; anything else is false.” Therefore, Great Seer, renunciants and brahmins do not all have the same teaching, desire, liking, pleasure, and intention. 637a

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

At that time Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked further:

Great Seer, are all renunciants and brahmins able to attain the ultimate—the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life?

Hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, renunciants and brahmins are not all necessarily able to attain the ultimate—the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, asked further:

Great Seer, for what reason are renunciants and brahmins not all necessarily able to attain the ultimate—the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life?

On hearing this, the World-honored One replied:

Kosiya, if there is a renunciant or brahmin who has not, by the unsurpassable elimination of craving, rightly and well liberated his mind, then he does not attain the ultimate—the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life.

Kosiya, if there is a renunciant or brahmin who has, by the unsurpassable elimination of craving, rightly and well liberated the mind, then he attains the ultimate—the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life.

Then, having heard this, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, said:

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. If there is a renunciant or brahmin who has not, by the unsurpassable elimination of craving, rightly and well liberated the mind, then he does not attain the ultimate—the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life.

Great Seer, if there is a renunciant or brahmin who has, by the unsurpassable elimination of craving, rightly and well liberated the mind, then he attains the ultimate—the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life.

Just so, World-honored One; just so, Well-gone One; just so, Great Seer. I have entirely understood the Dharma as the Buddha has taught it. I have discarded doubt and overcome perplexity, and I am without uncertainty because of hearing what the Buddha has said.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, having heard what the Buddha said, having received it well, and having kept it well [in mind], said:

Great Seer, I have had the thorn of doubt for a long time. Today the World-honored One has pulled it out. Why is that? It is because he is a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened.

637b The World-honored One asked, “Kosiya, do you recall ever having, in the past, asked other renunciants and brahmins about these matters?”

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, replied:<sup>57</sup>

The World-honored One, the Great Seer, would know this himself. Great Seer, [in the past] the devas of the Thirty-three assembled in the Sudhamma Hall. Each of them, harboring worry and grief, exclaimed again and again, “If we were to encounter a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, we would certainly go and visit him.” However, Great Seer, we were unable to encounter a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. Then we engaged to the full in the five kinds of sensual pleasure.

Great Seer, we were negligent. Having been negligent, one deva with great merit then died in that sublime realm. Great Seer, when I saw that that deva with great merit had died in that sublime realm, I became extremely distressed. The hairs of my entire body stood on end [and I thought], “Let me not [so] soon die in this realm!”

Great Seer, because of this I was distressed; because of this I was worried. If I saw another renunciant or brahmin staying in a forest place, in a mountain grove, or at the base of a tree, or happily dwelling on a high cliff, or in an isolated quiet place, in seclusion, a place without evil and without people, conducive to seated meditation, then [I knew that] he was enjoying seclusion, sitting in meditation peacefully in seclusion, abiding in happiness. Seeing him, I took him to be a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, and I went immediately to pay him a respectful visit.

Not recognizing me, he asked me, “Who are you?” Then I answered him, “Great Seer, I am Sakka, the ruler of the devas. Great Seer, I am Sakka, the ruler of the devas.” He asked me further, “I <never> met Sakka or met members of the Sakka lineage.<sup>58</sup> Why are you called Sakka? Why do you bear the name of the Sakka lineage?”

Then I answered him, “Great Seer, if someone comes and asks me about some matter, then I answer him according to my ability, according to my strength (sakkā). For this reason, I am called Sakka.”<sup>59</sup>

He said, “If we ask Sakka about this matter, Sakka will also answer us about this matter.” Then he asked me about some matters; I did not ask him. [In the end] he took refuge in me; I did not take refuge in him. Great Seer, from those renunciants and brahmins I could not even get a teaching about deportment. How could I get [a teaching on] questions like these?

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, spoke these verses:<sup>60</sup>

Sakka approached, and Sakka having approached,
Sakka now spoke like this,
“Keeping my mind remote from thought,
And eliminating doubt and all uncertainty,
Long have I traveled the world
In search of a tathāgata.

637c “When I saw renunciants and brahmins
Sitting in meditation in remote seclusion,
I took them to be fully awakened,
And went to serve and respect them.

“How can I progress upward?”
Thus I asked them.
Having asked, I [still] could not know
The noble path and route.

Now the World-honored One has for me
[Removed] the doubts I had in my mind:
What I was thinking, what I was reflecting on,
What my mind was engaged with.

Knowing the latent and the manifest in my mind,
The Enlightened One has explained them to me.
Honor to the Buddha! Honor to the teacher!
Honor to the sage who is without attachment!

Honor to the one who has cut off all fetters and latent tendencies,
Who has delivered himself and who delivers sentient beings,
Who has awakened to the highest awakening,
The foremost charioteer among charioteers,
The one who is still! Honor to his sublime stillness,
To the Great Seer who, having delivered himself, delivers [others]!

Therefore I pay respect to the one honored by the devas,
And pay homage with my head to the supreme human being,

Who has completely cut out the thorns of craving.
I pay homage to the Kinsman of the Sun.

At this the World-honored One asked:

Kosiya, do you remember having, in the past, attained detachment like this and attained joy like this, that is, joy in the Dharma [which you have] attained in my presence?<sup>61</sup>

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, answered:

World-honored One, the Great Seer would certainly know that himself. Great Seer, once long ago the devas and the asuras were fighting each other. Great Seer, while the devas and the asuras were fighting each other, I thought, “May the devas triumph and defeat the asuras! May the food of the devas and the food of the asuras all be eaten by the devas of the Thirty-three!” Great Seer, when the devas and the asuras fought each other, the devas finally triumphed, defeating the asuras. The food of the devas and the food of the asuras was all eaten by the devas of the Thirty-three.

Great Seer, at that time I experienced detachment and joy; but it was mixed with the [use of] sword and club, bound up with enmity, with aggression and conflict, with hatred and envy. I was unable to attain penetrative knowledge, to attain the path to awakening, to attain nirvana. Great Seer, today I have attained detachment and joy that is not mixed with the [use of] sword and club, not bound up with enmity, with aggression and conflict, or with hatred and envy. I am able to attain penetrative knowledge, to attain awakening, and to attain nirvana.

The World-honored One asked, “Kosiya, why are you able to attain detachment and joy, that is, to attain joy in the Dharma in my presence?”

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, answered:

Great Seer, I am having this thought, “When this life of mine ends, may I be reborn among human beings. May the clan [I am born into] be very wealthy and opulent, with immeasurable wealth, with livestock and property beyond calculation, with a fiefdom well endowed with various feudal manors. That is, may it be a clan of warrior householders, a clan of brahmin householders, or a clan of merchant householders, or any other clan that is very wealthy and opulent, with immeasurable wealth, with livestock and property beyond calculation, with a fiefdom well endowed with various feudal manors.

638a

Having been born into such a clan, may I be endowed with all the faculties, and may I gain faith in the Dharma and discipline taught by the Tathāgata. Having gained faith, may I shave off my hair and beard, don yellow robes, and out of faith give up the household life and become a homeless one to train in the path. May I train in wisdom. Having trained in wisdom, if I attain wisdom, then may I attain the utmost wisdom, attain the ultimate. As to training in wisdom, if having trained in wisdom I attain wisdom but do not attain final knowledge, then if there exist devas that are endowed with great merit, with sublime appearance, radiant and bright, with great power, peace, and happiness, and living in a [heavenly] palace for a long time at the highest level, may I be reborn among them!<sup>62</sup>

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, spoke these verses:

Abandoning this divine body,
May I come down and be born among human beings.
Free of ignorance, may I enter a womb
According to my intention and pleasure.

Having obtained a completely intact body,
May I attain the straight right path
And practice completely the holy life,
Always delighting in begging for almsfood.

As to training in wisdom, if, having trained in wisdom, I attain wisdom, then may I attain the final wisdom, and attain the ultimate. [Again] as to training in wisdom, if, having trained in wisdom, I attain wisdom but do not attain the final wisdom, then may I be supreme among sublime devas, famed among all devas as one of the Akaniṭṭha devas, being reborn among them. Great Seer, may I attain nonreturn. Great Seer, at present I have definitely attained stream-entry.

The World-honored One asked, “Kosiya, for what reason do you proclaim that you have attained stream-entry, this extremely fine, very high, and very extensive distinction?”<sup>63</sup>

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, answered by reciting verses:

[For me] there is no other [object of] veneration
 In this realm, [there is] only the World-honored One.
 [I] have attained the highest distinction,
 Having never before experienced this.

Great Seer, as I sit here,
 In this divine body,
 I have attained an increase in my life span.
 It is like this; I have seen it with my own eyes.

As he was explaining this phenomenon, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, became remote from the dust of defilements as, [in regard to] all phenomena, the Dharma eye arose [in him]. Eighty-thousand devas also became remote from the dust of defilements as, [in regard to] all phenomena, the Dharma eye arose [in them]. Thereupon Sakka, the ruler of the devas, saw the Dharma, attained the Dharma, realized the pure white Dharma, discarded doubt, and overcame perplexity. He would have no other [object of] veneration, would no longer follow others, being without uncertainty.

Having attained the fruit of realization and attained unshakability in regard to the World-honored One's Dharma, he rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, and said: 638b World-honored One, I now personally take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One receive me as a lay disciple, from now on until life ends. I personally take refuge for my entire life.

Thereupon Sakka, the ruler of the devas, praised the gandhabba Pañcasikha:

Well done! Well done, Pañcasikha! You have benefited me greatly. Why is that? Because of you, the Buddha emerged from meditative concentration. Because you first caused the Buddha to emerge from meditative concentration, we were afterward able to meet the Buddha. Pañcasikha, when I return home from here, I will have Bhaddā Suriya-vacchasā, the daughter of the gandhabba king Timbaru, marry you and become your wife. Also,

I will transfer the territory ruled over by her father, the gandhabba king, to you as the [new] king of the gandhabbas.

Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, told the devas of the Thirty-three:

All of you, come here! Formerly we paid threefold homage and reverence to the king of devas Brahmā, who dwells up in the Brahmā world and who now pays homage and reverence exclusively to the World-honored One. Why is that? As to the World-honored One and Brahmā, Brahmā acts as creator; [but] the most to be venerated of all sentient beings,<sup>64</sup> whether born in the present or in the future, is he who completely knows what can be known, and completely sees what can be seen.<sup>65</sup>

Thereupon Sakka, the ruler of the devas, along with the devas of the Thirty-three and the gandhabba Pañcasikha—all of whom had formerly paid threefold homage and reverence to Brahmā who dwells up in the Brahmā world and who [now] pays homage and reverence to the World-honored One—they [all] paid homage with their heads to the Tathāgata, who is free from attachment and fully awakened. Then Sakka, the ruler of the devas, along with the devas of the Thirty-three and the gandhabba Pañcasikha, again paid homage to the World-honored One. They paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet and, having circumambulated him three times, suddenly vanished from that spot and were no longer to be seen.

Then, when the night was over, at dawn, Brahmā, of sublime appearance, radiant and bright, approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, he stepped back, stood to one side, and spoke these verses to the World-honored One:

For the benefit and welfare of the many,
Seeing to their profit and benefit,
The Noble One, while staying in the Magadha country,
Spoke to Vāsava the [ruler] of devas,
Who was asking him questions.

When the Great Seer explained this Dharma, Sakka, the ruler of the devas, became remote from the dust of defilement as, [in regard to] all phenomena, the Dharma eye arose [in him]. Eighty thousand devas also became remote from the dust of defilement as, [in regard to] all phenomena, the Dharma eye arose [in them].

At this the World-honored One said to Brahmā:

It is like this, as Brahmā has said, it is like this,
 “For the benefit and welfare of the many,
 Seeing to their profit and benefit,
 The Noble One, while staying in the Magadha country,
 Spoke to Vāsava the [ruler] of devas,
 Who was asking him questions.”

638c

Brahmā, when I explained the Dharma [to him], Sakka, the ruler of the devas, became remote from the dust of defilement as, [in regard to] all phenomena, the Dharma eye arose [in him]. Eighty thousand devas also became remote from the dust of defilement as, [in regard to] all phenomena, the Dharma eye arose [in them].

Thus spoke the Buddha. At that time Sakka, the ruler of the devas, the devas of the Thirty-three, the gandhabba Pañcasikha, and the heavenly Great Brahmā, having heard what the Buddha said, were delighted and received it respectfully.

135. The Discourse on Sujāta<sup>66</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Rājagaha, in the Grove of Many Toads.

At that time there was a householder’s son named Sujāta.<sup>67</sup> His father, when near to death, had passed on to him instructions regarding the six directions, teaching him well and admonishing him well thus:<sup>68</sup>

Sujāta, after my death you should pay homage to the six directions, extending your hands with joined palms, saying this, “Whatever sentient beings are in the east, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me.”

In the same way [say this]: “Whatever sentient beings are in the south . . . in the west . . . in the north . . . at the nadir . . . at the zenith, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me.”

Having heard his father's instruction, the householder's son Sujāta told his father, "Very well. I will do as you command."

Then, after his father's death, the householder's son Sujāta, having bathed at dawn, put on new linen clothes, took fresh kusa grass in his hand, and went to the water's edge. He paid homage to the six directions, extending his hands with joined palms [saying], "Whatever sentient beings are in the east, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me." In the same way, "Whatever sentient beings are in the south . . . in the west . . . in the north . . . at the nadir . . . at the zenith, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me."

At that time, the night being over, at dawn, the World-honored One put on his robes and took his bowl and went into Rājagaha to beg for almsfood. As the World-honored One was going into Rājagaha to beg for almsfood, he saw in the distance that the householder's son Sujāta, having bathed at dawn, put on new linen clothes, and taken fresh kusa grass in his hand, had gone to the water's edge. He was paying homage to the six directions, extending his hands with joined palms, saying, "Whatever sentient beings are in the east, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me." In the same way, "Whatever sentient beings are in the south . . . in the west . . . in the north . . . at the nadir . . . at the zenith, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me."

Having seen this, the World-honored One went to the householder's son Sujāta and asked him:

Householder's son, from which renunciant or brahmin have you received instruction on respecting, serving, and revering, that you have bathed at dawn, put on new linen clothes, taken fresh kusa grass in your hand, gone to the water's edge, and paid homage to the six directions, extending your hands with joined palms [saying], "Whatever sentient beings are in the east, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me." In the same way, “Whatever sentient beings are in the south . . . in the west . . . in the north . . . at the nadir . . . at the zenith, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me”?

The householder’s son Sujāta answered:

World-honored One, I did not receive instruction from another renunciant or brahmin. World-honored One, when my father was near to death, he passed on to me instructions regarding the six directions, teaching me well and admonishing me well thus, “Sujāta, after my death you should pay homage to the six directions, extending your hands with joined palms [saying], ‘Whatever sentient beings are in the east, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me.’ In the same way, ‘Whatever sentient beings are in the south . . . in the west . . . in the north . . . at the nadir . . . at the zenith, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me.’”

World-honored One, I received as my father’s legacy his instructions about how to respect, serve, and revere. Therefore, I bathe at dawn, put on new linen clothes, take fresh kusa grass in my hand, and go to the water’s edge. I pay homage to the six directions, extending my hands with joined palms [saying], “Whatever sentient beings are in the east, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them, they should also respect, serve, and revere me.” In the same way, “Whatever sentient beings are in the south . . . in the west . . . in the north . . . at the nadir . . . at the zenith, I respect, serve, and revere them all. Since I have respected, served, and revered them all, they should also respect, serve, and revere me.”

Having heard this, the World-honored One said:

Householder’s son, I affirm the existence of the six directions; I do not deny it.<sup>69</sup> Householder’s son, if a person is able to differentiate skillfully the six directions and to separate themselves from the defilement of evil and unwholesome actions in the four directions, then they will be worthy of respect and reverence in the present; and on the breaking up of their body after death they will certainly go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven.

639b

Householder's son, for sentient beings there are four types of action, four types of defilement. What are the four? Householder's son, killing living beings is a type of action of sentient beings, a type of defilement. Taking what is not given . . . sexual misconduct . . . false speech is a type of action of sentient beings, a type of defilement.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

Killing living beings, taking what is not given,
Sexual misconduct with another's wife,
And saying what is not true,
These the wise do not praise.

Householder's son, owing to four causes, a person will acquire much guilt. What are the four? They are: acting from desire, acting from hatred, acting from fear, and acting from ignorance.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

Acting from desire, hatred, fear, and ignorance,
Evilly, contrary to the Dharma,
One will certainly destroy one's reputation,
Like the vanishing of the waning moon.

Householder's son, owing to four causes, a person will acquire much merit. What are the four? They are: not acting from desire, not acting from hatred, not acting from fear, and not acting from ignorance.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

Discarding desire, being without hatred and fear,
Acting without ignorance, acting in accordance with the Dharma,
One's reputation comes to be known everywhere,
Like the gradual filling out of the waxing moon.

Householder's son, you should know that for one pursuing wealth there are six wrong paths. What are the six? The first wrong path for one pursuing wealth is indulging in various kinds of gambling. The second wrong path for one pursuing wealth is roaming [the streets] at unseemly times. The third wrong path for one pursuing wealth is drinking intoxicating liquor [which leads to] negligence. The fourth wrong path for one pursuing wealth is associating with bad friends. The fifth wrong path for one pursuing wealth is constant fondness for entertainment. The sixth wrong path for one pursuing wealth is laziness.

Householder's son, if a person indulges in various kinds of gambling, one should know that there are six dangers inherent in that. What are the six? First, defeat gives rise to resentment; second, loss gives rise to humiliation; third, defeat leads to uneasy sleep; fourth, one's enemies feel happy; fifth, one's family members feel unhappy; sixth, what one says in assemblies is not believed.<sup>70</sup> Householder's son, a person who indulges in gambling will neglect their business, and if they neglect the business, it will not be successful. They will be unable to gain new wealth not yet gained, and their existing wealth will be used up.

Householder's son, if a person roams [the streets] at unseemly times, one should know that there are six dangers inherent in that. What are the six? First, they leave themselves unprotected; second, they leave their wealth unprotected; third, he leaves his wife unprotected;<sup>71</sup> fourth, they are suspected by others; fifth, they are subject to many miseries; sixth, they are condemned by others. Householder's son, a person who roams [the streets] at unseemly times will neglect their business, and if they neglect their business, it will not be successful. They will be unable to gain new wealth not yet gained, and the existing wealth will be used up. 639c Householder's son, if a person drinks intoxicating liquor [which leads to] negligence, one should know that there are six dangers inherent in that. [What are the six?] First, loss of one's present wealth; second, [susceptibility] to much illness; third, increased quarreling; fourth, indecent exposure; fifth, gaining a bad reputation; sixth, loss of wisdom and the arising of ignorance. Householder's son, a person who drinks intoxicating liquor and becomes negligent will neglect their business, and if they neglect their business, it will not be successful. They will be unable to gain new wealth not yet gained, and the existing wealth will be used up.

Householder's son, if a person associates with bad friends, one should know that there are six dangers inherent in that. What are the six? First, companionship with thieves; second, companionship with swindlers; third, companionship with drunkards; fourth, companionship with people of loose character; fifth, pursuit of fun and games; sixth, regarding these [above-mentioned people] as one's intimates. Regarding these as one's intimates, householder's son, a person who associates with bad friends will neglect their business, and if they neglect their business, it will not succeed. They will be unable to gain new wealth not yet gained, and their existing wealth will be used up.

Householder's son, if a person delights in entertainment, one should know that there are six dangers inherent in that. What are the six? First, fondness for listening to singing; second, fondness for watching dancers; third, fondness for going after amusement; fourth, fondness for watching the playing of bells; fifth, fondness for hand-clapping; sixth, fondness for big crowds and gatherings. Householder's son, a person who delights in entertainment will neglect their business, and if they neglect their business, it will not be successful. They will be unable to gain new wealth not yet gained, and their existing wealth will be used up.

Householder's son, a person who is lazy should know that there are six dangers inherent in that. What are the six? First, [saying] "It's too early," they do not work; second, [saying] "It's too late," they do not work; third, [saying] "It's too cold," they do not work; fourth, [saying] "It's too hot," they do not work; fifth, [saying] "I'm too full," they do not work; sixth, [saying] "I'm too hungry," they do not work. Householder's son, a person who is lazy will neglect their business, and if they neglect their business, it will not be successful. They will be unable to gain new wealth not yet gained, and their existing wealth will be used up.

640a

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:<sup>72</sup>

The various kinds of gambling, [roaming] in search of sex,
Addiction to intoxicating liquor, delighting in entertainment,
Keeping company with bad friends,
Laziness and not doing one's work,

Dissipation and lack of self-guarding—
These situations destroy a person.

Going and coming without self-guarding,
Sexual misconduct with another's wife,
A mind constantly fettered by resentment,
Wishful seeking for what is unbeneficial,
Drinking intoxicating liquor, thinking of women and sex—
These things destroy a person.

Recurrent unwholesome behavior,
Violence, rejection of others' guidance,
Insulting renunciants and brahmins,
Confusion, holding wrong views,
Brutality and doing black deeds—
These things destroy a person.

Self-inflicted deprivation and poverty,
Drinking intoxicating liquor, indecent exposure,
With debt [unending] like a spring of water,
Will certainly ruin the family.

Frequenting liquor shops,
Associating with bad friends,
They fail to earn the wealth they should,
Regarding [bad] companionship as enjoyable.

Having many bad friends,
Constantly keeping bad company,
In this world and the future world,
In both they will come to ruin.

A person who practices evil comes to decline;
One who practices good comes to prosperity.
One who practices for achievement comes to increase;
Therefore, one should practice for achievement.

One who practices ascending gets to ascend,

Constantly gaining wisdom and ascending.
In turn they achieve pure morality
And ascend in what is subtle and sublime.

By one who likes to sleep in the daytime,
And likes roaming about at night,
Who is negligent and constantly drinking liquor,
Family life cannot be maintained.

“It is too cold!” or “It is too hot!”,
So says the lazy person.
In the end they do not succeed in their business;
Ultimately they get no financial profit.

If [however], cold and heat
Are not reckoned with, being like [mere] straws,
A person doing their work in this way
Will never lack happiness.

Householder’s son, there are four enemies who have the appearance of friends. What are the four? The first enemy who has the appearance of a friend is one who knows about your affairs; the second enemy who has the appearance of a friend is a flatterer; the third enemy who has the appearance of a friend is one who is all talk [and no action]; the fourth enemy who has the appearance of a friend is a bad companion.

640b

Householder’s son, for four reasons one who knows about your affairs is an enemy who has the appearance of a friend. What are the four? First, knowing about your affairs, they carry off your property; second, while giving little, they take a lot; third, they may exploit your fears; fourth, they become intimate for [their own] benefit.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

A person who uses their knowledge of your affairs,
Who speaks in a very gentle way,
[Who exploits your] fears, [or] who becomes intimate for [their own] benefit,
Know them as enemies who resemble a friend.

You should always keep far away from them,
As [you would from] a terrifying path.

Householder's son, for four reasons the flatterer is an enemy who has the appearance of a friend. What are the four? First, they hold you back from doing good; second, they incite you to do evil; third, they praise you to your face; fourth, behind your back they speak ill of you.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

If [someone] holds you back from fine wholesome things,
[Or] incites you to do what is evil and unwholesome,
[Or] praises you to your face
[But] behind your back speaks ill of you;
If you know [the distinction between] good and evil
And also recognize these two kinds of talk,
[Then you know that] this [seeming] friend should not be befriended.

Knowing that person to be like this,
You should always keep far away from them,
As [you would from] a terrifying path.

Householder's son, for four reasons the one who is all talk [and no action] is an enemy who has the appearance of a friend. What are the four? First, that person reminds you of their support in the past; second, they keep promising future support; third, they speak what is void or untrue; fourth, their present support will certainly disappear, as they say, "I will do it" but do not do it.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

[If someone] reminds you of their past [support] and [promises] future [support];
[If someone] talks empty words and his present support disappears,
[If someone says,] "I will do it" [but then] does not do as they have said,
Then know them as an enemy who resembles a friend.
You should always keep far away from them,
As [you would from] a terrifying path.

Householder's son, for four reasons a bad companion is an enemy who has the appearance of a friend. What are the four? First, they incite you to engage in various kinds of gambling; second, they incite you to roam [the streets] at unseemly times; third, they incite you to drink liquor; fourth, they incite you to associate with bad friends.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

640c Incited to various kinds of gambling,
Incited to drink liquor, or to commit adultery,
Practicing what is low, not practicing what is supreme,
You will decline, like the waning moon.
You should always keep far away from them,
As you would from a terrifying path.<sup>73</sup>

Householder's son, as to good friends, you should know that they are of four kinds. What are the four? First, one who is the same in bad and good [times] should be recognized as a good friend; second, one who is compassionate [toward you] should be recognized as a good friend; third, one who seeks what is advantageous [to you] should be recognized as a good friend; fourth, one who greatly benefits [you] should be recognized as a good friend.<sup>74</sup>

Householder's son, for four reasons one who is the same in bad and good [times] should be recognized as a good friend. What are the four? First, they will give themselves up for you; second, they will give up their wealth for you; third, they will give up their spouse for you; fourth, they are patient with what you say [to them].

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

One who will give up their desired property or spouse,
Who is able to be patient with what you say [to them],
Knowing them to be a friend who is the same in bad and good [times],
A wise person should associate [with them].

Householder's son, for four reasons one who is compassionate [toward you] should be recognized as a good friend. What are the four? First, they incite in you sublime states; second, they restrain you from evil states; third, they praise you to your face; fourth, they protect you from your enemies.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

One who incites in you what is good and wholesome, who restrains you from evil,
Who praises you to your face, and who protects you from your enemies—
You should know them as a good friend who is compassionate [toward you].
A wise person should associate with [such a person].

Householder's son, for four reasons one who seeks what is of advantage [to you] should be recognized as a good friend. What are the four? First, they reveal their secrets [to you]; second, they do not conceal any secrets [from you]; third, they delight in what is to [your] advantage; fourth, they are not distressed about what is not to their advantage.

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

One who tells you their secrets and does not conceal them,
Who delights in what is to your advantage and is not distressed by what is not,
Know them as a good friend who seeks [your] advantage.
A wise person should associate [with them].

Householder's son, for four reasons one who greatly benefits you should be recognized as a good friend. What are the four? First, they know when your property is exhausted; second, knowing that your property is exhausted, they give you property; third, they teach and admonish you when they see you being negligent; fourth, they are always compassionate [toward you].

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

One who knows when your property is exhausted, who [then] gives you property,
Who admonishes you when you are negligent, and who is compassionate [toward you]—

You should know them as a good friend who benefits you greatly.
A wise person should associate [with such a person].

Householder's son, in the noble Dharma and discipline there are the six directions: east, south, west, north, the nadir, and the zenith.<sup>75</sup> 641a Householder's son, as to the east, it concerns how a child regards the parents. They should respect and support their parents in five ways. What are the five? First, increasing their property; second, supplying anything they require; third, offering them what they desire; fourth, not disregarding them out of selfishness; fifth, offering them all their own belongings out of respect for their superiors. In these five ways a son respects and supports their parents.

Parents in turn are well disposed toward their child in five ways. What are the five? First, they have loving thoughts for their child; second, they provide for them so that they lack nothing; third, they ensure that their child does not incur debt; fourth, they recommend a suitable spouse [for them]; fifth, parents think of handing over all their property to their child. In these five ways parents are well disposed toward their child Householder's son, thus the east is discerned in two ways. Householder's son, in the noble Dharma and discipline the east refers to a child and their parents. Householder's son, if one shows filial piety for one's parents, one will certainly prosper and not decline.

Householder's son, as to the south, it concerns how a disciple regards their teacher. A disciple should respect and support their teacher in five ways. What are the five? First, being properly respectful and obedient; second, doing proper service for them; third, rising quickly [to salute them]; fourth, doing their work properly; fifth, being able to serve and respect the teacher. A disciple respects and supports their teacher in these five ways.

A teacher in turn is well disposed toward their disciple in five ways. What are the five? First, teaching them skills; second, teaching them without delay; third, teaching them all they know; fourth, making them safe and well in any place; fifth, introducing them to good friends. A teacher is well disposed toward their disciple in these five ways.

Householder's son, thus the south is discerned in two ways. Householder's son, in the noble Dharma and discipline the south refers to a disciple and their teacher. Householder's son, if a person is compassionate and obedient to their teacher, they will certainly prosper and not decline.

Householder's son, as to the west, it concerns how a husband regards his wife. A husband should love, respect, and support his wife in five ways. What are the five? First, having affectionate thoughts toward his wife; second, not slighting her; third, supplying her with adornments such as necklaces of precious stones; fourth, letting her be in charge in the home; fifth, caring about his wife's relatives. A husband loves, respects, and supports his wife in these five ways.

A wife should well respect and obey her husband in thirteen ways. What are the thirteen? First, sincerely loving and respecting her husband; second, sincerely supporting her husband; third, thinking well of her husband; fourth, being supportive of his business; fifth, being well disposed toward his family members; sixth, being attentive to him in public; seventh, being loving in private; eighth, speaking truthfully; ninth, not limiting his access at the door; tenth, being welcoming when he comes home; eleventh, preparing his seat and waiting on him; twelfth, preparing ample clean and agreeable food and drink for him; thirteenth, making offerings to renunciants and brahmins. A wife well respects and obeys her husband in these thirteen ways.

641b

Householder's son, thus the west is discerned in two ways. Householder's son, in the noble Dharma and discipline the west refers to husband and wife. Householder's son, if a person is compassionate toward their spouse, they will certainly prosper and not decline.

Householder's son, as to the north, it concerns how the master of a household regards their servants. The master of a household should feel compassion and empathy for their servants in five ways. What are the five? First, allocating work to them according to their ability; second, providing them with food at the proper time; third, providing them with drink at the proper time; fourth, allowing them days off work; fifth, giving them medicine when they are sick. The master of a household feels compassion and empathy for their servants in these five ways.

Servants should serve the master of the household well in nine ways. What are the nine? First, doing their work at the proper time; second, working attentively; third, doing all the work [assigned to them]; fourth, being attentive to them in public; fifth, being loving in private; sixth, speaking truthfully; seventh, not deserting them in an emergency; eighth, praising them when they have gone elsewhere; ninth, praising their housemaster often. Servants serve the master of the household well in these nine ways.

Householder's son, thus the north is discerned in two ways. Householder's son, in the noble Dharma and discipline the north refers to the master of a household and their servants. Householder's son, if a person is compassionate toward their servants, they will certainly prosper and not decline.

Householder's son, as to the nadir, it concerns how a friend regards their colleagues. A friend should love, respect, and support their colleagues in five ways. What are the five? First, being loving and respectful; second, not slighting them; third, not deceiving them; fourth, giving them valuable gifts; fifth, helping their colleagues in time of need. A friend loves, respects, and supports their colleagues in these five ways.

Colleagues are also well disposed toward their friend in five ways. What are the five? First, knowing when their property is exhausted; second, on knowing that their property is exhausted, giving them property; third, admonishing their friend when they see them being negligent; fourth, having affectionate thoughts for them; fifth, being a refuge for them in an emergency. Colleagues are well disposed toward their friend in these five ways.

641c Householder's son, thus the nadir is discerned in two ways. Householder's son, in the noble Dharma and discipline the nadir refers to friends and colleagues. Householder's son, if a person is compassionate toward their colleagues, they will certainly prosper and not decline.

Householder's son, as to the zenith, it concerns how a donor regards renunciants and brahmins. A donor should respect and serve renunciants and brahmins in five ways. What are the five? First, not keeping them away from the door; second, welcoming them when he sees them coming; third, preparing seats for them and waiting on them; fourth, preparing adequate clean and agreeable food and drink for them; fifth, supporting them in accordance with the Dharma. A donor respects and serves renunciants and brahmins in these five ways.

Renunciants and brahmins are also well disposed toward donors in five ways. What are the five? First, teaching them so that they [gain] faith, practice with faith, and recollect faith; second, teaching them to observe the moral precepts; third, teaching them so that they [gain] wide learning; fourth, teaching them to practice charitable giving; fifth, teaching them so that they [gain] wisdom, dwell with wisdom, and are established in wisdom. Renunciants and brahmins are well disposed toward donors in these five ways.

Householder's son, thus the zenith is discerned in two ways. Householder's son, in the noble Dharma and discipline the zenith refers to donors and renunciants and brahmins. Householder's son, if a person respects and serves renunciants and brahmins, then they will certainly prosper and not decline.

Householder's son, there are four ways of caring. What are the four? First, generosity; second, loving words; third, acting beneficently; fourth, benefiting equally.<sup>76</sup>

Then the World-honored One spoke these verses:

[By] generosity, loving words,
Constantly acting for others' benefit,
And benefiting sentient beings equally,
[One's] reputation spreads far and wide.

These [four ways of] taking care of the world
Are like the driver steering the chariot.
Without these [ways of] caring,
A mother does not, from her child,
Receive support and respect,
Nor does a father [receive their support and respect].

If [however], these ways of caring are present,
Then great merit is thereby gained.
Shining far like the light of the sun,
Quickly bringing benefit,
Gentle in speech, intelligent—
Such a person gains a good reputation.

Decisive, protective, and free of pride,<sup>77</sup>
Quickly bringing benefit,

Accomplished in faith and moral precepts—
Such a person gains a good reputation.

Always rising [to the occasion], not lazy,
Delighting in offering food and drink to others,
Well disciplined in their movements when about to depart—
Such a person gains a good reputation.

642a Friends and colleagues being mutually empathic,
Caring for each other equally.
The caring that exists between friends
Is very refined, like that between teacher and disciple.

One should first learn technical skills,
And after that seek wealth.
Having afterward obtained wealth,
[One should] divide it into <six> parts.<sup>78</sup>

One part for food and drink, one part for farming,
One part set aside and saved
In case of need in emergencies.
To cultivators or merchants
One part [should be] lent out for interest.
The fifth is for marriage [expenses],
The sixth for constructing a house.

If a household is equipped with these six parts,
Will it not increase and quickly attain happiness?
[Such a householder] will certainly amass wealth,
Like water flowing into the sea.

Pursuing property in this way,
He is like a bee gathering [nectar] from flowers.
Having pursued wealth for a long time,
He will derive pleasure from it.

Do not spend [your] money too far,
Nor too widely.

Do not give money
To one who is violent and aggressive.

The east is parents;
The south is teachers;
The west is the wife;
The north is servants;
The nadir [is] friends and colleagues;
The zenith [is] renunciants and brahmins.

Wishing to revere all these directions
In two ways, one gains a great reputation.
Having revered all these directions,
A donor will be reborn in heaven.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the householder's son Sujāta was delighted and received it respectfully.<sup>79</sup>

136. The Discourse on Merchants Who Searched for Property<sup>80</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

642b

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

Long ago, in [the continent of] Jambudīpa a group of merchants assembled in a merchants' assembly hall. They thought, "Let us board an oceangoing ship and sail across the ocean in order to bring back treasure to meet our housekeeping expenses." They thought again, "Friends, since we cannot foresee whether or not it will be safe to sail across the sea, let us each prepare flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts."

Then, after they had each prepared flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts, they set out to sea. As they were sailing across the sea, their ship was destroyed by the king of the makara sea monsters. The merchants drifted in various different directions on their flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts.

At that time there suddenly arose a strong wind from the east which blew the merchants to the western shore of the sea. There they met many women of very dignified beauty, all of whom had their bodies adorned with various kinds of jewelry. On seeing the merchants, those women said: “Welcome, friends! Come quickly, friends! This is an extremely pleasant and most wonderful place with parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves. There is much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, carnelian, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl. All of this, friends, we will give to you. You should enjoy yourselves together with us. [But,] merchants of Jambudīpa, do not go toward the south, even in your dreams!”

The merchants all enjoyed themselves together with the women. The merchants cohabited with the women who consequently gave birth to male or female [offspring]. Later, one wise merchant of Jambudīpa, while alone in a quiet place, thought, “Why do the women prohibit us from going toward the south? Let me keep watch on the woman with whom I am living. When I know that she has fallen asleep, I will slowly and quietly get up and secretly go toward the south.”

That one wise merchant of Jambudīpa therefore kept watch on the woman with whom he was living; knowing that she had fallen asleep, he slowly and quietly got up and secretly went toward the south.<sup>81</sup> As he went south, that one wise merchant of Jambudīpa heard in the distance a great uproar, with high-pitched voices calling out. The noise came from many people weeping regretfully, calling out for their parents, crying out for their wives and their beloved and intimate friends, and lamenting that they were unable to see again the excellent Jambudīpa, which had been so peaceful and happy.

642c On hearing that, the merchant was in great fear and all his body hairs stood on end. [He thought,] “Let not anyone, human or non-human, entrap me!” Then the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa overcame his fear and continued heading southward. Having gone further southward, the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa suddenly saw in the east a great iron wall. On seeing that, he looked all over it but could see no door, nor even a place where a cat could get out.

To the north of the iron wall the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa saw a big thicket of trees. Going to that big thicket, he slowly and quietly climbed [one of the trees]. Having climbed it, he asked that great group of people, “Friends, why are you weeping regretfully, calling out for your parents, crying out for your wives<sup>82</sup> and your beloved and intimate friends, and lamenting that you are unable to see again the excellent Jambudīpa, which was so peaceful and happy?”

Then that great group of people answered, “Friend, we are merchants of Jambudīpa. [Once] we assembled in the merchants’ assembly hall, and we thought, ‘Let us board an oceangoing ship and sail across the ocean in order to bring back treasure to meet our housekeeping expenses.’ We thought again, ‘Friends, since we cannot foresee whether or not it will be safe to sail across the sea, let us each prepare flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts.’

“Friend, after we had each prepared flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts, we set out to sea. Friend, as we were sailing across the sea, our ship was destroyed by the king of the makara sea monsters. Friend, we all drifted in various different directions on our flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts.

“At that time there suddenly arose a strong wind from the east, which blew us merchants to the western shore of the sea. There we met many women of very dignified beauty, all of whom had their bodies adorned with various kinds of jewelry. On seeing us, those women said, ‘Welcome, friends! Come quickly, friends! This is an extremely pleasant and wonderful place with parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves. There is much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl. All of this, friends, we will give to you. You should enjoy yourselves together with us. [But,] merchants of Jambudīpa, do not go toward the south, even in your dreams!’

“Friend, we all enjoyed ourselves together with the women. We cohabited with the women who consequently gave birth to male or female [offspring]. Friend, as long as those women did not hear of other merchants of Jambudīpa sailing on the sea and of their ship being destroyed by the king of the makara sea monsters, they enjoyed themselves together with us.

“[But,] friend, when the women heard of other merchants of Jambudīpa sailing on the sea and of their ship being destroyed by the king of the makara sea monsters, they [began] feeding on us. We have suffered greatly. When those women are eating a person, if there are any remaining hairs, nails, or teeth, they take them and eat them up completely. When those women are eating a person, if any blood has dripped on to the ground, they dig down four inches with their nails to get it and eat it.

643a

“Friend, you should know that we merchants of Jambudīpa were originally five hundred people. Of those, two hundred and fifty people have already been eaten. The remaining two hundred and fifty are all now within this great iron wall. Friend, do not trust what those women say! They are not real people. They are yakkha demons.”

At this the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa descended slowly and quietly from the big thicket of trees and went back the way he had come. He returned to the place where he was living together with the woman.

Finding that the woman was still asleep and had not yet woken up, the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa went immediately, that very night, to the other merchants of Jambudīpa. He said [to them], “You should all come together to a quiet place. Each one come alone; do not bring your children. [We] should secretly discuss something there together.” The merchants of Jambudīpa went together to that quiet place, each of them going alone, not bringing his children.

Then the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa said, “Merchants, while I was alone in this quiet place, I had this thought, ‘Why do the women prohibit us from going toward the south? Let me keep watch on the woman with whom I am living. When I know that she has fallen asleep, I will slowly and quietly get up and secretly go to the south.’

“Then I kept watch on the woman with whom I was living; and knowing that she had fallen asleep, I slowly and quietly got up and secretly went toward the south. As I went south, I heard in the distance a great uproar, with high-pitched voices calling out. The noise came from many people weeping regretfully, calling out for their parents, crying out for their wives and their beloved and intimate friends, and lamenting that they were unable to see again the excellent Jambudīpa, which had been so peaceful and happy.

“On hearing that, I was in great fear, and all my body hairs stood on end. [I thought,] ‘Let not anyone, human or nonhuman, entrap me!’ Then I overcame my fear and continued heading southward. Having gone further southward, I suddenly saw in the east a great iron wall. Seeing that, I looked all over it, but could see no door, nor even a place where a cat could get out.

“To the north of the iron wall I also saw a big thicket of trees. Going to that big thicket, I slowly and quietly climbed [one of the trees]. Having climbed it, I asked that great group of people, ‘Friends, why are you weeping regretfully, calling out for your parents, crying out for your wives and your beloved and intimate friends, and lamenting that you are unable to see again the excellent Jambudīpa, which was so peaceful and happy?’ 643b

“Then that great group of people said in reply to me, ‘Friend, we are merchants of Jambudīpa. [Once] we assembled in a merchants’ assembly hall and we thought, “Let us board an oceangoing ship and sail across the ocean in order to bring back treasures to meet our housekeeping expenses.” Friend, we thought again, “Friends, since we cannot foresee whether or not it will be safe to sail across the sea, let us each prepare flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts.”

‘Friend, after we had each prepared flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts, we set out to sea. Friend, as we were sailing across the sea, our ship was destroyed by the king of the makara sea monsters. Friend, we all drifted in various different directions on our flotation devices, such as sheepskin bags, big gourds, and rafts.

‘At that time there suddenly arose a strong wind from the east, which blew us merchants to the western shore of the sea. There we met many women of very dignified beauty, all of whom had their bodies adorned with various kinds of jewelry. On seeing us, those women said, “Welcome, friends! Come quickly, friends! This is an extremely pleasant and wonderful place with parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves. There is much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl. All of this, friends, we will give to you. You should enjoy yourselves together with us. [But,] merchants of Jambudīpa, do not go toward the south, even in your dreams!”

‘Friend, we all enjoyed ourselves together with the women. We cohabited with the women who consequently gave birth to male or female [offspring]. Friend, as long as those women did not hear of other merchants of Jambudīpa sailing on the sea and of their ship being destroyed by the king of the makara sea monsters, they enjoyed themselves together with us.

643c ‘[But,] friend, when the women heard of other merchants of Jambudīpa sailing on the sea and of their ship being destroyed by the king of the makara sea monsters, they [began] feeding on us. We have suffered greatly. When those women are eating a person, if there are any remaining hairs, nails, or teeth, they take them and eat them up completely. When those women are eating a person, if any blood has dripped on to the ground, they dig down four inches with their nails to get it and eat it.

‘Friend, you should know that we merchants of Jambudīpa were originally five hundred people. Of those, two hundred and fifty people have been eaten up already. The remaining two hundred and fifty are all now within this great iron wall. Friend, do not trust what those women say! They are not real people. They are yakkha demons.’”

Then the merchants of Jambudīpa asked the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa, “Friend, did you ask that great group of people, ‘Friends, is there any means whereby we people and you people can safely cross over from here to Jambudīpa?’”

The one wise merchant of Jambudīpa answered, “Friends, at that time I left without asking that.” Then the merchants of Jambudīpa told him, “Friend, go back to the place of the woman with whom you are living. Keep watch on her, and when she has fallen asleep, get up slowly and quietly, and secretly go to the south. Go back to those people and ask them, ‘Friends, is there any means whereby we people and you people can safely cross over from here to Jambudīpa?’” Then the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa accepted the [request of the other] merchants by remaining silent.

Then the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa returned to the place of the woman with whom he was living. Keeping watch on her until she had fallen asleep, he got up slowly and quietly and secretly went toward the south. He went again to where the great group of people was and asked them, “Friends, is there any means whereby we people and you people can safely cross over from here to Jambudīpa?”

The people in that great group answered, “Friend, there is no further means whereby we people can safely cross over from here to Jambudīpa.

Friend, we [once] thought, ‘We should together break this wall down and return home.’ But just as we had this thought, the wall became twice its normal height. Friend, this so-called means has actually prevented us from safely crossing over from here to Jambudīpa.

“Friend, [you asked whether] there are any other means whereby you people can safely cross over from here to Jambudīpa. For us people there will never be any means.

“[However,] friend, we have heard devas up in space proclaiming, ‘You merchants of Jambudīpa are ignorant, indecisive, and also of poor understanding. Why is that? On the fifteenth day [of the month], when the code of rules is recited, you are not permitted to go toward the south. That is the day when the king of horses (Valahassa) eats naturally growing rice, calmly and happily, with all his faculties complete. [Having eaten,] he calls out three times, “Who wants to cross to the other shore? Who wants me to liberate him? Who wants me to take him safely across from here to Jambudīpa?”’

644a

“Go, all of you, to the king of horses and say, ‘We want to get across to the other shore. May you liberate us! May you take us safely across from here to Jambudīpa!’ Friend, this is the means by which you people can cross safely from here to Jambudīpa. Merchant, you come, approach the king of horses and say, ‘We want to cross to the other shore. May you liberate us! May you take us safely across from here to Jambudīpa!’”

Then, [after returning from the south to his companions,] the one wise merchant of Jambudīpa announced, “Merchants, it is now time to approach the king of horses and say, ‘We want to cross to the other shore. May you liberate us! May you take us safely across from here to Jambudīpa!’

“Merchants, [let us] follow the advice of the devas! Merchants, on the fifteenth day [of the month], when the code of rules is recited, the king of horses eats naturally growing rice, calmly and happily, with all his faculties complete. [Having eaten,] he will call out three times, ‘Who wants to get across to the other shore? Who wants me to liberate them? Who wants me to take them safely across from here to Jambudīpa?’ At that time we will immediately approach him and say, ‘We want to cross to the other shore. May you liberate us! May you take us safely across from here to Jambudīpa!’”

Then on the fifteenth day, when the code of rules was recited, the king of horses ate naturally growing rice, calmly and happily, with all his faculties complete. [Having eaten], he called out three times, “Who wants to cross over to the other shore? I will liberate him. I will take him safely across from here to Jambudīpa.”

Then, hearing that, the merchants of Jambudīpa immediately approached the king of horses and said, “We want to cross over to the other shore. May you liberate us! May you take us across safely from here to Jambudīpa!”<sup>83</sup>

644b Then the king of horses said, “Merchants, those women will certainly come, holding their children in their arms, and say, ‘Friends, welcome! Come back! This is an extremely pleasant and wonderful place with parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves. There is much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl. All of this, friends, we have given to you. You should enjoy yourselves together with us. If you do not need us anymore, then you should [at least] feel pity for the children.’

“If any of you merchants thinks, ‘I own [this] male or female [child]. I own [this] extremely pleasant and wonderful place with its parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves. I possess much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl,’ then, even though he is riding right on my back, he will certainly topple over and fall into the water. Then he will be eaten by the women and meet with misfortune. When those women are eating a person, if there are any remaining hairs, nails, or teeth, they take them and eat them up completely. When those women are eating a person, if any blood has dripped on to the ground, they dig down four inches with their nails to get it and eat it.

“If [however,] any of you merchants does not think, ‘I own [this] male or female [child]. I own [this] extremely pleasant and wonderful place with its parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves. I possess much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl,’ then, even if he is holding on to just one hair of my body, he will certainly get safely across to Jambudīpa.”

Then the World-honored One told the monks:

Those women came holding their children in their arms, saying, “Friends, welcome! Come back! This is an extremely pleasant and wonderful place with its parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves. There is much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl. All of this we have given to you, friends. You should enjoy it together with us.”

If [any of] those merchants thought, “I own [this] male or female [child]; I own this extremely pleasant and wonderful place with its parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves; I possess much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl,” then, even if he were riding right on the back of the king of horses, he certainly toppled over and fell into the water. Then he was eaten by the women and met with misfortune. When those women are eating a person, if there are any remaining hairs, nails, or teeth, they take them and eat them up completely. When those women are eating a person, if any blood has dripped on to the ground, they dig down four inches with their nails to get it and eat it. 644c

If [however, any of] those merchants did not think, “I own [this] male or female [child]; I own this extremely pleasant and wonderful place with its parks, viewing terraces, bathing pools, seats and couches, and luxuriant groves; I possess much wealth: gold, silver, crystal, beryl, maṇi-jewel, pearl, green jade, white jade, conch-shell, coral, amber, agate, tortoiseshell, ruby, and jade-pearl,” then, even if he were holding onto just one hair of the king of horses, he certainly crossed over safely to Jambudīpa.

Monks, I have delivered these similes wanting you to understand their meaning. This has been said with this meaning. My Dharma is well expounded, widely revealing, well protected, and without defect. It is like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device. It is widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings. It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If a monk thinks, “The eye is mine; I own the eye . . . the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind is mine; I own the mind,” then that monk will certainly come to harm, just like the merchants that were eaten by yakkhas.<sup>84</sup>

My Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect. It is like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If [however,] a monk thinks, “The eye is not mine; I do not possess the eye . . . the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind is not mine; I do not possess the mind,” then that monk will be able to leave safely, just like the merchants riding on the king of horses who crossed over safely.

My Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect. It is like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If a monk thinks, “Forms are mine; I possess forms . . . sounds . . . odors . . . flavors . . . tangibles . . . mental objects are mine; I possess mental objects,” then that monk will certainly come to harm, just like the merchants that were eaten by yakkhas.

My Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected and without defect. It is like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If [however,] a monk thinks, “Forms are not mine; I do not possess forms . . . sounds . . . odors . . . flavors . . . tangibles . . . mental objects are not mine; I do not possess mental objects,” then that monk will be able to leave safely, just like the merchants riding on the king of horses who crossed over safely.

645a

My Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected and without defect. It is like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device. It is widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If a monk thinks, “The aggregate of form is mine; I possess the aggregate of form . . . the aggregate of feeling . . . the aggregate of perception . . . the aggregate of volitional formations . . . the aggregate of consciousness is mine; I possess the aggregate of consciousness,” then that monk will certainly come to harm, just like the merchants that were eaten by yakkhas.

My Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect. It is like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If [however,] a monk thinks, “The aggregate of form is not mine; I do not possess the aggregate of form . . . the aggregate of feeling . . . the aggregate of perception . . . the aggregate of volitional formations . . . the aggregate of consciousness is not mine; I do not possess the aggregate of consciousness,” then that monk will be able to leave safely, just like the merchants riding on the king of horses who crossed over safely.

My Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected and without defect. It is like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If a monk thinks, “Earth is mine; I possess earth . . . water . . . fire . . . wind . . . space . . . consciousness is mine; I possess consciousness,” then that monk will certainly come to harm, just like the merchants that were eaten by yakkhas.

My Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

It is in this way that my Dharma is well expounded, very widely revealing, well protected, and without defect, like a bridge, a raft, or a flotation device, widely spread out everywhere, reaching devas and human beings.

If, [however,] a monk thinks, “Earth is not mine; I do not possess earth . . . water . . . fire . . . wind . . . space . . . consciousness is not mine; I do not possess consciousness,” then that monk will be able to leave safely, just like the merchants riding on the king of horses who crossed over safely.

645b

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

If a person lacks faith
In the true Dharma and discipline taught by the Buddha,
Then that person will certainly come to harm,
Like being eaten by yakkhas.

If [however,] a person has faith
In the true Dharma and discipline taught by the Buddha,
Then that person will be able to cross over safely,
Like riding on the king of horses.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

137. The Discourse on the World<sup>85</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattṭī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

The Tathāgata has himself awakened to the world and expounds it to others. The Tathāgata has understood the world.

The Tathāgata has himself awakened to the arising of the world and expounds it to others. The Tathāgata has abandoned the arising of the world.

The Tathāgata has himself awakened to the cessation of the world and expounds it to others. The Tathāgata has realized the cessation of the world.

The Tathāgata has himself awakened to the path [leading to the cessation] of the world and expounds it to others. The Tathāgata has developed the path [leading to the cessation] of the world.

If there is [anyone who] is completely and fully correct about all things, then it is he, the Tathāgata, who has understood, seen, awakened to, and attained everything. Why is that?

From the night in the past, when the Tathāgata awakened to the unsurpassable right and complete awakening, up until the night in the present when he will attain complete extinction in the remainderless nirvana element, throughout this period whatever is spoken by the Tathāgata, either on his own account or in response to others, all of that is true, not false, not departing from reality, not confused. It is the truth and is indeed correct.<sup>86</sup>

If [people] speak of “the Lion,” you should know that they are speaking of the Tathāgata.<sup>87</sup> Why is that? What the Tathāgata declares in assemblies is known as “the lion’s roar.”

In the entire world, with its devas, māras, Brahmins, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, the Tathāgata has the status of Brahmin. The Tathāgata has attained coolness, being without vexation and without heat. He is possessed of truth and devoid of falsity.<sup>88</sup>

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

Knowing the entire world,
Surpassing the entire world,
He expounds the entire world,
The entire world as it really is.

The supremely and highly regarded hero,
Able to untie all bonds,
He has put an end to all karma,
And is totally liberated from birth and death.

Whether deva or human being,
Those who take lifelong refuge in the Buddha

645c

Bow their heads in homage to the Tathāgata,
Who is very profound, like the great ocean.

Knowing this, one also practices reverence.
The devas and gandhabbas
Also bow their heads in homage,
And follow him until death.

Bowing their heads in homage to the Wise One,
They take lifelong refuge in the supreme human being,
Who is without grief, free of defilements, at peace,
Unobstructed, totally liberated.<sup>89</sup>

For the purpose of delighting in meditation,
Dwell secluded, becoming fully concentrated.
You should be your own lamp,
[Thinking,] “I must not waste time!”
Those who waste time experience grief and worry,
That is, they fall into hell.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

138. The Discourse on Meritorious Deeds<sup>90</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, in Jeta’s
Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One told the monks:

Do not fear meritorious action, for it is delightful when recalled to mind.
Why is that? Meritorious action is what is called happiness. Fear of meritorious action is not delightful when recalled to mind. Why is that? Lack of meritorious action is what is called dukkha.<sup>91</sup> What is the reason for that?

I recall how, in the distant past, I engaged in meritorious action for a long time, and I experienced the results for a long time; and that is delightful when recalled to mind. Having, in the distant past, practiced loving-kindness for seven years, I did not come to [be born in] this world [of human sensuality] for seven eons of cosmic evolution and destruction. When the world went to destruction, I was reborn in the Heaven of Radiance (ābhassara). When the world evolved [again], I descended to take birth in a vacant Brahmā palace. Among those Brahmās I was the Great Brahmā. In other places I was king of the devas, experiencing freedom and ease for a thousand eons. For thirty-six eons I was Sakka, ruler of the devas; and again for countless eons I was the warrior king Mandhātu.<sup>92</sup>

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand elephants equipped with fine harnesses, adorned with numerous precious decorations, draped with strings of white pearls, with the royal elephant Uposatha as the chief.

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand horses equipped with fine harnesses, adorned with numerous precious decorations, entwined with gold and silver, with the king of horses [Valahassa] as the chief.

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand chariots, adorned with four kinds of decoration and various beautiful things, such as the hides of lions, tigers, and leopards woven with designs of varied colors and various decorations—very swift chariots, the chief of which was the chariot Vejayanta. 646a

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand cities, very large and pleasant, with many inhabitants, the chief of which was the royal city of Kusāvati.

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand multistoried buildings, made of four kinds of precious material, gold, silver, beryl, and crystal, the chief of which was the Sudhamma Hall.

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand thrones, made of four kinds of precious material, gold, silver, beryl, and crystal, upholstered with woolen textiles, draped with brocades and fine silk fabrics, with lined and quilted coverlets, and with cushions [made of] antelope hide at both ends.

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand suits of clothing, clothing of linen, clothing of brocade and silk, clothing of cotton, and clothing of antelope hide.

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand women, each with a splendid, clear, bright, fresh body, of extraordinary beauty exceeding human [beauty], almost divine [beauty], dignified beauty that delighted those who saw it, richly adorned with various kinds of precious jewelry, jade and pearl necklaces in abundance, pure warrior [caste] women, as well as countless women of other castes.

Monks, when I was the warrior king Mandhātu, I had eighty-four thousand kinds of food, served constantly day and night, for me to eat when I wished.

Monks, of those eighty-four thousand kinds of food there was one that was particularly delicious and fresh, with numerous flavors, which I often ate.

Monks, of those eighty-four thousand women there was one woman of the warrior caste, the most dignified and beautiful, who often waited on me.

Monks, of those eighty-four thousand suits of clothes there was one suit of clothes, of linen or brocade or silk or cotton or antelope hide, that I often wore.

Monks, of those eighty-four thousand thrones there was one throne, of gold or silver or beryl or crystal, upholstered with woolen textiles, draped with brocade or fine silk fabric, with lined and quilted coverlets, and with cushions [made of] antelope hide at both ends, on which I often reclined.

646b Monks, of those eighty-four thousand multistoried buildings, there was one [made of] gold or silver or beryl or crystal, called Sudhamma Hall, in which I often stayed.

Monk, of those eighty-four thousand cities there was one, very wealthy and pleasant, with many inhabitants, named Kusāvātī, in which I often resided.

Monks, of those eighty-four thousand chariots there was one, decorated with various beautiful things, such as the hides of lions, tigers, and leopards, woven with designs of varied colors, a very swift chariot, named Vejayanta, in which I often rode when visiting pleasure parks and viewing terraces.

Monks, of those eighty-four thousand horses there was one, with bluish body and crow-like head, the royal horse named Valahassa, which I often rode when visiting pleasure parks and viewing terraces.

Monks, of those eighty-four thousand elephants there was one whose entire body was very white and whose seven parts were perfect, the royal elephant named Uposatha, which I often rode when visiting pleasure parks and viewing terraces.

Monks, I had this thought, “What are the kinds of action whose fruit and result have caused me to be endowed today with this great supernormal power, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power?”

Monks, again I had this thought, “There are three kinds of action whose fruits and results have caused me to be endowed today with this great supernormal power, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power. The first is charitable giving, the second is self-discipline, and the third is restraint.”

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:<sup>93</sup>

Look at these results of meritorious action,
So wonderful and so abundant!
Monks, [because] in the distant past,
I had practiced loving-kindness for seven years,
For seven eons of evolution and destruction,
I did not come to [birth in] this world [of human sensuality].

When the world went to destruction,
I was born in the Heaven of Radiance.
When the world evolved [again],
I took birth in Brahmā Heaven.

Among the Brahmās I was the Great Brahmā,
And for a thousand births I experienced freedom and ease as a deva.
For thirty-six [births] I was Sakka;
And for countless hundreds [of births] I was the king Mandhātu.
The warrior king Mandhātu
Is the most honored by human beings.

In accordance with Dharma, without relying on sword or club,
He reigned over the entire world.
In accordance with Dharma, without abusive oppression,
He taught genuine peace and happiness.
In accordance with Dharma, [his teaching] was passed on
And spread over the whole great earth.

646c      Of great wealth and much property—
Such was the clan into which he was born,
Endowed with abundant property and grain crops,
He acquired the seven treasures.
Because of this great merit,
Wherever he was born, he experienced freedom and ease.

Buddhas guide the world
By what a buddha teaches.
Knowing this very special [fact],
One sees their abundant supernormal power.
Whoever knows it, yet is without faith,
Such a one is born into darkness.

Therefore, one should take action oneself,
Seeking great merit and fortune.
One should be respectful toward the Dharma,
Always recollecting the Buddha and his Dharma and discipline.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, those monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

139. The Discourse on the Path of Stillness

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

A young monk who has just been ordained should often approach the path of stillness, to contemplate the signs [of a corpse, namely], the sign of bones, the sign of blue color, the sign of decay, the sign of being devoured [by scavenging animals], and the sign of a skeleton. Having received and retained these signs well, he returns to his dwelling place, washes his hands and feet, spreads his sitting mat, sits down cross-legged on the seat, and recollects these signs, [namely,] the sign of bones, the sign of blue color, the sign of decay, the sign of being devoured, and the sign of a skeleton. Why is that? If that monk cultivates these signs, he will quickly remove the defects of craving and hatred from his mind.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

If a young monk,
In his practice has not yet achieved stilling of the mind,
Then he should approach the path of stillness,
Wishing to remove his sensual passion,
With a mind free of hatred and quarrel,
With loving-kindness and compassion for all sentient beings,
He pervades all directions.

As he goes [there] to contemplate the [dead] bodies,
He should contemplate the sign of blue color,
As well as that of decay,
Contemplate [the signs of] being devoured by birds and worms,
[And the signs of] bones and bone joints linked together.

After cultivating the signs in this way,
He returns to his former place,
Washes his hands and feet,
Spreads his sitting mat, and sits upright on it.

[He] should contemplate, as it truly is,
The body, both internally and externally,
Filled with excrement and urine,
With heart, kidneys, liver, lungs, and so on.

If, wanting to do the almsround,
He goes to a village or town,
Then, like a general clad in his armor,
He constantly keeps right mindfulness before him.

647a

If he sees a visible form as desirable,
Associated purely with desire,
Then, seeing this, he contemplates it as it really is,
With right mindfulness of the Buddha and his Dharma and discipline.

Herein [he contemplates] not bones and tendons,
Not flesh and not blood,
Not kidneys, heart, liver, and lungs,
Not tears, saliva, brain;
[Rather, he contemplates] it all as the earth [element], totally empty,
And [as] the water element in the same way.

Empty entirely is the fire element,
The wind element too is empty.
If there are any feelings
Associated purely with desire,
He stills them all,
And contemplates them as the wise ones do.

In this way he practices energetically,
Constantly recollecting the perception of impurity.
He totally removes sensual passion, hatred, and delusion.
Discarding all ignorance,
And arousing pure understanding,
The monk attains the end of dukkha.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

140. The Discourse on the Lowliest<sup>94</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

Of all kinds of livelihood, the lowliest one by far is begging for almsfood. Worldly people shun it vehemently, speaking of bald-pated ones walking around holding out their bowls. [Yet some] of those clansmen accept it as beneficial. Why is that? Because of disenchantment with birth, aging, disease, death, grief, worry, weeping, sorrow, and distress [they think], "Perhaps by this means I can achieve the ending of this entire great mass of dukkha." Didn't you have such an intention when you went forth to train in the path?

Then the monks answered, “That is so.”

The World-honored One addressed the monks further:

Ignorant fools may go forth to train in the path with a similar intention, and yet they are serving their desires. They are very heavily contaminated with attachment, mentally polluted and entangled with hatred, envy, and lack of faith. Negligent, lacking right mindfulness, without right concentration, with their minds deranged by stupidity and with their faculties distracted, they keep the precepts very loosely. They are not cultivating [the path of] a renunciant and do not advance in their practice.

It is as if a person were [trying] to wash out an ink stain with ink, to remove blood with blood, to remove filth with filth, to remove turbidity with turbidity, or to remove excrement with excrement.<sup>95</sup> [This person] is thereby merely increasing the impurity, [going] from obscurity into obscurity, from darkness into darkness.

It is the same, I say, with ignorant fools [very loosely] keeping the precepts of a renunciant. That is to say, these people are serving their desires. They are very heavily contaminated with attachment, mentally polluted and entangled with hatred, envy, and lack of faith. Negligent, lacking right mindfulness, without right concentration, with their minds deranged by stupidity and their faculties distracted, they keep the precepts very loosely. They are not cultivating [the path of] a renunciant and do not advance in their practice. 647b

It is like the remnants of wood left over from a cremation place in a forest; the burned-out cinders are of no use in the forest and of no use in a village or town. It is the same, I say, with ignorant fools [very loosely] keeping the precepts of a renunciant; for those [people] are serving their desires. They are very heavily contaminated with attachment, mentally polluted, and entangled with hatred, envy, and lack of faith. Negligent, lacking right mindfulness, without right concentration, with their minds deranged by stupidity and their faculties distracted, they keep the precepts very loosely. They are not cultivating [the path of] a renunciant and do not advance in their practice.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

Ignorant fools lose the desires and pleasures [of sensuality]
And also lose the benefits of being a renunciant.
They completely lose out on both sides,
Just like the cinders remaining from a fire.

Just as in a forest
The cinders remaining from a cremation fire,
Are of no use in either forest or village,
So it is with a person who has attachment and desire.
[This person] is just like the cinders remaining from a fire:
Completely losing out on both sides.<sup>96</sup>

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

141. The Discourse with Similes<sup>97</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

Of the countless wholesome states that are attainable, all are based on being without negligence; they are practiced by being without negligence, will arise through being without negligence, and are headed by being without negligence. Being without negligence is foremost among all wholesome states.

647c It is just as, in agriculture, everything is accomplished based on the earth, depends on the earth, and is established on the earth.

In the same way, of the countless wholesome states that are attainable, all are based on being without negligence; they are practiced by being without negligence, will arise through being without negligence, and are headed by being without negligence. Being without negligence is foremost of all wholesome states.

It is just as with seed for planting—in a village or even in a deserted village—of the hundreds of edible grains and medicinal herbs that are able to grow and flourish, all grow and flourish based on the earth, depending on the earth, and established on the earth.

In the same way, of the countless wholesome states that are attainable, all are based on being without negligence; they are practiced by being without negligence, will arise through being without negligence, and are headed by being without negligence. Being without negligence is foremost of all wholesome states.

It is just as, of all root fragrances, the fragrance of aloeswood is foremost; just as of all tree fragrances, the fragrance of red sandalwood is foremost; just as of all water flowers, the blue lotus is foremost; just as of all earth-dwelling flowers, jasmine is foremost; just as of animal footprints, all of which are included in the footprint of the elephant, the footprint of the elephant is foremost, since it is so broad.

In the same way, of the countless wholesome states that are attainable, all are based on being without negligence; they are practiced by being without negligence, will arise through being without negligence, and are headed by being without negligence. Being without negligence is foremost of all wholesome states.

It is just as, of all animals, the lion king is foremost; just as when fighting in battle formation, swearing a single oath is foremost; just as of the rafters of a multistoried building, which are all established on the ridge beam, and the ridge beam supports them all, the ridge beam is foremost since it supports them all.

In the same way, of the countless wholesome states that are attainable, all are based on being without negligence; they are practiced by being without negligence, will arise through being without negligence, and are headed by being without negligence. Being without negligence is foremost of all wholesome states.

It is just as, of all mountains, Sumeru, king of mountains, is foremost; just as, of all springs, great springs that accumulate water, the great ocean is foremost; just as, of all great bodies, the king of asuras is foremost; just as, of all those who wait expectantly, King Māra is foremost; just as, of all those who engage in sensuality, King Mandhātu is foremost; just as of all lesser kings, the wheel-turning monarch is foremost; just as, of all the stars and constellations in space, the moon is foremost; just as, of all silk garments, softened whitened silk is foremost; just as of all radiances, the radiance of wisdom is foremost; just as, of all assemblies, the assembly of the Tathāgata's disciples is foremost; just as, of all dharmas, conditioned and unconditioned, the eradication of craving, dispassion, cessation, nirvana is foremost; just as, of all sentient beings—those with no legs, two legs, four legs, or many legs, material or immaterial, those with perception, without perception, or even neither-with-perception-nor-without-perception—the Tathāgata is foremost in terms of being great, being supreme, being the utmost, being superb, being worthy of respect, and being sublime.

648a It is just as, based on cows there is milk; based on milk there is cream; based on cream there is fresh butter; based on fresh butter there is butter; based on butter there is ghee. [Of all these,] ghee is foremost in terms of being great, being supreme, being the utmost, being the superb, being worthy of respect, and being sublime.

In the same way, of all sentient beings—those with no legs, two legs, four legs, or many legs, those with form or without form, those with perception, without perception, or even neither-with-perception-nor-without-perception—the Tathāgata is foremost in terms of being great, being supreme, being the utmost, being the superb, being worthy of respect, and being sublime.

Then the World-honored One uttered these verses:

If someone wishes their property
To be excellent and to increase greatly,
Then praise being without negligence,
Whether in worldly life or in seclusion—so say the wise.

Those who are without negligence
Definitely obtain benefit both ways.
They obtain it immediately in this world,
And also obtain it in the future world.
Bravely contemplating these benefits,
Those who are wise will certainly attain liberation.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Division 12

On Brahmins

142. The Discourse to Vassakāra<sup>98</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Rājagaha, on Mount Vulture Peak.

At that time King Ajātasattu Vedehiputta of Magadha harbored hatred for Vajji. He repeatedly said to his retainers:

The people of the Vajji country have great might, great virtue, great merit, great power; [yet] I will exterminate the Vajji clan, destroy Vajji, and cause the Vajji people to meet with immeasurable misfortune.

648b

Then King Ajātasattu Vedehiputta of Magadha heard that the World-honored One was staying at Rājagaha, on Mount Vulture Peak. He said to his chief minister Vassakāra:

I hear that the renunciant Gotama is staying at Rājagaha, on Mount Vulture Peak. Vassakāra, approach the renunciant Gotama and in my name politely inquire whether the noble one is at ease and without illness in the body and whether his strength is as usual. Say this, “Gotama, King Ajātasattu Vedehiputta of Magadha inquires whether the noble one is at ease and without illness in the body and whether his strength is as usual.

“Gotama, King Ajātasattu Vedehiputta of Magadha harbors hatred for Vajji. He repeatedly says to his retainers, ‘The people of the Vajji country have great might, great virtue, great merit, great power; [yet] I will exterminate the Vajji clan, destroy Vajji, and cause the Vajji people to meet with immeasurable misfortune.’ What does the renunciant Gotama say about this?”

Vassakāra, receive and remember well what the renunciant Gotama says! Why is that? Such a person never speaks falsehood.

Having received these instructions from the king, the chief minister Vassakāra mounted a most beautiful chariot, went out of the town of Rājagaha in the company of five hundred chariots, and headed for Mount Vulture Peak. Having gone up to Mount Vulture Peak, he descended from the chariot and approached the Buddha on foot. He exchanged polite greetings with the World-honored One, stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

Gotama, King Ajātasattu Vedehiputta of Magadha inquires whether the noble one is at ease and without illness in the body and whether your strength is as usual.

Gotama, King Ajātasattu Vedehiputta of Magadha harbors hatred for Vajji. He repeatedly says to his retainers, “The people of the Vajji country have great might, great virtue, great merit, great power; [yet] I will exterminate the Vajji clan, destroy Vajji, cause the Vajji people to meet with immeasurable misfortune.” What does the renunciant Gotama say about this?

Having heard this, the World-honored One said:<sup>99</sup>

Vassakāra, formerly I was dwelling in the Vajji country where there is a shrine called Sāranda. Vassakāra, at that time I taught the people of the Vajji country seven principles for non-decline, and the people of the Vajji country were able to accept and implement those seven principles for non-decline. Vassakāra, if the people of the Vajji country implement the seven principles for non-decline and do not violate them, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.

The chief minister Vassakāra said to the World-honored One:

648c The renunciant Gotama has spoken of this matter in brief, without expounding the details. We are unable to understand its meaning. May the renunciant Gotama expound the details, so that we can come to understand the meaning.

The World-honored One said, “Vassakāra, listen closely and pay proper attention, I will explain the meaning in detail to you.” The chief minister Vassakāra listened to receive the instruction.

At that time, Venerable Ānanda was holding a fan and attending on the Buddha. The World-honored One turned and asked him, “Ānanda, have you heard whether the Vajjis conduct frequent assemblies, often meeting together?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “World-honored One, I have heard that the Vajjis conduct frequent assemblies, often meeting together.”

The World-honored One said to the chief minister Vassakāra, “If the Vajjis conduct frequent assemblies, often meeting together, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.”

The World-honored One further asked Venerable Ānanda:

Have you heard whether the Vajjis conduct their assemblies collaboratively, deal with the affairs of Vajji collaboratively, and conclude [the assemblies] collaboratively?

Venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, I have heard that the Vajjis conduct their assemblies collaboratively, deal with the affairs of Vajji collaboratively, and conclude [the assemblies] collaboratively.

The World-honored One again said to the chief minister Vassakāra:

If the Vajjis conduct their assemblies collaboratively, deal with the affairs of Vajji collaboratively, and conclude [the assemblies] collaboratively, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.

The World-honored One further asked Venerable Ānanda:

Have you heard whether the Vajjis do not decree what has never previously been decreed, do not alter what has already been decreed, and properly respect and follow the principles of the ancient Vajjis?

Venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, I have heard that the Vajjis do not decree what has never previously been decreed, do not alter what has already been decreed, and properly respect and follow the principles of the ancient Vajjis.

The World-honored One again said to the chief minister Vassakāra:

If the Vajjis do not decree what has never previously been decreed, do not alter what has already been decreed, and properly respect and follow the principles of the ancient Vajjis, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.

The World-honored One further asked Venerable Ānanda, “Have you heard whether the Vajjis do not forcibly violate the wives of others or the daughters of others?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “World-honored One, I have heard that the Vajjis do not forcibly violate the wives of others or the daughters of others.”

The World-honored One again said to the chief minister Vassakāra, “If the Vajjis do not forcibly violate the wives of others or the daughters of others, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.”

The World-honored One further asked Venerable Ānanda:

Have you heard whether all the Vajjis together revere famous, virtuous, and honorable Vajjis, respecting them, supporting them, and accepting the teachings received from them?<sup>100</sup>

Venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, I have heard that all the Vajjis together revere famous, virtuous, and honorable Vajjis, respecting them, supporting them, and accepting the teachings received from them.

649a The World-honored One said again to the chief minister Vassakāra:

If all the Vajjis together revere famous, virtuous, and honorable Vajjis, respecting them, supporting them, and accepting the teachings received from them, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.

The World-honored One further asked Venerable Ānanda:

Have you heard whether the Vajjis together adorn all the ancient Vajji shrines, respectfully make offerings to them, and perform ceremonies, continuing the earlier offerings without abandoning them and with no lessening in their earlier practices?

Venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, I have heard that the Vajjis together adorn all the ancient Vajji shrines, respectfully make offerings to them, and perform ceremonies, continuing the earlier offerings without abandoning them and with no lessening in their earlier practices.

The World-honored One again said to the chief minister Vassakāra:

If the Vajjis together adorn all the ancient Vajji shrines, respectfully make offerings to them, and perform ceremonies, continuing the earlier offerings without abandoning them and with no lessening in their earlier practices, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.

The World-honored One further asked Venerable Ānanda:

Have you heard whether all of the Vajjis together support arahants, holding them in the highest reverence, always wishing that arahants who have not yet come [to Vajji] may wish to come and that those who have come may delight in staying permanently, and always ensuring that they do not lack robes and blankets, food and drink, beds and seats, and medicines, all the requisites of life?<sup>101</sup>

Venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, I have heard that all of the Vajjis together support arahants, holding them in highest reverence, constantly wishing that arahants who have not yet come [to Vajji] may wish to come and that those who have come may delight in staying permanently, and always ensuring that they do not lack robes and blankets, food and drink, beds and seats, and medicines, all the requisites of life.

The World-honored One again said to the chief minister Vassakāra:

If all of the Vajjis together support arahants, holding them in highest reverence, constantly wishing that arahants who have not yet come [to Vajji] may wish to come and that those who have come may delight in staying permanently, and always ensuring that they do not lack robes and blankets, food and drink, beds and seats, and medicines, all the requisites of life, then Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.

Vassakāra, the Vajjis are implementing these seven principles for non-decline; they all accept and uphold these seven principles for non-decline. Vajji will certainly excel; it will not decline.

Then the chief minister Vassakāra rose from his seat, arranged his clothes so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with palms joined toward the Buddha, and said:

Gotama, if those Vajjis had accomplished just one of the principles for non-decline, then King Ajātasattu Vedehiputta of Magadha would not be able to overcome them—let alone being endowed with all seven principles for non-decline! Gotama, having many affairs of state [to attend to], I ask [permission] to return.

The World-honored One replied, “[If] you wish to leave, do as you wish.”

649b Then the chief minister Vassakāra, having heard what the Buddha said, received it and memorized it well. Rising [from his seat], he circumambulated the World-honored One three times and left.<sup>102</sup>

Then, soon after the chief minister Vassakāra had left, the World-honored One turned around and said:

Ānanda, whatever monks are dwelling in the various places on Mount Vulture Peak, tell them all to gather in the assembly hall. When they have all gathered there, come and tell me.

Venerable Ānanda received the instruction from the Buddha, [saying,] “Yes, World-honored One.”

Then Venerable Ānanda made this announcement, “Whatever monks are dwelling in the various places on Mount Vulture Peak should now all gather in the assembly hall!” When they had all gathered there, he returned to the Buddha, paid homage with his head, stepped back, and stood to one side. He said:

World-honored One, I have announced that whatever monks are dwelling in the various places on Mount Vulture Peak should all now gather in the assembly hall. They have all now gathered. May the World-honored One himself know the right time.

Then the World-honored One, followed by Venerable Ānanda, approached the assembly hall. He sat down on a seat prepared in front of the sangha of monks and addressed the monks, “I shall now teach you seven principles for non-decline. You should listen closely and pay proper attention.”<sup>103</sup>

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the seven? If the monks conduct frequent assemblies, if they often meet together, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks conduct their assemblies collaboratively, attend to the affairs of the Sangha collaboratively, and conclude [the assemblies] collaboratively, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks do not decree what has never previously been decreed, do not alter what has already been decreed, and properly respect and follow the moral precepts that I have propounded, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks do not follow craving and desire for future existence, accompanied by craving and delight in arising in this or that existence, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks revere their elders, those highly regarded ones that train together with them in the holy life, if they all respect them, support them, and accept the teachings received from them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks delight in staying in secluded places, mountain forests, high crags, peaceful places without noise, distant places without disturbance, free of people, places conducive to sitting in meditation, and do not leave them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If all the monks together support their companions in the holy life, very much holding them in solemn reverence, constantly wishing that companions in the holy life who have not yet come [to their monastery] may wish to come and that those who have come may delight in staying permanently, and always ensuring that they do not lack robes and blankets, food and drink, beds and seats, and medicines, all the requisites of life, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks implement these seven principles of non-decline, accept and uphold them, and do not violate them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.<sup>104</sup>

649c

Then the World-honored One again said to the monks, “I shall teach you another seven principles for non-decline. Listen closely and pay proper attention.”<sup>105</sup>

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the seven? If the monks are reverential toward their teacher, venerate him, give him supreme and full support, and are respectful, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks are reverential toward the Dharma . . . the Sangha . . . morality . . . diligence . . . offerings [which they have received] . . . concentration, and give supreme and full support for it and are respectful of it, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks implement these seven principles for non-decline, accept and uphold them, and do not violate them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

The World-honored One again said to the monks, “I shall teach you another seven principles for non-decline. Listen closely and pay proper attention.”<sup>106</sup>

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the seven? If the monks do not engage in [excessive] activity, do not delight in activity, do not make a habit of activity, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline. [If they] do not engage in noisy talk, do not delight in noisy talk, do not make a habit of noisy talk . . . if they do not engage in socializing, do not delight in socializing, do not make a habit of socializing . . . if they do not engage in mixing with company, do not delight in mixing with company, do not make a habit of mixing with company . . . if they do not engage in oversleeping, do not delight in oversleeping, do not make a habit of oversleeping . . . if they do not undertake the holy life for the sake of profit, for the sake of fame, or for the sake of other people . . . if they do not give up making an effort midway for the sake of something temporary, nor for the sake of outdoing others in virtue [but instead become truly] excellent in virtue—then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks implement these seven principles for non-decline, accept and uphold them, and do not violate them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

The World-honored One again said to the monks, “I shall teach you another seven principles for non-decline. Listen closely and pay proper attention.”<sup>107</sup>

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the seven? If the monks are accomplished in the treasure of faith, the treasure of morality . . . the treasure of shame . . . the treasure of scruple . . . the treasure of learning . . . the treasure of generosity . . . and the treasure of wisdom, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks implement these seven principles for non-decline, accept and uphold them, and do not violate them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

The World-honored One again said to the monks, “I shall teach you another seven principles for non-decline. Listen closely and pay proper attention.”

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the seven? If the monks are accomplished in the power of faith . . . the power of energy . . . the power of shame . . . the power of scruple . . . the power of mindfulness . . . the power of concentration . . . and the power of wisdom, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

650a

If the monks implement these seven principles for non-decline, accept them and uphold them, and do not violate them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

The World-honored One again said to the monks, “I shall teach you another seven principles for non-decline. Listen closely and pay proper attention.”<sup>108</sup>

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the seven? If the monks cultivate the mindfulness factor of awakening, which is based on seclusion, based on dispassion, based on cessation, and inclines toward release . . . if they cultivate the investigation-of-dharmas . . . energy . . . joy . . . tranquility . . . concentration . . . the equanimity factor of awakening, which is based on seclusion, based on dispassion, based on cessation, and inclines toward release, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks implement these seven principles for non-decline, accept and uphold them, and do not violate them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

The World-honored One again said to the monks, “I shall teach you another seven principles for non-decline. Listen closely and pay proper attention.”<sup>109</sup>

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the seven? If, in settling litigation, the monks use the rule of confrontation in cases that require the rule of confrontation; if they use the rule of memory in cases that require the rule of memory; . . . the rule of nondelusion in cases that require the rule of nondelusion; . . . confession in cases that require confession; . . . majority [decision] in cases that require majority [decision]; . . . exposing [of bad character] in cases that require exposing [of bad character]; and if, in dealing with disputes that arise in the sangha, they use the method that resembles sweeping away excrement with a broom, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

If the monks implement these seven principles for non-decline, accept them and uphold them, and do not violate them, then the monks will certainly excel; consequently the Dharma will not decline.

Then the World-honored One again said to the monks, “I shall teach you six principles of cordiality. Listen closely and pay proper attention.”<sup>110</sup>

Then the monks said, “Yes.”

The Buddha said:

What are the six? If a monk undertakes bodily deeds of loving-kindness toward his companions in the holy life, this is a principle of cordiality, a principle of affection, a principle that delights; it results in affection, in being valued, in being respected, in being revered, in being cultivated, in being included; it leads to being a [true] renunciant, to attaining unification of the mind, to attaining energy, and to attaining nirvana.

In the same way, undertaking verbal deeds of loving-kindness . . . mental deeds of loving-kindness . . . sharing one's gains gotten in accordance with the Dharma, one's own food, even what is in one's bowl, by giving to one's companions in the holy life, this is a principle of cordiality, a principle of affection, a principle that delights; it results in affection, in being valued, in being respected, in being revered, in being cultivated, in being included; it leads to being a [true] renunciant, to attaining unification of the mind, to attaining energy, and to attaining nirvana.

If one has moral discipline that is not deficient, not defective, not defiled, not blackened; if one is [firm] like the earth, not swayed by others, praised by the noble ones, endowed with it and accepting and upholding it well, then sharing such moral discipline with one's companions in the holy life is a principle of cordiality, a principle of affection, a principle that delights, that results in affection, in being valued, in being respected, in being revered, in being cultivated, in being included. It leads to becoming a [true] renunciant, to attaining unification of the mind, to attaining energy, and to attaining nirvana.

650b

If one has the vision that is a noble release, a deep understanding that is able rightly to eradicate dukkha, then sharing such vision with one's companions in the holy life is a principle of cordiality, a principle of affection, a principle that delights; it results in affection, in being valued, in being respected, in being revered, in being cultivated, in being included; it leads to becoming a [true] renunciant, to attaining unification of the mind, to attaining energy, and to attaining nirvana.

When I spoke earlier of six principles of cordiality, it was in relation to this that I spoke.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

143. The Discourse to Saṅgārava<sup>111</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the young brahmin Saṅgārava, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha and exchanged friendly greetings. He stepped back, sat to one side, and said, "Gotama, I would like to ask a question. Will you listen if I venture to express it?"

The World-honored One said, "Young brahmin, feel free to ask about what you are in doubt."

Then the young brahmin Saṅgārava asked:

Gotama, a brahmin, in accordance with [brahmin] custom, goes begging for wealth [and then] either performs a sacrifice himself or gets [someone else] to perform a sacrifice. Gotama, whether he performs the sacrifice himself or gets [someone else] to perform the sacrifice, in either case he produces countless meritorious effects through the sacrifice.

A disciple of the renunciant Gotama, in accordance with his clan's custom, shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes and, out of faith, gives up the household life and becomes homeless to train in the path. He [only] tames himself, attains peace himself, and attains extinction himself. In this way disciples of the renunciant Gotama who follow their clan's custom produce only a single meritorious effect; they do not produce countless meritorious effects through training in the path.<sup>112</sup>

At that time Venerable Ānanda was holding a fan and attending on the Buddha. Then Venerable Ānanda asked, "Young brahmin, of these two ways of practice, which is the superior, the more superb, the more excellent?"

The young brahmin Saṅgārava said, "Ānanda, I revere, honor, and venerate the renunciants Gotama and Ānanda."

Venerable Ānanda said again:

Young brahmin, I did not ask whom you revere, honor, and venerate. Rather, I asked you: of these two ways of practice, which is the superior, the more superb, the more excellent?

Venerable Ānanda asked three times, "Young brahmin, of these two ways of practice, which is the superior, the more superb, the more excellent?"

The young brahmin Saṅgārava also said three times, “Ānanda, I revere, honor, and venerate the renunciants Gotama and Ānanda.”

650c

Venerable Ānanda said again:

Young brahmin, I did not ask whom you revere, honor, and venerate. Rather, I asked you: of these two ways of practice, which is the superior, the more superb, the more excellent?

Then the World-honored One thought, “This young brahmin Saṅgārava has been cornered by Ānanda. Let me rescue him.”

Knowing this, the World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, in former days, when the king and his courtiers gathered for a great assembly, what matter would they discuss? For what matter would they assemble?

The young brahmin Saṅgārava replied:

Gotama, in former days, when the king and his courtiers gathered for a great assembly, they would discuss this matter: “What is the cause, what is the reason why the renunciant Gotama formerly laid down few rules, yet many monks attained awakening? What is the cause, what is the reason why the renunciant Gotama now lays down many rules, yet only a few monks attain awakening?”<sup>113</sup> Gotama, in former days, when the king and his courtiers gathered for a great assembly, they would discuss this matter. Because of this matter they would assemble.

Then the World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, I will now ask you. Answer in accordance with your understanding. What do you think? Suppose that a renunciant or brahmin themselves walk a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, they eradicate all taints and attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and dwell knowing by themselves, awakening by themselves, realizing by themselves: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence,” knowing it as it really is.

They tell others, “I myself undertook a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, I eradicated all taints and attained the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and I dwell having known by myself, having awakened by myself, having realized by myself: ‘Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence,’ knowing it as it really is.

“Come, all of you, and walk by yourselves a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, you will eradicate all taints and attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and will dwell knowing by yourselves, awakening by yourselves, realizing by yourselves: ‘Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence,’ knowing it as it really is.”

They themselves also walk a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, they eradicate all taints and attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and they dwell having known by themselves, having awakened by themselves, having realized by themselves, “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence,” knowing it as it really is.

651a They tell others, and those others tell others, and so on in turn to countless hundreds and thousands [of others]. What do you think, young brahmin? My disciples who follow their clan’s custom by shaving off hair and beard, donning the yellow robes and, out of faith, give up the household life and become homeless to train in the path—do they produce only a single meritorious effect? Do they not produce countless meritorious effects by training in the path?

The young brahmin Saṅgārava replied:

Gotama, as I understand the meaning of what the renunciant Gotama has said, the disciples of the renunciant Gotama, who follow their clan’s custom by shaving off hair and beard, donning the yellow robes and, out of faith, give up the household life and become homeless to train in the path—they produce countless meritorious effects. They do not produce only a single meritorious effect by training in the path.

The World-honored One further said to Saṅgārava:

There are three types of miracle: the miracle of supernormal powers, the miracle of divining the thoughts [of others], and the miracle of instruction.

Young brahmin, what is the miracle of supernormal powers? Here a renunciant or brahmin has great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great divine might. His mind has mastery of supernormal powers and engages in the virtues of immeasurable supernormal powers, namely, being one, he becomes many; being many, he becomes one [again]. Being one, he remains one, possessing knowledge and possessing vision. He passes unhindered through stone walls as if passing through space. He dives into the earth as if it were water; he walks on water [without sinking] as if it were earth. Seated cross-legged, he ascends into space like a bird. With his hand he touches and strokes the sun and the moon, which are of such great supernormal power, of such great and mighty virtue, of such great merit, of such great divine might. With his body he reaches the Brahmā world. Young brahmin, this is called the miracle of supernormal powers.

Young brahmin, what is the miracle of divining the thoughts [of others]? Here a renunciant or brahmin uses another person's outward appearance as a basis for divining that other person's mind to be like this [or like that]. If [he divines] that mind to be like this [or like that], then it really is like this [or like that]. He makes countless divinations, not just a few divinations, and all of them are correct; none is false.

If he does not divine another person's mind on the basis of that other person's outward appearance, then he instead divines that person's mind to be a mind like this [or like that] by hearing the sound of devas or the sound of [other] non-human beings. If [he divines] it to be a mind like this [or like that], then it really is a mind like this [or like that]. He makes countless divinations, not just a few divinations, and all of them are correct; none is false.

If he does not divine another person's mind on the basis of that other person's outward appearance, and also not by hearing the sound of devas or the sound of [other] non-human beings, then he instead divines that person's mind to be like this [or like that] on the basis of that other person's thoughts, his intentions, and what he says. On hearing [that person's] voice, [he divines] his mind to be like this [or like that]. If he divines it to be a mind like this [or like that], then it really is a mind like this [or like that]. He makes countless divinations, not just a few divinations, and all of them are correct; none is false.

651b If he does not divine another person's mind on the basis of that other person's outward appearance, and also not by hearing the sound of devas or the sound of [other] nonhuman beings, and also not on the basis of that other person's thoughts, his intentions, and what he says, nor on hearing his voice, then he instead divines that other person's mind by seeing them enter the concentration that is without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation. Having seen this, he thinks, "In this state the venerable one is not thinking and not intending, [yet] his mind has such-and-such inclinations. [When] that venerable one emerges from this concentration, he will think like this [and like that]." On emerging from this concentration that one does [indeed] think like this and like that.

[A renunciant or brahmin] may also divine the past, the future, and the present: what was done long ago and said long ago. He may also divine [the mind of someone who is] in a quiet place, dwelling in a quiet place, even divining his mind states and his mind objects. Young brahmin, this is called the miracle of divining the thoughts [of others].

Young brahmin, what is the miracle of instruction? Here a renunciant or brahmin themselves walk a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, they eradicate all taints and attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and dwell knowing by themselves, awakening by themselves, realizing by themselves: "Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence," knowing it as it really is.

They tell others, "I myself walked a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, I eradicated all taints and attained the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and I dwell having known by myself, having awakened by myself, having realized by myself, 'Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence,' knowing it as it really is.

“Come, all of you, and also walk such a path yourselves, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, you will eradicate all taints and attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and dwell knowing by yourselves, awakening by yourselves, realizing by yourselves: ‘Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence,’ knowing it as it really is.”

They themselves also walk such a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, they eradicate all taints and attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and dwell having known by themselves, having awakened by themselves, having realized by themselves: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence,” knowing it as it really is.

They tell others, and those others tell others, and so on in turn to countless hundreds and thousands [of others]. Young brahmin, this is what is called the miracle of instruction.<sup>114</sup> Of these three miracles, which miracle is the best, the most superb, the most excellent?

The young brahmin Saṅgārava replied:

Gotama, suppose that a renunciant or brahmin has great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great divine might. His mind has mastery of supernormal powers . . . up to . . . with his body he reaches the Brahmā world. Gotama, this is done for himself and is possessed by himself; he himself receives the fruit of it. Gotama, this miracle is [nevertheless] a great method among these miracles.<sup>115</sup>

Gotama, suppose that a renunciant or brahmin divines the minds of others based on their outward appearance . . . up to . . . he divines their mind states and their mind objects. Gotama, this too is done for himself and is possessed by himself; he himself receives the fruit of it. Gotama, this miracle is [nevertheless] a great method among these miracles.

651c

Gotama, suppose that a renunciant or brahmin himself walks such a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, he eradicates all taints and attains the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and dwells having known by himself, having awakened by himself, having realized by himself: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence,” knowing it as it really is. He tells others, those others tell others, and so on in turn to countless hundreds and thousands [of others]. Gotama, among these three miracles, this miracle is the best, the most superb, the most excellent.

The World-honored One asked Saṅgārava, “Of these three miracles, for which miracle would your praise [someone]?”

The young brahmin Saṅgārava replied:

Gotama, I praise the renunciant Gotama for [each of] these three miracles. Why is that? The renunciant Gotama has great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great divine might. His mind has mastery of supernormal powers . . . up to . . . with his body he reaches the Brahmā world.

The renunciant Gotama divines the minds of others on the basis of their outward appearance . . . up to . . . he divines their mind states and their mind objects.

The renunciant Gotama [manifests] the miracle of [teaching] a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, one eradicates all taints and attains the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and dwells knowing by oneself, awakening by oneself, realizing by oneself: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence,” knowing it as it really is. The renunciant Gotama tells others, those others tell others, and so on in turn to countless hundreds and thousands [of others]. Gotama, for this reason, in relation to these three miracles, I praise the renunciant Gotama.

Then the World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, you have penetrated this discussion well.<sup>116</sup> Why is that? I have great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great divine might. My mind has mastery of supernormal powers . . . up to . . . with my body I reach the Brahmā world.

Young brahmin, I divine the minds of others on the basis of their outward appearance . . . up to . . . I divine their mind states and their mind objects.

Young brahmin, I have myself walked a path, a track such that, having walked this path, having walked this track, I eradicated all taints and attained the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, and I dwell having known by myself, having awakened by myself, having realized by myself: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence,” knowing it as it really is.

I tell others, those others tell others, and so on in turn to countless hundreds and thousands [of others].

Young brahmin, for this reason you have penetrated this discussion well. You should receive it well like this and keep it well in mind. Why is that? The meaning of what has been said is just like this.

652a

Then the young brahmin Saṅgārava said:

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until life ends, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the young brahmin Saṅgārava, Venerable Ānanda, and the [other] monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

144. The Discourse to Gaṇaka Moggallāna<sup>117</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattṥī, in the Eastern Park, the Hall of Migāra’s Mother.

At that time the brahmin Gaṇaka Moggallāna, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha and exchanged friendly greetings. He stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Gotama, I would like to ask a question. Will you listen if I venture to express it?”

The World-honored One said, “Moggallāna, feel free to ask. Let no doubt trouble you.”

Then Gaṇaka Moggallāna asked:

Gotama, this Hall of Migāra's Mother was constructed gradually, by stages, until it reached completion. Gotama, within this Hall of Migāra's Mother one ascends by the ladders first to the first level, and after that to the second, third, and fourth levels. Gotama, in this way one ascends gradually within the Hall of Migāra's Mother.

Gotama, for elephant trainers there is a gradual training until completion, namely by means of the hook. Gotama, for horse trainers there is also a gradual training until completion, namely by means of the halter.<sup>118</sup> Gotama, for warriors there is also a gradual training until completion, namely by means of grasping bow and arrow. Gotama, for brahmins there is also a gradual training until completion, namely by means of learning the texts.

Gotama, in our learning of accountancy, in order to make a living by accounting, there is also a gradual training until completion. If we have an apprentice, whether male or female, we first teach him or her one one, two twos, three threes, [and so on to the] tens, hundreds, thousands, and ten thousands, gradually going upward. Gotama, thus in our learning of accountancy, in order to make a living by accounting, there is a gradual training until completion. Renunciant Gotama, in this Dharma and discipline [of yours], is there a gradual training until completion?

The Word-honored One said:

Moggallāna, rightly speaking, there is a gradual training until completion. Moggallāna, this is rightly said of my Dharma and discipline. Why is that? Moggallāna, in my Dharma and discipline there is a gradual training until completion.

652b Moggallāna, when a young monk first comes to train in the path, one who is just entering this Dharma and discipline, the Tathāgata first instructs him, "Come, monk, with your body guard the purity of your livelihood, with your speech . . . with your mind guard the purity of your livelihood."<sup>119</sup>

Moggallāna, suppose a monk guards the purity of his livelihood with the body, guards the purity of his livelihood with speech . . . and mind.

Then the Tathāgata instructs him further, "Come, monk, contemplate the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplate feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas."

Moggallāna, suppose a monk contemplates the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas.

Then the Tathāgata instructs him further, “Come, monk, contemplate the body as a body internally and do not think thoughts related to sensuality . . . up to . . . contemplate feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas and do not think thoughts that are not in accordance with the Dharma.”

Moggallāna, suppose a monk contemplates the body as a body internally and does not think thoughts related to sensuality . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas and does not think thoughts that are not in accordance with the Dharma.

Then the Tathāgata instructs him further, “Come, monk, guard the sense faculties, always being mindful of stopping thoughts of sensuality with clear understanding. Successfully guard the mind through mindfulness, constantly arousing right comprehension. On seeing a form with the eye, do not cling to its appearance; do not savor the form. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, guard the eye faculty so that no covetousness or sorrow, evil and unwholesome states, arise in the mind. For progress in that, guard the eye faculty. In the same way, [on hearing a sound] with the ear . . . [smelling an odor] with the nose . . . [tasting a flavor] with the tongue . . . [experiencing a tangible] with the body . . . coming to know a mental object with the mind, do not cling to its appearance, do not savor the mental object. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, guard the mind faculty so that no covetousness or sorrow, evil and unwholesome states, arise in the mind. For progress in that, guard the mind faculty.”<sup>120</sup>

Moggallāna, suppose a monk guards the sense faculties and is always mindful of stopping thoughts of sensuality with clear understanding; he successfully guards the mind through mindfulness, constantly arousing right comprehension; on seeing a form with the eye, he does not cling to its appearance, does not savor the form; that is to say, for the sake of restraint, he guards the eye faculty so that no covetousness or sorrow, evil and unwholesome states, arise in the mind; for progress in that, he guards the eye faculty; in the same way, on [hearing a sound] with the ear . . . [smelling an odor] with the nose . . . [tasting a flavor] with the tongue . . .

[experiencing a tangible] with the body . . . coming to know a mental object with the mind, he does not cling to its appearance, does not savor the mental object; that is to say, for the sake of restraint, he guards the mind faculty so that no covetousness or sorrow, evil and unwholesome states, arise in the mind; in order to progress in that, he guards the mind faculty.

Then the Tathāgata instructs him further, “Come, monk, have right comprehension when going out or coming in, contemplate and distinguish well when bending or stretching [the limbs], when lowering or raising [the head]; with orderly manners and appearance, carry properly the outer robe, the other robes, and the bowl; when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, when going to sleep or waking up, when speaking or keeping silent, always have right comprehension.”<sup>121</sup> 652c Moggallāna, suppose a monk has right comprehension when going out or coming in, contemplates and distinguishes well when bending or stretching [the limbs], when lowering or raising [the head]; with orderly manners and appearance, he carries properly the outer robe, the other robes, and the bowl; when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, when going to sleep or waking up, when speaking or keeping silent, he always has right comprehension.

Then the Tathāgata instructs him further, “Come, monk, dwell alone in seclusion. Stay in a forest area or go to the base of a tree in an empty peaceful place, to a mountain cave, to a heap of straw in an open place, or go into a forest, or stay in a cemetery. Staying in a forest or having gone to the base of a tree in an empty peaceful place, you spread out the sitting mat and sit down cross-legged with body erect, with right mental aspiration and undivided mindfulness.

“Abandon and remove covetousness. With a mind free from agitation, on seeing others’ wealth and requisites of life, do not give rise to covetousness, wishing, ‘May I get it!’ Purify your mind of covetousness. In the same way abandon ill will . . . sloth-and-torpor . . . restlessness-and-worry . . . abandon doubt, transcend uncertainty, become free from vacillation in regard to wholesome states. Purify your mind of doubt.

“Abandon these five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom. Secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . dwell having attained the fourth absorption.”

Moggallāna, suppose that a monk, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the fourth absorption. Moggallāna, [in this way] the Tathāgata is of much benefit to new monks, by instructing and teaching them.

Moggallāna, if there are monks who are elders, highly regarded, seasoned practitioners of the holy life, then the Tathāgata teaches them further, namely regarding final knowledge, the complete and total eradication of the taints.

Gaṇaka Moggallāna asked again:

Renunciant Gotama, do all disciples, on being instructed like this and taught like this, completely attain final knowledge, certainly [attaining] nirvana?

The World-honored One replied, “Moggallāna, not all attain it. Some attain it, some do not attain it.”

Gaṇaka Moggallāna asked again:

Gotama, what is the cause here, what is the reason why, [although] there is nirvana, and there is the path to nirvana, and the renunciant Gotama is at present the guiding teacher, yet some monks, being instructed like this, taught like this, attain final knowledge, nirvana, and some do not attain it?

The World-honored One replied:

Moggallāna, I will ask you in return. Answer according to your understanding. Moggallāna, what do you think? Do you know the location of the city of Rājagaha and are you well acquainted with the road to it?

Gaṇaka Moggallāna replied, “Indeed, I know the location of the city of Rājagaha and I am well acquainted with the road to it.”

The World-honored One asked:

Moggallāna, suppose that someone comes by wishing to visit the king, to reach the city of Rājagaha. That person asks you, “I wish to visit the king and reach Rājagaha. Gaṇaka Moggallāna, do you know the location of the city of Rājagaha? Are you well acquainted with the road to it? Can you show it to me and explain it?”

653a

You tell that person, “From here go to the east until you reach a certain village; going on from that village, you will reach a certain town; continuing in this way you will reach the city of Rājagaha. On the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha there are beautiful parks on level ground, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs. All of these you will see and recognize.”

Having heard your words and received your instructions, [this person] heads east from here and soon, before long, leaves the correct road and follows a wrong road heading in the opposite direction. The beautiful parks on level ground on the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs—all of these [the person] does not see, does not recognize.

Someone else comes by wishing to visit the king, to reach the city of Rājagaha, and that person asks you, “I wish to visit the king and reach Rājagaha. Gaṇaka Moggallāna, do you know the location of the city of Rājagaha? Are you well acquainted with the road to it? Can you show it to me and explain it?”

You tell that person, “From here go to the east until you reach a certain village; going on from that village, you will reach a certain town; continuing in this way you will reach the city of Rājagaha. On the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha there are beautiful parks on level ground, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs. All of these you will see and recognize.”

Having heard your words and received your instructions, [the person] heads east from here until they reach that village, from that village they go until they reach the town, and so on in this way until they reach the city of Rājagaha. The beautiful parks on level ground on the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs—all of these they see and recognize.

Moggallāna, what is the cause here, what is the reason why, [given that] there is that city of Rājagaha, there is the road to the city of Rājagaha, and you are at present the guiding teacher, yet the first person following the instructions they received from you, left the correct road before long and followed a wrong road in the opposite direction, and did not at all get to see and recognize the beautiful parks on level ground on the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs?

[And what is the cause here, what is the reason why] the second person, following the instructions they received from you, following the correct level road and so on, was able to reach the city of Rājagaha, and got to see and recognize the beautiful parks on level ground on the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs?

Gaṇaka Moggallāna replied:

Gotama, it has nothing at all to do with me. There is the city of Rājagaha, there is the road to the city of Rājagaha, and I am at present the guiding teacher. That first person did not follow my instructions. Before long they left the correct road and followed a wrong road in the opposite direction; [consequently] they did not at all get to see and recognize the beautiful parks on level ground on the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs.<sup>122</sup> 653b

That second person followed the instructions they received from me, following the right level road and so on they were able to reach the city of Rājagaha, and they got to see and recognize all the beautiful parks on level ground on the outskirts of the city of Rājagaha, with watchtowers and bathing places, with various kinds of flowering trees, located between flowing rivers and clear springs.

The World-honored One said:

In the same way, Moggallāna, it also has nothing to do with me. There is nirvana, there is the path to nirvana, I am the guiding teacher, yet some monks, being instructed like this, taught like this, attain final knowledge, nirvana, and some do not attain it. Moggallāna, each monk follows the practice by themselves. At that time the World-honored One has merely declared that practice, namely [what leads to] complete eradication of the taints.

Gaṇaka Moggallāna said:

Gotama, I have understood. Gotama, I have comprehended. Gotama, it is just as if there were a grove of sāla trees growing on good ground and in it there was a guardian of the sāla tree grove, who is intelligent, healthy, and not lazy. At appropriate times [the guardian] digs around the roots of the sāla trees with a hoe, making the ground level. [The guardian] puts down fertilizer and waters the trees, never missing the time for it. If bad weeds grow beside the trees, [the guardian] pulls them all out and discards them.

If there are [trees] that are growing sideways or crookedly, ones that are not growing straight, [the guardian] prunes and trains them all. If there are straight and very beautiful trees among them, [the guardian] nourishes and protects them, according to the season, hoeing, fertilizing, and watering them, without missing the time for it. In this way the sāla tree grove on good ground flourishes and becomes beautiful.<sup>123</sup>

Gotama, in the same way there are persons who are hypocritical and deceitful, completely lacking in generosity, without faith, lazy, without mindfulness, without concentration, stupid, crazy-minded, with their faculties in disorder, lax in adhering to the precepts, who do not extensively cultivate [the way of] the renunciant. Gotama, with such persons it is not possible to work. Why is that? Gotama, such persons defile the holy life.

Gotama, again there are persons who are not hypocritical and not deceitful, who have generosity and faith, who are energetic and not lazy, who have mindfulness, have concentration, and have wisdom, who respect the precepts to the utmost and extensively cultivate [the way of] the renunciant. Gotama, with such persons it is possible to work. Why is that? Gotama, such persons maintain the purity of the holy life.

Gotama, it is just as aloe root is foremost among fragrant roots. Why is that? Gotama, it is because aloe root is supreme among fragrant roots.

Gotama, it is just as red sandalwood is foremost among fragrant sāla trees. Why is that? Gotama, it is because red sandalwood is supreme among fragrant sāla trees.

653c

Gotama, it is just as the blue lotus is foremost among all flowers that grow in water. Why is that? Gotama, it is because the blue lotus is supreme among all flowers that grow in water.

Gotama, it is just as jasmine is foremost among all flowers that grow on land. Why is that? Gotama, it is because jasmine is supreme among all flowers that grow on land.<sup>124</sup>

Gotama, it is just as the renunciant Gotama is foremost among teachers in the world. Why is that? It is because the renunciant Gotama is able to outdo in debate all practitioners of heterodox teachings. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until life ends as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Gaṇaka Moggallāna and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

145. The Discourse to Gopaka Moggallāna<sup>125</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time, not long after the Buddha had attained final nirvana, Venerable Ānanda was staying at Rājagaha.

At that time Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, was governing the city of Rājagaha, guarding it against the Vajjis.<sup>126</sup> Then Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, had assigned Gopaka Moggallāna, the field watchman, to [watch over] the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary.

At that time, when the night was over, at dawn, Venerable Ānanda put on his [outer] robe and took his bowl, wishing to enter Rājagaha to beg for almsfood.<sup>127</sup> Venerable Ānanda thought, "For the time being, never mind about begging for almsfood in Rājagaha. Let me instead approach Gopaka Moggallāna, the field watchman." Then Venerable Ānanda approached Gopaka Moggallāna, the field watchman.

654a

On seeing Venerable Ānanda coming in the distance, the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna rose from his seat, arranged his clothes so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward Venerable Ānanda, and said, "Welcome, Ānanda. For a long time you have not come here. Please sit on this seat." Venerable Ānanda sat on that seat.

The brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna exchanged polite greetings with Venerable Ānanda, stepped back, and sat to one side. He said, “Ānanda, I would like to ask something. Will you listen to my question?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “Moggallāna, you may ask it. On hearing it, I will consider it.”

Then [Gopaka Moggallāna] asked, “Ānanda, is there any monk who is the equal of the renunciant Gotama?”<sup>128</sup>

Just when Venerable Ānanda and the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna were discussing this matter together, Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, [wishing] to encourage his field watchmen in their work, approached Gopaka Moggallāna, the field watchman. Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, saw in the distance Venerable Ānanda sitting with the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna, the field watchman. He approached Venerable Ānanda, exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side. He asked, “Ānanda, what matter have you been discussing with the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna? For what matter have you [two] come together here?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “Vassakāra, the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna asked me, ‘Ānanda, is there any monk who is the equal of the renunciant Gotama?’”

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, asked further, “Ānanda, how did you reply to him?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “Vassakāra, there is no monk at all who is the equal of the World-honored One.”

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, asked further:

Yes indeed, Ānanda, there is no monk who is the equal of the World-honored One. Is there a monk who was appointed by the renunciant Gotama when he was alive [thus]: “After my final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,” so that you now take refuge in him?

Venerable Ānanda replied:

Vassakāra, there is no monk at all who was appointed by the World-honored One, who knows and sees, the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, when he was alive [thus]: “After my final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,” so that we now take refuge in him.

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, asked further:

Yes, indeed, Ānanda, there is no monk who is the equal of the World-honored One; and there is also no monk who was appointed by the renunciant Gotama when he was alive [thus]: “After my final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,” so that you now take refuge in him. Is there, however, a monk who is honored by the assembly of the Sangha [thus]: “After the World-honored One’s final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,” so that you now take refuge in him? 654b

Venerable Ānanda replied:

Vassakāra, there is no monk who is honored by the assembly of the Sangha [thus]: “After the World-honored One’s final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,” so that we now take refuge in him.

Vassakāra, the great minister of Magadha, asked further:

Yes indeed, Ānanda, there is no monk who is the equal of the World-honored One; and there is also no monk who was appointed by the renunciant Gotama when he was alive [thus]: “After my final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,” so that you now take refuge in him; and there is also no monk who is honored by the assembly of the Sangha [thus]: “After the World-honored One’s final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,” so that you now take refuge in him.

In that case, Ānanda, are you without a refuge [to ensure] communal harmony, freedom from quarrel, peace, unity in a single teaching, blending like water and milk, joyfully associating in practice, just as when the renunciant Gotama was alive?

Venerable Ānanda replied, “Vassakāra, do not speak like this, saying that we have no refuge. Why is that? We do indeed have a refuge.”

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, said:

Ānanda, what you said earlier does not match what you have said later. Until just now Ānanda said this, “There is no monk who is the equal of the World-honored One; and there is also no monk whom the World-honored One, who knows and sees, the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, appointed when he was alive [thus]: ‘After my final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,’ so that we now take refuge in him; and there is also no monk who is honored by the assembly of the Sangha [thus]: ‘After the World-honored One’s final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,’ so that we now take refuge in him.” Ānanda, what is the cause and condition that you now say, “We do have a refuge”?”

Venerable Ānanda replied:

Vassakāra, we do not take refuge in a person; we take refuge in the Dharma. Vassakāra, if some of us are dwelling in reliance on a village or town, then on the fifteenth day, at the time for reciting the code of rules, we gather and sit in <one> place.<sup>129</sup> If there is a certain monk who is knowledgeable in the Dharma, we invite that monk to teach us the Dharma.<sup>130</sup> If that sangha is pure, we all rejoice together and respectfully receive the teachings of that monk. If there is an impure person in the sangha, we instruct [the person] in accordance with what is set forth in the Dharma.

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, said:

654c So, Ānanda, the instruction [to the impure monk] is given not by you, but rather by the Dharma. In this way, Ānanda, with little or much of the Dharma you can continue to exist for a long time. In this way, Ānanda, you are in communal harmony, free of quarrel, at peace, at unity in a single teaching, blending like water and milk, joyfully associating in practice, just as when the renunciant Gotama was alive.

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, asked further, “Ānanda, is there someone that you [monks] respect?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “Vassakāra, there is someone that we respect.” Vassakāra said:

Ānanda, what you said earlier does not match what you have said later. Until just now Ānanda said this, “There is no monk who is the equal of the World-honored One; and there is also no monk whom the World-honored One, who knows and sees, the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, appointed when he was alive [thus]: ‘After my final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,’ so that we now take refuge in him; and there is also no monk who was honored by an assembly of the Sangha [thus]: ‘After the World-honored One’s final nirvana, this monk should be the refuge of all the monks,’ so that we now take refuge in him.” Ānanda, what is the cause, what is the reason why you now say: “There is someone that we respect”?”

Venerable Ānanda replied:

Vassakāra, the World-honored One, who knows and sees, the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, taught us ten principles of respect. If we see these ten principles in a monk, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

What are the ten? Vassakāra, a monk cultivates morality and guards [against breaking] the code of rules, adopts proper conduct and manners, always dreading the slightest fault; he upholds the training in the precepts. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior practice of higher morality, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

Again, Vassakāra, a monk is widely trained in having learned much, keeping it in mind, and not forgetting it. He has accumulated wide learning of that which is called the Dharma, which is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and revealing the holy life. Thus he is widely trained in all [aspects] of the Dharma, has learnt much and has recited and reviewed it a thousand times, reflected on it, and contemplated it with clear vision and penetrative realization. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior learning, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.<sup>131</sup>

Again, Vassakāra, a monk acts as a good friend, acts as a good companion, acts as a good comrade. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior good friendship, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

Again, Vassakāra, a monk delights in dwelling in seclusion and is accomplished in the two types of seclusion, bodily and mental. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior delight in dwelling in seclusion, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

655a

Again, Vassakāra, a monk delights in sitting in meditation, properly practices inner tranquility, is never separated from application of the mind, is accomplished in insight and increasingly dwells in emptiness. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior delight in sitting in meditation, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

Again, Vassakāra, a monk is contented, taking robes [just] to cover the body, taking food [just] to sustain the physical body. Wherever he goes, he takes his robes and bowl with him, without concerns or longings, like a wild goose that flies through the air with [just] its two wings.<sup>132</sup> In these ways a monk is contented, taking robes [just] to cover the body, taking food [just] to sustain the physical body. Wherever he goes, he takes his robes and bowl with him, without concerns or longings. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior contentment, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

Again, Vassakāra, a monk continuously practices mindfulness, is accomplished in right mindfulness, always remembering, not forgetting, what was done long ago and what was heard long ago. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior possession of right mindfulness, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

Again, Vassakāra, a monk constantly and energetically practices to abandon evil and unwholesome [states] and to develop wholesome states, persistently arousing his mind, single-mindedly and steadfastly, for the sake of [developing] the roots of wholesomeness with relentless energy. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior diligence, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

Again, Vassakāra, a monk cultivates comprehension and wisdom. Observing the rise and fall of phenomena, he attains such comprehension, noble penetrative knowledge, and discriminative understanding as will truly put an end to dukkha. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk such superior wisdom, then we all revere him, respect him, support him, esteem and emulate him, and show high regard for that monk.

Again, Vassakāra, a monk has eradicated all taints and attained the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom. He dwells having known by himself, having awakened by himself, having realized by himself: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence,” knowing this as it really is. Vassakāra, if we see in a monk the eradication of the taints, then we all revere, respect, support, esteem and emulate, and show high regard for that monk.

Vassakāra, the World-honored One who knows and sees, the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, taught us these ten principles of respect. Vassakāra, if we see a monk practicing these ten principles, then we all revere, respect, support, esteem and emulate, and show high regard for that monk.

At this, the great assembly [of Vassakāra’s retainers] exclaimed loudly:

The straight path is to be developed, it is not to be left undeveloped! If someone develops the straight path, which is not to be left undeveloped, then they are following the arahants of the world who are revered, respected, supported, and highly regarded. Because you venerable ones are able to develop the straight path, which can be developed, therefore you are revered in the world as arahants, respected, supported, and highly regarded.<sup>133</sup> 655b

Then Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, and his retainers asked, “Ānanda, where are you dwelling now?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “I am now dwelling here at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary.”

[Vassakāra said]:

Ānanda, the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary, is delightful, well maintained, and pleasing.<sup>134</sup> It is free of noise during the day and quiet at night, free of mosquitos and gadflies, and also free of flies and fleas; it is neither [too] cold nor [too] hot. Ānanda, do you delight in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary?

Venerable Ānanda replied:

It is like this, Vassakāra; it is like this, Vassakāra. The Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary, is delightful, well maintained, and pleasing. It is free of noise during the day and quiet at night, free of mosquitos and gadflies, and also free of flies and fleas; it is neither [too] cold nor [too] hot. Vassakāra, I delight in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. Why is that? Because the World-honored One commended it.<sup>135</sup>

At that time the great general Upananda was among that gathering. Great General Upananda said:

It is like this, Vassakāra; it is like this, Vassakāra. The Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary is delightful, well maintained, and pleasing. It is free of noise during the day and quiet at night, free of mosquitos and gadflies, and also free of flies and fleas; it is neither [too] cold nor [too] hot. The venerable one delights in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. Why is that? Because this venerable one practices application of the mind, delights in application of the mind.<sup>136</sup>

Hearing this, Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, said:

Great General Upananda, in former times the renunciant Gotama was staying in the pleasure park of Kimbilā.<sup>137</sup> Great General Upananda, at that time I frequently went there to visit the renunciant Gotama. Why is that? [Because] the renunciant Gotama practiced application of the mind, delighted in application of the mind. He praised all application of the mind.

Hearing this, Venerable Ānanda said:

Vassakāra, do not say, "The renunciant Gotama praised all application of the mind." Why is that? [Because] the World-honored One praised some [kinds of] application of the mind but did not praise other [kinds of] application of the mind.<sup>138</sup>

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, asked further, "Ānanda, as to the application of the mind that the renunciant Gotama did not praise, what type of application of the mind did he not praise?"

Venerable Ānanda replied:

Vassakāra, suppose that someone is entangled in sensual desire and does not really know how to get out of that arisen sensual desire. Because of being obstructed by sensual desire, they apply their mind, increasingly apply their mind, repeatedly apply their mind. Vassakāra, this is the first [kind of] application of the mind that the World-honored One did not praise. 655c Again, Vassakāra, suppose that someone is entangled in ill will and does not really know how to get out of that arisen ill will. Because of being obstructed by ill will, they apply their mind, increasingly apply their mind, repeatedly apply their mind. Vassakāra, this is the second [kind of] application of the mind that the World-honored One did not praise.

Again, Vassakāra, suppose that someone is entangled in sloth-and-torpor and does not really know how to get out of that arisen sloth-and-torpor. Because of being obstructed by sloth-and-torpor, they apply their mind, increasingly apply their mind, repeatedly apply their mind. Vassakāra, this is the third [kind of] application of the mind that the World-honored One did not praise.

[Again, Vassakāra, suppose that someone is entangled in restlessness-and-worry and does not really know how to get out of that arisen restlessness-and-worry. Because of being obstructed by restlessness-and-worry, they apply their mind, increasingly apply their mind, repeatedly apply their mind. Vassakāra, this is the fourth kind of application of the mind that the World-honored One did not praise.]<sup>139</sup>

Again, Vassakāra, suppose that someone is entangled in doubt and does not really know how to get out of that arisen doubt. Because of being obstructed by doubt, they apply their mind, increasingly apply their mind, repeatedly apply their mind. Vassakāra, this is the <fifth><sup>140</sup> [kind of] application of the mind that the World-honored One did not praise. Vassakāra, the World-honored One did not praise these five kinds of] application of the mind.

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, said:

Ānanda, these <five> [kinds of] application of the mind are dislikable,<sup>141</sup> they are occasions for abhorrence. The renunciant Gotama did not praise them. Why is that? Because he was perfectly and completely awakened.

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, asked further, “Ānanda, what [kind of] application of the mind did the renunciant Gotama praise?”

Venerable Ānanda replied:

Vassakāra, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. Vassakāra, the World-honored One praised these four applications of the mind.

Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, said:

Ānanda, these four [kinds of] application of the mind are praiseworthy; they are occasions for praise. The renunciant Gotama praised them. Why is that? Because he was perfectly and completely awakened. Ānanda, I have numerous matters to attend to. I ask leave to return.

Venerable Ānanda said, “[If] you wish to return, do as you wish.”

Then Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, having heard what Venerable Ānanda had said, received it well and kept it well in mind. He rose from his seat, circumambulated Venerable Ānanda three times, and left.

Then, soon after Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, had left, the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna said, “Ānanda, [I assume] you will not be answering at all the question I asked [earlier].”

Venerable Ānanda said, “That is so, Moggallāna. I will not be answering it [since I answered the same question asked by Vassakāra].”<sup>142</sup>

The brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna said, “Ānanda, I have another question. Will you listen to my question?”

Venerable Ānanda replied, “Moggallāna, you may ask. On hearing it, I will consider it.”

The brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna asked:

656a Ānanda, what is the difference between the liberation of the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, and the liberation of an arahant who is liberated by wisdom? Which of these two liberations is superior?<sup>143</sup>

Venerable Ānanda replied:

Moggallāna, there is no difference between the liberation of the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, and the liberation of an arahant who is liberated by wisdom. Neither of these two liberations is superior.

The brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna said, “Ānanda, please take your meal here!” Venerable Ānanda accepted by remaining silent.

Knowing that [Ānanda] had accepted by remaining silent, the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna rose from his seat and personally brought water for washing [of hands], and personally offered various kinds of fine dishes, delicious, plentiful, and easy to digest, making sure that [Ānanda] was satisfied. After the meal, he gathered up the utensils, again brought water for washing, and then seated himself on a small seat to one side to listen to the Dharma. Venerable Ānanda expounded the Dharma to him, exhorting and inspiring him, fully delighting him by teaching him the Dharma with countless skillful means.

Thus said Venerable Ānanda. Having been exhorted, inspired, and fully delighted, Vassakāra, the chief minister of Magadha, his retainers, and the brahmin Gopaka Moggallāna were delighted on having heard what Venerable Ānanda had said and received it respectfully.

146. The Discourse on the Simile of the Elephant's Footprint<sup>144</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the heterodox practitioner Pilotika had gone out of Sāvattthī at dawn and approached the Buddha.<sup>145</sup> He paid homage by bowing his head, stepped back, and sat to one side. The Buddha expounded the Dharma to him, exhorting and inspiring him, fully delighting him by teaching him the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired him, fully delighting him, he remained silent. The heterodox practitioner Pilotika, having been taught the Dharma by the Buddha, having been exhorted, encouraged, and delighted, rose from his seat, paid homage by bowing his head to the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

At that time the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, driving a very beautiful white chariot and in the company of five hundred disciples, had gone out of Sāvattthī at dawn and was approaching a forest area with the wish of instructing his disciples in recitation of the sacred texts.<sup>146</sup> The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi saw the heterodox practitioner Pilotika coming in the distance. He asked him, "Vacchāyana, having risen so early, where are you coming from?"

The heterodox practitioner Pilotika replied, "Brahmin, I come from visiting the World-honored One, having paid my respects and offered my support."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked, “Vacchāyana, do you know about the knowledge and wisdom learned by the renunciant Gotama in empty and quiet places?”

The heterodox practitioner Pilotika replied:

656b      Brahmin, what kind of person could know about the knowledge and wisdom learned by the World-honored One in empty and quiet places? Brahmin, to know about the knowledge and wisdom learned by the World-honored One in empty and quiet places, one would [have to] be like him. However, brahmin, there are four principles of reason in the sacred texts that we recite.<sup>147</sup> On the basis of these four principles of reason I have firm confidence that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the disciples of the Tathāgata progresses rightly.

Brahmin, it is just as a skilled elephant trainer might, while walking in a forest area, see among the trees of the forest a large elephant footprint and, on seeing it, have firm confidence that this footprint belongs to a very big [male] elephant. Brahmin, for me it is the same. There are four principles of reason in the sacred texts that we recite. On the basis of these four principles of reason I have firm confidence that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata’s disciples progresses rightly.

What are the four principles of reason? Brahmin, there are learned and wise members of the warrior caste, debaters who have wide learning and determination, who are able to defeat people [in debate], know-it-alls who compose treatises on their various views and promote them among the populace. They think, “We will approach the renunciant Gotama and ask him about such-and-such a matter. If he is able to reply, we will keep on questioning him further. If he is unable to reply, he will be defeated and we will give up and leave.” Hearing that the World-honored One is dwelling in a certain village or town, they approach him. [However,] on seeing the World-honored One, they do not even dare to question him, let alone have the ability to defeat him.<sup>148</sup>

In this way, brahmin, using the first principle of reason from the texts that we recite, on the basis of this reason, I have firm confidence that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.<sup>149</sup>

In the same way, brahmin, there are learned and wise brahmins . . . learned and wise householders . . . learned and wise renunciants, debaters who have wide learning and determination, who are able to defeat ordinary people [in debate], know-it-alls who compose treatises on their various views and promote them among the populace. They think, "We will approach the renunciant Gotama and ask him about such-and-such a matter. If he is able to reply, we will keep on questioning him further. If he is unable to reply, he will be defeated and we will leave." Hearing that the World-honored One is dwelling in a certain village or town, they approach him. [However,] on seeing the World-honored One, they do not even dare to question him, let alone have the ability to defeat him.

In this way, brahmin, using the fourth principle of reason from the texts that we recite, on the basis of this reason, I have firm confidence that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.

In this way, brahmin, there are these four principles of reason in the sacred texts that we recite. On the basis of these four principles of reason, I have firm confidence that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi said:

Vacchāyana, you greatly support the renunciant Gotama. With cause and with reason you are delighted and have respectfully received [his teachings].” 656c

The heterodox practitioner Pilotika replied:

It is like this, brahmin; it is like this. I support that World-honored One to the utmost and praise him to the utmost. The entire world should also support him.

Then the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, having heard these reasons, descended from his chariot, knelt with his right knee on the ground, extended his hands with joined palms in the direction of Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park, and paid homage three times: "Homage to the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened!" Having done this three times, he returned to mount his very beautiful white chariot and approached Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park. Having reached that destination, he descended from the chariot and approached the Buddha on foot. He exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi told the Buddha the entire conversation he had had with the heterodox practitioner Pilotika. Having heard it, the World-honored One said:

Brahmin, the simile of the elephant's footprint spoken by the heterodox practitioner Pilotika is not well composed and not complete. I will now tell you the simile of the elephant's footprint that is well composed and complete. Listen carefully!

Brahmin, it is just as a skilled elephant trainer might, while walking in a forest area, see among the trees of the forest a large elephant footprint. On seeing it, he should have confidence that this footprint belongs to a very big [male] elephant. [But,] brahmin, that skilled elephant trainer may lack such confidence, [thinking,] "In this forest there are also female elephants called kaṇerukā whose bodies are very large. They [too] leave such a footprint."

Then he searches for [more] such footprints and again sees a large elephant footprint. On seeing it, he should have confidence that this footprint belongs to a very big [male] elephant. [But,] brahmin, that skilled elephant trainer may still lack such confidence, [thinking,] "In this forest there are also female elephants called kāḷārikā whose bodies are very large. They [too] leave such a footprint."

Then he searches for [more] such footprints and again sees a large elephant footprint. On seeing it, he should have confidence that this footprint belongs to a very big [male] elephant. [But,] brahmin, that skilled elephant trainer may still lack such confidence, [thinking,] "In this forest there are also female elephants called vāmanikā whose bodies are very large. They [too] leave such a footprint."

Then he searches for [more] such footprints and again sees a large elephant footprint. On seeing it, he has firm confidence that this footprint belongs to a very big [male] elephant. Having searched for footprints and seen large elephant footprints, [he thinks,] “Only a big [male] elephant has a footprint so very long and broad, with its entire circumference clearly marked, squarely and deeply impressed in the ground.”

Also, he sees the elephant [itself], coming and going, standing still and walking, standing upright and lying down. Having seen that elephant [itself], he thinks, “If there is such a footprint, it must be [of this] big elephant.”

In the same way, brahmin, there appears in the world a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, knower of the world, unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one. In this world with its devas and māras, Brahmas, renunciants, and brahmins . . . up to . . . devas and human beings he dwells having known by himself, having awakened by himself, having realized by himself. He knows as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

657a

He teaches the Dharma, which is excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle, and excellent in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and he reveals the holy life. Having heard him teach the Dharma, a householder or a householder’s son gains confidence. Having gained confidence in the true Dharma and discipline of the Tathāgata, he reflects, “The household life is confined, a dusty place; going forth to train in the path is [like] emerging into a vast open space. Now for me at home, fettered with [such] fetters, it is not possible to devote my life completely to the practice of the holy life in purity. Let me forsake my wealth, little or much, forsake my relatives, few or many, shave off beard and hair, don the yellow robe and, out of faith, leave the home life and become homeless to train in the path.”

At a later time he forsakes his wealth, little or much, forsakes his relatives, few or many, shaves off beard and hair, dons the yellow robe and, out of faith, leaves the home life and becomes homeless to train in the path. Having gone forth to train in the path, having forsaken the characteristics of family life, he receives the training of monkhood. He observes the training in the precepts, guards [against breaking] the code of rules. He also carefully maintains proper conduct and etiquette, always dreading the slightest fault, upholding the training in the precepts.

He abstains from killing, having abandoned killing. He has discarded sword and club, has a sense of shame and scruple, and a mind of loving-kindness and compassion, [wishing to] benefit all [beings], even including insects. He purifies his mind with regard to killing living beings.

He abstains from taking what is not given, having abandoned taking what is not given. He takes [only] what is given, delighting in taking [only] what is given. He always likes to give generously, rejoicing in non-stinginess and not expecting any reward. He purifies his mind with regard to taking what is not given.

He abstains from sexual activity, having abandoned sexual activity. He diligently cultivates the practice of celibacy, is energetic in [maintaining this] immaculate conduct, pure, without defilement, free from sensuality, having abandoned sensual passion. He purifies his mind with regard to sexual activity.

He abstains from false speech, having abandoned false speech. He speaks the truth, delighting in the truth, unshakably established in the truth, completely trustworthy, not deceiving [anyone in] the world. He purifies his mind with regard to false speech.

He abstains from divisive speech, having abandoned divisive speech. He does not engage in speech that is divisive, that would harm others. Hearing something from this person, he does not tell it to that person in order to harm this person; hearing something from that person, he does not tell it to this person in order to harm that person. He wishes to unite those who are divided, delighting in their unity. He does not create factions, does not delight in factions or praise factions. He purifies his mind with regard to divisive speech.

He abstains from harsh speech, having abandoned harsh speech. Whatever speech there is that is rough and rude in tone, that sounds offensive and grates on the ear, that people neither enjoy nor desire, that causes others suffering and vexation, and that does not lead to calmness—such speech he has abandoned. Whatever speech there is that is pure, peaceful, and gentle, that is pleasant to the ear and [easily] enters the mind, that is enjoyable and desirable, that gives others happiness, speech endowed with meaning, that does not make others afraid and that leads to calmness in others—such speech he speaks. He purifies his mind with regard to harsh speech.

657b

He abstains from frivolous speech, having abandoned frivolous speech. He speaks at the [proper] time, speaks what is true, what is Dharma, what is meaningful, what is peaceful. Delighting in speech that is peaceful in all matters at the proper time and in the proper way, he teaches well and admonishes well. He purifies his mind with regard to frivolous speech.

He abstains from earning profits, having abandoned earning profits. He has discarded weights and measures and does not accept goods [on commission], he does not bind people [with debts], does not try to cheat with measures, nor does he deceive others for the sake of some small profit. He purifies his mind with regard to earning profits.

He abstains from accepting widows or girls, having abandoned accepting widows or girls. He purifies his mind with regard to accepting widows or girls.

He abstains from accepting male or female slaves, having abandoned accepting male or female slaves. He purifies his mind with regard to accepting male or female slaves.

He abstains from accepting elephants, horses, cattle, or sheep, having abandoned accepting elephants, horses, cattle, or sheep. He purifies his mind with regard to accepting elephants, horses, cattle, or sheep.

He abstains from accepting chickens or swine, having abandoned accepting chickens or swine. He purifies his mind with regard to accepting chickens or swine.

He abstains from accepting farmlands or marketplaces, having abandoned accepting farmlands or marketplaces. He purifies his mind with regard to accepting farmlands or marketplaces.

He abstains from accepting uncooked rice, wheat, or legumes, having abandoned accepting uncooked rice, wheat, or legumes. He purifies his mind with regard to accepting uncooked rice, wheat, or legumes.

He abstains from alcoholic beverages, having abandoned alcoholic beverages. He purifies his mind with regard to alcoholic beverages.<sup>150</sup>

He abstains from [reclining on] high and wide beds, having abandoned [reclining on] high and wide beds. He purifies his mind with regard to high and wide beds.

He abstains from [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics, having abandoned [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics. He purifies his mind with regard to flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics.

He abstains from singing, dancing, and acting, and from going to see or hear them; he has abandoned singing, dancing, and acting, and [abandoned] going to see or hear them. He purifies his mind with regard to singing, dancing, and acting, and [with regard to] going to see or hear them.

He abstains from accepting gold and silver, having abandoned accepting gold and silver. He purifies his mind with regard to accepting gold and silver.

He abstains from eating after noon, having abandoned eating after noon. He takes a single meal [per day], not eating at night, training in eating [only] at the [proper] time. He purifies his mind with regard to eating after noon.<sup>151</sup> 657c Having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue, he further practices supreme contentment, taking robes [just] to cover his body, taking food [just] to sustain his physical body. Wherever he goes, he takes [just] robes and bowl with him, without concerns or longings, just as a wild goose flies through the air with [just] its two wings.

Having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue and this supreme contentment, he further practices guarding the sense faculties. Always mindful of blocking thoughts of desire, with clear understanding, successfully guarding the mind through mindfulness, he constantly arouses right comprehension. On seeing a form with the eye, he does not grasp at its appearance, nor does he savor the form. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, he guards the eye faculty. In order that no covetousness or sorrow, evil and unwholesome states, will arise in the mind, to that end he guards the eye faculty.

In the same way, on [hearing a sound] with the ear . . . [smelling an odor] with the nose . . . [tasting a flavor] with the tongue . . . [experiencing a tangible] with the body . . . cognizing a mental object with the mind, he does not grasp at its appearance, nor does he savor the mental object. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, he guards the mind faculty. In order that no covetousness or sorrow, evil and unwholesome states, will arise in the mind, to that end he guards the mind faculty.

Having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue, this supreme contentment, and this guarding of the sense faculties, he further [practices] right comprehension when going out or coming in, observing and distinguishing well when bending or stretching [his limbs], when lowering or raising [his head], [all] with orderly manners and appearance; he behaves properly in wearing the outer robe and the other robes, and [in holding] the bowl; when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, when going to sleep or waking up, when speaking or keeping silent, he always has right comprehension.

Having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue, this supreme contentment, this guarding of the sense faculties, and this right comprehension when going out or coming in, he further dwells alone and in seclusion. He stays in a forest area, or at the base of a tree in an empty peaceful place, in a mountain cave, on a heap of straw in an open place, in the midst of a forest, or in a cemetery.

Staying in a forest, or having gone to the base of a tree in an empty peaceful place, he spreads out his sitting mat and sits down cross-legged with body erect. With right mental aspiration and undivided mindfulness, he abandons and removes covetousness. With the mind free of agitation on seeing others' wealth and requisites of life, he does not give rise to covetousness by wishing, "May I get it!" He purifies his mind with regard to covetousness.

In the same way he abandons ill will . . . sloth-and-torpor . . . restlessness-and-worry . . . and he abandons doubt, transcends uncertainty, becomes free from vacillation with regard to wholesome states. He purifies his mind with regard to doubt.

Having abandoned these five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, he enters and abides in the first absorption, which is accompanied by [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of separation.

Brahmin, this is something the Tathāgata excels in,<sup>152</sup> something practiced by the Tathāgata, something the Tathāgata is [well] accustomed to.<sup>153</sup> Yet, [the monk] does not for this reason conclude that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.

With the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, he dwells having attained the second absorption, which is without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation and with rapture and happiness born of concentration.

Brahmin, this is something the Tathāgata excels in, something practiced by the Tathāgata, something the Tathāgata is [well] accustomed to. Yet, [the monk] does not for this reason conclude that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.

658a

Secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling with equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, he dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

Brahmin, this is something the Tathāgata excels in, something practiced by the Tathāgata, something the Tathāgata is [well] accustomed to. Yet, [the monk] does not for this reason conclude that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.

With the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of joy and displeasure, with neither pain nor pleasure, and with purity of mindfulness and equanimity, he dwells having attained the fourth absorption.

Brahmin, this is something the Tathāgata excels in, something practiced by the Tathāgata, something the Tathāgata is [well] accustomed to. Yet, [the monk] does not for that reason conclude that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.

With his mind concentrated and purified in this way, free of defilements, free of troubles, malleable, well steadied, having gained imperturbability, he directs his mind toward knowledge and realization of the destruction of the taints.<sup>154</sup>

He knows as it really is: "This is dukkha." He knows [as it really is]: "This is the arising of dukkha." He knows [as it really is]: "This is the cessation of dukkha." He knows as it really is: "This is the path to the cessation of dukkha."

He knows as it really is: "These are the taints." He knows [as it really is]: "This is the arising of the taints." He knows [as it really is]: "This is the cessation of the taints." He knows as it really is: "This is the path to the cessation of the taints."

Knowing like this, seeing like this, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire . . . from the taint of existence, and his mind is liberated from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, he knows it is liberated, knowing as it really is: "Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done. There will not be another experiencing of existence."

Brahmin, this is something the Tathāgata excels in, something practiced by the Tathāgata, something the Tathāgata is [well] accustomed to. For this reason [the monk] concludes that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened; that the Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; and that the noble Sangha of the Tathāgata's disciples progresses rightly.

Brahmin, what do you think? Done in this way, is the simile of the elephant's footprint well composed and complete?

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi replied, "Yes indeed, Gotama. Done in this way, the simile of the elephant's footprint is well composed and complete."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi said:

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.<sup>155</sup>

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi and the heterodox practitioner Pilotika were delighted and received it respectfully.

147. The Discourse on the Virtues of Learning

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha. He exchanged friendly greetings, stepped back, sat to one side, and said, "Gotama, I would like to ask a question. Will you listen if I venture to express it?"

The World-honored One said, "Brahmin, feel free to ask."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi then asked:

Among the disciples of the renunciant Gotama there are those who live at home and those who have gone forth to train in the path. For what purpose do they recite and practice what they have widely heard [of the Dharma]?

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, my disciples, who live at home or who have gone forth to train in the path, recite and practice what they have widely heard because they wish to tame themselves, they wish to calm themselves, they seek final extinction for themselves. Brahmin, for these reasons my disciples, who live at home or who have gone forth to train in the path, recite and practice what they have widely heard.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, "Gotama, is it a distinction to recite and practice what one has widely heard? Is it a virtue to recite and practice what one has widely heard?"

The World-honored One replied, "Brahmin, it is a distinction to recite and practice what one has widely heard. It is a virtue to recite and practice what one has widely heard."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked again, “Gotama, what is the distinction, what is the virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard?”

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, a learned noble disciple works all day wishing to gain profit; [then] the work he has done comes to ruin and is unsuccessful. Although his work has come to ruin and is unsuccessful, he is not worried, vexed, and aggrieved; he does not beat his breast in distress; he does not become deranged.

Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple, who works all day wishing to gain profit and whose work comes to ruin and is unsuccessful, is not worried, vexed, and aggrieved when his work comes to ruin and is unsuccessful, that he does not beat his breast in distress and does not become deranged—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, the possessions for which a learned noble disciple has affection become otherwise, cease to exist, fall apart. Despite becoming separated from them, being no more associated with them, having to part with them, he is not worried, vexed, and aggrieved; he does not beat his breast in distress; he does not become deranged.

Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple is not worried, vexed, and aggrieved when possessions for which he has affection become otherwise, cease to exist, and fall apart, that despite becoming separated from them and being no more associated with them, he does not beat his breast in distress and does not become deranged—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, a learned noble disciple understands that all the wealth he owns is impermanent and he thinks of going forth to train in the path. Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple understands that all the wealth he owns is impermanent and thinks of going forth to train in the path—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

658c

Again, brahmin, a learned noble disciple, having understood that all the wealth he owns is impermanent, shaves off beard and hair, dons the yellow robe and, out of faith, leaves the home life and becomes homeless to train in the path. Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple who has understood that all the wealth he owns is impermanent, shaves off beard and hair, dons the yellow robe and, out of faith, leaves the home life, and becomes homeless to train in the path—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, a learned noble disciple is able to bear hunger and thirst, cold and heat, mosquitos and gadflies, flies and fleas, and oppression by wind or sun. He is also able to bear evil speech or being beaten with sticks, or to encounter with his body any kind of disease, so painful that one would wish to end one's life, or whatever [else] is undesirable—all of this he is able to endure.

Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple is able to bear hunger and thirst, cold and heat, mosquitos and gadflies, flies and fleas, and oppression by wind or sun; that he is also able to bear evil speech, or being beaten with sticks, or encountering with his body any kind of disease, so painful that one would wish to end one's life; that he is able to endure whatever is undesirable—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, a learned noble disciple tolerates dislike; if dislike arises, his mind never clings to it. Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple tolerates dislike; that if dislike arises, his mind never clings to it—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, a learned noble disciple tolerates fear; if fear arises, his mind never clings to it. Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple tolerates fear; that if fear arises, his mind never clings to it—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, if in a learned noble disciple there arise the three [kinds of] evil and unwholesome thoughts: thoughts of desire, thoughts of anger, and thoughts of harming; then, having these three [kinds of] evil and unwholesome thoughts, his mind never clings to them. Brahmin, that if in a learned noble disciple there arise the three [kinds of] unwholesome thoughts: thoughts of desire, thoughts of anger, and thoughts of harming; that having these three [kinds of] evil and unwholesome thoughts, his mind never clings to them—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . a learned noble disciple dwells having attained the fourth absorption. Brahmin, that secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . a learned noble disciple dwells having attained the fourth absorption—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard. 659a

Again, brahmin, through the elimination of three fetters a learned noble disciple attains stream-entry. He will not fall into evil conditions and is assured of progress toward full awakening within at most seven existences. Having gone through [at most] seven existences in heavenly or human realms, he will attain the ending of dukkha.

Brahmin, that through the elimination of three fetters a learned noble disciple attains stream-entry, will not fall into evil conditions, and is assured of progress toward full awakening within at most seven existences, that having gone through [at most] seven existences in the heavenly or human realms, he will attain the ending of dukkha—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, having eliminated three fetters, a learned noble disciple reduces sensual passion, anger, and ignorance and attains once-returning. Having passed through one existence in a heavenly or human realm, he will attain the ending of dukkha. Brahmin, that having eliminated three fetters a learned noble disciple reduces sensual desire, anger, and ignorance and attains once-returning, that having passed through one existence in a heavenly or human realm, he will attain the ending of dukkha—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, having eliminated the five lower fetters, a learned noble disciple, who on having been reborn in between will attain final nirvana there, has attained the condition of nonreturning, not coming back to this world. Brahmin, that having eliminated the five lower fetters a learned noble disciple, who on having been reborn in between will attain final nirvana there, has attained the condition of nonreturning, not coming back to this world—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

Again, brahmin, a learned noble disciple attains the peaceful liberations; transcending form, he attains the formless; and he dwells having directly realized concentrated states such that, through wisdom and insight, he understands the taints and eradicates them. Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple attains the peaceful liberations, that transcending form, he attains the formless, and that he dwells having directly realized concentrated states such that, through wisdom and insight, he understands the taints and eradicates them—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

659b Again, brahmin, a learned noble disciple acquires the supernormal powers: the divine ear, the knowledge of other minds, the knowledge of former lives, and the knowledge of the birth and death [of beings]; and through having eradicated all the taints, he attains the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, knowing and realizing it by himself here and now; and he dwells having personally realized, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

Brahmin, that a learned noble disciple acquires the supernormal powers: the divine ear, the knowledge of other minds, the knowledge of former lives, and the knowledge of the birth and death [of beings]; and that through having eradicated all the taints, he attains the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom, knowing and realizing it by himself here and now, and that he dwells having personally realized, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence”—this, brahmin, is a distinction, a virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked the Blessed One further:

[Regarding] these distinctions and virtues in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard, is there another distinction and virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard, [a distinction and virtue] that is superior, more sublime, more excellent?

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, [regarding] these distinctions and virtues in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard, there is no other distinction and no other virtue in reciting and practicing what one has widely heard, [no distinction or virtue] that is superior, more sublime, more excellent.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi said:

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, I now personally go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi was delighted and received it respectfully.

148. The Discourse on What Is Suffering

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha. He exchanged friendly greetings, stepped back, sat to one side, and said, "Gotama, I would like to ask a question. Will you listen if I venture to express it?"

The World-honored One said, "Brahmin, feel free to ask."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi then asked, "Gotama, what is suffering for one who lives at home? What is suffering for one who has gone forth to train in the path?"

The World-honored One replied, "Brahmin, for one who lives at home, constraint is suffering; for one who has gone forth to train in the path, lack of constraint is suffering."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, "Gotama, why is constraint suffering for one who lives at home? Why is lack of constraint suffering for one who has gone forth to train in the path?"

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, for one who lives at home, if money does not increase, [if] gold, silver, pearl, beryl, and crystal all do not increase; [if] livestock, grain, and male and female servants do not increase, then at such a time there is sorrow and suffering, worry and woe in the home. For this reason one living at home has much sorrow and suffering, harbors much worry and woe.

659c Brahmin, for one who has gone forth to train in the path, if they act under the influence of sensual desire, act under the influence of ill will and delusion, then at such a time there is sorrow and suffering, worry and woe in having gone forth to train in the path. For this reason one who has gone forth to train in the path has much sorrow and suffering, harbors much worry and woe.

In this way, brahmin, for one who lives at home constraint is suffering; for one who has gone forth to train in the path lack of constraint is suffering.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, “Gotama, what is happiness for one who lives at home? What is happiness for one who has gone forth to train in the path?”

The World-honored One replied, “Brahmin, for one who lives at home lack of constraint is happiness; for one who has gone forth to train in the path constraint is happiness.”

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, “Gotama, why is lack of constraint happiness for one who lives at home? Why is constraint happiness for one who has gone forth to train in the path?”

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, for one who lives at home, if money increases, [if] gold, silver, pearl, beryl, and crystal all increase; [if] livestock, grain, and male and female servants increase, then at such a time there is joy and delight in the home. For this reason one living at home has much joy and delight.

Brahmin, for one who has gone forth to train in the path, if they do not act under the influence of sensual desire, do not act under the influence of ill will and delusion, then at such a time there is joy and delight in having gone forth to train in the path. For this reason one gone forth to train in the path has much joy and delight.

In this way, brahmin, for one who lives at home lack of constraint is happiness; for one who has gone forth to train in the path constraint is happiness.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further:

Gotama, what kind of activity is certain to be of no benefit to devas and human beings? What kind of activity is certain to be of benefit to devas and human beings?

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, when devas and human beings quarrel with one another, this is certain to be of no benefit to them. When devas and human beings do not quarrel with one another, this is certain to be of benefit to them.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further:

Gotama, why is it certain to be of no benefit to devas and human beings to quarrel with one another? Why is it certain to be of benefit to devas and human beings not to quarrel with one another?

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, if devas and human beings quarrel and detest one another, then at such a time there is sorrow and suffering, worry and woe for devas and human beings. For this reason devas and human beings have much sorrow and suffering, harbor much worry and woe.

Brahmin, if devas and human beings do not quarrel and do not detest one another, then at such a time there is joy and delight for devas and human beings. For this reason devas and human beings have much joy and delight.

In this way, brahmin, when devas and human beings quarrel with one another, this is certain to be of no benefit to them; but when devas and human beings do not quarrel with one another, this is certain to be of benefit to them.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further:

Gotama, what kind of activity is certain not to lead to the flourishing of devas and human beings, certain to lead to their suffering? What kind of activity is certain to lead to the flourishing of devas and human beings, and certain to lead to their happiness? 660a

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, when devas and human beings engage in acts that are contrary to the Dharma, acts that are evil, this is certain not to lead to their flourishing, certain to lead to their suffering. When devas and human beings are able to engage in acts that are in accordance with the Dharma, acts that are not evil, this is certain to lead to their flourishing, and certain to lead to their happiness.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further:

Gotama, why are acts that are contrary to the Dharma, acts that are evil, certain not to lead to the flourishing of devas and human beings, certain to lead to their suffering? Why are acts that are in accordance with the Dharma, acts that are not evil, certain to lead to the flourishing of devas and human beings, and certain to lead to their happiness?

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, when devas and human beings engage in bodily acts that are contrary to the Dharma, acts that are evil . . . verbal acts . . . mental acts that are contrary to the Dharma, acts that are evil; at that time devas and human beings are certain to become diminished, [while] the asuras are certain to prosper. Brahmin, when devas and human beings engage in bodily acts that are in accordance with the Dharma, when they guard the body . . . vocal acts . . . mental acts, acts that are in accordance with the Dharma, when they guard their speech and mind, at that time devas and human beings are certain to prosper, [while] the asuras are certain to decline.

In this way, brahmin, when devas and human beings engage in acts that are contrary to the Dharma, acts that are evil, this is certain not to lead to their flourishing, certain to lead to their suffering. Brahmin, when devas and human beings are able to engage in acts that are in accordance with the Dharma, acts that are not evil, this is certain to lead to their flourishing, and certain to lead to their happiness.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, “Gotama, how should one look upon a bad friend?”

The World-honored One replied, “Brahmin, one should look upon a bad friend as similar to the [waning] moon.”

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, “Gotama, how should one look upon a bad friend as similar to the [waning] moon?”

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, [a bad friend] is just like the waning moon, decreasing a little day by day. The moon-palace also decreases, its brightness also decreases, its shape also decreases day by day [until] it is gone. Brahmin, there comes a time when the moon has reached extinction and is not visible anymore.

Brahmin, persons who have a bad friend, gain such faith in the Tathāgata’s true Dharma and discipline. Then, having gained faith, at a later time they no longer have devotion, no longer have respect. Their practice becomes inappropriate. They do not establish right comprehension and do not progress in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma. They lose their faith, and then they also lose their keeping of the precepts, their wide learning, their generosity, and their wisdom. Brahmin, there comes a time when, being instructed by this bad friend, their wholesome states entirely cease to exist, just like the disappearance of the [waning] moon. Brahmin, this is how one should look upon a bad friend as similar to the [waning] moon.

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, “Gotama, how should one look 660b upon a good friend?”

The World-honored One replied, “Brahmin, one should look upon a good friend as similar to the [waxing] moon.”

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked further, “Gotama, how should one look upon a good friend as similar to the [waxing] moon?”

The World-honored One replied:

Brahmin, a good friend is just like the [waxing] moon, whose brightness is at first weak but increases day by day. Brahmin, there comes a time, on the fifteenth day of the month, when the moon-palace is full and complete.

In the same way, brahmin, persons who have a good friend gain faith in the Tathāgata’s true Dharma and discipline. Having gained faith, at a later time they have devotion and respect. Their practice is appropriate. They establish right comprehension and they progress in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma. They increase their faith, and they also increase their keeping of the precepts, their wide learning, their generosity, and their wisdom. Brahmin, there comes a time when, being endowed with a good friend, their wholesome states come to completion, just like the moon on the fifteenth day. Brahmin, this is how one should look upon a good friend as similar to the moon.

Then the World-honored One said these verses:<sup>156</sup>

It is just as the stainless moon,
Moving through empty space,
Which outshines all constellations in the world
With its bright radiance.

In the same way [those who have] faith and wide learning,
And generosity free from stinginess and greed
Outshine all stinginess in the world
With the bright radiance of their giving.

They are like a great nāga
Which raises clouds, thunder, and lightning,
And pours down rain abundantly
So that the whole earth is drenched.

In the same way, [those who have] faith, wide learning,
And generosity free of stinginess and greed
Give food and drink plentifully
And delight in urging [others] to increase their giving.

In this way, like the strongest thunder
When the devas send down timely rain,
Such is the wide and heavy rain of merit
That is rained down by this donor.

Wealthy and with much fame,
They shall be reborn in a good realm.
They shall receive the reward for their merit
After death by being reborn in heaven.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin 660c Jāṇussoṇi was delighted and received it respectfully.

149. The Discourse on What One Desires<sup>157</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha. Having exchanged friendly greetings, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said, "Gotama, I have a question I would like to ask. Will you listen if I venture to express it?"

The World-honored One said, "Feel free to ask."

Then the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked, "Gotama, what are the desires of warriors? What do they engage in? What is their support? On what do they depend? What is their end?"

The World-honored One replied, "Warriors desire to gain wealth; they engage in wisdom; their support is the use of the sword; they rely on the people; being in control is their end."<sup>158</sup>

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked, "Gotama, what are the desires of householders? What do they engage in? What is their support? On what do they depend? What is their end?"

The World-honored One replied, "Householders desire to gain wealth; they engage in wisdom; their support is their abilities and skills; they rely on doing work; completing the work is their end."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked, "Gotama, what are the desires of women? What do they engage in? What is their support? On what do they depend? What is their end?"

The World-honored One replied, "Women desire to get a husband and children; they engage in adornment; their support is their sons; they rely on having no rival; being in control is their end."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked, "Gotama, what are the desires of thieves? What do they engage in? What is their support? On what do they depend? What is their end?"

The World-honored One replied, "Thieves desire to take what is not given; they engage in hiding; their support is the use of the sword; they rely on darkness; not being seen is their end."

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked, "Gotama, what are the desires of brahmins?"

What do they engage in? What is their support? On what do they depend? What is their end?”

The World-honored One replied, “Brahmins desire to gain wealth; they engage in wisdom; their support is the sacred texts; they rely on the sacrifice; Brahmā is their end.”

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi asked, “Gotama, what are the desires of renunciants? What do they engage in? What is their support? On what do they depend? What is their end?”

The World-honored One replied, “Renunciants desire to gain the truth; they engage in wisdom; their support is morality; they rely on secluded places; nirvana is their end.”<sup>159</sup>

The brahmin Jāṇussoṇi said:

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin 661a Jāṇussoṇi was delighted and received it respectfully.

150. The Discourse to Esukārī<sup>160</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary.

At that time the brahmin Esukārī, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha. Having exchanged friendly greetings, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Gotama, I have a question that I would like to ask. Will you listen if I venture to express it?”

The World-honored One said, “Brahmin, feel free to ask.”

Then the brahmin Esukārī asked:

Gotama, the brahmins declare four types of service for the four castes. They declare service for brahmins, and they declare service for warriors, merchants, and workers. Gotama, the brahmins declare [these types of] service for brahmins: a brahmin should serve a brahmin; a warrior, a merchant, and a worker should serve a brahmin. Gotama, these four castes should serve a brahmin.

Gotama, the brahmins declare [these types of] service for warriors: a warrior should serve a warrior; a merchant and a worker should serve a warrior. Gotama, these three castes should serve a warrior.

Gotama, the brahmins declare [these types of] service for merchants: a merchant should serve a merchant and a worker should serve a merchant. Gotama, these two castes should serve a merchant.

Gotama, the brahmins declare [this type of] service for workers: a worker should serve a worker. Who else is so low that they should be declared to serve a worker? Only a worker serves a worker.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, do the brahmins themselves know what four types of service to declare for the four castes, so that they declare service for brahmins and declare service for warriors, merchants, and workers?<sup>161</sup>

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

They do not know, Gotama; but the brahmins themselves make this statement, “In this world with its devas and māras, Brahmas, renunciants, brahmins, from human beings to devas, we brahmins, [although] not knowing ourselves what four types of service to declare for the four castes, [nevertheless] declare service for brahmins, and declare service for warriors, merchants, and workers.”

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, it is just as if a person were to force a piece of meat on another saying, “Good man, eat this and pay me the <price> of it!”<sup>162</sup> Brahmin, what you say on behalf of the brahmins is just like that. Why is that? The brahmins themselves do not know what four types of service to declare for the four castes, [yet] they declare service for brahmins and they declare service for warriors, merchants, and workers.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, how should one do service? If there is service [to be done], and 661b if because of that service one remains the same and does not become better, should one do such service? If there is service [to be done], and if because of that service one becomes better and does not remain the same, should one do such service?

Brahmin, if one serves a brahmin, and if because of that service one remains the same and does not become better, should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service one remains the same and does not become better, should one do such service?

Brahmin, if one serves a brahmin, and if because of that service one becomes better and does not remain the same, should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, [or] a worker, and if because of that service one becomes better and does not remain the same, should one do such service?<sup>163</sup>

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

Gotama, if I serve [someone], and if because of that service I remain the same and do not become better, then I should not serve them. If I serve [someone] and if because of that service I become better and do not remain the same, then I should serve them.

Gotama, if I serve a brahmin and if because of that service I remain the same and do not become better, then I should not serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, or a worker, and if because of that service I remain the same and do not become better, then I should not serve them.

Gotama, if I serve a brahmin and if because of that service I become better and do not remain the same, then I should serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, or a worker and if because of that service I become better and do not remain the same, then I should serve them.

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, suppose that another brahmin were to come by, one who is not stupid, not deluded, not deranged, who does not have a deranged mind, who is free and unrestrained, and I were to ask him, “Brahmin, what do you think? If there is service [to be done], and if because of that service one remains the same and does not become better, should one do such service?

If there is service [to be done], and if because of that service one becomes better and does not remain the same, should one do such service?

“Brahmin, if one serves a brahmin and if because of that service one remains the same and does not become better, should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, or a worker, and if because of that service one remains the same and does not become better, should one do such service?”

“Brahmin, if one serves a brahmin and if because of that service one becomes better and does not remain the same, should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, or a worker, and if because of that service one becomes better and does not remain the same, should one do such service?”

Brahmin, that [other] brahmin, who is not stupid, not deluded, not deranged, who does not have a deranged mind, who is free and unrestrained, would answer me, “Gotama, if I serve [someone], and if because of that service I remain the same and do not become better, then I should not serve them. If I serve [someone], and if because of that service I become better and do not remain the same, then I should serve them. 661c “Gotama, if I serve a brahmin and if because of that service I remain the same and do not become better, then I should not serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, or a worker, and if because of that service I remain the same and do not become better, then I should not serve them.

“Gotama, if I serve a brahmin, and if because of that service I become better and do not remain the same, then I should serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service I become better and do not remain the same, then I should serve them.”

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, what do you think?<sup>164</sup> If there is service [to be done], and if because of that service one loses faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service? If there is service [to be done], and if because of that service one increases in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service?

Brahmin, if one serves a brahmin, and if because of that service one loses faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service one loses faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service?

Brahmin if one serves a brahmin, and if because of that service one increases in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service one increases in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service?

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

Gotama, if I serve [someone], and if because of that service I lose faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should not serve them. If I serve [someone], and if because of that service I increase in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should serve them.

Gotama, if I serve a brahmin, and if because of that service I lose faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should not serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service I lose faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should not serve them.

Gotama, if I serve a brahmin, and if because of that service I increase in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service I increase in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should serve them.

662a The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, suppose that another brahmin were to come by who is not stupid, not deluded, not deranged, who does not have a deranged mind, who is free and unrestrained, and I were to ask him, “Brahmin, what do you think? If there is service [to be done], and if because of that service one loses faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service? If there is service [to be done], and if because of that service one increases in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service?

“Brahmin, if one serves a brahmin, and if because of that service one loses faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service one loses faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service?”

“Brahmin, if one serves a brahmin, and if because of that service one increases in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service? If one serves a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service one increases in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then should one do such service?”

Brahmin, that [other] brahmin, who is not stupid, not deluded, not deranged, who does not have a deranged mind, who is free and unrestrained, would answer me like this, “Gotama, if I serve [someone], and if because of that service I lose faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should not serve them. If I serve [someone], and if because of that service I increase in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should serve them.

“Gotama, if I serve a brahmin, and if because of that service I lose faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should not serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service I lose faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should not serve them.

“Gotama, if I serve a brahmin, and if because of that service I increase in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should serve them. If I serve a warrior, a merchant, a worker, and if because of that service I increase in faith, morality, wide learning, generosity, and wisdom, then I should serve them.”

The brahmin Esukārī said:

Gotama, the brahmins declare for the four castes four types of property. They declare for brahmins their property, they declare for warriors . . . merchants . . . workers their property. And what, Gotama, do the brahmins declare for brahmins as their property?

Gotama, the brahmins declare for brahmin begging as their property. If brahmins disdain begging, they are disdaining their property. Having 662b disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss. It is just as a cowherd who is unable to watch over his cows consequently suffers loss.<sup>165</sup> In the same way, Gotama, the brahmins declare for the brahmin begging as his property. If brahmins disdain begging, they are disdaining their property. Having disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss.

Gotama, what do the brahmins declare for warriors as their property? Gotama, the brahmins declare for warriors the bow and arrow as their property. If a warrior disdains the bow and arrow, they are disdaining their property. Having disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss. It is just as a cowherd who is unable to watch over his cows suffers loss. In the same way, Gotama, the brahmins declare for the warriors the bow and arrow as their property. If warriors disdain the bow and arrow, they are disdaining their property. Having disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss.

Gotama, what do the brahmins declare for merchants as their property? Gotama, the brahmins declare for merchants farming as their property. If merchants disdain farming, they are disdaining their property. Having disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss. It is just as a cowherd who is unable to watch over his cows suffers loss. In the same way, Gotama, the brahmins declare for merchants farming as their property. If merchants disdain farming, they are disdaining their property. Having disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss.

Gotama, what do the brahmins declare for workers as their property? Gotama, the brahmins declare for workers hemp as their property.<sup>166</sup> If workers disdain hemp, they disdaining their property. Having disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss. It is just as a cowherd who is unable to watch over his cows consequently suffers loss. In the same way, Gotama, the brahmins declare for workers hemp as their property. If workers disdain hemp, they are disdaining their property. Having disdained their property, they consequently suffer loss.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, do the brahmins themselves know what four types of property to declare for the four castes, so that they declare for brahmins their property, declare for warrior . . . the merchants . . . workers their property?"<sup>167</sup>

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

They do not know, Gotama; but the brahmins themselves make this statement, “In this world with its devas and māras, Brahmas, renunciants, brahmins, from human beings to devas, we brahmins, [although] not knowing ourselves what four types of property to declare for the four castes, [nevertheless] declare property for the brahmin, and declare property for the warrior . . . the merchant . . . the worker.” 662c

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, it is just as if a person were to force a piece of meat on another and say, “Good man, eat it, and you must give me the price of it!” Brahmin, what you say on behalf of the brahmins is just like this. Why is that? The brahmins themselves do not know what four types of property to declare for the four castes, [yet] they declare for brahmins their property, and they declare for warriors . . . merchants . . . workers their property.

Brahmin, having in this way myself come to understand well and know well all principles, I declare to people the principle of appeasement, the principle of complete cessation, the principle of the path to awakening, and the principle of good progress [in the practice].<sup>168</sup> I declare [these] as their property.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, what do you think? Is it only brahmins that are not affected by empty space, not bound by it, not touched by it, not obstructed by it, unlike warriors, merchants, and workers?<sup>169</sup>

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

Gotama, brahmins are not affected by empty space, not bound by it, not touched by it, not obstructed by it—and for warriors, merchants, and workers it is the same.

[The World-honored One said]:

Brahmin, having myself come to understand well and know well all principles, I declare to people the principle of appeasement, the principle of complete cessation, the principle of the path to awakening, and the principle of good progress [in the practice]. I declare [these] as their property.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, what do you think? Is it only brahmins who are able to dwell with a mind of loving-kindness, without fetters, without resentment, without ill will, without contention—unlike warriors, merchants, and workers?

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

Gotama, brahmins are able to dwell with a mind of loving-kindness, without fetters, without resentment, without ill will, without contention—and for warriors, merchants, and workers it is the same.

[The World-honored One said]:

Brahmin, having myself come to understand well and know well all principles, I declare for people the principle of appeasement, the principle of complete cessation, the principle of the path to awakening, and the principle of good progress [in the practice]. I declare [these] as their property.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that one hundred types of people were to come by and someone were to tell them, “Come, all of you. Only those of you who are born into the warrior caste or the brahmin caste are able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of your dirt and to become fully clean.”<sup>170</sup>

663a      Brahmin, what do you think? Are [only] those from the warrior caste or the brahmin caste able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean? Are those from the merchant caste or the worker caste not able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean? [Or] are all one hundred types of people able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean?

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

Gotama, all one hundred types of people are able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean.

[The World-honored One said]:

Brahmin, having in this way myself come to understand well and know well all principles, I declare for people the principle of appeasement, the principle of complete cessation, the principle of the path to awakening, and the principle of good progress [in the practice]. I declare [these] as their property.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that one hundred types of people were to come by and someone were to tell them, “Come, all of you. Only those of you who are born in the warrior caste or the brahmin caste are able, by using totally dry sāla wood and sandalwood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow.”

Brahmin, what do you think? Is it that [only] those from the warrior caste or the brahmin caste would be able, by using totally dry sāla wood and sandalwood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow? Is it that those from the merchant caste or the worker caste [would be unable], by using a dried-out pig trough or dog trough or castor oil wood or some other inferior wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow? [Or] is it that all one hundred types of people would be able, by using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow?

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

Gotama, all of those one hundred types of people would be able, by using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow.

[The World-honored One said:]

Brahmin, having in this way myself come to understand well and know well all principles, I declare for people the principle of appeasement, the principle of complete cessation, the principle of the path to awakening, and the principle of good progress [in the practice]. I declare [these] as their property.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, what do you think? If all of those one hundred types of people, using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, were to produce fire and to make it grow, then would all those fires have flames, color, heat, and light, and would they all be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire? [Or] is it that only some of the fires would have flames, color, heat, and light, and be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire? Is it that some of the fires would have no flames, no color, no heat, no light, and would not be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire? [Or] is it that all the fires would have flames, color, heat, light, and that they would all be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire?

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

663b

Gotama, if all of those one hundred types of people, by using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, were to produce fire and to make it grow, then all of the fires would have flames, color, heat, light, and all of them would be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire. That only some [of the fires] would have flames, color, heat, light and be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire—that is not possible. That only some [of the fires] would have no flames, no color, no heat, no light, and would not be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire—that too is not possible. Gotama, all those fires would have flames, color, heat, and light, and all of them would be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire.

[The World-honored One said:]

Brahmin, having in this way myself come to understand well and know well all principles, I declare for people the principle of appeasement, the principle of complete cessation, the principle of the path to awakening, and the principle of good progress [in the practice]. I declare [these] as their property.

The World-honored One asked:

Brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that all of those one hundred types of people, using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, were to produce fire and to make it grow; and one of them were to fuel their fire with dry grass and wood and produce flames, color, heat, and smoke. Would there be differences between [those] flames, color, heat, and smoke and the flames, color, heat, and smoke [of the others]?<sup>171</sup>

The brahmin Esukārī replied:

Gotama, if all of those one hundred types of people, using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, were to produce fire and to make it grow; and if one of those people were to fuel their fire with dry grass and wood and produce flames, color, heat, and smoke, then I would not be able to declare any difference between the flames, color, heat, and smoke of that fire and the flames, color, heat, and smoke [of the others].

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, it is the same with the fire that I acquired, the diligence that I acquired. It is able to eliminate negligence and also conceit, yet I cannot declare any [corresponding] difference in this fire.

The brahmin Esukārī said:

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin Esukārī was delighted and received it respectfully.

151. The Discourse to Assalāyana<sup>172</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time many brahmins from Kosala had gathered in their study hall and were discussing this matter:

663c The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; non-brahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā. Yet the renunciant Gotama says that all four castes are able to achieve purity, declaring it and proclaiming it.<sup>173</sup>

They thought:

Friends, who has the power and ability to approach the renunciant Gotama and defeat him in debate in relation to this matter, in accordance with the Dharma?

They further thought:

The young brahmin Assalāyana is born of parents of pure descent. For seven generations on both his father's and mother's sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. He has learned much, has retained it, and is able to recite it. He is a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth.<sup>174</sup>

The young brahmin Assalāyana has the power and ability to approach the renunciant Gotama and defeat him in debate in relation to this matter, in accordance with the Dharma. Friends, we could together approach the young brahmin Assalāyana and tell him about this matter. According to what the young brahmin Assalāyana says, we will accept it.

Then the many brahmins from Kosala approached the young brahmin Assalāyana. Having exchanged polite greetings with him, they stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

Young brahmin, we many brahmins from Kosala had gathered in the study hall and were discussing this matter: "The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā. Yet the renunciant Gotama says that all four castes are able to achieve purity, declaring it and proclaiming it.”

We thought, “Friends, who has the power and ability to approach the renunciant Gotama and defeat him in debate in relation to this matter, in accordance with the Dharma?” We further thought, “The young brahmin Assalāyana is born of parents of pure descent. For seven generations on both his father’s and mother’s sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. He has learned much, has retained it, and is able to recite it. He is a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth. The young brahmin Assalāyana has the power and ability to approach the renunciant Gotama and defeat him in debate in relation to this matter in accordance with the Dharma.”

Let the young brahmin Assalāyana approach the renunciant Gotama and defeat him in debate in relation to this matter, in accordance with the Dharma!

The young brahmin Assalāyana said to the brahmins:

Friends, the renunciant Gotama teaches the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma. If someone teaches the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma, it is not possible to defeat them in debate.

The many Kosalan brahmins said:

664a

Young brahmin, you have not yet been defeated [in debate]. You should not surrender in advance. Why is that? The young brahmin Assalāyana is born of parents of pure descent. For seven generations on both his father’s and mother’s sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. He has learned much, has retained it, and is able to recite it. He is a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth. The young brahmin Assalāyana has the power and ability to approach the renunciant Gotama and defeat him in debate in relation to this matter, in accordance with the Dharma. Let the young brahmin Assalāyana approach the renunciant Gotama and defeat him in debate in relation to this matter, in accordance with the Dharma!

The young brahmin Assalāyana accepted [the suggestion] of the many Kosalan brahmins by remaining silent.<sup>175</sup>

Then the young brahmin Assalāyana, together with those many Kosalan brahmins, approached the Buddha. Having exchanged polite greetings, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Gotama, I would like to ask a question. Will you listen to my question?”

The World-honored One said, “Young brahmin, you can feel free to ask.”

Then the young brahmin Assalāyana asked, saying:

Gotama, the brahmins speak like this, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.” I do not know what the renunciant Gotama will say about this.

The World-honored One said:

I will now ask you something. Answer according to your understanding.<sup>176</sup>

Young brahmin, have you heard that in the countries of Yona and Kamboja there are two castes, masters and slaves, and that the masters [can] become slaves and the slaves [can] become masters?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, I have heard that in the countries of Yona and Kamboja there are two castes, masters and slaves, and that the masters [can] become slaves and the slaves [can] become masters.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, if brahmins progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma; and if warriors, merchants, or workers progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma.<sup>177</sup>

The young brahmin Assalāyana said:

Gotama, it is wonderful, it is remarkable, how promptly you have come out with this simile.<sup>178</sup> Yet the brahmins speak like this, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.”

The World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, what do you think? Are only brahmins not affected by empty space, not bound by it, not touched by it, not obstructed by it— 664b unlike warriors, merchants, and workers?<sup>179</sup>

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, brahmins are not affected by empty space, not bound by it, not touched by it, not obstructed by it, and for warriors, merchants, and workers it is the same.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, if brahmins progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma; and if warriors, merchants, or workers progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma.

The young brahmin Assalāyana said:

Gotama, it is wonderful, it is remarkable, how promptly you have come out with this simile. Yet the brahmins speak like this, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.”

The World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, what do you think?<sup>180</sup> Is it only brahmins who are able to dwell with a mind of loving-kindness, without fetters, without resentment, without ill will, without contention—unlike warriors, merchants, and workers?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, brahmins are able to dwell with a mind of loving-kindness, without fetters, without resentment, without ill will, without contention, and for warriors, merchants, and workers it is the same.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, if brahmins progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma; and if warriors, merchants, or workers progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma.

The young brahmin Assalāyana said:

Gotama, it is wonderful, it is remarkable, how promptly you have come out with this simile. Yet the brahmins speak like this, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.”

The World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that one hundred types of people were to come by and someone were to tell them, “Come, all of you. Only those of you who are born in the warrior caste or the brahmin caste are able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of your dirt and to become fully clean.”

Young brahmin, what do you think? Are [only] those from the warrior caste or the brahmin caste able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean? Are those from the merchant caste or the worker caste not able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean? [Or] are all one hundred types of people able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean?<sup>181</sup>

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

664c

Gotama, all one hundred types of people are able, by taking soap powder and going to bathe in the water, to get rid of their dirt and to become fully clean.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, if brahmins progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma; and if warriors, merchants, or workers progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma.

The young brahmin Assalāyana said:

Gotama, it is wonderful, it is remarkable, how promptly you have come out with this simile. Yet the brahmins speak like this, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.”

The World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that one hundred types of people were to come by and someone were to tell them, “Come, all of you. Only those of you who are born in the warrior caste or the brahmin caste are able, by using totally dry sāla wood and sandalwood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow.”

Young brahmin, what do you think? Is it that [only] those from the warrior caste or the brahmin caste would be able, by using totally dry sāla wood and sandalwood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow? Is it that those from the merchant caste or the worker caste [would be unable], by using a dried-out pig trough or dog trough, or castor oil wood, or some other inferior wood as a fire base, and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow? [Or] is it that all one hundred types of people would be able, by using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, all of those one hundred types of people would be able, by using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, to produce fire and to make it grow.

[The World-honored One said]:

In the same way, young brahmin, if brahmins progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma; and if warriors, merchants, or workers progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma.

The young brahmin Assalāyana said:

Gotama, it is wonderful, it is remarkable, how promptly you have come out with this simile. Yet the brahmins speak like this, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.”

The World-honored One asked:

665a Young brahmin, what do you think? If all of those one hundred types of people, using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, were to produce fire and to make it grow, then would all of those fires have flames, color, heat, and light, and would they all be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire? [Or] is it that only some of the fires would have flames, color, heat, and light, and be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire? Is it that some of the fires would have no flames, no color, no heat, no light, and would not be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire? [Or] is it that all the fires would have flames, color, heat, light, and that they would all be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, if all of those one hundred types of people, by using various kinds of wood as a fire base and drilling it with a drill, were to produce fire and to make it grow, then all of the fires would have flames, color, heat, light, and all of them would be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire. That only some fires would have flames, color, heat, light, and be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire—that is not possible. That only some fires would have no flames, no color, no heat, no light, and would not be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire—that too is not possible. Gotama, all those fires would have flames, color, heat, and light, and all of them would be capable of fulfilling the functions of fire.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, if brahmins progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma; and if warriors, merchants, or workers progress rightly, they will become well liberated and know for themselves, according to the Dharma.

The young brahmin Assalāyana said:

Gotama, it is wonderful, it is remarkable, how promptly you have come out with this simile. Yet the brahmins speak like this, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.”

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, one is reckoned according to where this body is born. If one is born in a brahmin clan, one is reckoned to be of the brahmin clan. If one is born in a warrior . . . merchant . . . worker clan, one is reckoned to be of the worker clan.

Young brahmin, it is just as a fire is reckoned according to what gives rise to it. If it arises in dependence on twigs, it is reckoned to be a “twig fire”; if it arises in dependence on grass . . . on dung . . . on firewood, it is reckoned to be a “firewood fire.” In the same way, young brahmin, one is reckoned according to where this body is born. If one is born in a brahmin clan, one is reckoned to be of the brahmin clan, if one is born in a warrior . . . merchant . . . worker clan, one is reckoned to be of the worker clan.<sup>182</sup>

The World-honored One asked:

665b Young brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that a warrior female and a brahmin male cohabit and a child is later born of their cohabitation. It could resemble the father, or it could resemble the mother, or it could resemble neither the father nor the mother. What do you say? Is it a warrior [child] or a brahmin [child]?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, if a warrior female and a brahmin male cohabit and a child is later born of their cohabitation, which could resemble the father, or could resemble the mother, or could resemble neither the father nor the mother; I do not say it is a warrior [child] and I also do not say it is a brahmin [child]. Gotama, I say only that it is another body.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, one is reckoned according to where this body is born. If one is born in a brahmin clan, one is reckoned to be of the brahmin clan, if one is born in a warrior . . . merchant . . . worker clan, one is reckoned to be of the worker clan.

The World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, suppose that a brahmin female and a warrior male cohabit and a child is later born of their cohabitation. It could resemble the father, or it could resemble the mother, or it could resemble neither the father nor the mother. What do you say? Is it a brahmin [child] or a warrior [child]?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, if a brahmin female and a warrior male cohabit and a child is later born of their cohabitation, which could resemble the father, or could resemble the mother, or could resemble neither the father nor the mother; I do not say it is a brahmin [child] and I also do not say it is a warrior [child]. Gotama, I say only that it is another body.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, one is reckoned according to where this body is born. If one is born in a brahmin clan, one is reckoned to be of the brahmin clan; if one is born in a warrior . . . merchant . . . worker clan, one is reckoned to be of the worker clan.

The World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that someone has many female horses and lets loose a male donkey among them, and one female horse cohabits with the male donkey, and a foal is later born of their cohabitation. What do you say? Is it a donkey or a horse?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, if a horse cohabits with a donkey, and a foal is later born of their cohabitation, then I do not say it is a donkey and I also do not say it is a horse. Gotama, I say only that it is a mule.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, young brahmin, one is reckoned according to where this body is born. If one is born in a brahmin clan, one is reckoned to be of the brahmin clan, if one is born in a warrior . . . merchant . . . worker clan, one is reckoned to be of the worker clan.

The World-honored One said:<sup>183</sup>

Young brahmin, in the distant past there were many seers who were staying together in a high forest area and who had given rise to this evil view, “The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.”

665c

Then the seer Asita Devala heard that the many seers who were staying together in that high forest area had given rise to this evil view. He put on yellow robes and wrapped a yellow cloth around his head; then, supporting himself with a stick, holding an umbrella, and wearing the sandals of a white-clothed [lay person],<sup>184</sup> he entered without using the gate, went to the seers' retreat, and walked up and down.<sup>185</sup>

Then one of the seers who was dwelling there in the high forest area saw the seer Asita Devala who, having put on yellow robes and wrapped a yellow cloth around his head, supporting himself with a stick, holding an umbrella, and wearing the sandals of a white-clothed [layperson], had entered without using the gate, gone to the seers' retreat, and was walking up and down. Having seen this, he approached the many seers who were dwelling together in the high forest area and said, "Friends, right now there is a person who, having put on yellow robes and wrapped a yellow cloth around his head, supporting himself with a stick, holding an umbrella, and wearing the sandals of a white-clothed [layperson], has entered without using the gate and gone to the seers' retreat, and is walking up and down. Shall we together curse him [saying], 'You, become ashes! You, become ashes!'"?

Then the many seers who were dwelling together in the high forest area approached the seer Asita Devala. On reaching him, they together cursed him [saying], "You, become ashes! You, become ashes!" They cursed him according to their procedure for cursing [saying], "You, become ashes! You, become ashes!" [However,] the more they cursed him, the more his complexion became bright and beautiful and his body pleasantly bright.

Then the many seers thought, "Previously when we cursed someone [saying], 'You, become ashes! You, become ashes!' he became ashes. Now we are cursing this person [saying], 'You, become ashes! You, become ashes!' but the more we curse this person according to our procedure for cursing, the more his complexion becomes bright and beautiful and his body pleasantly bright. Let us rather ask him [who he is]."<sup>186</sup> So they asked him, "Who are you?"

The seer Asita Devala replied, "Friends, have you heard of the seer Asita Devala?" They replied, "We have heard of the seer Asita Devala." He said again, "I am he." Then the many seers together apologized to the seer Asita Devala, "Please forgive us! We did not know that the venerable one was the seer Asita Devala."

Then the seer Asita Devala said to the seers, "I have already forgiven you. Is it true that you have given rise to this evil view, 'The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahṃā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahṃā'?" The seers replied, "Yes, that is so."

666a

Asita again asked the seers, "Do you yourself know your own father?" The seers replied, "We know him. He was a brahmin who took a brahmin wife, not a nonbrahmin; and that father's father, and so on up to seven generations of fathers, were brahmins [each of whom] took a brahmin wife, not a nonbrahmin."<sup>187</sup>

Asita asked the seers further, "Do you yourself know your own mother?" The seers replied, "We know her. She was a brahmin who took a brahmin husband, not a nonbrahmin; and that mother's mother, and so on up to seven generations of mothers, were brahmins [each of whom] took a brahmin husband, not a nonbrahmin."

Asita asked the seers further, "Do you yourself know how the reception of an embryo takes place?" The seers answered, "We know. Due to the conjunction of three things the reception of an embryo takes place: there is a coming together of the father and mother, the [mother's womb] is vacant and capable, and the gandhabba has arrived. Asita, on these things coming together there is reception of the fetus by the mother."

Asita asked the seers further, "Do you know if the one to be born is male or female? Do you know where it came from? Did it come from a warrior clan, a brahmin, a merchant, or a worker clan? Did it come from the east, south, west, or north?"<sup>188</sup> The seers replied, "We do not know."

Asita also said to the seers, "Friends, you do not see and do not know these things, you do not know whether there has been reception of an embryo, who it is and from where it came, whether it is male or female, whether it came from a warrior clan, a brahmin, a merchant or a worker clan, and whether it came from the east, south, west, or north. Yet you make this statement: 'The brahmin caste is the highest; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin caste is white; all of the others are black. The brahmins achieve purity; nonbrahmins do not achieve purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. The brahmins were created by Brahmā.””

Young brahmin, those many seers staying in a high forest area, on being thus well instructed and well rebuked by the seer Asita Devala, were unable to declare the purity of brahmins—let alone of your teachers and their followers, who dressed in hides and straw.<sup>189</sup>

Then the young brahmin Assalāyana, being rebuked to his face by the World-honored One, was sad and distressed within. He lowered his head in silence, unable to reply.

Then the World-honored One, having rebuked the young brahmin Assalāyana to his face, in order to cheer him up, said:

666b Young brahmin, [suppose] a brahmin performs a sacrifice and makes an offering, and he has four sons, of whom two are fond of learning and two are not learned. Young brahmin, what do you think? To whom will that brahmin first offer the best seat, the best water for washing, and the best food?<sup>190</sup>

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, if that brahmin has two sons who are fond of learning, he will certainly first offer them the best seat, the best water for washing, and the best food.

The World-honored One asked further:

Again, young brahmin, suppose a brahmin performs a sacrifice and makes an offering, and he has four sons, of whom two are fond of learning but are not energetic and delight in doing evil things, and two are not learned but are fond of being energetic and delight in doing good things. Young brahmin, what do you think? To whom will that brahmin first offer the best seats, the best water for washing, and the best food?

The young brahmin Assalāyana replied:

Gotama, if that brahmin has two sons who, although not learned, are fond of being energetic and delight in doing good things, he will certainly first offer them the best seats, the best water for washing, and the best food.

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, you first commended learning, and then commended the upholding of morality. Young brahmin, I say that all four castes are able to achieve purity; I declare it and proclaim it. You too are [now] saying that all four castes are able to achieve purity; you are declaring it and proclaiming it.

At this the young brahmin Assalāyana got up from his seat, wishing to pay homage by bowing his head to the Buddha's feet.<sup>191</sup> Then that big assembly made a huge uproar:

The renunciant Gotama is very wonderful, very remarkable! He has great spiritual power, great virtue, great merit, great power! Why is that? [Because] as the renunciant Gotama says that all of the four castes are able to achieve purity, as he declares it and proclaims it, he causes the young brahmin Assalāyana also to say that all of the four castes are able to achieve purity.

Then the World-honored One, knowing the thoughts in the minds of the big assembly, said:

Stop, stop, Assalāyana! Although your mind is pleased and satisfied [making you wish to pay homage], you may return to your seat. I will teach you the Dharma.

Then the young brahmin Assalāyana, having paid homage by bowing his head to the Buddha's feet, stepped back and sat to one side. The World-honored One taught him the Dharma, exhorting and inspiring him, fully delighting him, teaching him the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired him, fully delighting him, he remained silent.

Then the young brahmin Assalāyana, having been taught the Dharma by the Buddha, having been exhorted and inspired, fully delighted, rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

666c Then the many Kosalan brahmins, before they had gone far, rebuked Assalāyana with all sorts of talk:

What did you want to do? You wanted to defeat the renunciant Gotama, but instead you return having been defeated by the renunciant Gotama. You are just like someone who goes into the forest [in search of a cure] for their eyes,<sup>192</sup> but instead returns having lost their sight. Assalāyana, you too are like that. You wanted to defeat the renunciant Gotama, but instead you return having been defeated by the renunciant Gotama. You are just like someone who goes into a pool to drink, but instead returns still thirsty. Assalāyana, you too are like that. You wanted to defeat the renunciant Gotama, but instead you return having been defeated by the renunciant Gotama. Assalāyana, what did you want to do?

Then the young brahmin Assalāyana said to the many Kosalan brahmins:

Friends, earlier I had already said, “The renunciant Gotama teaches the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma. If someone teaches the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma, it is not possible to defeat him in debate.”

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the young brahmin Assalāyana was delighted and received it respectfully.

152. The Discourse to Suka<sup>193</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary.

667a At that time the young brahmin Suka,<sup>194</sup> the son of Todeyya, had gone to Rājagaha for some small matter and was staying in the home of a householder. Then the young brahmin Suka, the son of Todeyya, asked the householder with whom he was staying:

Is there some renunciant or brahmin who is the leader and teacher of a congregation, head of a great congregation, respected by the people, whom I could go to visit to pay my respects at an appropriate time, such that when I pay my respects to him it will bring me delight?

The householder replied:

There is, Beloved of the Devas. The renunciant Gotama of the Sakya lineage left the Sakya clan, shaved off his hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and became homeless to train in the path. He has awakened to the unsurpassable, right, and total awakening. Beloved of the Devas, you can go to visit him yourself at an appropriate time, call on him, and pay your respects to him. Perhaps when you pay your respects to him, your mind will experience delight.

The young brahmin Suka asked further, “Where is the renunciant Gotama? I wish to visit him.”

The householder replied, “The renunciant Gotama is staying at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary. Go there and visit him.”

Then the young brahmin Suka went out of the householder’s home where he was staying and approached the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary. From afar the young brahmin Suka saw the World-honored One in the grove, dignified and beautiful, like the moon amid the stars, with a radiant aura, shining like a golden mountain, endowed with handsome appearance and lofty dignity, with calm sense faculties, free of obstruction, accomplished and disciplined, and with his mind calm and quiet.<sup>195</sup>

On seeing the Buddha, he went forward and approached him. Having exchanged polite greetings, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Gotama, I have a question I would like to ask. Will you listen if I venture to express it?”

The World-honored One said, “Feel free to ask.”

The young brahmin Suka asked:

Gotama, according to what I have heard, one who lives at home will gain proper understanding and knowledge in accordance with the Dharma; one who goes forth to train in the path will not. I ask Gotama about this matter.

The World-honored One replied, “This matter is uncertain.”

The young brahmin Suka said, “Gotama, may you now analyze this matter for me?”

The World-honored One said, “Young brahmin, listen closely and pay proper attention, and I shall give you an analytical explanation.”<sup>196</sup> The young brahmin Suka listened to receive the instruction.

The Buddha said:

Young brahmin, if one who lives at home or one who has gone forth to train in the path practices wrongly, I do not commend them. Why is that? If one who lives at home or one who has gone forth to train in the path practices wrongly, they will not gain proper understanding and will not come to know in accordance with the Dharma. That is why, young brahmin, if one who lives at home or one who has gone forth to train in the path practices wrongly, I do not commend them.

667b Young brahmin, if one who lives at home or one who has gone forth to train in the path practices rightly, I commend them. Why is that? Because if one who lives at home or one who has gone forth to train in the path practices rightly, they will certainly gain proper understanding and will come to know in accordance with the Dharma. That is why, young brahmin, if one who lives at home or one who has gone forth to train in the path practices rightly, I commend them.

Young brahmin, this is how I speak. In speaking of these two states, I have analyzed them like this, and proclaimed them like this. [In contrast,] if a renunciant or brahmin is firmly entrenched in upholding a one-sided position, they will say, “This is true; anything else is false.”<sup>197</sup>

The young brahmin Suka said:

Gotama, according to what I have heard, living at home is of much profit, much virtue; going forth to train in the path is not. May I ask Gotama about this matter?

The World-honored One replied, “This matter is uncertain.”

The young brahmin Suka said, “Gotama, may you again analyze this matter for me?”

The World-honored One said, “Young brahmin, listen closely and pay proper attention, and I shall give you an analytical explanation.” The young brahmin Suka listened to receive the instruction.

The Buddha said:

Young brahmin, for one who lives at home there is much adversity, much conflict, much that is unpleasant, and one who practices wrongly will not gain much fruit, will not have much merit. It is just as in farming, where there is much adversity, much conflict, much that is unpleasant, and one who practices wrongly will not gain much fruit, will not have much merit. It is like that, young brahmin; if one lives at home it is also like that.

Young brahmin, for one who has gone forth to train in the path, there is little adversity, little conflict, little that is unpleasant, and one who practices wrongly will not gain much fruit, not have much merit. It is just as in trade, where there is little adversity, little conflict, little that is unpleasant, and one who practices wrongly will not gain much fruit, not have much merit. It is like that, young brahmin; going forth to train in the path is also like that.

Young brahmin, for one who lives at home there is much adversity, much conflict, much that is unpleasant, but if they practice rightly, they will gain much fruit, have much merit. It is just as in farming, where there is much adversity, much conflict, much that is unpleasant, but one who practices rightly will gain much fruit, have much merit. It is like that, young brahmin; if one lives at home it is also like that.

Young brahmin, for one who has gone forth to train in the path there is little adversity, little conflict, little that is unpleasant, and one who practices rightly will gain much fruit, have much merit. It is just as in trade, where there is little adversity, little conflict, little that is unpleasant, and one who practices rightly will gain much fruit, have much merit. It is like that, young brahmin; going forth to train in the path is also like that.

667c

Young brahmin, this is how I speak. In speaking of these two states, I have analyzed them like this, and proclaimed them like this. [In contrast,] if a renunciant or brahmin is firmly entrenched in upholding a one-sided position, they will say, “This is true; anything else is false.”

The young brahmin Suka said, “Gotama, the brahmins declare five principles to be of much fruit, of much merit, as making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome.”

The World-honored One said:

Those five principles, as declared by the brahmins to be of much fruit, of much merit, making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome—can you state them now, in this assembly?

The young brahmin Suka said, “Gotama, certainly I can. Why is that? Gotama, [because] I am now seated in this assembly.”

The World-honored One said, “So, please state them.”

The young brahmin Suka said:

Gotama, listen well! Gotama, the first principle that the brahmins declare is truth, which is of much fruit, of much merit, making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome. The second is recitation . . . the third is practicing generosity,<sup>198</sup> . . . the fourth is ascetic practice . . . Gotama, the fifth principle that the brahmins declare is celibacy, which is of much fruit, of much merit, making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome.

The World-honored One said:

Since the brahmins declare five principles to be of much fruit, of much merit, as making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome, is there among these brahmins one brahmin who speaks like this: “As to these five principles, having here and now come to know them myself, awakened to them myself, realized them myself, I declare their fruit”?

The young brahmin Suka said to the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

The World-honored One said:

Does their teacher, or the teacher of their teacher, up to seven generations of predecessors, speak like this, “As to these five principles, having here and now come to know them myself, awakened to them myself, realized them myself, I declare their fruit”?

The young brahmin Suka said to the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

Then the World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, in ancient times there were brahmins who have since died and passed away, reciters and memorizers of the sacred texts, transmitters of the sacred texts, and reciters of the Vedas—one called Atṭhaka, a second called Vāmaka, a third called Vāmadeva, a fourth called Vessāmitta, a fifth called Yamataggi, a sixth called Āṅgīrasa, a seventh called Vāseṭṭha, an eighth called Kassapa, a ninth called Bhāradvāja, and a tenth called Bhagu—whom the present-day brahmins regard as skilled in textual recitation, as having practiced and trained in memorization. Did any of them speak like this, “As to these five principles, having here and now come to know them myself, awakened to them myself, realized them myself, I declare their fruit”?

The young brahmin Suka said to the World-honored One, “No, Gotama. But the brahmins base their faith on what they have memorized.”<sup>199</sup>

668a

The World-honored One said:

Since there is among the brahmins not one brahmin who speaks like this: “As to these five principles, having here and now come to know them myself, awakened to them myself, realized them myself, I declare their fruit”; and since there is no teacher, or teacher of a teacher, up to seven generations of predecessors, who speaks like this: “As to these five principles, having here and now come to know them myself, awakened to them myself, realized them myself, I declare their fruit”; and since among brahmins of ancient times who have since died and passed away, reciters and memorizers of the sacred texts, transmitters of the sacred texts, and reciters of the Vedas—one called Aṭṭhaka, a second called Vāmaka, a third called Vāmadeva, a fourth called Vessāmitta, a fifth called Yamataggi, a sixth called Aṅgīrasa, a seventh called Vāseṭṭha, an eighth called Kassapa, a ninth called Bhāradvāja, and a tenth called Bhagu—whom the present-day brahmins regard as skilled in textual recitation, as having practiced and trained in memorization, none spoke like this: “As to these five principles, having here and now come to know them myself, awakened to them myself, realized them myself, I declare their fruit”; young brahmin, for these reasons, is not the faith of those brahmins in this without foundation?

The young brahmin Suka said, “Gotama, it is truly without foundation. But the brahmins have heard it and then memorized it.”

The World-honored One said:

They are just like a group of blind children, each holding onto the other. Those in front do not see what is behind and what is in the middle, those in the middle do not see what is in front and what is behind, and those behind do not see what is in the middle and what is in front. Young brahmin, the generations of brahmins you speak of are just like that. Young brahmin, those in front speak out of faith and those coming after them repeat what they have heard.

The young brahmin Suka became angry with the World-honored One. He felt irritated and displeased, [wanting to] slander the World-honored One, to provoke the World-honored One, to speak abusively to the World-honored One. [Thinking:] “Gotama should be slandered; Gotama should be provoked; Gotama should be toppled,” he said to the World-honored One:

The brahmin called Pokkarasāti of the Upamaññā clan speaks thus, “If some renunciant or brahmin [claims], ‘I have now attained knowledge and vision in a superhuman state,’ then on hearing this, I have a great laugh. In my mind I disapprove of it as vain and untrue, as not in accordance with the Dharma. How could a human being, born among human beings, proclaim themselves as having attained a superhuman state? If anyone says of a superhuman state, ‘I know it; I see it,’ this is not right.”

Then the World-honored One thought:

668b

The young brahmin Suka has become angry with me, feeling irritated and displeased, [he wants to] slander me, to provoke me, to speak abusively to me. [Thinking,] “Gotama should be slandered; Gotama should be provoked; Gotama should be toppled,” he said to me, “Gotama, the brahmin called Pokkarasāti of the Upamaññā clan speaks thus, ‘If some renunciant or brahmin [claims], ‘I have now attained knowledge and vision in a superhuman state,’ then on hearing this, I have a great laugh. In my mind I disapprove of it as vain and untrue, as not in accordance with the Dharma. How could a human being, born among human beings, proclaim himself as having attained a superhuman state? If anyone says of a superhuman state, ‘I know it; I see it,’ then this is not right.’”

Knowing this, the World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, does the brahmin Pokkarasāti of the Upamaññā clan know the thoughts in the minds of all renunciants and brahmins so that after that he speaks thus, “If some renunciant or brahmin [claims], ‘I have now attained knowledge and vision in a superhuman state,’ then on hearing this, I have a great laugh. In my mind I disapprove of it as vain and untrue, as not in accordance with the Dharma. How could a human being, born among human beings, proclaim himself as having attained a superhuman state? If anyone says of a superhuman state, “I know it; I see it,” then this is not right.””

The young brahmin Suka replied:

Gotama, the brahmin Pokkarasāti of the Upamañña clan has a female slave called Punnikā, yet he is not able to know the thoughts in her mind. How could he hope to know the thoughts in the minds of all renunciants and brahmins? That he should know them is impossible.

The World-honored One said:

It is just as if a person born blind were to make this statement: “There are no black or white objects, nor is there seeing of black or white objects. There are no beautiful or ugly objects, nor is there seeing of beautiful or ugly objects. There are no long or short objects, nor is there seeing of long or short objects. There are no near or far objects, nor is there seeing of near or far objects. There are no thick or slender objects, nor is there seeing of thick or slender objects. From the beginning I have never seen or known them, therefore there are no such objects.” Would this statement by that person born blind be true?

The young brahmin Suka answered the World-honored One:

No Gotama. Why is that? There are black or white objects, and there is seeing of black or white objects. There are beautiful or ugly objects, and there is seeing of beautiful or ugly objects. There are long or short objects, and there is seeing of long or short objects. There are near or far objects, and there is seeing of near or far objects. There are thick or slender objects, and there is seeing of thick or slender objects. If [the person] says, “From the beginning I have never seen or known them, therefore there are no such objects,” then this statement by the person born blind is not true.

[The World-honored One said,] “Young brahmin, in speaking as he does, is the brahmin Pokkarasāti of the Upamañña clan not like that man born blind, without eyes?”

668c The young brahmin Suka answered the World-honored One, “Gotama, he is as if blind.”

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, what do you think? As to those brahmins of ancient times who have since died and passed away, reciters and memorizers of the sacred texts, transmitters of the sacred texts, and reciters of the Vedas, namely the brahmin Caṅkī, the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, the brahmin Pokkara-sāti, and your father Todeyya, is what they said to be accepted or not accepted? Is it true or untrue? Should it be respected or despised?<sup>200</sup>

The young brahmin Suka replied to the World-honored One:

As to those brahmins of ancient times who have since died and passed away, reciters and memorizers of the sacred texts, transmitters of the sacred texts, and reciters of the Vedas, namely the brahmin Caṅkī, the brahmin Jāṇussoṇi, the brahmin Pokkara-sāti, and my father Todeyya, in my mind I wish to accept what they said, not to reject it; I wish [to hold] it as true, not as untrue; I wish to respect it, not to despise it.

Then the World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, that statement by the brahmin Pokkara-sāti of the Upamañña clan: Is it not unacceptable, devoid of anything acceptable? Is it not untrue, devoid of any truth? Is it not despicable, devoid of anything to be respected?

The young brahmin Suka replied to the World-honored One, “[What you say] is true, Gotama.”

[The World-honored One said:]

Again, young brahmin, there are five states that create obstruction, that create obscuration, that create blindness and loss of sight, that are capable of eroding wisdom, that tire one to no avail and do not lead to nirvana. What are the five? Young brahmin, sensual desire is the first state that creates obstruction, that creates obscuration, that creates blindness and loss of sight, that is capable of eroding wisdom, that tires one to no avail and does not lead to nirvana.

Young brahmin, ill will . . . identity view . . . clinging to precepts . . . doubt is the fifth state that creates obstruction, that creates obscurations, that creates blindness and loss of sight, that is capable of eroding wisdom, that tires one to no avail and does not lead to nirvana.<sup>201</sup>

Young brahmin, what do you think? That one who is obstructed by these five states, obscured by them, entangled in them should, at will, have insight into what is of benefit for themselves, or insight into what is of benefit for others, or insight into what is of benefit for both, and [this person] should know the thoughts in the minds of all renunciants and brahmins? That is not possible.

Young brahmin, the brahmin Pokkarasāti of the Upamañña clan is stained by sensual desires, defiled by sensual desires. Touched by sensual desires and dependent on sensual desires,<sup>202</sup> he is attached to sensual desires. He enters into sensual desires, not seeing the danger in them. Not knowing the escape from them, he engages in sensual desires. He is obstructed by these five states, obscured by them, entangled in them. That he should, at will, have insight into what is of benefit for himself, or insight into what is of benefit for others, or insight into what is of benefit for both, and that he should know the thoughts in the minds of all renunciants and brahmins—that is not possible.

Again, young brahmin, there are the five strands of sensual pleasure, which are longed for, pleasing to the mind, of desirable appearance, connected with sensual desire, and extremely pleasurable. What are the five? 669a They are visible forms known by the eye, sounds known by the ear, odors known by the nose, flavors known by the tongue, and tangibles known by the body. Young brahmin, what do you think? Because of these five strands of sensual pleasure, do living beings experience pleasure and joy, [knowing] nothing that is superior to it?

The young brahmin Suka said to the World-honored One, “It is like this, Gotama.”

The World-honored One asked him:

Young brahmin, what do you think? Of a fire that burns in dependence on grass and wood and a fire that burns without grass and wood, which one’s flame would be superior, more sublime, more superb?

The young brahmin Suka replied:

Gotama, that a fire might burn without grass and wood, that is not possible except through supernormal power. [But,] Gotama, supposing that a fire could burn without grass and wood, then its flame would be superior, more sublime, more superb.

The World-honored One said:

It is like this, young brahmin, it is like this. That a fire might burn without grass and wood, that is not possible except through supernormal power. [But] supposing that a fire could burn without grass and wood, then its flame would be superior, more sublime, more superb.

I shall now speak [in terms of that] supposition. Young brahmin, like the fire that burns in dependence on grass and wood, such is the delight and pleasure that living beings give rise to in dependence on sensual pleasure and evil unwholesome states. They do not attain the pleasure of letting go and the tranquility of appeasement.

Young brahmin, like the fire that burns without grass and wood, such is the pleasure of letting go that living beings give rise to independence on seclusion from sensual desires and through compliance with wholesome states. They attain the pleasure of letting go and the tranquility of appeasement.<sup>203</sup>

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, what do you think? A brahmin performs a sacrifice and practices generosity. Suppose a young warrior comes from the eastern direction and says, “I will get the best of the seats, the best water for washing, and the best food and drink.” Not getting the best of the seats, the best water for washing, or the best food and drink, he becomes resentful and harbors a grudge.

Suppose a young brahmin comes from the southern direction and says, “I will get pure fine food in here.” Not getting pure fine food in here, he becomes resentful and harbors a grudge. Suppose a young merchant comes from the western direction and says, “I will get plenty of food in here.” Not getting plenty of food in here, he becomes resentful and harbors a grudge. Suppose a young worker comes from the northern direction and says, “I will get much food in here.” Not getting much food in here, he becomes resentful and harbors a grudge. Young brahmin, what fruit do you declare for that brahmin practicing generosity in that way?<sup>204</sup>

669b

The young brahmin Suka said:

Gotama, brahmins do not practice generosity with a mental attitude of causing others to become resentful and harbor a grudge. Gotama, you should know that brahmins practice generosity with a mental attitude of empathy. By having a mental attitude of empathy when practicing generosity, they gain great merit.

The World-honored One said:

Then, young brahmin, do the brahmins not declare this as a sixth principle that is of great fruit and great merit, making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome?

The young brahmin Suka replied to the World-honored One, “That is so, Gotama.”

The World-honored One asked:

Young brahmin, as to the five principles that the brahmins declare to be of great fruit and great merit, making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome, where do you see these principles often, among those who live at home or among those who have gone forth to train in the path?

The young brahmin Suka replied:

Gotama, as to the five principles that the brahmins declare to be of great fruit and great merit, as making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome, I see these principles often among those who have gone forth to train in the path, not among those who live at home. Why is that?

For one who lives at home there are many affairs, many activities, there is much resentment, much quarreling, and one is not able to preserve the truth. Gotama, for one who goes forth to train in the path there are few affairs, few activities, there is little resentment and little quarreling, and one is certainly able to preserve the truth. Gotama, as to the truth, I see it often among those who have gone forth to train in the path, not among those who live at home. Why is that?

For one living at home there are many affairs, many activities, there is much resentment, much quarreling, one is not able to practice generosity . . . not able to practice reciting . . . not able to practice asceticism . . . not able to practice celibacy. Gotama, for one who goes forth to train in the path there are few affairs, few activities, there is little resentment and little quarreling, and one is certainly able to practice generosity . . . able to practice reciting . . . able to practice asceticism . . . able to practice celibacy. Gotama, as to the practice of celibacy, I see this principle often among those who have gone forth to train in the path, not among those who live at home.

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, the five principles that the brahmins declare to be of great fruit and of great merit, making for happiness and attaining what is wholesome, I say that they arise from the mind. What kind of mind? It is a mind that is free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, because of having been cultivated.<sup>205</sup> 669c Young brahmin, what do you think? If a monk protects the truth, then because of protecting the truth he gains gladness and gains joy. Young brahmin, that gladness and that joy, I say, which are well conjoined with what is wholesome, arise from the mind. What kind of mind? It is a mind that is free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, because it has been cultivated.

Young brahmin, in this way [if] one is able to practice generosity . . . one is able to gain learning . . . one is able to practice asceticism . . . one is able to practice celibacy, and because of practicing celibacy [the person] gains gladness and gains joy. Young brahmin, that gladness and that joy, I say, which are well conjoined with what is wholesome, arise from the mind. What kind of mind? It is a mind that is free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention.<sup>206</sup>

With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, he dwells [mentally] pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth direction, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated. In the same way with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or conflict, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated.

Young brahmin, it is just as if there were a skilled conch-blower. He goes to a place where nobody has ever heard [the sound of a conch]. He mounts a high hill at midnight, and with all his might he blows the conch. A wonderful sound comes out of it that pervades the four directions.

In the same way, with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, a monk dwells [mentally] pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth direction, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated. In the same way with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or conflict, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated.<sup>207</sup>

Young brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that someone is seeking [to become] a deva and, because of really seeking [to reach] a deva realm, he dwells with a lustful mind [thinking], “May I become a deva or one among the devas!” Suppose that someone [else] is seeking [to become] a deva and, because of really seeking [to reach] a deva realm, he dwells free of fetters, free of resentment, without ill will or contention, [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, and well cultivated, with a concentrated mind, mentally liberated; and [this person] dwells having fully accomplished this, [thinking], “May I become a deva or one among the devas!” As you see it, who [of these two] will become a deva or one among the devas?

The young brahmin Suka replied:

Gotama, if someone is seeking [to become] a deva and, because of really seeking [to reach] a deva realm, he dwells free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, and well cultivated, with a concentrated mind, mentally liberated, and dwells having fully accomplished this then, as I see it, [this person] will certainly become a deva or one among the devas.

The World-honored One asked:

670a Young brahmin, what do you think? Suppose that someone is seeking [to become] Brahmā and, because of really seeking [to reach] the heaven of Brahmā, he dwells with a lustful mind, [thinking,] “May I become Brahmā or one among the Brahmā devas!” Suppose that someone [else] is seeking [to become] Brahmā and, because of really seeking [to reach] the heaven of Brahmā, he dwells free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, and well cultivated, with a concentrated mind, mentally liberated; and [this person] dwells having fully accomplished this, [thinking,] “May I become Brahmā or one among the Brahmā devas!” As you see it, who [of these two] will become Brahmā or one among the Brahmā devas?

The young brahmin Suka replied:

Gotama, if someone is seeking [to become] Brahmā and, because of really seeking [to reach] the heaven of Brahmā dwells free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, and well cultivated, with a concentrated mind, mentally liberated; and [this person] dwells having fully accomplished this then, as I see it, they will certainly become Brahmā or one among the Brahmā devas.

The young brahmin Suka asked, “Gotama, do you know the path to Brahmā?”<sup>208</sup>

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, I will now ask you. Answer according to your understanding. Young brahmin, what do you think? Is the village of Naḷakāra not far from this assembly?

The young brahmin Suka replied, “It is not far.”

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, what do you think? [Suppose] you tell someone in this assembly, “You go to the village of Naḷakāra and, on arriving there, come back right away.” [The person] receives your instructions, quickly goes to the village of Naḷakāra and on arriving there, right away comes back. When they have gone there and come back, you ask them about the route, about the matter of going to the village of Naḷakāra, and coming back from it. Would that person hesitate and be unable to reply?

The young brahmin Suka replied to the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, it might be that that person who has gone to the village of Naḷakāra and come back, on being asked about the route, would hesitate and be unable to reply. But if a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, is asked about the path to Brahmā, it is impossible that [the tathāgata] would hesitate even for a moment and be unable to reply.

The young brahmin Suka said to the World-honored One:

Renunciant Gotama, you are free from attachment and revered by the devas. You are accomplished in this matter. Therefore, on being asked about the path to Brahmā you are able to reply promptly. World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.<sup>209</sup>

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the young brahmin Suka was delighted and received it respectfully.

153. The Discourse to Māgandiya<sup>210</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying among the Kurus in the main quiet room of Bhāradvāja, seated on a seat of straw.

670b        Then, when the night was over, at dawn, the World-honored One put on his [outer] robe, took his bowl, and went into Kammāsadhamma to beg for almsfood in [proper] sequence [from house to house]. Having partaken of the midday meal, he put away his [outer] robe and bowl, washed his hands and feet, put his sitting mat over his shoulder, and went to a certain grove for the day's abiding. Then the World-honored One entered that grove, went to the base of a tree, spread out the sitting mat, and sat down cross-legged.

At that time the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya, who was roaming about in the afternoon, approached the main quiet room of Bhāradvāja. The heterodox practitioner Māgandiya saw from afar that in the main quiet room of Bhāradvāja there was straw [to serve as] a seat and as a place for lying down on one's side in the manner of a lion, in the manner of a renunciant, in the manner of a brahmin.<sup>211</sup> On seeing this, the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya asked Bhāradvāja:

Whose is the straw seat, in your main quiet room, the place for lying down on one's side in the manner of a lion, in the manner of a renunciant, in the manner of a brahmin?

The brahmin Bhāradvāja replied:

Māgandiya, there is the renunciant Gotama from the Sakya lineage who left the Sakya clan, shaved off his hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and became homeless to train in the path. He has realized the unsurpassable right and total awakening. His is the straw seat in the main quiet room, the place for lying down on one's side in the manner of a lion, in the manner of a renunciant, in the manner of a brahmin.

The heterodox practitioner Māgandiya said:

Bhāradvāja, I am now seeing what should not be seen and hearing what should not be heard, namely seeing the place where the renunciant Gotama reclines. Why is that? The renunciant Gotama is a destroyer of the stages [of growth] and a destroyer of the stages [of growth] is useless.

Bhāradvāja said:

Māgandiya, you should not condemn the renunciant Gotama on this account. Why is that? The renunciant Gotama has much wisdom. Wise warriors, wise brahmins, wise householders, and wise renunciants, who are spoken of as wise ones, all gain noble knowledge [from him]. Māgandiya, I would like to tell the renunciant Gotama about this statement [of yours]. May I do so?

Māgandiya said:

Bhāradvāja, if you want to tell him, then do as you wish. I have no objection. Bhāradvāja, if I were to see the renunciant Gotama, I too would tell him this statement. Why is that? [Because] the renunciant Gotama is a destroyer of the stages [of growth] and a destroyer of the stages [of growth] is useless.

At that time the World-honored One was in the day's abiding. With the purified divine ear that surpasses the human [ear] he heard the brahmin Bhāradvāja and the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya discussing this matter. Having heard it, the World-honored One rose from sitting in meditation and in the late afternoon approached the main quiet room of Bhāradvāja. He spread out his sitting mat on the straw seat and sat down cross-legged.

The brahmin Bhāradvāja saw from afar the World-honored One [coming back from] the grove, dignified and beautiful, like the moon amid the stars, with a radiant aura, shining like a golden mountain, endowed with handsome appearance and lofty dignity, and with sense faculties calm, free of obstruction, accomplished and disciplined, with his mind calm and quiet.<sup>212</sup> Having seen the Buddha, he came forward to approach him, exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side. 670c

The World-honored One asked, “Bhāradvāja, did you have a conversation with the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya about this straw seat?”

The brahmin Bhāradvāja answered the World-honored One:<sup>213</sup>

That is so, Gotama. I had wanted to tell the renunciant Gotama about this matter; however, before I had said it, the renunciant Gotama has already come to know by himself. Why is that? Because he is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened.

[While] the World-honored One and the brahmin Bhāradvāja were discussing this matter, the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya, who was roaming around, approached the main quiet room of Bhāradvāja. On seeing from afar that the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya had come, the World-honored One said:

Māgandiya, one who does not restrain the eye faculty, does not guard it, and does not practice doing so, certainly experiences suffering as a result. That has been well restrained by the renunciant Gotama. He guards it well, and practices well doing so, and he certainly experiences happiness as a result. Māgandiya, is it for this reason that you say, “The renunciant Gotama is a destroyer of the stages [of growth], and a destroyer of the stages [of growth] is useless”?

The heterodox practitioner Māgandiya answered the World-honored One, “That is so, Gotama.”

Māgandiya, in the same way, one who does not restrain the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body faculty . . . the mind faculty, does not guard it and does not practice doing so, will certainly experience suffering as a result. That has been well restrained by the renunciant Gotama. He guards it well, and practices well doing so, and he certainly experiences happiness as a result. Māgandiya, is it for this reason that you say, “The renunciant Gotama is a destroyer of the stages [of growth], and a destroyer of the stages [of growth] is useless”?

The heterodox practitioner Māgandiya answered the World-honored One, “That is so, Gotama.”

The World-honored One asked:

Māgandiya, what do you think? Suppose a person who, before going forth to train in the path, cognizes with the eye forms that are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desires. At a later time he gives up such forms cognized with the eye, shaves off his hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, and out of faith leaves the household life and becomes homeless to train in the path. Seeing as it really is the arising and ceasing of forms cognized by the eye, [seeing] their attraction, their peril, and the escape from them, he dwells with a mind at peace within.

Suppose that he then sees [another] person who is not yet detached from sensual desire for forms, who is consumed by craving for forms, who becomes heated up by the fever of forms. When he sees that person engaging with forms cognized by the eye, [forms] that are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire, at that time he does not praise them and does not rejoice with them. Māgandiya, what do you think? When [he sees] this pleasure, which is dependent on craving and dependent on forms, when that person is delighting in this pleasure, he does not praise them, because it is trifling and tawdry; he does not rejoice with them, because it is trifling and tawdry. Māgandiya, would you have something to say to him?<sup>214</sup>

671a

He answered the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”
[The World-honored One asked:]

Māgandiya, what do you think? Suppose a person who, before going forth to train in the path, in the same way cognizes sounds with the ear . . . odors with the nose . . . tastes with the tongue . . . tangibles with the body, [tangibles] that are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire. Suppose that at a later time he gives up such tangibles cognized with the body, shaves off his hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, and out of faith leaves the household life and becomes homeless to train in the path. Seeing as it really is the arising and ceasing of tangibles cognized by the body, [seeing] their attraction, their peril, and the escape from them, he dwells with a mind at peace within.

Suppose that he then sees [another] person who is not yet detached from sensual desire for tangibles, who is consumed by craving for tangibles, who becomes heated up by the fever of tangibles. When he sees that person engaging with tangibles cognized by the body, [tangibles] that are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire, at that time he does not praise him and does not rejoice with him. Māgandiya, what do you think? When [he sees] this pleasure, which is dependent on craving and dependent on tangibles, when that person is delighting in this pleasure, he does not praise them, because it is trifling and tawdry; he does not rejoice with them, because it is trifling and tawdry. Māgandiya, would you have something to say to him?

He answered the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

The World-honored One asked:<sup>215</sup>

Māgandiya, what do you think? Suppose a person who, before going forth to train in the path, is [equipped] with the five strands of sensual pleasure, which are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire. At a later time he gives up the five strands of sensual pleasure, shaves off his hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, and out of faith leaves the household life and becomes homeless to train in the path. Seeing as it really is the arising and ceasing of the five strands of sensual pleasure, their attraction, their peril, and the escape from them, he dwells with a mind at peace within.

Suppose that he then sees [another] person who is not yet detached from sensual desire, who is consumed by sensual craving, who becomes heated up by the fever of sensual pleasures. When he sees that person engaging with the five strands of sensual pleasures, which are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire, at that time he does not praise them and does not rejoice with them. Māgandiya, what do you think? When [he sees] this pleasure, which is dependent on sensual desire and dependent on sensual craving, when that person is delighting in this pleasure, he does not praise them, because it is trifling and tawdry; he does not rejoice with them, because it is trifling and tawdry. Māgandiya, would you have something to say to him?

He answered the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

[The World-honored One said:]

Māgandiya, at the time before I had gone forth to train in the path, I obtained easily, without difficulty, the five strands of sensual pleasure, which are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire.<sup>216</sup> At a later time I gave up the five strands of sensual pleasure, shaved off my hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and became homeless to train in the path. Seeing as it really is the arising and ceasing of the five strands of sensual pleasure, their attraction, their peril, and the escape from them, I dwell with a mind at peace within.

I see a person who is not yet detached from sensual desire, who is consumed by sensual craving, who becomes heated up by the fever of sensual desire. When I see that person engaging with the five strands of sensual pleasure, which are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire, at that time I do not praise them and do not rejoice with them. Māgandiya, what do you think? When [I see] this pleasure, which is dependent on sensual desire and dependent on sensual craving, when that person is delighting in this pleasure, I do not praise them, because it is trifling and tawdry; I do not rejoice with them, because it is trifling and tawdry. Māgandiya, have you something to say to me? 671b

He answered the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

The World-honored One said:

Māgandiya, suppose [there is] a householder or the son of a householder who enjoys much wealth and prosperity, immeasurable property, plentiful livestock, tenants, and feudatories, and who is endowed with an abundance of the various requisites of life. He obtains easily, without difficulty, the five strands of sensual pleasure. He accomplishes good conduct of the body . . . of speech . . . and good conduct of mind. When he is near death he does not wish to let go of the five strands of sensual pleasure. With the breaking up of the body at death he ascends to a good realm of existence and attains rebirth in some heaven, where he dwells equipped with the five strands of [heavenly] sensual pleasure. Māgandiya, would this deva or son of a deva prefer to give up the five strands of heavenly sensual pleasure, delighting in human sensual pleasure and longing for it?

He answered the World-honored One:

No, Gotama. Why is that? Human sensual pleasure is foul and impure.<sup>217</sup> To his mind it would be extremely unclean and unapproachable. He would detest it as wretched. Gotama, heavenly sensual pleasure is superior to human sensual pleasure, more sublime, more excellent. That that deva or son of a deva would give up the five strands of heavenly sensual pleasure, delighting in human sensual pleasure and longing for it—that is not possible.

[The World-honored One said:]

Māgandiya, in the same way, I abandoned human sensual pleasure and crossed over to heavenly sensual pleasure by shaving off my hair and beard, donning the yellow robes, and out of faith leaving the household life and becoming homeless to train in the path. Seeing as it really is the arising and ceasing of the five strands of sensual pleasure, their attraction, their peril, and the escape from them, I dwell with a mind at peace within.

I see a person who is not yet detached from sensual desire, who is consumed by sensual craving, who becomes heated up by the fever of sensual desire. When I see that person engaging with the five strands of sensual pleasure, which are longed for, pleasing to the mind, and connected with sensual desire, at that time I do not praise them and do not rejoice with them. Māgandiya, what do you think? When they have this pleasure, which is dependent on sensual desire and dependent on sensual craving, when that person is delighting in this pleasure, I do not praise them, because it is trifling and tawdry; I do not rejoice with them, because it is trifling and tawdry. Māgandiya, have you something to say to me?

He answered the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

The World-honored One said:

Māgandiya, suppose a person afflicted with leprosy, their body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, who scratches their sores open with their fingernails and goes to a firepit to cauterize them. Māgandiya, what do you think? That person afflicted with leprosy, their body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, who scratches their sores open with their fingernails and goes to a firepit to cauterize them—would this person, by this means, succeed in getting rid of their disease and becoming strong, without damaging their faculties, shaking off the leprosy, with their body becoming completely healthy, becoming just as it was before, returning to its former condition?<sup>218</sup>

671c

He answered the World-honored One:

No Gotama. Why is that? That person afflicted with leprosy, their body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, who scratches their sores open with their fingernails and goes to a firepit to cauterize them—by this means they will cause even more sores to arise, and cause the earlier sores to become bigger. Yet, they get pleasure from [scratching and cauterizing] their leprosy sores.

[The World-honored One said:]

Māgandīya, just as that person afflicted with leprosy, their body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, who scratches their sores open with their fingernails and goes to a firepit to cauterize them and by this means causes even more sores to arise, and the earlier sores to become bigger, yet gets pleasure from their leprosy sores—in the same way, Māgandīya, living beings who are not detached from sensual desire, who are consumed by sensual craving, who become heated up by the fever of sensual desire, nevertheless engage in sensual pleasure.

Māgandīya, in this way living beings who are not detached from sensual desire, who are consumed by sensual craving, who become heated up by the fever of sensual desire, nevertheless engage in sensual pleasure. In this way their sensual desire increases, their sensual craving increases, yet they get pleasure from their sensual craving. If they do not abandon sensual desire, do not become detached from sensual craving, then it is impossible that they should dwell, in the past, in the future, or in the present, with a mind at peace within. Why is that? This is not the way to abandon sensual desire and become detached from sensual craving, namely engaging in sensual pleasures.

The World-honored One said:

Māgandīya, suppose a king or a great minister obtains the five strands of sensual pleasures easily, without difficulty. If he does not abandon sensual desire, does not become detached from sensual craving, then it is impossible that he should dwell, in the past, in the future, or in the present, with a mind at peace within. Why is that? This is not the way to abandon sensual desire and become detached from sensual craving, namely engaging in sensual pleasures. In this way, Māgandīya, living beings who are not detached from sensual desire, who are consumed by sensual craving, who become heated up by the fever of sensual desire, engage in sensual pleasures.

Māgandīya, if living beings are not detached from sensual desire, are consumed by sensual craving, become heated up by the fever of sensual desire, and engage in sensual pleasure, then in this way their sensual desire increases, their sensual craving increases, yet they get pleasure from their sensual craving. If they do not abandon sensual desire, do not become detached from sensual craving, then it is impossible that they should dwell, in the past, in the future, or in the present, with a mind at peace within. Why is that? This is not the way to abandon sensual desire and become detached from sensual craving, namely engaging in sensual pleasures.

672a Māgandiya, it is just like a person afflicted with leprosy, his body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, who scratches his sores open with his fingernails and goes to a firepit to cauterize them. Out of empathy and pity for him a person who seeks his welfare, who seeks his happiness and peace, gives him good medicine appropriate to his condition. Having taken that good medicine appropriate to his condition, he gets rid of the disease and gains strength, without damage to his faculties. Having shaken off the leprosy, his body becomes completely healthy, becomes just as it was before, returned to its former condition. If he sees a person who is afflicted by leprosy, his body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, who scratches his sores open with his fingernails and goes to a firepit to cauterize them, Māgandiya, having seen that person, would he feel delight in his mind and praise him joyfully?

He answered the World-honored One, “No Gotama. Why is that? One who is sick needs medication; one who is not sick does not need it.”

[The World-honored One said:]

Māgandiya, what do you think? Consider that leper who has gotten rid of the disease in this way and gained strength, without damage to his faculties, having shaken off the leprosy, his body having become completely healthy, become as it was before, returned to its former condition. If two strong men seize him and take him to the firepit to cauterize him, then in that situation he would be writhing in fear, trying to avoid having his body scorched.<sup>219</sup> Māgandiya, what do you think? Is it that the firepit is now hotter, more painful, and more dangerous than previously?

He answered the World-honored One:

No, Gotama. Previously, when he was afflicted with leprosy, his body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, and having scratched his sores open with his fingernails and having gone to the firepit to cauterize them, he perceived the pain as a greatly pleasurable contact, his mind being deranged and his perception distorted. Gotama, having now gotten rid of the disease in this way and having gained strength, without damage to his faculties, having shaken off the leprosy, his body completely healthy, becoming just as it was before, returned to its former condition, he perceives what is painful as greatly painful, his mind being composed and his perception not being distorted.

[The World-honored One said:]

Māgandiya, just as a person afflicted with leprosy, his body covered in blisters, being eaten by maggots, scratching his sores open with his fingernails and going to a firepit to cauterize them, perceives what is painful as a greatly pleasurable contact, his mind being deranged and his perception distorted—in the same way, Māgandiya, living beings who are not detached from sensual desire, who are consumed by sensual craving, who become heated up by the fever of sensual desire and engage in sensual pleasures, perceive sensual pleasures that are painful as pleasurable, their minds being deranged and their perceptions distorted.

Māgandiya, just as that person who has gotten rid of the disease and gained strength, without damage to his faculties, having shaken off the leprosy, his body becoming completely healthy, just as it was before, returned to its former condition, perceives what is painful as greatly painful contact, his mind being composed and his perception no longer distorted—in the same way, Māgandiya, I perceive sensual pleasures that are painful as painful, because I have attained the truth and my perception is not distorted. Why is that?

Māgandiya, in the past sensual pleasure was impure and foul, very dirty and objectionable to the mind, to be disliked as painful to touch. In the future . . . In the present, sensual pleasure is impure and foul, very dirty and objectionable to the mind, to be disliked as painful to touch. Māgandiya, the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, says:

Freedom from disease is the supreme gain;
Nirvana is the supreme happiness.<sup>220</sup>

672b The heterodox practitioner Māgandiya said to the World-honored One:
Gotama, in the past I also heard from ancient senior elders who practiced the holy life,

Freedom from disease is the supreme gain;
Nirvana is the supreme happiness.

The World-honored One asked him:

Māgandiya, if you heard in the past from ancient senior elders who practiced the holy life,

Freedom from disease is the supreme gain;
Nirvana is the supreme happiness.

Māgandiya, what is freedom from disease? What is nirvana?

At this, the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya stroked with both hands his body—which is [comparable to] an illness, a tumor, a thorn, a snake, which is impermanent, dukkha, empty, not-self—and said, “Gotama, this is freedom from disease. This is nirvana.”<sup>221</sup>

The World-honored One said:

Māgandiya, it is just as if someone born blind were to hear a person with eyesight say, “Pure white, without a stain; pure white without a stain,” and having heard this, were to go searching for this pure whiteness. A swindler, not seeking [the blind person’s] welfare, not seeking his happiness and peace, hands him a dirty, greasy, impure cloth and says, “You should know, this is a pure white, stainless cloth. Respectfully accept it with both hands and wear it on your body.” The blind person is delighted, respectfully accepts it with both hands, and puts it on his body, saying, “Pure white, without a stain; pure white without a stain.” Māgandiya, does that person speak knowing for himself or does he speak not knowing for himself? Does he speak seeing for himself or does he speak not seeing for himself?

The heterodox practitioner Māgandiya replied, “Gotama, from what you say, he really does not know or see.”

The World-honored One said:

In the same way, Māgandiya, like a blind person, without eyes, you have stroked with both hands your body—which is [comparable to] an illness, a tumor, a thorn, a snake, which is impermanent, dukkha, empty, not-self—and said, “Gotama, this is freedom from disease. This is nirvana.”

Māgandiya, you have never experienced freedom from disease. How much less could you know and see nirvana? It is impossible for you to say that you know and see it. Māgandiya, the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, says,

Freedom from disease is the supreme gain.
Nirvana is the supreme happiness.
Of all paths the eightfold right path
Leads to peace, to the deathless.<sup>222</sup>

Many people have heard of this, and many heterodox practitioners, having heard this stanza, have handed it down in turn, unable to understand its meaning. Having heard it they wish to seek instruction; [but,] being equally foolish, they mislead one another.<sup>223</sup>

Their own present body is made up of the four elements, born of father and mother, to be nourished by food and drink constantly, to be clothed, massaged, and bathed, having to endure being mishandled, which is of a nature to deteriorate, to wear away, to fall apart. They see it as a self, cling to it as a self. Conditioned by clinging there is becoming; conditioned by becoming there is birth; conditioned by birth there are old age and death; conditioned by old age and death there are worry and woe, weeping and tears, sorrow and pain, distress and vexation. Thus arises this great mass of pure dukkha.<sup>224</sup> 672c

Then the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya rose from his seat, arranged his robe to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said:

Gotama, I now have complete faith in the renunciant Gotama. May the renunciant Gotama well teach me the Dharma so that I come to know what is freedom from disease, what is nirvana.

The World-honored One said:

Māgandiya, if the eye of noble wisdom is not yet purified in you and I were to teach you the freedom from disease, nirvana, you would not be able to understand, and that would just be troublesome for me. Māgandiya, it is just as with a person born blind and someone else tells him, “You should know there are the colors blue, yellow, red, and white.” Māgandiya, because of what that other person said, would the person born blind know the colors blue, yellow, red, and white?<sup>225</sup>

He answered the World-honored One, “No, Gotama.”

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, Māgandiya, if the eye of noble wisdom is not purified in you and I were to teach you the freedom from disease, nirvana, you would not be able to understand, and that would just be troublesome for me.

Māgandiya, I shall tell you of a good medicine appropriate to your condition, to purify the unpurified eye of noble wisdom in you. Māgandiya, if the eye of noble wisdom becomes purified in you, you will understand for yourself what is freedom from disease, what is nirvana.

Māgandiya, it is just as with a person born blind, whose relatives, out of empathy, seeking his welfare and seeking his happiness, call an eye doctor. That eye doctor gives him various treatments, such as [inducing] vomiting, [administering] a laxative, nasal instillations, rectal instillations, pricking the veins, or causing tears to flow. Māgandiya, it is possible that he recovers sight in both eyes.

Māgandiya, if he recovers sight in both eyes, he sees for himself the colors blue, yellow, red, and white. He sees that dirty, greasy, impure cloth and thinks, “That person is my enemy. For a long time he has cheated me with this dirty greasy cloth.” He hates him, Māgandiya, and might even be capable of killing him.

In the same way, Māgandiya, I shall tell you of a good medicine appropriate to your condition, to purify the unpurified eye of noble wisdom in you. Māgandiya, if the eye of noble wisdom becomes purified in you, you will understand for yourself what is freedom from disease, what is nirvana.

Māgandiya, there are four principles that lead to purification of the eye of noble wisdom that has not yet been purified. What are the four? They are associating in a respectful and receptive manner with good friends, hearing the good Dharma, giving it proper attention, and advancing in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma.<sup>226</sup> Māgandiya, you should train like this. Associate in a respectful and receptive manner with good friends! Hear the good Dharma! Give it proper attention! Advance in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma! Māgandiya, you should train like this.

673a

Māgandiya, having associated in a respectful and receptive manner with good friends, you will hear the good Dharma. Having heard the good Dharma, you will give it proper attention. Having given it proper attention, you will advance in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma. Having advanced in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma, you will know dukkha as it really is, you will know the arising of dukkha . . . , you will know the cessation of dukkha . . . and you will know the path leading to the cessation of dukkha as it really is.<sup>227</sup>

What is knowledge of dukkha as it really is? It is that birth is dukkha; old age is dukkha; disease is dukkha; death is dukkha; association with what is disliked is dukkha; separation from what is loved is dukkha; being unable to get what one wishes is dukkha; in short, the five aggregates affected by clinging are dukkha. This is knowledge of dukkha as it really is.

What is knowledge of the arising of dukkha as it really is? It is craving, which brings future existence and is accompanied by delight and desire, wishing for this or that existence. This is knowledge of the arising of dukkha as it really is.

What is knowledge of the cessation of dukkha as it really is? It is the remainderless cessation of craving, which brings future existence and is accompanied by delight and desire, wishing for this or that existence, its eradication, giving up, vomiting out, termination, fading away, disappearance, and appeasement. This is knowledge of the cessation of dukkha as it really is.

What is knowledge of the path [leading to] the cessation of dukkha as it really is? It is the noble eightfold path, right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight. This is knowledge of the path [leading to] the cessation of dukkha as it really is.

When this teaching was given, there arose in the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya the spotless, immaculate Dharma eye in regard to all phenomena.<sup>228</sup>

Then the heterodox practitioner Māgandiya saw the Dharma, attained the Dharma, realized the bright pure Dharma; he abandoned doubt, went beyond perplexity; he became independent of other teachers, would never again follow others; and he became free of hesitation. Having been established in the attainment of the fruit, he had attained fearlessness in the Dharma taught by the World-honored One.

Then he rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, and said, "World-honored One, may I obtain the going forth to train in the path, receive the full ordination, and become a monk?"

The World-honored One said, "Welcome, monk! Practice the holy life!"<sup>229</sup> The heterodox practitioner Māgandiya obtained the going forth to train in the path. He received the full ordination and became a monk. Māgandiya, having gone forth to train in the path, having received the full ordination, came to know the Dharma and attained arahantship.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Venerable Māgandiya was delighted and received it respectfully.

673b

154. The Discourse to Vāseṭṭha at the Hall [of Migāra's Mother]<sup>230</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattihī, in the Eastern Park, in the Hall of Migāra's Mother.

At that time there were two members of the brahmin class, Vāseṭṭha and Bhāradvāja, who had shaved off their hair and beards, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and become homeless to train in the path.<sup>231</sup> Any brahmins who saw them rebuked them severely and with much bitterness, saying:

Brahmins are the highest class; others are not equal to it. The brahmin class is white; all others are black. Brahmins attain purity; nonbrahmins do not attain purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth; brahmins were created by Brahmā. You have given up what is superior to follow what is not equal to it. You have given up what is white to follow what is black. Those bald-pated renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness, their lineage is severed since they are without sons. Therefore, what you have done is a great evil, the ultimate crime, a great fault.<sup>232</sup>

At that time the World-honored One, having risen from sitting in meditation, had come down from the hall in the afternoon and was walking back and forth in the open, in the shade of the hall, teaching the monks the profound and sublime Dharma. Venerable Vāseṭṭha saw from afar that the World-honored One, having risen from sitting in meditation, had come down from the hall in the afternoon and was walking back and forth in the open in the shade of the hall, teaching the monks the profound and sublime Dharma.

Seeing this, Venerable Vāseṭṭha said:

Venerable Bhāradvāja, you should know that the World-honored One, having risen from sitting in meditation, has come down from the hall in the afternoon and is walking back and forth in the open in the shade of the hall, teaching the monks the profound and sublime Dharma. Venerable Bhāradvāja, let us together approach the Buddha. Perhaps we will thereby be able to hear the Dharma from the Buddha.

Then Vāseṭṭha and Bhāradvāja approached the Buddha, paid homage by bowing their heads [to his feet], and followed him, walking back and forth.

The World-honored One turned around and said to the two:

Vāseṭṭha, you two are brahmins who have left the brahmin class, shaved off hair and beards, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and became homeless to train in the path. On seeing this, do the brahmins not greatly rebuke you?

[Vāseṭṭha] replied, “Indeed, World-honored One, on seeing this, the brahmins severely scold and rebuke us with much bitterness.”

The World-honored One asked, “Vāseṭṭha, how do the brahmins, on seeing this, severely scold and rebuke you with much bitterness?”

673c

[Vāseṭṭha] replied:

World-honored One, on seeing us, the brahmins say, “Brahmins are the highest class; the others are not equal to it. The brahmin class is white; all the others are black. Brahmins attain purity; nonbrahmins do not attain purity. Brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth; brahmins were created by Brahmā. You have given up what is superior to follow what is not equal to it. You have given up the white to follow the black.

Those bald-pated renunciants are bound by [their own] darkness. Their lineage is severed, since they are without sons. Therefore, what you have done is a great evil, the ultimate crime, a great fault.” World-honored One, on seeing us, this is how the brahmins severely scold and rebuke us with much bitterness.

The World-honored One said:

Vāseṭṭha, what those brahmins say is most evil, extremely troublesome,<sup>233</sup> and lacking foundation. Why is that? It is because they are foolish, have poor understanding, do not recognize a fertile field [of merit], and cannot know for themselves, that they say,<sup>234</sup> “We brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. We brahmins were created by Brahmā.” Why is that?

Vāseṭṭha, regarding this unsurpassable knowledge and conduct that I have realized, I do not talk about superiority based on birth, I do not talk about lineage, I do not talk about matters of pride, about someone being to my liking or not to my liking because of status or because of [ritual purification by] water, or [because of] the sacred texts they study.<sup>235</sup>

Vāseṭṭha, if people are getting married, they ought to talk about their birth, they ought to talk about their lineage, they ought to talk about matters of pride, about someone being to their liking or not to their liking because of status or because of [ritual purification by] water, or [because of] the sacred texts they study.

Vāseṭṭha, if someone values birth, values lineage, values matters of pride, then [this person] is very far from the unsurpassable knowledge and conduct that I have realized. Vāseṭṭha, one who talks about birth, talks about lineage, talks about matters of pride, about someone being to their liking or not to their liking because of status or because of [ritual purification by] water, or [because of] the sacred texts they study, is separated from the supreme knowledge and conduct that I have realized.

Again, Vāseṭṭha, as for the three classes, they do not make all people quarrel with one another about their various wholesome and unwholesome qualities. They are praised or not praised by noble ones.

What are the three? The warrior class, the brahmin class, and the merchant class.<sup>236</sup> Vāseṭṭha, what do you think? Is it that a warrior kills living beings, takes what is not given, engages in sexual misconduct, speaks falsehood . . . up to . . . has wrong view, and a merchant does the same but a brahmin does not?

[Vāseṭṭha] replied:

World-honored One, a warrior may kill living beings, take what is not given, engage in sexual misconduct, speak falsehood . . . up to . . . have wrong view; and so too may a brahmin or a merchant.

The World-honored One asked:

Vāseṭṭha, what do you think? Is it that a brahmin abstains from killing, having abandoned killing . . . taking what is not given . . . engaging in sexual misconduct . . . speaking falsehood . . . up to . . . abstaining from wrong view having gained right view; but a warrior or a merchant does not?

[Vāseṭṭha] replied:

World-honored One, a brahmin may abstain from killing, having abandoned killing . . . taking what is not given . . . engaging in sexual misconduct . . . speaking falsehood . . . up to . . . abstaining from wrong view having gained right view; and so too may a warrior or a merchant.

674a

The World-honored One asked:

Vāseṭṭha, what do you think? Are the countless evil and unwholesome things practiced [only] by warriors and merchants and not by brahmins? Are the countless wholesome things practiced [only] by brahmins and not by warriors and merchants?

[Vāseṭṭha] replied:

World-honored One, there being countless evil and unwholesome things, they may be practiced by warriors and merchants, and similarly also by brahmins. There being countless wholesome things, they may be practiced by brahmins, and similarly also by warriors and merchants.

[The World-honored One said:]

Vāseṭṭha, if the countless evil and unwholesome things were consistently practiced only by warriors and merchants and not by brahmins, and if the countless wholesome things were consistently practiced by brahmins and not by warriors and merchants, then the brahmins would be able to make this statement, “We brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth; brahmins are created by Brahmā.” Why is that?

Vāseṭṭha, it is seen that brahmin women first get married; and after having been married it is seen that they at some time become pregnant; and after having become pregnant it is seen that they at some time give birth to a boy or a girl. Thus, Vāseṭṭha, brahmins are born in the usual way, through the [mother’s] birth canal. However, they lie and slander Brahmā by saying, “We brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth. Brahmins are created by Brahmā.”

Vāseṭṭha, if clansmen, from various clans, with various surnames, leave those various clans and, having shaved off their hair and beards, don the yellow robes, and out of faith leave the household life and become homeless to train in the path under me, then they should say, “We brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth, brahmins created by Brahmā.”

Why is that? Vāseṭṭha, those sons of clansmen who have entered my true Dharma and discipline and accepted my true Dharma and discipline reach the further shore. Abandoning doubt, transcending perplexity, becoming free of hesitation, they attain fearlessness in the Dharma of the World-honored One. Therefore they can say, “We brahmins are children of Brahmā, born from his mouth, brahmins created by Brahmā.”

Vāseṭṭha, that “Brahmā” refers to the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened. “Brahmā” is the Tathāgata. “The Cool” is the Tathāgata, who is without distress, without heat, and who never leaves that state. This is the Tathāgata.

Vāseṭṭha, what do you think? Do the Sakyans humble themselves and, with affectionate respect, support and revere King Pasenadi of Kosala?

He replied, “That is so, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked:

674b Vāseṭṭha, what do you think? As the Sakyans humble themselves and, with affectionate respect, support and revere King Pasenadi of Kosala, does Pasenadi, the king of Kosala, in this way humble himself and, with affectionate respect, support and revere me?

[Vāseṭṭha] answered the World-honored One, saying:

That the Sakyans humble themselves and, with affectionate respect, support and revere King Pasenadi of Kosala—this is not remarkable. That King Pasenadi of Kosala humbles himself and, with affectionate respect, supports and reveres the World-honored One—this is indeed remarkable.

The World-honored One said:

Vāseṭṭha, when King Pasenadi of Kosala humbles himself before my body and, with affectionate respect, supports and reveres me, he does not have this in his mind, “The renunciant Gotama is from the superior class; my class is inferior. The renunciant Gotama has much wealth; I have little wealth.”<sup>237</sup> The renunciant Gotama is of beautiful appearance; my appearance is not beautiful. The renunciant Gotama has great might; I have little might. The renunciant Gotama has good knowledge; I have bad knowledge.”<sup>238</sup>

Instead, Vāseṭṭha, because King Pasenadi of Kosala has affectionate respect for the Dharma, supports it and reveres it, therefore he humbles himself before my body and, with affectionate respect, supports and reveres me.

Then the World-honored One said to the monks:

Vāseṭṭha, there comes a time when this world goes to total destruction. When this world goes to destruction, any living beings that exist are reborn among the devas of Radiance (ābhassarā-devā). There they have subtle bodies that are mind-made, completely endowed with all limbs and faculties, and feeding on joy. With [their] self-luminous bodies they rise up into space, pure and beautiful, and remain [there] for a long time.

Vāseṭṭha, there comes a time when [the space that was formerly occupied by] the great earth becomes filled with water. The surface of that ocean is stirred up by the wind and condenses as an essence that coagulates. It is just as when milk is churned, butter condenses as an essence that coagulates.

In the same way, Vāseṭṭha, there comes a time when [the space that was formerly occupied by] the great earth becomes filled with water; and the surface of that ocean is stirred up by the wind and condenses as an essence that coagulates. From this arises an earthly savor that has color, fragrance, and flavor. What color is it? It is like the color of fresh butter and mature butter. What flavor does it have? It is like the flavor of honey balls.

Vāseṭṭha, there comes a time when this world again comes into being. At that time any living beings that have been reborn among the devas of Radiance, with the exhaustion of their life span, the exhaustion of their karma, and the exhaustion of their merit, die and are reborn here as people. Having been reborn here, they [still] have subtle bodies that are mind-made, completely endowed with all limbs and faculties, and feeding on joy. With [their] self-luminous bodies they rise up into space, pure and beautiful, and remain there for a long time.

674c

Vāseṭṭha, at that time in the world there were no sun and moon, no constellations of stars, no day and night, no month or half month, and no seasons and no years. Vāseṭṭha, at that time there was no [distinction between] father and mother, no [distinction between] male and female, and also no [distinction between] master and slave. There were just equally ranked living beings.

Then one living being, who was greedy, gluttonous, and corrupt, had this thought, “What is the flavor of the earth? Let me take this flavorsome earth on my finger and taste it.”

Then that being took the flavorsome earth on his finger and tasted it. In this way that living being came to know the flavor of the earth. He wanted to get more of it to eat. Then that being further had this thought, “Why should I tire myself by using my finger to eat the flavorsome earth. Let me now rather use my hands to gather up this flavorsome earth and eat it.” Then that being used his hands to gather up the flavorsome earth and ate it.

Among those beings there were others who, seeing that being gathering up the flavorsome earth with his hands and eating it, thought, “This is truly skillful. This is truly ingenious. Let us too gather up this flavorsome earth with our hands and eat it!” Then those beings gathered up the flavorsome earth with their hands and ate it.

To the extent that those beings gathered up the flavorsome earth with their hands and ate it, to that extent their bodies became fatter, heavier, and more solid. The formerly clear and pure [luminosity] of their complexion disappeared and darkness naturally arose.

Vāseṭṭha, it is a rule of the world that this naturally happens: if darkness arises, sun and moon must arise; once sun and moon have arisen, the constellations of stars arise; once the constellation of stars have arisen, day and night come into being; once day and night have come into being, there are months and half months, seasons and years. Those [beings] ate the flavorsome earth and remained in the world for a long time.

Vāseṭṭha, those beings that ate much of the flavorsome earth came to be of ugly complexion; those who ate little of the flavorsome earth came to be of beautiful complexion. From then on they understood complexions as superior or inferior. Because of their superior or inferior complexions, beings despised one another, saying, “My complexion is superior; your complexion is not equal to it.” When, because of superiority and inferiority of complexion, arrogance and evil mind states had arisen, the flavorsome earth disappeared.

When the flavorsome earth had disappeared, the beings came together with much crying and lamenting, saying, “What has become of the flavorsome earth? What has become of the flavorsome earth?”

It is just as, nowadays, a person who has let some delicious morsel dissolve in their mouth similarly <says> those ancient words.<sup>239</sup> Even though they have heard [those ancient words] and bear them in mind, they do not understand their meaning. The meaning of this saying should be regarded as just this.

Vāseṭṭha, after the flavorsome earth had disappeared, there arose for those beings an earth-fat that had color, fragrance, and flavor. What color did it have? It was like the color of fresh butter and mature butter. What flavor did it have? It was like the flavor of honey balls. Those [beings] 675a ate this earth-fat and remained in the world for a long time.

Vāseṭṭha, if beings ate much of the earth-fat, they came to be of ugly complexion; those who ate little of the earth-fat came to be of beautiful complexion. From then on they understood complexions as superior or inferior. Because of their superior or inferior complexions, beings despised one another, saying, “My complexion is superior; your complexion is not equal to it.” When, because of superiority and inferiority of complexion, arrogance and evil mind states had arisen, the earth-fat disappeared.

When the earth-fat had disappeared, the beings came together with much crying and lamenting, saying, “What has become of the earth-fat? What has become of the earth-fat?” It is just as, nowadays, a person who is being reproached by another similarly <says> those ancient words. Even though they have heard [those ancient words] and bear them in mind, they do not understand their meaning. The meaning of this saying should be regarded as just this.

Vāsetṭha, after the earth-fat had disappeared, there arose for those beings a creeper that had color, fragrance, and flavor. What color did it have? It was like the color of the kadamba flower. What flavor did it have? It was like the flavor of sticky honey balls. Those [beings] ate the creeper and remained in the world for a long time.

Vāsetṭha, those beings that ate much of the creeper came to be of ugly complexion; those who ate little of the creeper came to be of beautiful complexion. From then on they understood complexions as superior or inferior. Because of their superior or inferior complexions, beings despised one another, saying, “My complexion is superior; your complexion is not equal to it.” When, because of superiority and inferiority of complexion, arrogance and evil mind states had arisen, the creeper disappeared.

When the creeper had disappeared, the beings came together with much crying and lamenting, saying, “What has become of the creeper? What has become of the creeper?” It is just as, nowadays, a person who is being touched by bitter experiences similarly <says> those ancient words. Even though they have heard [those ancient words] and bear them in mind, they do not understand their meaning. The meaning of this saying should be regarded as just this.

Vāsetṭha, after the creeper had disappeared, there arose for those beings natural nonglutinous rice, which was white, clean, without husks, and without stalks, four inches long. Harvested in the morning, it would be grown [again] by the evening; harvested in the evening, it would be grown [again] by the morning. It had a salty taste when cooked and did not give rise to wind. The beings ate this natural nonglutinous rice.

As those beings ate the natural nonglutinous rice, those beings came to be of different shapes. Some beings came to be of male shape; some beings came to be of female shape. Since those beings had come to have male or female shape, on looking at each other they said, “An evil being has appeared; an evil being has appeared.”

Vāseṭṭha, “an evil being has appeared” refers to the [appearance of men and] women. As those beings had male and female shapes, those beings observed each other more. Having observed each other more, they eyed each other more and more. Having eyed each other more and more, they became more and more desirous of each other. Having become more and more desirous of each other, they became overwhelmingly heated up. Having become overwhelmingly heated up, they had craving and attachment for each other. Having craving and attachment for each other, they engaged in sensual behavior. 675b

When people saw others engaging in sensual behavior, they struck them with sticks and stones or threw staves and clods at them, saying, “Woe betide you! You evil beings are doing what is against the Dharma. How can beings do this together?” It was just as nowadays people greet the bride and scatter simple flowers over her<sup>240</sup> or place a flower garland on her and say, “Peace to the bride! Peace to the bride!” Thus what was formerly undesirable has now become desirable.

Vāseṭṭha, when beings were embarrassed by these evil impure things, which are detestable, and felt ashamed of them, they withdrew from the crowd for a day, or two days, up to six or seven days, half a month, one month, up to a year [to engage in them].

Vāseṭṭha, when beings wanted to get to engage in this impure practice, they constructed houses and said, “In here one can do evil; in here one can do evil!” Vāseṭṭha, in the world this is the first cause and condition for the coming into being of the principle of house [construction]. This is ancient knowledge, primary knowledge. It is in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma; and, being in accordance with the Dharma, it is respected by the people.

Among them was one being who was lazy and thought,<sup>241</sup> “Why do I every day keep going [repeatedly] to get the natural nonglutinous rice?

What if I were to get all the rice for one day just once?” Then he got all the rice to eat for one day just once. Then a certain [other] being said to that being, “Being, shall we go together to get rice?”

The [first] one replied, “I have gotten it already, all at once. You go and get it by yourself.” On hearing this, the [second] being thought, “This is truly skillful. This is truly ingenious. What if I were to get the rice to be eaten tomorrow at once as well?” Then he also got the rice for the next day at once and brought it back. Another [third] being said to that [second] being, “Being, shall we go together to get rice?”

That one replied, “I have already gotten the rice for tomorrow at once and brought it back. You go and get it by yourself.” On hearing this, the being thought, “This is truly skillful. This is truly ingenious. What if I were now to get rice to eat for seven days all at once and bring it back?” Then that being got rice for seven days at once and brought it back.

Because those beings took the natural nonglutinous rice excessively and stored it up, overnight the nonglutinous rice developed a skinlike husk. Having been harvested for up to seven days, it similarly developed a skinlike husk, and the places where it had been harvested did not grow back.

Then those beings came together with much crying and lamenting, saying:

675c We have given rise to evil and unwholesome states, in that we collected and stored up rice overnight. Why is that? Previously we had subtle bodies that were mind-made, completely endowed with all limbs and faculties, feeding on joy, self-luminous bodies. Rising up into space, our pure bodies remained for a long time. A flavorsome earth arose for us, which had color, fragrance, and taste. What color did it have? It was like the color of fresh butter or mature butter. What flavor did it have? It was like the flavor of honey balls. We ate the flavorsome earth and remained in the world for a long time.

Those of us who ate much of the flavorsome earth came to be of ugly complexion; those who ate little of the flavorsome earth came to be of beautiful complexion. From then on we understood complexions as superior or inferior. Because of our superior or inferior complexions, we despised one another, saying, “My complexion is superior; your complexion is not equal to it.” When, because of superiority and inferiority of complexion, arrogance and evil mind states had arisen, the flavorsome earth disappeared.

After the flavorsome earth had disappeared, there arose for us an earth-fat that had color, fragrance, and flavor. What color did it have? It was like the color of fresh butter and mature butter. What flavor did it have? It was like the flavor of honey balls. We ate this earth-fat and remained in the world for a long time.

Those of us who ate much of the earth-fat came to be of ugly complexion; those who ate little of the earth-fat came to be of beautiful complexion. From then on we understood complexions as superior or inferior. Because of our superior or inferior complexions, we despised one another, saying, “My complexion is superior; your complexion is not equal to it.” When, because of superiority and inferiority of complexion, arrogance and evil mind states had arisen, the earth-fat disappeared.

After the earth-fat had disappeared, there arose for us a creeper that had color, fragrance, and flavor. What color did it have? It was like the color of the kadamba flower. What flavor did it have? It was like the flavor of sticky honey balls. We ate the creeper and remained in the world for a long time.

Those of us who ate much of the creeper came to be of ugly complexion; those who ate little of the creeper came to be of beautiful complexion. From then on we understood complexions as superior or inferior. Because of our superior or inferior complexions, we despised one another, saying, “My complexion is superior; your complexion is not equal to it.” When, because of superiority and inferiority of complexion, arrogance and evil mind states had arisen, the creeper disappeared.

After the creeper had disappeared, there arose for us natural nonglutinous rice, which was white, clean, without husks, and without stalks, four inches long. Harvested in the morning, it would be grown [again] by the evening; harvested in the evening, it would be grown [again] by the morning. It had a salty taste when cooked and did not give rise to wind. We ate this natural nonglutinous rice.

Because we took the natural nonglutinous rice excessively and stored it up, overnight the nonglutinous rice developed a skinlike husk.

Having been harvested for up to seven days it similarly developed a skin-like husk, and the places where it had been harvested did not grow back.

What if we were now to create fields for sowing and set up boundary markers?

676a Then the beings created fields for sowing and set up boundary markers. Among them was one being who had their own rice, yet went into another's field to steal rice. On seeing this, the owner said, "Woe betide you! Woe betide you, evil being! How can you do this? You have your own rice, yet you go into another's field to steal rice. Now go, and do not do this again!"

However, that being stole the other's rice again, altogether three times. Having seen this three times, the owner beat him with his fists and dragged him before the community. He said to the community, "This being has their own rice, yet goes into my field and steals my rice." However, that [accused] being also said to the community, "This being has beaten me with his fists and dragged me before the community."<sup>242</sup>

At this, all the beings came together with much crying and lamenting, saying:

We have given rise to evil and unwholesome states through guarding our fields. Why is that? Because we guard our fields, we quarrel with one another, there is loss and depletion, there is altercation, and there is beating with fists. Let us now select one among the community who is upright, of fine appearance, very handsome, the foremost, to be lord of the fields. Let him rebuke those who should be rebuked. Let him expel those who should be expelled. From the rice that we have obtained, we will deliver and donate to him [an amount] in accordance with the Dharma.

Then the beings together selected one among them who was upright, of fine appearance, very handsome, the foremost, and set him up as lord of the fields. He was to rebuke those who should be rebuked and to expel those who should be expelled.

From the rice they had, they delivered and donated to the lord of the fields [an amount] in accordance with the Dharma. He was lord of the "fields" (khetta) so they called him "warrior" (khattiya). He was empowered according to the Dharma. One who pleases beings by guarding and protecting the practice of morality is a king. He was a king so they called him “King.” Vāsetṭha, this is the first cause and condition for the existence, in the world, of the warrior class. This is ancient, primary knowledge, in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma; and, being in accordance with the Dharma, it is respected by the people.

Then certain other beings considered guarding [one’s fields] as a disease, considered such guarding as a carbuncle, considered such guarding as an arrow or a thorn. They gave up such guarding and relied on forest-dwelling, constructing huts out of grass and leaves and trained in meditation. Each morning at dawn they left the forest and entered a village or city or the royal town to beg for almsfood.

Seeing them, many beings gave to them, respecting and esteeming them and saying:

These other beings consider guarding [one’s fields] as a disease, consider such guarding as a carbuncle, consider such guarding as an arrow or a thorn. They have given up such guarding and rely on forest-dwelling, constructing huts out of grass and leaves and training in meditation. These venerable ones, having “abandoned” (bāhitvā) harming and evil and unwholesome states, are “brahmins” (brāhmaṇa).<sup>243</sup>

Being brahmins, they were called “brahmins.” Those beings who trained in meditation but did not succeed in meditation, who trained in ascetic practices but did not succeed in ascetic practices, who trained in seclusion but did not succeed in seclusion, who trained in unification of the mind but did not succeed in unification of the mind, who trained in being energetic but did not succeed in being energetic, abandoned forest-dwelling and returned to a village or city or the royal town.<sup>244</sup> They constructed houses with four pillars and composed sacred texts. 676b

Many beings, on seeing this, no longer gave to them, no longer respected and esteemed them, saying:

These other beings actually considered guarding [one’s fields] as a disease, considered such guarding as a carbuncle, considered such guarding as an arrow or a thorn. They gave up such guarding and relied on forest-dwelling, constructing huts out of grass and leaves. They trained in meditation but could not succeed in meditation, they trained in ascetic practices but did not succeed in ascetic practices, they trained in seclusion but did not succeed in seclusion, they trained in unification of the mind but did not succeed in unification of the mind, they trained in being energetic but did not succeed in being energetic. They have abandoned forest-dwelling and returned to a village or to a city or to the royal town. They have constructed houses with four pillars and composed sacred texts. These venerable ones train in wide learning; they no longer train in meditation; they are learned. Being learned, they are called “learned ones.”

Vāseṭṭha, this is the first cause and condition for the existence, in the world, of the brahmin class. This is ancient, primary knowledge, in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma; and, being in accordance with the Dharma, it is respected by the people.

Then those other beings went to all regions to practice farming. They were practicing farming in all regions. Practicing farming in all regions, they were called merchants. Vāseṭṭha, this is the first cause and condition for the existence, in the world, of the merchant class. This is ancient, primary knowledge, in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma; and, being in accordance with the Dharma, it is respected by the people.

Vāseṭṭha, when these three classes had arisen in the world, it became known that there was a fourth class, the renunciants.<sup>245</sup> How, when these three classes had arisen in the world, did it become known that there was a fourth class, the renunciants?

In a warrior clan, a clansman might censure himself for evil and unwholesome states and, becoming disgusted with himself for his evil and unwholesome states, shave off his hair and beard, don the yellow robes, and out of faith leave the household life and become homeless to train in the path. Thinking, “I shall become a renunciant and practice the holy life,” he would become a renunciant and practice the holy life.

In the same way, in a brahmin clan or a merchant clan, a clansman might similarly censure himself for evil and unwholesome states and, being disgusted with himself for his evil and unwholesome states, shave off his hair and beard, don the yellow robes, and out of faith leave the household life and become homeless to train in the path. Thinking, “I shall become a renunciant and practice the holy life,” he would become a renunciant and practice the holy life. Vāseṭṭha, in this way, when the three classes had arisen in the world, it became known that there was a fourth class, the renunciants.

676c

Vāseṭṭha, I will now tell you in detail about these three classes. What, in detail, are these three classes? A clansman of a warrior clan who does unwholesome things with his body . . . with his speech . . . and does unwholesome things with his mind, will, at the breaking up of the body at death, certainly experience suffering. In the same way, a clansman of a brahmin clan or of a merchant clan who does unwholesome things with his body . . . with his speech . . . and does unwholesome things with his mind, will, at the breaking up of the body at death, certainly experience suffering.

Vāseṭṭha, a clansman of a warrior clan who does wholesome things with his body . . . with his speech . . . and does wholesome things with his mind will, at the breaking up of the body at death, certainly experience pleasure. In the same way, a clansman of a brahmin clan or a clansman of a merchant clan who does wholesome things with his body . . . with his speech . . . and does wholesome things with his mind will, at the breaking up of the body at death, certainly experience pleasure.

Vāseṭṭha, a clansman of a warrior clan who does both [wholesome and unwholesome] things with his body while practicing restraint . . . with his speech . . . and does both [wholesome and unwholesome] things with his mind while practicing restraint will, at the breaking up of the body at death, experience suffering and pleasure. In the same way a clansman of a brahmin clan or of a merchant clan who does both [wholesome and unwholesome] things with his body while practicing restraint . . . with his speech . . . and does both [wholesome and unwholesome] things with his mind while practicing restraint will, at the breaking up of the body at death, experience [both] suffering and pleasure.

Vāseṭṭha, a clansman of a warrior clan cultivates the seven factors of awakening, attends to them well and contemplates them well. Knowing like this and seeing like this, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire . . . from the taint of existence . . . his mind is liberated from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, he knows it is liberated, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done. There will not be another experiencing of existence.”

In the same way a clansman of a brahmin clan or of a merchant clan cultivates the seven factors of awakening, attends to them well and contemplates them well. Knowing like this and seeing like this, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire . . . from the taint of existence . . . his mind is liberated from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, he knows it is liberated, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

Vāseṭṭha, in this way I have analyzed these three classes in detail. Brahmā, the lord of heaven, has spoken this stanza:

The warrior is esteemed among two-footed [beings],
That is, those possessing class and clan.
[But] those who seek to train in knowledge and conduct
Are praised by devas and human beings.

Vāseṭṭha, the lord of heaven, Brahmā, said this stanza well, not badly. He intoned and chanted it well, not badly. He proclaimed it well, not badly—that is, saying this:

677a      The warrior is esteemed among two-footed [beings],
That is, those possessing class and clan.
[But] those who seek to train in knowledge and conduct
Are praised by devas and human beings.

Why is that? I similarly say this,

The warrior is esteemed among two-footed [beings],
That is, those possessing class and clan.
[But] those who seek to train in knowledge and conduct
Are praised by devas and men.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Venerable Vāseṭṭha and Bhāradvāja and the [other] monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

155. The Discourse about Velāma<sup>246</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvaththī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the householder Sudatta approached the Buddha,<sup>247</sup> paid homage with his head, stepped back, and sat to one side.

The World-honored One asked him, "Householder, does your family practice almsgiving?"

The householder Sudatta replied:

Yes indeed, World-honored One. My family practices almsgiving, but we are unable to [give] what is excellent. [What we give as almsfood] is very coarse, just rice bran with husks, sesame soup, and a slice of ginger.

The World-honored One said:

Householder, whether one gives coarse food or gives excellent food, both bring their results indeed. Householder, if one gives what is coarse and gives without faith, gives without deliberation, gives but not with one's own hands, gives without going in person, gives without due consideration, gives without sincerity, gives without contemplating the fruits and results of one's actions, then one should contemplate receiving the following kinds of results: One's mind will not enjoy getting an excellent house; it will not enjoy getting an excellent chariot; it will not enjoy getting excellent clothing; it will not enjoy getting excellent food and drink; it will not enjoy getting whatever is excellent by way of the five strands of sensuality.<sup>248</sup>

Why is that? Because one is practicing giving without sincerity. Householder, one should understand that one will receive these kinds of results.

Householder, if one gives what is coarse but gives with faith, gives with deliberation, gives with one's own hands, gives having gone in person, gives with due consideration, gives with sincerity, gives having contemplated the fruits and results of one's actions, then one should contemplate receiving the following kinds of results: One's mind will enjoy getting an excellent house; it will enjoy getting an excellent chariot; it will enjoy getting excellent clothes; it will enjoy getting excellent food and drink; it will enjoy getting whatever is excellent by way of the five strands of sensuality. Why is that? Because one is practicing giving with sincerity. Householder, one should understand that one will receive these kinds of results.

677b

Householder, if one gives what is excellent but gives without faith, gives without deliberation, gives but not with one's own hands, gives without going in person, gives without due consideration, gives without sincerity, gives without contemplating the fruits and results of one's actions, then one should contemplate receiving the following kinds of results: One's mind will not enjoy getting an excellent house; it will not enjoy getting an excellent chariot; it will not enjoy getting excellent clothes; it will not enjoy getting excellent food and drink; it will not enjoy getting whatever is excellent by way of the five strands of sensuality. Why is that? Because one is practicing giving without sincerity. Householder, one should understand that one will receive these kinds of results.

Householder, if one gives what is excellent and gives with faith, gives with deliberation, gives with one's own hands, gives having gone in person, gives with due consideration, gives with sincerity, gives having contemplated the fruits and results of one's actions, then one should contemplate receiving the following kinds of results: One's mind will enjoy getting an excellent house; it will enjoy getting an excellent chariot; it will enjoy getting excellent clothes; it will enjoy getting excellent food and drink; it will enjoy getting whatever is excellent by way of the five strands of sensuality. Why is that? Because one is practicing giving with sincerity. Householder, one should understand that one will receive these kinds of results.<sup>249</sup>

Householder, in the distant past there was a great brahmin householder named Velāma. He was extremely wealthy and prosperous, with immeasurable wealth, with many domains and feudatories, all manner of treasures, and livestock beyond reckoning. He practiced giving in the following ways:

With eighty-four thousand golden bowls filled with pieces of silver, in this way he practiced a great giving; with eighty-four thousand silver bowls filled with pieces of gold, in this way he practiced a great giving; with eighty-four thousand golden bowls filled with pieces of gold, in this way he practiced a great giving; with eighty-four thousand silver bowls filled with pieces of silver, in this way he practiced a great giving;

[W]ith eighty-four thousand elephants solemnly adorned and decorated with a covering of white netting, in this way he practiced a great giving; with eighty-four thousand horses solemnly adorned and decorated with white netting and golden ornaments, in this way he practiced a great giving;

[W]ith eighty-four thousand cows clothed in cords and coverlets, each of which, when milked, was able to yield a barrelful of milk, in this way he practiced a great giving; with eighty-four thousand women who were of dignified beauty that delighted those who saw them, adorned with various precious necklaces for dignified decoration, in this way he practiced a great giving—not to mention food and beverages to be consumed as well.<sup>250</sup>

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma would it be if one were to feed all the worldlings in Jambudīpa.<sup>251</sup>

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma and the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa would it be if one were to feed one stream-enterer.

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa and the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers would it be if one were to feed one once-returner.

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers and a hundred once-returners would it be if one were to feed one nonreturner.

677c

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers, a hundred once-returners, and a hundred nonreturners would it be if one were to feed one arahant.

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers, a hundred once-returners, a hundred nonreturners, and a hundred arahants would it be if one were to feed one paccekabuddha.

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers, a hundred once-returners, a hundred nonreturners, a hundred arahants, and a hundred paccekabuddhas, would it be if one were to feed one tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened.

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, and to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers, a hundred once-returners, a hundred nonreturners, a hundred arahants, and a hundred paccekabuddhas, would be if one were to construct a monastery and give it to the Sangha of monks of the four directions.<sup>252</sup>

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers, a hundred once-returners, a hundred nonreturners, a hundred arahants, a hundred paccekabuddhas, and to constructing a monastery and giving it to the Sangha of monks of the four directions, would it be if one were to take refuge joyfully in the Triple Gem—the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks—and to take the precepts.

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers, a hundred once-returners, a hundred nonreturners, a hundred arahants, a hundred paccekabuddhas, to constructing a monastery and giving it to the Sangha of monks of the four directions, and to taking refuge joyfully in the Triple Gem—the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks—and taking the precepts, would it be if one were to develop a mind of loving-kindness for all beings just for the brief time it takes to milk a cow.

678a

Householder, superior even to this great giving by the brahmin Velāma, to the feeding of all the worldlings in Jambudīpa, to the feeding of a hundred stream-enterers, a hundred once-returners, a hundred nonreturners, a hundred arahants, a hundred paccekabuddhas, to constructing a monastery and giving it to the Sangha of monks of the four directions, to taking refuge joyfully in the Triple Gem—the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks—and taking the precepts, and to developing a mind of loving-kindness for all beings just for the brief time that it takes to milk a cow, would it be if one were to contemplate all phenomena as impermanent, dukkha, empty, and devoid of self.<sup>253</sup>

Householder, what do you think? The great brahmin householder of the past named Velāma, was he someone else? Do not think that. Why is that? You should know that he was myself.<sup>254</sup> In the past I was the great brahmin householder named Velāma.

Householder, at that time I was benefiting myself and benefiting others, benefiting many people. I had compassion for the whole world, and I sought prosperity, benefit, peace, and happiness for devas and human beings. The teaching I gave at that time did not lead to the ultimate, was not the ultimate purity, not the ultimate holy life, not the ultimate completion of the holy life. At that time I had not become free of birth, old age, disease, and death, sorrow, and grief, sadness and lamentation, nor was I able to attain complete liberation from dukkha.

Householder, I have now appeared in this world as a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one. I now benefit myself, benefit others, benefit many people. I have compassion for the whole world, and I seek prosperity, benefit, peace, and happiness for devas and human beings.

The teaching I give now does lead to the ultimate, is the ultimate purity, the ultimate holy life, the ultimate completion of the holy life. I have become free of birth, old age, disease, and death, sorrow and grief, sadness and lamentation. I have attained complete liberation from dukkha.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the householder Sudatta and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

156. The Discourse to the Pārāyana Brahmins<sup>255</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time a group of brahmins from the Kosala country, who were taking an afternoon walk, approached the Buddha. Having exchanged polite greetings, they stepped back, sat to one side, and said, "Gotama, we would like to ask a question. Will you listen to our question?"

The World-honored One said, "Feel free to ask."

Then the brahmins asked, "Gotama, are brahmins now practicing the Dharma of former brahmins or are they transgressing the Dharma of former brahmins?"

678b

The World-honored One replied:

There are no brahmins now who practice the Dharma of former brahmins. For a long time brahmins have been transgressing the Dharma of former brahmins.

Then the brahmins asked:

Gotama, why are no brahmins now practicing the Dharma of former brahmins? Since when have brahmins been transgressing the Dharma of former brahmins?

Then the World-honored One said these stanzas:<sup>256</sup>

In so-called ancient times there were those
Who were self-restrained and intent on their practice.
Relinquishing the five strands of sensuality,
They practiced the pure holy life.

Practicing celibacy and morality
Led them to become soft and tender by nature.
Their minds shone with forgiveness and harmlessness.
Patient and forbearing, they guarded their thoughts.

In ancient times this was the Dharma,
Which [present-day] brahmins have not preserved.
[In ancient times] brahmins did not keep watch over
Wealth or grain as their possessions.

Chanting [of hymns] was their wealth and grain;
This was the treasure that brahmins guarded,
[Rather than] variously colored garments,
Houses, beds, and couches.

[In] prosperous cities and in all countries
[The ancient] brahmins trained like this.
These brahmins did no harm;
They led the way in protecting all things.

When they went to others' doors,
No one turned them away.
[People] opened their homes [to them]
When mealtime came and they went begging.<sup>257</sup>

When brahmins were at home,
Visitors wished to make offerings to them.

For fully forty-eight years
They practiced pure celibacy.

Seeking accomplishment in knowledge and conduct
Was the practice of brahmins in ancient times.
They did not steal [others'] wealth
And they had nothing to fear.

If mutual affection matched up,
Then it was proper for them to cohabit,
[But] not out of annoyance
Or resentment toward sexual customs.

Not all brahmins
Were capable of practicing like this.
If there were some of outstanding practice,
Brahmins extremely firm in their quest,
Then they, as regards sexual matters,
Did not engage in them even in their dreams.

Because of this practice of celibacy
They called themselves brahmins [saying], "I am a brahmin."
Knowing they had this conduct,
The wise always recognized them
As using thin beds and simple clothes
And surviving on ghee and milk as food.

678c

Begging was always done according to the Dharma
During a sacrifice and in the ritual of giving.
During a sacrifice they did not have others beg for them,
But begged for themselves.

When making offerings at a sacrifice,
They did not kill cows,
Which are like one's parents or brothers
Or one's other relatives.

Cows are also like human beings.
The reason they give rise to happiness

Are the food and drink [they provide, which gives us] bodily strength;
As a means of conveyance [they provide] ease and happiness.

Understanding this principle,
They did not delight in killing cows,
Whose soft bodies are so large,
With a refined appearance that is renowned.

Eagerly seeking their own benefit,
The brahmins of ancient times pursued their practice.
For their own benefit brahmins
Engaged in [some] affairs and abstained from [other] affairs.

They had to come into this world,
Yet they were committed to liberation from this world.
[However] as month succeeded month,
Their minds were seen to incline toward that [worldliness].

They enjoyed themselves at night
With finely adorned women.
They were surrounded by auspicious cows
[But also by] very handsome women.

The subtle sensual pleasures of society
[Became] for brahmins a constant source of longing.
Possession of chariots
Well-made and finely finished,
Household life, and marriage
[Became] for brahmins a constant source of longing.

Having created this bond, [they thought,]
“Come, let us pursue that!”
[They then approached the king and said,]
“Great king, perform a sacrifice and practice giving!
Do not miss [this opportunity] to profit from your wealth,
From your abundant property and grain.

“If you have surplus [wealth] and cows,
Great king, it is appropriate [to expend it on] this:

On brahmins and chariots
 For an elephant sacrifice, a horse sacrifice,
 And a cow sacrifice.<sup>258</sup> Do not guard the gates [of your stables].

“Gather crowds and perform a sacrificial giving,
 With wealth as gifts to brahmins.
 From this you will gain profit,
 Beloved and cherished wealth!”

Thus they aroused [the king’s] desire,
 Increasing his craving more and more
 For wealth immeasurable
 Like water in a vast reservoir.

[They thought,] “Men who own cows are in this way Provided with their livelihood.”

They created this bondage [with the thought],
 “Come, let us pursue that!”

[They approached the king again and said,]
 “Great king, perform a sacrifice and practice giving!
 Do not miss [this opportunity] to profit from your wealth,
 From your abundant property and grain.

679a

“If you have surplus wealth,
 Great king, it is appropriate [to expend it on] this:
 On brahmins and chariots
 And countless hundreds and thousands of cows
 To be killed in a sacrifice.”

The horns on their heads disturbed no one;
 The cows of ancient times were [harmless] as pigs.
 Going and seizing them by the horns
 [Brahmins] took sharp knives and killed the cows.

“Cows are just like our fathers!”
 Exclaimed a spirit named Fragrance.
 He cried, “This is against the Dharma!”
 As they stabbed the cows with knives.

This custom of undertaking sacrifices
Was the principal transgression.
There is no reason to kill.
Stay far away from this decadent custom!

In ancient times there were three diseases:
Desire, lack of food, and old age.<sup>259</sup>
Through hatred of cows
Diseases increased to ninety-eight.

Such [behavior] caused quarrels to grow,
And therefore was disliked by the wise.
If people saw such [behavior],
Who did not dislike it?
Such behavior in this world
Lacked wisdom; it was the lowest.

Everyone had desire and hatred.
Wives even slandered their husbands.
Some women of the warrior and brahmin classes,
Although guarded by their clans,
Violating their birth customs,
Became unrestrained in sensual pleasures.

Thus, brahmins, brahmins now are not practicing the Dharma of former brahmins. For a long time brahmins have been transgressing the Dharma of former brahmins.

Then the group of brahmins from Kosala country said:

World-honored One, we have understood. Well-gone One, we have comprehended.<sup>260</sup> World-honored One, from now on we go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept us as lay disciples from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for our whole life.

Thus said the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the group of brahmins from the Kosala country and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

679b

157. The Discourse in the Yellow Reed Park<sup>261</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Verañjā in the Yellow Reed Park. 679b

At that time a brahmin of Verañjā, who was very old, whose life span was almost over, whose life was on the verge of coming to an end, a hundred and twenty years [of age], walking with the support of a staff, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha and exchanged polite greetings. Standing before the Buddha supported by his staff, he said:

Gotama, I have heard that the renunciant Gotama, who is very young and has just gone forth to train [in the path], on being personally approached by famous and virtuous renunciants and brahmins, does not show respect for them, does not revere them, does not get up from his seat, and does not invite them to be seated. Gotama, this is very improper.

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, I have never seen anyone, among devas and māras, Brahmas, renunciants, brahmins, from human beings to devas who, on approaching me could expect me, the Tathāgata, to show respect and reverence for them, to get up from my seat and invite them to be seated. Brahmin, if someone were to approach me, the Tathāgata, desiring that I should show respect and reverence, get up from my seat, and invite them to be seated, then that person's head would certainly split into seven pieces.

The brahmin said, "Gotama lacks taste."

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, there is a way in which I do lack taste, though it is not what you are referring to. Whatever there is of taste in forms, taste in sounds, taste in fragrances, [taste in flavors,]<sup>262</sup> taste in tangibles, the Tathāgata has eradicated it through wisdom, brought it to cessation, uprooted it so that it can never arise again. This is a way in which I lack taste, though it is not what you are referring to.

The brahmin said again, "Gotama is without fear."<sup>263</sup>

The World-honored One said:

Brahmin, there is a way in which I am without fear, though it is not what you are referring to. Whatever is fearsome in forms, fearsome in sounds, fearsome in odors, fearsome in flavors, fearsome in tangibles, the Tathāgata has eradicated it through wisdom, brought it to cessation, uprooted it so that it can never arise again. This is a way in which I am without fear, though it is not what you are referring to.

The brahmin said again, “Gotama does not enter a womb.”

The World-honored One said:

679c Brahmin, there is a way in which I do not enter a womb, though it is not what you are referring to. If there is some renunciant or brahmin who has, through wisdom, eradicated future coming to a womb, brought it to cessation, uprooted it so that he will never take birth again, then of him I say that he does not enter a womb. The Tathāgata has, through wisdom, eradicated future coming to a womb, brought it to cessation, uprooted it so that he will never take birth again. For this reason I will not enter a womb. This is a way in which I do not enter a womb, though it is not what you are referring to.

Brahmin, among these living beings who have come from ignorance, delight in ignorance, are covered by ignorance, are trapped in the eggshell of ignorance, I am the first to have insight into the Dharma. I am foremost among living beings.

It is just like a hen that has laid ten or twelve eggs and is mindful of them at the proper time, shelters them at the proper time, warms them at the proper time, sustains them at the proper time. Later on, [even if] the hen may have left them alone [at that time], one of the chicks pecks through its shell with its beak or claws and emerges safely. That one is foremost among the chicks.

I am like this. Of these living beings who have come from ignorance, delight in ignorance, are covered by ignorance, are trapped in the eggshell of ignorance, I am the first to have insight into the Dharma, I am foremost among living beings.

Brahmin, taking mugwort grass, I went to the tree of awakening, spread the grass beneath the tree, placed my sitting mat on it, and sat down cross-legged [with this resolve]: “I will not break this upright sitting posture until the taints have been destroyed.” And I did not break that upright sitting posture until the taints had been destroyed.<sup>264</sup>

Sitting upright, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, I attained and dwelt in the first absorption, which is with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion. At that time this was the first higher state of mind that I reached, attaining a pleasant abiding in the present, attaining it easily and without difficulty, a pleasant dwelling without fear, peaceful and delightful, which leads to nirvana.

Again, brahmin, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, I attained and dwelt in the second absorption, which is without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, and with rapture and happiness born of concentration. At that time this was the second higher state of mind that I reached, attaining a pleasant abiding in the present, attaining it easily and without difficulty, a pleasant dwelling without fear, peaceful and delightful, which leads to nirvana.

Again, brahmin, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, I attained and dwelt in the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode. At that time this was the third higher state of mind that I reached, attaining a pleasant abiding in the present, attaining it easily and without difficulty, a pleasant dwelling without fear, peaceful and delightful, which leads to nirvana.

Again, brahmin, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of joy and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, and with purity of mindfulness and equanimity, I attained and dwelt in the fourth absorption. At that time this was the fourth higher state of mind that I reached, attaining a pleasant abiding in the present, attaining it easily and without difficulty, a pleasant dwelling without fear, peaceful and delightful, which leads to nirvana.

Again, brahmin, with my mind concentrated and purified in this way, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having 680a gained mental imperturbability, I trained in the realization of the higher knowledge of the recollection of former lives. I recalled countless former lives traversed by me in the past, together with my activities and my outward appearance [in those lives]: one birth, two births, a hundred births, a thousand births, eons of [world] expansion, eons of [world] contraction, countless eons of [world] expansion and contraction.

[I recalled:] “I was that living being named So-and-so. [I] went through those past experiences; I was [once] born there, with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of food and drink, experiencing this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this. Dying here, I was reborn there; dying there, I was reborn here. I was reborn here with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of food and drink, experiencing this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this.”

This was the first higher knowledge that I attained at that time in the first watch of the night, having formerly been without negligence, having delighted in being established in seclusion, and having energetically cultivated it.

Thus lack of wisdom was eradicated and wisdom arose, darkness was destroyed and knowledge accomplished, ignorance was eradicated and knowledge arose, namely by realizing the higher knowledge of recollecting past lives.

Again, brahmin, with my mind concentrated and purified in this way, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having gained mental imperturbability, I trained in the realization of the higher knowledge of the death and rebirth [of beings].

With the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human [eye], I saw beings as they die and as they are reborn, handsome or ugly, superior or inferior, as they come and go between good and bad realms of existence, in accordance with the [previous] deeds of these living beings.

I saw as it really is that, if these living beings have undertaken evil bodily conduct, evil verbal and mental conduct, if they have reviled noble ones, held wrong views, and undertaken actions [based on] wrong views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking up of the body after death they certainly go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell.

If [however], these living beings have undertaken sublime bodily conduct, sublime verbal and mental conduct, if they have not reviled noble ones, have held right views, and undertaken actions [based on] right views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking up of the body after death they certainly go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in a heavenly realm.

This was the second higher knowledge that I attained at that time in the middle watch of the night, by having formerly been without negligence, having delighted in being established in seclusion, and having energetically cultivated it.

Thus lack of wisdom was eradicated and wisdom arose, darkness was destroyed and knowledge accomplished, ignorance was eradicated and knowledge arose, namely by realizing the higher knowledge of the death and rebirth [of beings].

Again, brahmin, with my mind concentrated and purified in this way, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having gained mental imperturbability, I trained in the realization of the higher knowledge of the destruction of the taints.

I knew as it really is: “This is dukkha.” I knew [as it really is]: “This is the arising of dukkha.” I knew [as it really is]: “This is the cessation of dukkha.” I knew as it really is: “This is the path to the cessation of dukkha.”

I knew as it really is: “These are the taints.” I knew [as it really is]: “This is the arising of the taints.” I knew [as it really is]: “This is the cessation of the taints.” I knew as it really is: “This is the path to the cessation of the taints.”

680b

Knowing like this, seeing like this, my mind was liberated from the taint of sensual desire . . . from the taint of existence, my mind was liberated from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, I knew it was liberated, knowing as it really is: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

This was the third higher knowledge that I attained at that time in the last watch of the night, having formerly been without negligence, having delighted in being established in seclusion, and having energetically cultivated it.

Thus lack of wisdom was eradicated and wisdom arose, darkness was destroyed and knowledge accomplished, ignorance was eradicated and knowledge arose, namely by realizing the higher knowledge of the destruction of the taints.

Again, brahmin, if there is someone of whom it could rightly be said that he teaches to living beings that have arisen in the world a Dharma that is free from delusion, who is foremost among all living beings, who is not covered up by pain and pleasure, then you should know that it can rightly be said of me. Why is that? [It is because] I teach to living beings who have arisen in the world a Dharma that is free from delusion. I am foremost among all living beings. I am not covered up by pain and pleasure.<sup>265</sup>

Then the brahmin of Verañjā put aside his staff, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, and said to the World-honored One:

The World-honored One is foremost, the World-honored One is great, the World-honored One is superior, the World-honored One is supreme, the World-honored One has rank, the World-honored One is without equal, the World-honored One is incomparable, the World-honored One is without obstructions, the World-honored One is a person without obstructions.<sup>266</sup>

World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.<sup>267</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin of Verañjā and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

158. The Discourse to Doṇa<sup>268</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattihī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the brahmin Doṇa, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha, exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side. The World-honored One asked him,<sup>269</sup> “Doṇa, if someone asks you if you are a brahmin, do you say you are a brahmin and call yourself one?”

The brahmin Doṇa replied:

Gotama, one can rightly call himself a brahmin if he is born of parents who are of pure descent, if for seven generations on both his father’s and his mother’s sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish; and if he has learned much and retained it, is able to recite it, and is a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth.<sup>270</sup>

Gotama, one who can rightly call himself a brahmin is myself. Why is that? I am born of parents of pure descent; for seven generations on both my father’s and my mother’s sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish; and I have learned much and retained it, am able to recite it, and am a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth. 680c

The World-honored One said:

Doṇa, I will now ask you [a question]; answer according to your understanding. Doṇa, what do you think? Those ancient brahmins who have died and passed away, reciters of the sacred texts, who promulgated the sacred texts and recited the Vedas—namely, Aṭṭhaka, Vāmaka, Vāmadeva, Vessāmitta, Yamataggi, Aṅgīrasa, Vāseṭṭha, Kassapa, Bhāradvāja, and Bhagu—they have designated five types of brahmins:

There are brahmins who are like Brahmā, there are brahmins who are like a deva, there are brahmins who do not overstep the boundaries, there are brahmins who overstep the boundaries, and there are brahmins who are outcastes as the fifth. Doṇa, of these five types of brahmins, which one are you?

Doṇa said:

Gotama has spoken about this matter in brief, without explaining its details. I am unable to understand it. May the renunciant Gotama explain it well so that I understand its meaning.

The World-honored One said, “Doṇa, listen closely and pay proper attention, I will analyze it for you in detail.”

Doṇa said, “Indeed, Gotama.” The brahmin Doṇa listened to receive the instruction.

The Buddha said:

Doṇa, how is a brahmin like Brahmā? A brahmin is born of parents of pure descent; for seven generations on both his father’s and his mother’s sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. For forty-eight years he practices the holy life as a young man, wishing to acquire the sacred texts, to recite the canonical texts. Having acquired the sacred texts, recited the canonical texts, he supports his teacher by begging for wealth in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma.

What is “[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma”? [It is] not by farming, not by trade, not by [compiling] books, not by calculating, not by accounting, not by engraving, not by handwriting, not by composing regulations, not by [compiling] discourses, not by poetry, not by wielding sword or staff, not by attending to the king’s affairs, [but] by begging in accordance with the Dharma, he begs for wealth to support his teacher.<sup>271</sup>

Having offered wealth [to his teacher],<sup>272</sup> with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, he dwells [mentally] pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth direction, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. In the same way, with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or conflict, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. Doṇa, in this way a brahmin is like Brahmā.

681a

Doṇa, how is a brahmin like a deva? A brahmin is born of parents of pure descent; for seven generations on both his father’s and his mother’s sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. For forty-eight years he practices the holy life as a young man, wishing to acquire the sacred texts, to recite the canonical texts. Having acquired the sacred texts, recited the canonical texts, he supports his teacher by begging for wealth in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma.

What is “[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma”? Not by farming, not by trade, not by [compiling] books, not by calculating, not by accounting, not by engraving, not by handwriting, not by composing regulations, not by [compiling] discourses, not by poetry, not by wielding sword or staff, not by attending to the king’s affairs, but by begging in accordance with the Dharma, he begs for wealth to support his teacher.

Having offered wealth [to his teacher], he practices sublime bodily conduct . . . verbal . . . sublime mental conduct. Having practiced sublime bodily conduct . . . verbal . . . sublime mental conduct, at the destruction of the body at death he will certainly go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven.<sup>273</sup> Doṇa, in this way a brahmin is like the devas.

Doṇa, how does a brahmin not overstep the boundaries? A brahmin is born of parents of pure descent; for seven generations on both his father’s and his mother’s sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. For forty-eight years he practices the holy life as a young man, wishing to acquire the sacred texts, to recite the canonical texts. Having acquired the sacred texts, recited the canonical texts, he supports his teacher by begging for wealth in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma.

What is “[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma”? Not by farming, not by trade, not by [compiling] books, not by calculating, not by accounting, not by engraving, not by handwriting, not by composing regulations, not by [compiling] discourses, not by poetry, not by wielding sword or staff, not by attending to the king’s affairs, but by begging in accordance with the Dharma, he begs for wealth to support his teacher.

Having offered wealth [to his teacher], he seeks a wife for himself in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma. What is “[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma”? A brahmin does not approach a brahmin woman with intentions such as these: to increase mutual craving and to have [sexual] union. He approaches a brahmin woman, not a nonbrahmin woman, nor a warrior woman, nor one who is pregnant, nor one who is nursing.

Doṇa, for what reason does a brahmin not approach [a woman] who is pregnant? So that this man and woman will not become known as impure and licentious.<sup>274</sup> For this reason a brahmin does not approach [a woman] who is pregnant. Doṇa, for what reason does a brahmin not approach [a woman] who is nursing? So that this man and woman will not become known as impure and angry. For this reason a brahmin does not approach [a woman] who is nursing.

681b Doṇa, he approaches [a woman] not for the sake of wealth, nor for the sake of pride, nor for the sake of adornment, nor for the sake of decoration, but just for the sake of a son. Once a son is born, [the brahmin] is established within the boundaries of the conventions of the brahmins of old, upholding them and not overstepping them. Doṇa, in this way a brahmin does not overstep the boundaries.

Doṇa, how does a brahmin overstep the boundaries? A brahmin is born of parents of pure descent; for seven generations on both his father's and his mother's sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. For forty-eight years he practices the holy life as a young man, wishing to acquire the sacred texts, to recite the canonical texts. Having acquired the sacred texts, recited the canonical texts, he supports his teacher by begging for wealth in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma.

What is "[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma"? Not by farming, not by trade, not by [compiling] books, not by calculating, not by accounting, not by engraving, not by handwriting, not by composing regulations, not by [compiling] discourses, not by poetry, not by wielding sword or staff, not by attending to the king's affairs, but by begging in accordance with the Dharma, he begs for wealth to support his teacher.

Having offered wealth [to his teacher], he seeks a wife for himself in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma. What is "[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma"? A brahmin does not approach a brahmin woman with intentions such as these: to increase mutual craving and to have [sexual] union. He approaches a brahmin woman, not a nonbrahmin woman, nor a warrior woman, nor one who is pregnant, nor one who is nursing.

Doṇa, for what reason does a brahmin not approach [a woman] who is pregnant? So that this man and woman will not become known as impure and licentious. For this reason a brahmin does not approach [a woman] who is pregnant. Doṇa, for what reason does a brahmin not approach [a woman] who is nursing? So that this man and woman will not become known as impure and angry. For this reason a brahmin does not approach [a woman] who is nursing.

Doṇa, he approaches [a woman] not for the sake of wealth, nor for the sake of pride, nor for the sake of adornment, nor for the sake of decoration, but just for the sake of a son. [However,] once a son is born, he does not remain within the boundaries of the conventions of the brahmins of old, not upholding them but overstepping them.<sup>275</sup> Doṇa, in this way a brahmin oversteps the boundaries.

Doṇa, how is a brahmin an outcaste [among] brahmins? A brahmin is born of parents of pure descent; for seven generations on both his father's and his mother's sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. For forty-eight years he practices the holy life as a young man, wishing to acquire the sacred texts, to recite the canonical texts. Having acquired the sacred texts, recited the canonical texts, he supports his teacher by begging for wealth in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma.

What is "[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma"? Not by farming, not by trade, not by [compiling] books, not by calculating, not by accounting, not by engraving, not by handwriting, not by composing regulations, not by [compiling] discourses, not by poetry, not by wielding sword or staff, not by attending to the king's affairs, but by begging in accordance with the Dharma, he begs for wealth to support his teacher. 681c

Having offered wealth [to his teacher], he seeks a wife for himself in accordance with the Dharma, not contrary to the Dharma. What is "[in accordance with the Dharma, not] contrary to the Dharma"? A brahmin does not approach a brahmin woman with intentions such as these: to increase mutual craving and to have [sexual] union. He approaches a brahmin woman, not a nonbrahmin woman, nor a warrior woman, nor one who is pregnant, nor one who is nursing.

Doṇa, for what reason does a brahmin not approach [a woman] who is pregnant? So that this man and woman will not become known as impure and licentious. For this reason a brahmin does not approach [a woman] who is pregnant. Doṇa, for what reason does a brahmin not approach [a woman] who is nursing? So that this man and woman will not become known as impure and angry. For this reason a brahmin does not approach [a woman] who is nursing.

Doṇa, he approaches [a woman] not for the sake of wealth, nor for the sake of pride, nor for the sake of adornment, nor for the sake of decoration, but just for the sake of a son. Once a son is born, he undertakes affairs related to kings, affairs related to thieves, affairs related to those who are on the wrong path, saying, “Brahmins should undertake all affairs; brahmins are not defiled by this, they are not contaminated by it. They are just like fire, which burns what is pure and burns what is impure.” [If someone says] “Brahmins should not undertake any affairs,” [we reply,] “Brahmins are not defiled by this; they are not contaminated by it.” Doṇa, in this way a brahmin is an outcaste [among] brahmins.<sup>276</sup> Doṇa, of these five types of brahmin, which one are you?<sup>277</sup>

Doṇa said:

Gotama, I am not entitled to say I am even the most inferior [type of] brahmin, the outcaste, let alone the others. World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.<sup>278</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin Doṇa was delighted and received it respectfully.

159. The Discourse to Aggilāyana

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvaththī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the brahmin Aggilāyana, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the Buddha, exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Gotama, I wish to ask a question. Will you listen if I venture to express it?”

682a

The World-honored One said, “Feel free to ask.”

Then the brahmin asked, “Gotama, dependent on what do the brahmin texts remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the people, the brahmin texts remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the people remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on rice and wheat, the people remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do rice and wheat remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the earth, rice and wheat remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what does the earth remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on water, the earth remains.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what does water remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on wind, water remains.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what does wind remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on space, wind remains.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what does space remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Space is dependent on nothing, yet because of the sun and moon, therefore there is empty space.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the sun and moon remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the Four Heavenly Kings, the sun and moon remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the Four Heavenly Kings remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the devas of the Thirty-three, the Four Heavenly Kings remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the devas of the Thirty-three remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the Yāma devas, the devas of the Thirty-three remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the Yāma devas remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the Tusita devas, the Yāma devas remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the Tusita devas remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the devas who Delight in Creating, the Tusita devas remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the devas who Delight in Creating remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the devas who Wield Power over Others’ Creations, the devas who Delight in Creating remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do the devas who Wield Power Over Others’ Creations remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the Brahmā world, the devas who Wield Power Over Others’ Creations remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what does the Brahmā world remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on the Great Brahmā, the Brahmā world remains.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what does the Great Brahmā remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on patience, humility, gentleness, and goodness, the Great Brahmā remains.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what do patience, humility, gentleness, and goodness remain?”

The World-honored One replied, “Dependent on nirvana, patience, humility, gentleness, and goodness remain.”

The brahmin asked again, “Gotama, dependent on what does nirvana remain?”

The World-honored One replied:

682b

Brahmin, you are asking for a dependence of what is infinite. You are now asking me about what is limitless. Indeed, nirvana is not dependent on anything to remain. Nirvana is total cessation. Nirvana is supreme. Brahmin, it is for the sake of this that one practices the holy life under me.

The brahmin said:

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin Aggilāyana was delighted and received it respectfully.

160. The Discourse on Araka<sup>279</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time, after the midday meal, the monks were sitting together in the assembly hall discussing this matter:

Venerable friends, it is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome, one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly].

At that time the World-honored One was passing the day's abiding elsewhere. With the purified divine ear, which surpasses the human [ear], he heard those monks sitting together in the assembly hall after the midday meal discussing this matter:

Venerable friends, it is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome, one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly].

Having heard this, in the late afternoon the World-honored One rose from sitting in meditation and approached the assembly hall. He sat down on a seat prepared in front of the assembly of monks and asked the monks, “What matter were you discussing? For what purpose have you come to sit together in the assembly hall?”

Then the monks said:

World-honored One, we monks assembled and, being seated together in the assembly hall after the midday meal, were discussing this matter: “Venerable friends, it is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome, one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly].” World-honored One, this is the matter we have been discussing. It is for this reason that we are seated together in the assembly hall.

682c

The World-honored One exclaimed:

It is well, it is well, monks, that you were talking like this: “Venerable friends, it is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome; one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly].” Why is that? I too say this: “It is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome, one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly].”

Why is that? In former times, in the past, the life span of living beings was eighty thousand years. Monks, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, this Jambudīpa was flourishing greatly and delightful, with plenty of wealth and treasures, and with villages and towns close together, only a chicken’s flight apart.

Monks, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, women were marriageable at five hundred years of age. Monks, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, the only diseases that existed were these: cold, heat, the need to urinate and defecate, sensual desire, hunger, and old age. There were no other afflictions.

Monks, when the human life span was eighty thousand years, there was a king named Koravya, who was a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise. Equipped with a fourfold army, he reigned over the entire world, freely, as he liked. Being a righteous Dharma king, he had attained the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven. He had a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and able to overcome the troops of others. He certainly ruled over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness.

Monks, King Koravya had a brahmin named Araka, a great elder, who was born of parents of pure descent. For seven generations on both his father’s and his mother’s sides there had been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. He had learned much and retained it, and was able to recite it. He was a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth.

Monks, the brahmin Araka had countless hundreds and thousands of young brahmin students. Dwelling in a secluded place, the brahmin Araka taught the sacred texts to his countless hundreds and thousands of young brahmin students.

At that time the brahmin Araka, dwelling alone in a secluded place, sat in meditation and reflection. He had this thought in his mind: “It is 683a extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome; one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly]. Let me now shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robes and, out of faith, go forth from the household life to train in the path.”

Then the brahmin Araka approached his group of many young brahmin students from various countries and said, “Young brahmin students, while dwelling alone in a secluded place, I sat in meditation and reflection. I had this thought in my mind: ‘It is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome; one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly]. Let me now shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robes, and, out of faith, go forth from the household life to train in the path.’ Young brahmin students, I now wish to shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robes, and, out of faith, go forth from the household life to train in the path. What will you do?”

The group of many young brahmin students from various countries said, “Venerable teacher, whatever we know, we have received it all through the teacher’s kindness. If the venerable teacher shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, and, out of faith, goes forth from the household life to train in the path, then we too will shave off hair and beard, don the yellow robes, and, out of faith, go forth from the household life to train in the path under our venerable teacher.”

Then at a later time the brahmin Araka shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and, out of faith, went forth from the household life to train in the path; and the group of many young brahmin students from various countries also shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and, out of faith, went forth from the household life to train in the path under their venerable teacher. Thus arose the designations “the venerable teacher Araka” and “the disciples of the venerable teacher Araka.”

At that time the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma:<sup>280</sup> “Brahmin students, it is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome, one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly].”

Thus at that time the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is extraordinary. It is extraordinary how very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome, one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die. Yet, as regards practice of the Dharma, practice that is beneficial, practice that is wholesome, practice that is sublime, people in this present life do not act and strive [accordingly].” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just like a drop of dew on grass in the morning. It disappears [as] the sun rises, not lasting long. Such, brahmin students, is human life, it is like dew in the morning. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

683b

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just as, at a time of great rain, the water drops form bubbles which arise and pass away. Such, brahmin students, is human life, it is like a bubble. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just as writing with a stick by inserting it into water, which quickly returns again [to its former condition].<sup>281</sup> Such, brahmin students, is human life, it is like writing with a stick by inserting it into water, which quickly returns again [to its former condition]. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just like putting a new earthenware pot into water and quickly taking it out again;<sup>282</sup> exposed to wind and heat, it quickly dries out.<sup>283</sup> Such, brahmin students, is human life, it is like a new earthenware pot that after being placed in water quickly dries out. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just as a small piece of meat placed in a big caldron of water under which a blazing fire is burning, it quickly disappears completely.<sup>284</sup> Such, brahmin students, is human life, it is like meat melting away. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just like a thief who has been bound and is being taken to the signpost beneath which he is to be executed.<sup>285</sup> As he lifts his feet, step by step he approaches death, step by step he approaches the end of his life. Such, brahmin students, is human life, it is like a thief who has been bound and is being taken to the signpost beneath which he is to be executed. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just like an ox being led by a butcher to be slaughtered. As it lifts its feet, step by step it approaches death, step by step it approaches the end of its life. Such, brahmin students, is human life, it is like an ox being led to be slaughtered. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just like a loom weaving [cloth]; with each movement, it comes nearer to completion, nearer to the end.<sup>286</sup> Such, brahmin students, is the life of a human being: it is like a loom nearing completion of the weaving. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just like a mountain stream which, having grown rapidly, flows quickly,<sup>287</sup> carrying flotsam along with it. Its water flows swiftly, not stopping for a moment.<sup>288</sup> Such, brahmin students, is the human life span, moving quickly and not stopping for a moment. Such, brahmin students, is human life, like a quickly flowing river. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, it is just as when, in the dark of night, one throws a staff onto the ground.<sup>289</sup> It may land with its head down, it may land with its head up, again it may land on its side; it may land in a clean place, or it may land in an unclean place. Such, brahmin students, are living beings obscured by ignorance and bound by craving. They may be reborn in hell, they may be reborn as animals, they may be reborn as hungry ghosts, they may be reborn in a heaven, or they may be reborn in the human realm. Such, brahmin students, is human life, like a staff thrown onto the ground in the dark. To get even a trifling amount of gratification is very difficult; and it [brings] great suffering and adversity, exceedingly much adversity.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.<sup>290</sup>

Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, I have abandoned and discarded covetousness regarding the world. With my mind free of agitation, on seeing others’ wealth and all their requisites of life, I do not give rise to covetousness with the wish ‘May I get it!’ I have purified my mind of covetousness. In the same way, I have abandoned ill will . . . sloth-and-torpor . . . restlessness-and-worry. . . . I have abandoned doubt regarding the world and overcome uncertainty. Being without vacillation in regard to wholesome states, I have purified my mind of doubt.

“Brahmin students, you too should abandon and remove covetousness regarding the world. Having a mind without strife, on seeing others’ wealth and all their requisites of life, do not give rise to covetousness with the wish ‘May I get it!’ Purify your mind of covetousness. In the same way, abandon ill will . . . sloth-and-torpor . . . restlessness-and-worry . . . abandon doubt regarding the world and overcome uncertainty, being without vacillation regarding wholesome states.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

684a Again, the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma: “Brahmin students, with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, I dwell [mentally] pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth direction, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, I dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. In the same way, with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or conflict, I dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated.

“Brahmin students, with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, you too should dwell [mentally] pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth direction, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated. In the same way, with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or conflict, dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated.” In this way the venerable teacher Araka taught his disciples the Dharma.

Again, the venerable teacher Araka explained to his disciples the teaching of the Brahmā realm. When the venerable teacher Araka explained the teaching of the Brahmā realm, there were some of the disciples who did not completely accept the teaching. After death they were reborn among the Four Heavenly Kings, or they were reborn among the devas of the Thirty-three, or they were reborn among the Yāma devas, or they were reborn among the Tusita devas, or they were reborn among the devas who Delight in Creating, or they were reborn among the devas who Wield Power over Others' Creations. When the venerable teacher Araka explained the teaching of the Brahmā realm, there were some of the disciples who completely accepted the teaching. Cultivating the four divine abodes (brahmavihāras) and separating themselves from sensual desires, after death they were reborn among the Brahmā devas.

At that time the venerable teacher Araka thought, "It is not appropriate for me to be equal to my disciples, being reborn together with them in the next life in one place. Let me now further cultivate a superior loving-kindness. Having further cultivated a superior loving-kindness, after death I will be reborn among the Ābhassara devas." At a later time the venerable teacher Araka further cultivated a superior loving-kindness. Having further cultivated a superior loving-kindness, after death he was reborn among the Ābhassara devas. The path in which the venerable teacher Araka and his disciples trained was not vain. They attained great fruit.

Monks, what do you think? Was the venerable teacher Araka of ancient times someone else? Do not think this. Why is that? Monks, you should know that he was myself. At that time I was called "the venerable teacher Araka." At that time I had countless hundreds and thousands of disciples. At that time I explained to my disciples the teaching about the Brahmā realm.

When I explained the teaching about the Brahmā realm, some of my disciples did not fully accept the teaching, and after death they were reborn among the Four Heavenly Kings, or they were reborn among the devas of the Thirty-three, or they were reborn among the Yāma devas, or they were reborn among the Tusita devas, or they were reborn among the devas who Delight in Creating, or they were reborn among the devas who Wield Power over Others' Creations. When I explained the teaching about the Brahmā realm, some of my disciples completely accepted the teaching. Cultivating the four divine abodes and separating themselves from sensual desires, after death they were reborn among the Brahmā devas. 684b

At that time I thought, "It is not appropriate for me to be equal to my disciples, being reborn together with them in one place in the next life. Let me now further cultivate a superior loving-kindness. Having further cultivated a superior loving-kindness, after death I will be reborn among the Ābhassara devas.” At a later time I further cultivated a superior loving-kindness. Having cultivated a superior loving-kindness, after death I was reborn among the Ābhassara devas. The path in which I and my disciples trained at that time was not vain. We attained great fruit.

At that time I benefited myself, benefited others, benefited many people. I had compassion for the whole world and I sought prosperity, benefit, peace, and happiness for devas and human beings. [However,] the teaching that I taught at that time did not reach fulfillment, it did not fulfill purification, it did not fulfill the holy life. Not having fulfilled the holy life, at that time I did not become free from birth, aging, disease, death, sorrow, and distress, and I was not yet able to attain liberation from all dukkha.

Monks, I have now appeared in this world as a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one. I now benefit myself, benefit others, benefit many people. I have compassion for the whole world and I seek prosperity, benefit, peace, and happiness for devas and human beings. I now teach the Dharma, having reached fulfillment, having fulfilled purification, having fulfilled the holy life. Having completely fulfilled the holy life, I am now free from birth, aging, disease, death, sorrow, and distress. I have now attained liberation from all dukkha.

Monks, “Very short is human life, [after which] one has to pass on to the next life. One should do what is wholesome, one should practice the holy life, for whoever is born will die.” Monks, this is rightly spoken now. Why is that? Because the [human] life span now extends to only a hundred years, or perhaps a little more.

One who has such a life span lives for three hundred seasons—a hundred springs, a hundred summers, and a hundred winters. He lives for one thousand two hundred months—four hundred months of spring, four hundred months of summer, and four hundred months of winter—so he lives for one thousand two hundred months.

He lives for two thousand four hundred fortnights—eight hundred fortnights of spring, eight hundred fortnights of summer, and eight hundred fortnights of winter—so he lives for two thousand four hundred fortnights. 684c

[He lives] for thirty-six thousand days and nights—twelve thousand days and nights of spring, twelve thousand days and nights of summer, and twelve thousand days and nights of winter—so he lives for thirty-six thousand days and nights.

He eats seventy-two thousand meals, including the times of being prevented [from eating] and the times of being breastfed. Being prevented [from eating] happens when one cannot eat because of pain, cannot eat because of anger, cannot eat because of sickness, cannot eat because of being busy, cannot eat because one is traveling, cannot eat because one is with the king, cannot eat because one is observing a day of purification, or cannot eat because one cannot get [food].

That is to say, monks, [a person] with a one-hundred-year life span lives to the age of one hundred counted by years, [which alternatively could be] counted by seasons, counted by years and seasons, counted by months, counted by fortnights, counted by months and fortnights, counted by days, counted by nights, counted by days and nights, counted by meals, counted by prevention [from eating], or counted by meals and prevention [from eating].

Monks, what a teacher should do for his disciples out of great compassion, mercy, sympathy, and concern, seeking their benefit and welfare, seeking their safety and well-being, that I have now already done. You too should do your part. Go and sit in meditation and contemplation in a secluded place, on a mountain, in a forest, at the base of a tree, in an empty and quiet place. Do not be negligent. Make a diligent effort, lest you regret it later. This is my instruction, this is my teaching.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

161. The Discourse to Brahmāyu<sup>291</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying in the country of Videha together with a great company of monks. 685a

At that time there was in Mithilā a brahmin named Brahmāyu who was very wealthy and prosperous, with immeasurable wealth, with livestock and estates beyond estimation, and with an abundance of flourishing feudatories. Mithilā with its water, pasture, and timber had been granted to him as a brahmin's fief by the king of Magadha, Ajātasattu Vedehiputta. The brahmin Brahmāyu had a young brahmin [disciple] named Uttara, who was born of parents of pure descent. For seven generations on both his father's and mother's sides there had been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. He had learned much, retained it, and was able to recite it. He was a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth.<sup>292</sup>

The brahmin Brahmāyu heard that the renunciant Gotama from the Sakya lineage, who had left the Sakya clan, shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and became homeless to train in the path, was staying in the country of Videha together with a large company of monks. The renunciant Gotama had a great reputation, which had spread throughout the ten directions, namely: the renunciant Gotama is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, endowed with knowledge and [perfect] conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as the Buddha, an exalted one. In this world, with its devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, he has himself known and realized, and dwells having himself accomplished realization. The Dharma he teaches is good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and he reveals the holy life.

Again, he heard that the renunciant Gotama was endowed with the thirty-two marks of a great man.<sup>293</sup> For one who is endowed with these marks of a great man, there truly are only two real possibilities. If he lives the home life, he will certainly become a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a fourfold army to reign over the entire world, freely, as he likes. Being a righteous Dharma king, he will attain the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven.

He will have a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and able to overcome the troops of others. He will certainly rule over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness. 685b

If [however,] he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path, then he will certainly become a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. His fame will spread and be known throughout the ten directions.

Having heard this, the brahmin Brahmāyu said:

Uttara, I have heard thus: The renunciant Gotama from the Sakya lineage, who left the Sakya clan, shaved off his hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and became homeless to train in the path, is staying in the country of Videha together with a large company of monks. Uttara, the renunciant Gotama has a great reputation, which has spread throughout the ten directions, namely: the renunciant Gotama is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, endowed with knowledge and [perfect] conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as the Buddha, an exalted one. In this world, with its devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, he has himself known and realized, and dwells, having himself accomplished realization. The Dharma he teaches is good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and it reveals the holy life.

Again, Uttara, [I have heard] that the renunciant Gotama is endowed with the thirty-two marks of a great man. For one who is endowed with these marks of a great man, there truly are only two real possibilities. If he lives the home life, he will certainly become a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a fourfold army to reign over the entire world, freely, as he likes. Being a righteous Dharma king, he will attain the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven.

He will have a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and will be able to overcome the troops of others. He will certainly rule over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness.

If [however,] he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path, then he will certainly become a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. His fame will spread and be known throughout the ten directions.

685c      Uttara, you have received and retained the texts on the possession of the thirty-two marks of a great man. For one who is endowed with these marks of a great man, there truly are only two real possibilities. If he lives the home life, he will certainly become a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a fourfold army to reign over the entire world, freely, as he likes. Being a righteous Dharma king, he will attain the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven. He will have a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and will be able to overcome the troops of others. He will certainly rule over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness.

If [however,] he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path, then he will certainly become a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. His fame will spread and be known throughout the ten directions.

Uttara replied:

Yes indeed, venerable sir,<sup>294</sup> I have received and retained the texts on the possession of the thirty-two marks of a great man. For one who is endowed with these marks of a great man, there truly are only two real possibilities. If he lives the home life, he will certainly become a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a fourfold army to reign over the entire world, freely, as he likes. Being a righteous Dharma king, he will attain the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven. He will have a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and will be able to overcome the troops of others. He will certainly rule over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness.

If [however,] he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path, then he will certainly become a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. His fame will spread and be known throughout the ten directions.

The brahmin Brahmāyu said:

Uttara, you approach the renunciant Gotama. Examine the renunciant Gotama to see whether he is so or not so. Does he really have the thirty-two marks of a great man?<sup>295</sup>

Having heard this, the young brahmin Uttara paid homage with his head at the feet of the brahmin Brahmāyu, circumambulated him three times, and left. Having approached the Buddha, he exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, sat to one side, and examined the World-honored One's body for the thirty-two marks. He saw that the World-honored One's body had thirty of the marks, but he was in doubt regarding two of the marks: the concealed male organ and the long, wide tongue.

The World-honored One thought, "This Uttara is examining my body for the thirty-two marks. He sees that I have thirty of the marks, but he is in doubt regarding two of the marks: the concealed male organ and the long, wide tongue. Let me now remove his doubt." Having discerned this, the World-honored One [thought], "I will perform an appropriate psychic feat. By performing the appropriate psychic feat, I will cause the young brahmin Uttara to see that my body has the concealed male organ and the long, wide tongue."

Then the World-honored One performed the appropriate psychic feat. The appropriate psychic feat having been performed, the young brahmin Uttara saw that the World-honored One's body had the concealed male organ and that his tongue was long and wide. As for the long, wide tongue, he extended it from his mouth so that it completely covered his face.

Having seen this, the young brahmin Uttara thought: "The renunciant Gotama is indeed endowed with the thirty-two marks of a great man. For one who is endowed with these marks of a great man, there truly are only two real possibilities. If he lives the home life, he will certainly become a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a fourfold army to reign over the entire world, freely, as he likes. Being a righteous Dharma king, he will attain the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven. He will have a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and will be able to overcome the troops of others. He will certainly rule over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness.

686a

“If, [however,] he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path, then he will certainly become a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. His fame will spread and be known throughout the ten directions.”

The young brahmin Uttara further thought, “Let me now closely examine his bearing and behavior and examine the inclinations that he demonstrates.” Then the young brahmin Uttara closely followed the Buddha’s activities. For the four months of the summer he examined his bearing and behavior and examined the inclinations that he demonstrated.<sup>296</sup> After the four months of the summer the young brahmin Uttara was pleased with the World-honored One’s bearing and behavior, having examined the inclinations he demonstrated. He said, “Gotama, I now have affairs [to attend to]. Wishing to return, I request to take my leave.”

The World-honored One said, “Uttara, you may leave as you wish.”

The young brahmin Uttara, having heard what the World-honored One had said, having received it well and retained it well, rose from his seat, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached the brahmin Brahmāyu. Having paid homage with his head at the feet of the brahmin Brahmāyu, he stepped back and sat to one side.

The brahmin Brahmāyu asked him:

Uttara, is what I have heard true? The renunciant Gotama has a great reputation, which has spread throughout in the ten directions. Is he so or is he not so? Does he really have the thirty-two marks of a great man?

The young brahmin Uttara replied:

Indeed, venerable sir, what you have heard is true. The renunciant Gotama has a great reputation, which has spread throughout the ten directions. The renunciant Gotama is so; he is not otherwise. He really does have the thirty-two marks of a great man.

Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama's feet stand flat and even on the ground. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the soles of the feet of the renunciant Gotama bear a wheel with a thousand spokes, all complete. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the toes of the renunciant Gotama are long and slender. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama's feet are completely level and straight. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man. 686b

Again, venerable sir, the heels and ankles of the renunciant Gotama are equal and full on both sides. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, both ankles of the renunciant Gotama are even. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the body hairs of the renunciant Gotama are turned upwards. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama has webbed hands and feet, like a royal goose. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the hands and feet of the renunciant Gotama are very tender and soft like lotuses. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the skin of the renunciant Gotama is soft and fine; dust and water do not adhere to it. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, every single body hair of the renunciant Gotama is separate, grows from a single pore, has a dark purple color, and curls to the right like a spiral shell. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the thighs of the renunciant Gotama are like those of a royal deer. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the male organ of the renunciant Gotama is concealed, like that of a fine royal horse. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the body shape of the renunciant Gotama is well rounded above and below in proper proportion, like a banyan tree. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama with his body not bent, without bending his body, while standing erect, can touch his knees with his hands. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the body of the renunciant Gotama is of a golden color, like pure gold with a purple tinge. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the body of the renunciant Gotama is complete in the seven parts. The seven complete parts are the two hands, the two legs, the two shoulders, and the neck. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the upper part of the renunciant Gotama's body is large like that of a lion. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the jaws of the renunciant Gotama are like those of a lion. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama has a straight spine and back. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the shoulders of the renunciant Gotama are connected with the neck evenly and fully. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama has forty teeth, which are even,<sup>297</sup> his teeth are not widely spaced, his teeth are white, his teeth come together, and he tastes the best of flavors. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama is endowed with a sweet celestial voice like that of a cuckoo. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama has a long, wide tongue. As to this long, wide tongue, when he extends it from his mouth, his tongue completely covers his face. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the eyelashes of the renunciant Gotama are full, like those of a royal ox. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama's eyes are reddish-blue in color. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama has on the crown of his head a fleshy protuberance that is round and in proportion, with the hairs curling to the right. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man.

Again, venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama has pure white hairs that curl to the right, growing between his eyebrows. Venerable sir, this is a mark of a great man possessed by the renunciant Gotama, a great man. The renunciant Gotama is endowed with the thirty-two marks of a great man.

For one who is endowed with these marks of a great man, there truly are only two real possibilities. If he lives the home life, he will certainly become a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a fourfold army to reign over the entire world, freely, as he likes. Being a righteous Dharma king, he will attain the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven. He will have a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and will be able to overcome the troops of others. He will certainly rule over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness.

If [however,] he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path, then he will certainly become a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. His fame will spread and be known throughout the ten directions.

687a Again, venerable sir, I have seen the renunciant Gotama as he puts on his [inner] robe; having put on his [inner] robe, as he covers himself with the [outer] robe; having covered himself with the [outer] robe, as he goes out of the hut; having gone out of the hut, as he goes out of the [monastery] park; having gone out of the [monastery] park, as he walks on the road to the village and as he enters the village; having entered the village along an alley, as he enters a house; having entered a house, as he arranges his seat; having arranged his seat, as he sits down; having sat down, as he washes his hands; having washed his hands, as he accepts food and drink; having accepted food and drink, as he consumes them; having consumed them, as he washes his hands and gives a blessing; [having given a blessing,] as he rises from the seat and leaves the house; having left the house, as he leaves the village along an alley; having left the village, as he enters the [monastery] park; having entered the [monastery] park, as he enters the hut; and having entered the hut.<sup>298</sup> [On all such occasions,] venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama wears the [inner] robe neatly, neither [too] high nor [too] low; his [inner] robe is not [worn] too tightly on the body, nor is the wind able to blow the [inner] robe away from his body. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama covers himself with the [outer] robe neatly, neither [too] high nor [too] low; the [outer] robe is not [worn] too tightly on his body, nor is the wind able to blow the [outer] robe away from his body.

Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama always, when wearing new robes, [makes them] following the custom of the noble ones by cutting [the cloth] with a knife. He dyes it an unattractive color just as the noble ones dye it an unattractive color. He wears the robes not as property, not out of pride, not to decorate himself, not for adornment, but just for protection against mosquitoes and gadflies, against contact with wind and sun, and to cover the body out of a sense of modesty.

When emerging from a hut, he does not stoop and [then] straighten up his body. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama never stoops as he emerges from a hut. Venerable sir, when the renunciant Gotama wishes to walk, he raises his right foot first. He raises [each foot] straight and puts it down straight, walking without disorderliness and without disarray. As he walks, the two ankles never bump against each other. Venerable sir, as he walks the renunciant Gotama is not dirtied by dust. Why is that? Because of his naturally good way of walking.

When emerging from the [monastery] park, he does not stoop and [then] straighten up his body [to pass through a low entrance gate]. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama never stoops as he emerges from the [monastery] park. In turning toward the village, he turns his entire body to the right and observes in the manner of an elephant. He observes all over, just observing, without anxiety or concern, without surprise, observing in all directions. Why is that? Because he is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened.

When entering the village, he does not stoop and [then] straighten up his body. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama never stoops as he enters a village. When being on a street or lane he looks neither down nor up; he looks only straight ahead with unobstructed knowledge and vision.

Venerable sir, the faculties of the renunciant Gotama are always composed. Why is that? Because of his inherently good mode of practice. When entering a house, he does not stoop and [then] straighten up his body. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama never stoops as he enters a house. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama turns his body to the right, arranges the seat, and sits down. In sitting down on the seat he does not do so with the full force of his body. He also does not place his hands on his thighs as he sits down on the seat. Having sat down on the seat, he is not restless, not disturbed, but neither is he jolly. In receiving water for washing, he [holds his hands] neither [too] high nor [too] low [and he uses] neither [too] much [water] nor [too] little.

In receiving food and drink, he [holds his bowl] neither [too] high nor [too] low, [and he accepts] neither [too] much [food] nor [too] little. Venerable 687b sir, in receiving food, the renunciant Gotama keeps his bowl level and [accepts] curries and rice to eat in equal proportions.<sup>299</sup> Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama forms the food into a ball neatly and puts it into his mouth slowly. He does not open his mouth until the ball of food has reached it, and when it is inside his mouth, he chews it three times before swallowing it. No rice or curry that is not broken up [by chewing] remains in his mouth when the next ball follows.

Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama eats with three kinds of purity. He wishes to experience the taste, but he does not wish to be defiled by that taste. He eats not for the sake of wealth, not out of pride, not for the sake of his appearance, not for adornment, but just wishing to maintain the body, so that it may long endure without trouble. He uses [food] to arrest old disease and prevent the arising of new illness, to preserve life without trouble and to have strength and comfort.

Having completed the meal, when receiving water for hand washing, [he holds his hands] neither [too] high nor [too] low, and [takes] neither [too] much [water] nor [too] little. In receiving water for washing the bowl [he holds the bowl] neither [too] high nor [too] low, and takes neither [too] much [water] nor [too] little. When he has washed his hands clean, his bowl is also clean; when he has washed his bowl clean, his hands are also clean. Having wiped his hands, he then wipes the bowl; having wiped the bowl, he then wipes his hands.

Having washed and wiped the bowl, he places it to one side, neither [too] close nor [too] far away. He does not keep looking at the bowl; he is not possessive of the bowl. He does not criticize this food or praise that food. Instead, he keeps silent for a little while.<sup>300</sup> After that he teaches the Dharma to the householders, exhorting and inspiring them, fully delighting them, teaching them the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired them, fully delighting them, he rises from his seat and withdraws to return [to the monastery].

When leaving the house, he does not stoop and [then] straighten up his body.

Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama never stoops as he leaves a house. When on a street or lane he looks neither down nor up; he looks only straight ahead with unobstructed knowledge and vision. Venerable sir, the faculties of the renunciant Gotama are always composed. Why is that? Because of his inherently good mode of practice.

When he goes out of the village, he does not stoop and [then] straighten up his body. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama never stoops when going out of a village. When he enters the [monastery] park, he does not stoop and [then] straighten up his body. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama never stoops when entering a [monastery] park.

After the midday meal, he puts away his [outer] robe and bowl, washes his hands and feet, puts his sitting mat over his shoulder, and enters a hut to sit in meditation. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama enters a hut to sit in meditation for the welfare of the whole world. Venerable sir, the renunciant Gotama rises from sitting in meditation in the afternoon with radiant complexion. Why is that? Because he is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened.

Venerable sir, the voice that emerges from the mouth of the renunciant Gotama has eight qualities: first, it is very deep; second, it is melodious; third, it enters the heart; fourth, it is lovely; fifth, it is very sonorous; sixth, it is lively; seventh, it is clear and distinct; eighth, it is wise. Many people love it, many delight in it, many recall it and thereby gain calmness of mind. 687c Venerable sir, when the renunciant Gotama teaches the Dharma to an assembly, the sound does not go beyond the assembly; it just remains within [the confines of] the assembly. He teaches the Dharma to [his listeners], exhorting and inspiring them, fully delighting them, teaching them the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired them, fully delighting them, he rises from his seat and withdraws to return to his former place.

Venerable sir, such is the appearance of the renunciant Gotama; yet he has other excellent qualities beyond these. Venerable sir, I wish to approach the renunciant Gotama and train in the holy life under him.<sup>301</sup>

The brahmin Brahmāyu said, “Do as you wish.”

Then the young brahmin Uttara paid homage with his head at the feet of the brahmin Brahmāyu, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. He said:

World-honored One, may I train in the path under the World-honored One! [May I] receive full ordination and become a monk, so that I can practice the holy life under the World-honored One!

Then the World-honored One allowed the young brahmin Uttara to train in the path by giving him the full ordination. Having allowed the young brahmin Uttara to train in the path by giving him the full ordination, he traveled in the country of Videha together with a great company of monks, proceeding by stages to Mithilā. In Mithilā he stayed in Mahādeva’s Mango Grove.

The brahmins and householders of Mithilā heard that the renunciant Gotama from the Sakya lineage, who had left the Sakya clan and gone forth to train in the path, had been traveling in the country of Videha together with a large company of monks, proceeding by stages to Mithilā, and was staying in Mahādeva’s Mango Grove.

[They had heard this:] “The renunciant Gotama has a great reputation, which has spread throughout the ten directions. The renunciant Gotama is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct. He is a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as the Buddha, an exalted one. In this world, with its devas, māras, Brahmas, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, he has himself known and realized, and dwells having personally accomplished realization. The Dharma he teaches is good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and he reveals the holy life.”

[They thought]: “One who visits the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, who reveres and pays homage to him, supports him and respects him, swiftly gains excellent benefits. Let us go together and visit the renunciant Gotama, pay homage to him, and support and honor him.”

The brahmins and householders of Mithilā, each accompanied by their family members, went out of Mithilā and proceeded northward to Mahādeva’s Mango Grove, desiring to visit the World-honored One, pay homage to him, and support him. Having approached the Buddha, some brahmins and householders from Mithilā paid homage with their heads at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side; some exchanged polite greetings with the Buddha, stepped back, and sat to one side; some extended their hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, stepped back, and sat to one side; and some, having seen the Buddha from afar, sat down in silence.

688a

When the brahmins and householders of Mithilā had all sat down, the Buddha taught them the Dharma, exhorting and inspiring them, fully delighting them, teaching them the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired them, fully delighting them, he remained silent.

The brahmin Brahmāyu heard that the renunciant Gotama from the Sakya lineage, who had left the Sakya clan and gone forth to train in the path, had been traveling in the country of Videha together with a large company of monks, proceeding by stages to Mithilā, and was staying in Mahādeva's Mango Grove.

[He also had heard this:] "The renunciant Gotama has a great reputation, which has spread throughout the ten directions. The renunciant Gotama is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct. He is a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as the Buddha, an exalted one. In this world, with its devas, māras, Brahmās, renunciants, and brahmins, from human beings to devas, he has himself known and realized, and dwells, having personally accomplished realization. The Dharma he teaches is good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and he reveals the holy life."

[He thought:] "One who visits the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, who reveres and pays homage to him, supports him and respects him, swiftly gains excellent benefits. Let me go and visit the renunciant Gotama, pay homage to him, and support him."

The brahmin Brahmāyu said to his charioteer, "Quickly prepare the chariot. I wish to approach the renunciant Gotama now."

Having received this instruction, the charioteer quickly completed preparing the chariot, returned, and said, "The chariot is prepared. The venerable one himself will know the proper time." Then Brahmāyu, driving that extremely fine chariot, went out of Mithilā and proceeded northward to Mahādeva's Mango Grove, desiring to visit the World-honored One, to pay homage to him and support him.

At that time the World-honored One was teaching the Dharma surrounded by an immense assembly. The brahmin Brahmāyu saw from afar that the World-honored One was teaching the Dharma surrounded by an immense assembly. Seeing this, he felt intimidated. Then Brahmāyu avoided [the situation] by driving to a tree beside the road and remaining under it.<sup>302</sup> He said to a young brahmin:

Approach the renunciant Gotama and on my behalf inquire if the noble one is in good health, strong in body, comfortable, free from ailments, and if he is dwelling at ease with his usual vigor. Say this: “Gotama, my teacher Brahmāyu inquires: ‘Are you in good health, strong, comfortable, free from ailments, and dwelling at ease with your usual vigor? Gotama, my teacher Brahmāyu wishes to come and visit the renunciant Gotama.’”

688b Then the young brahmin, receiving the instruction, walked over and approached the Buddha. He exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

Gotama, my teacher Brahmāyu inquires: “Is the noble one is in good health, strong in body, comfortable, free from ailments, and dwelling at ease with your usual vigor?” Gotama, my teacher Brahmāyu wishes to come and visit the renunciant Gotama.

The World-honored One said:

Young brahmin, may the brahmin Brahmāyu find well-being and happiness! May devas, human beings, asuras, gandhabbas, yakkhas, and other forms of life find well-being and happiness! Young brahmin, if the brahmin Brahmāyu wishes to come, let him do as he wishes.<sup>303</sup>

Then the young brahmin, having heard what the Buddha said, received it well and retained it well. He rose from his seat, circumambulated the Buddha three times, and left. He returned to the brahmin Brahmāyu and told him:

Venerable sir, I have communicated with the renunciant Gotama. The renunciant Gotama is now waiting for the venerable one. May the venerable one know the proper time.

The brahmin Brahmāyu descended from the chariot and approached the Buddha on foot. On seeing from afar the brahmin Brahmāyu coming, the assembly rose from their seats to make way for him. Why is that? Because he was famous, virtuous, and widely renowned.

The brahmin Brahmāyu said to the assembly, “Friends, be seated again, all of you! I wish to go straight on and visit the renunciant Gotama.” Then Brahmāyu approached the Buddha, exchanged polite greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side.

At that time two of Brahmāyu’s sense faculties were still good: the eye faculty and the ear faculty. Having sat down, the brahmin Brahmāyu carefully examined the Buddha’s body for the thirty-two marks. He saw thirty marks but was in doubt about two marks: the concealed male organ and the long, wide tongue. Then the brahmin Brahmāyu asked the World-honored One in verse:

As I heard long ago,
 [There are] thirty-two marks of a great man.
 Searching, I cannot see two of them.
 Does the body of the venerable renunciant Gotama
 Have a concealed male organ?

All men venerate [this] deep secret.
 Why does the most venerated of men
 Not display his mysterious tongue
 If the venerable one does have a long, wide tongue?

Let him enable me to see [these two marks]!
 I now really have doubt in my mind.
 May the tamer of those to be tamed resolve my doubt!

The World-honored One thought, “This brahmin Brahmāyu is searching my body for the thirty-two marks. He sees thirty but is in doubt about two: the concealed male organ and the long, wide tongue. Let me now remove his doubt.” Having understood this, the World-honored One performed a feat of supernormal power. The feat of supernormal power having been performed, the brahmin Brahmāyu saw that the World-honored One’s body did have the concealed male organ and the long, wide tongue. As for the long, wide tongue, when the tongue came out of his mouth it completely covered his face.

688c

Having concluded the feat of supernormal power, the World-honored One spoke these stanzas to the brahmin Brahmāyu:

As you heard long ago,
[There are] thirty-two marks of a great man.
All of them are found in my body.
I am fully, properly, and superbly endowed with them,
Being a trainer of those to be trained. Cut off your doubt about me,
Brahmin, develop sublime faith!

Very rare it is to get to see and hear
One who has rightly and fully awakened to the Supreme.
Extremely rare is the appearance in the world
Of one who has rightly and fully awakened to the Supreme.
Brahmin, I am rightly awakened,
A king of the unsurpassable true Dharma.<sup>304</sup>

Having heard this, the brahmin Brahmāyu thought:

This renunciant Gotama is indeed endowed with the thirty-two marks of a great man. For one who is endowed with these marks of a great man, there truly are only two real possibilities. If he lives the home life, he will certainly become a wheel-turning monarch, intelligent and wise, equipped with a four-fold army to reign over the entire world, freely, as he likes. Being a righteous Dharma king, he will attain the seven treasures. Those seven treasures are: the wheel treasure, the elephant treasure, the horse treasure, the jewel treasure, the woman treasure, the steward treasure, and the counselor treasure—these are the seven. He will have a thousand sons, handsome, brave, fearless, and will be able to overcome the troops of others. He will certainly rule over the whole earth, as far as the ocean, without relying on sword or club, just by teaching the Dharma, bringing peace and happiness.

If, [however], he shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robes, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to train in the path, then he will certainly become a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened. His fame will spread and be known throughout the ten directions.

Then the World-honored One thought, “This brahmin Brahmāyu has for a long time been without flattery and deceit. Whatever he wishes, whatever he asks will be entirely from a wish to understand and not to oppose or to annoy; he is like that. Let me teach him the profound higher Dharma (Abhidharma).” Having understood this, the World-honored One spoke to the brahmin Brahmāyu in verse:

For the sake of rejoicing in the Dharma in the present life
 And for much benefit in the next life,
 Brahmin, you may ask about such matters
 According to your own wishes.
 Whatever you ask about
 I will cut off your doubt.

Having been permitted by the World-honored One to ask questions, the brahmin Brahmāyu therefore asked the World-honored One about matters in accordance with what he originally intended [to ask]:

How is one a brahmin?
 What is the significance of the threefold attainment?
 By virtue of what is one said to be without attachment?
 What is perfect full awakening?<sup>305</sup>

689a

Then the World-honored One replied in verse:

Eradicating evil and unwholesome states,
 Being established and dwelling in celibacy,
 Cultivating the conduct of brahmins,<sup>306</sup>
 By these one is a brahmin.

Having higher knowledge of one’s past [existences],
 Seeing happy and evil destinies,
 Achieving the complete destruction of ignorance,<sup>307</sup>
 With these [three] knowledges, one is established as a sage.

Knowing well that the mind has been purified,
 Completely shedding sensual passion, anger, and delusion,
 Accomplishing the three knowledges,
 By this one has the threefold attainment.

Abstaining from unwholesome states,
Rightly established in the foremost of purposes,
Revered by the world as foremost,
By these one is without attachment.

Being of much benefit to devas and human beings,
Bestowing vision and destroying dissention,
Knowing widely and manifesting vision that is complete,
With these one is perfectly and fully awakened.

At this the brahmin Brahmāyu got up from his seat, wishing to pay homage with his head at the Buddha's feet.<sup>308</sup> Then that great assembly made a huge uproar:

The renunciant Gotama is very wonderful, very remarkable! He has great spiritual power, great virtue, great merit, great power! Why is that?

Among brahmins and householders in this country of Mithilā the brahmin Brahmāyu is foremost, because of his birth. The brahmin Brahmāyu is born to parents of pure descent. For seven generations on both his father's and his mother's sides there has been uninterrupted continuity of births without blemish. [Yet] he [wants to] prostrate himself humbly before the renunciant Gotama, revering, worshiping, supporting, and respecting him.<sup>309</sup>

The renunciant Gotama is very wonderful, very remarkable! He has great spiritual power, great virtue, great merit, great power! Why is that? Among brahmins and householders in this country of Mithilā the brahmin Brahmāyu is foremost, because of his learning. The brahmin Brahmāyu has learned much, retained it, and is able to recite it. He is a master of the four Vedas with their vocabularies, liturgy, phonology, and etymology, and the histories as a fifth. [Yet] he [wants to] prostrate himself humbly before the renunciant Gotama, revering, worshiping, supporting, and respecting him.

The renunciant Gotama is very wonderful, very remarkable! He has great spiritual power, great virtue, great merit, great power! Why is that? Among brahmins and householders in this country of Mithilā the brahmin Brahmāyu is foremost, because of his wealth. The brahmin Brahmāyu is very wealthy and prosperous, with immeasurable wealth, with livestock and estates beyond estimation, and with an abundance of flourishing feudatories. Mithilā with its water, pastures, and timber was granted to him as a brahmin's fief by the king of Magadha, Ajātasattu Vedehiputta. [Yet] he [wants to] prostrate himself humbly before the renunciant Gotama, revering, worshipping, supporting, and respecting him.

689b

The renunciant Gotama is very wonderful, very remarkable! He has great spiritual power, great virtue, great merit, great power! Why is that? Among brahmins and householders in this country of Mithilā the brahmin Brahmāyu is foremost, because of his age. The brahmin Brahmāyu is very old, endowed with a life span of one hundred and twenty-six years. [Yet] he [wants to] prostrate himself humbly before the renunciant Gotama, revering, worshipping, supporting, and respecting him.

Then the World-honored One, with his knowledge of other minds, knew the thoughts in the minds of the great assembly. Having understood it, the World-honored One said to the brahmin Brahmāyu: “Stop, stop, brahmin, though my mind is pleased and satisfied [by your wish to pay respect]. Return to your seat and I will teach you the Dharma.”

Then the brahmin Brahmāyu, having paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back and sat to one side. The World-honored One taught him the Dharma, exhorting and inspiring him, fully delighting him, teaching him the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired him, fully delighted him, he did as all buddhas do when first teaching the true Dharma to delight their hearers. He taught him about generosity, virtue, rebirth in heaven, the disadvantages of sensual desire, and the defilement of [continued] birth and death, extolling the excellence of dispassion and the purity of the constituents of the path. Having taught him like this, the Buddha knew that [Brahmāyu's] mind was delighted, prepared, malleable, resolute, uplifted, unified, free of doubt, free of the hindrances, [possessing] the ability and power to receive the true Dharma of the Buddha.

In accordance with the essential teaching of all buddhas, the World-honored One taught him about dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path [leading to its cessation]. While seated [right there], the brahmin Brahmāyu saw the four noble truths: dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path [leading to its cessation]. Just as a piece of white cloth is easily dyed, so the brahmin Brahmāyu, while seated [right there], saw the four noble truths: dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path [leading to its cessation].

Then the brahmin Brahmāyu, having seen the Dharma, having attained the Dharma, awakened of his own accord to the pure Dharma, cut off doubt, and overcame uncertainty. [For him] there was no other teacher; he would no longer follow others. Without hesitation, he abided in the realization of the fruit. In the teaching of the World-honored One he had attained fearlessness. He rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, [saying:]

689c World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.<sup>310</sup>

Then the brahmin Brahmāyu held his hands with joined palms [in respect] toward the Buddha and said, "May the World-honored One condescend to accept my invitation for [the meal] tomorrow, together with the Sangha of monks." The World-honored One accepted for the sake of the brahmin Brahmāyu by remaining silent.

Knowing that the World-honored One had accepted by remaining silent, the brahmin Brahmāyu paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times and returned to his home. That night he had various kinds of fine dishes prepared, very delicious, plentiful, and easy to digest. When the preparations were completed, at dawn, he put out seats and announced that the time had come: "World-honored One, the meal has been prepared. May the Noble One know the proper time."

Then, when the night was over, at dawn, the World-honored One put on his [outer] robe and took his bowl. Followed by the monks, the World-honored One led the way to the house of the brahmin Brahmāyu. He sat down on a seat prepared in front of the Sangha of monks. When the brahmin Brahmāyu knew that the World-honored One and the Sangha of monks had settled into their seats, he personally brought water for washing [their hands], and personally offered various kinds of fine dishes, delicious, plentiful, and easy to digest, making sure there was enough. After the meal, he gathered up the utensils, brought water for washing, and then seated himself on a small seat to one side to receive the blessing.

When the brahmin Brahmāyu had sat down, the World-honored One gave him a blessing.<sup>311</sup>

The fire oblation is the foremost of sacrifices,
 The universal sound is the root of all sounds,
 The king is foremost among men,
 The ocean is chief among rivers.
 The moon is brightest among the constellations,
 [But] in brightness nothing surpasses the sun.

Above, below, in all the [ten] directions,
 And in all the worlds,
 From human beings to devas,
 The Buddha alone is foremost.

Then, having spoken these blessings to the brahmin Brahmāyu, the World-honored One rose from his seat and left. Having stayed in the country of Mithilā for some days, he gathered his robes, took his bowl, and traveled toward Sāvattihī. Having proceeded by stages to Sāvattihī, he stayed in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

Then a group of many monks, while begging for almsfood in Sāvattihī, heard that the brahmin Brahmāyu of Mithilā, who had asked the Buddha in verse about some matters, had passed away. Having heard this, after having partaken of their midday meal, putting away their [outer] robes and bowls, and washing their hands and feet, the monks put their sitting mats over their shoulders and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with their heads [at his feet], they stepped back, stood to one side, and said:

World-honored One, having put on our robes at dawn and taken our bowls, we as a group of many monks entered Sāvattihī to beg for almsfood. At that time we heard that the brahmin Brahmāyu of Mithilā, who had asked the Buddha in verse about some matters, has passed away. World-honored One, where has he gone? Where will he be reborn? What is his future destiny?

The World-honored One replied:

690a

Monks, the brahmin Brahmāyu possessed the foremost great benefit. At his last, he came to know the Dharma, yet he did not trouble me for the sake of the Dharma. Monks, through having eradicated the five lower fetters the brahmin Brahmāyu will take birth <in between> and attain final nirvana there.<sup>312</sup> Having attained the state of not falling back from the Dharma, he will not come back to this world.

At that time the World-honored One declared that Brahmāyu had attained nonreturn.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the brahmin Brahmāyu and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Division 13

On Basic Analysis

162. The Discourse on an Analysis of the Six Elements<sup>313</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha, who was dwelling in the country of Magadha, approached Rājagaha to stay overnight. Then the World-honored One approached the house of a potter and said to the potter, “I would like to stay the night in your pottery. Will you give permission?”

The potter replied, “I have no objection. However, there is a monk who came first and is already staying there. If he gives permission, then you may stay as you wish.”

At that time the venerable Pukkusāti was already staying in that pottery. So the World-honored One went out of the potter’s house, entered the pottery, and said to the venerable Pukkusāti, “Monk, I would like to stay the night in the pottery. Will you give permission?”

The venerable Pukkusāti replied, “Sir, I have no objection. Furthermore, in this pottery there are straw seats already set out. Sir, if you wish to stay, you may do as you wish.”

Then the World-honored One went out of the pottery, washed his feet, and came back inside. He spread his sitting mat on a straw seat, sat down cross-legged, and spent the night in silence, seated in meditation with a concentrated mind. The venerable Pukkusāti also spent the night in silence, seated in meditation with a concentrated mind. 690b

Then the World-honored One thought, “It is marvelous and wonderful how this monk stays tranquil and quiet. Let me ask him this: ‘Monk, who is your teacher? In dependence on whom have you gone forth to train in the path, having accepted his Dharma?’”

Having thought this, the World-honored One asked, “Monk, who is your teacher? In dependence on whom have you gone forth to train in the path, having accepted his Dharma?”

The venerable Pukkusāti replied:

Venerable friend, there is the renunciant Gotama from the Sakyan lineage who left the Sakyan clan, shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robes, and out of faith left the household life and became homeless to train in the path. He has realized the unsurpassable right and total awakening. He is my teacher. In dependence on him I have gone forth to train in the path, having accepted his Dharma.

The World-honored One asked further, “Monk, have you ever seen your teacher?”<sup>314</sup>

The venerable Pukkusāti replied, “I have not seen him.”

The World-honored One asked further, “If you saw your teacher, would you recognize him?”

The venerable Pukkusāti replied:

I would not recognize him. However, venerable friend, I have heard that the World-honored One is a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one. He is my teacher. In dependence on him I have gone forth to train in the path, having accepted his Dharma.

Then, the World-honored One thought, “This clansman has gone forth to train in the path in dependence on me, having accepted my Dharma. Let me now teach him the Dharma!”

Having thought this, the World-honored One said to the venerable Pukkusāti:

Monk, I will teach you the Dharma that is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, to reveal the holy life,<sup>315</sup> namely the analysis of the six elements. You should listen closely and pay proper attention.

The venerable Pukkusāti replied, “Yes indeed.”

The Buddha said to him:

Monk, a human being is composed of six elements, has six spheres of contact, and has eighteen mental activities. He [also] has four spheres of stability, and if he is established in them, he does not experience distressing objects. Not experiencing distressing objects, his mind does not give rise to dislike, sadness, worry, or agitation.<sup>316</sup> Such is the instruction: do not neglect wisdom, protect the truth, and cultivate relinquishment.

Monk, one should train for the supreme, one should train to attain quietude, by analyzing the six elements in this way. Monk, “a human being is composed of six elements”—for what reason has this been said? It refers to the earth element, the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element. Monk—for this reason it has been said: “a human being is composed of six elements.”

Monk, “a human being has six spheres of contact”—for what reason has this been said? This means, monk, that through eye contact one sees forms, through ear contact one hears sounds, through nose contact one smells odors, through tongue contact one tastes flavors, through body contact one experiences tangibles, and through mind contact one cognizes mind objects.<sup>317</sup> Monk, for this reason it has been said, “a human being has six spheres of contact.”

690c

Monk, “a human being has eighteen mental activities”—for what reason has this been said? It means, monk, that on seeing a form with the eye, one observes that form and abides in joy, [or] one observes that form and abides in sadness, [or] one observes that form and abides in equanimity. In the same way, with the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . on cognizing a mental object with the mind, one observes that mental object and abides in joy, [or] one observes that mental object and abides in sadness, [or] one observes that mental object and abides in equanimity. Monk, these six observed with joy, six observed with sadness, and six observed with equanimity together become eighteen activities. Monk, for this reason it has been said: “a human being has eighteen mental activities.”

Monk, “a human being has four spheres of stability”—for what reason has this been said? It refers to the sphere of stability in truth, the sphere of stability in wisdom, the sphere of stability in relinquishment, and the sphere of stability in appeasement. Monk, for this reason it has been said: “a human being has four spheres of stability.”

How does a monk not neglect wisdom? Suppose that a monk discerns in relation to the bodily elements: “in this present body of mine there is the internal earth element, which was received at birth.” And what is it?

It is this: head hair, body hair, nails, teeth, rough and smooth epidermis, skin, flesh, bones, sinews, kidneys, heart, liver, lungs, spleen, large intestine, stomach, and feces—whatever is of this nature; and whatever else is found in this body internally, whatever is contained in it internally that is solid, that is of a solid nature and found internally, having been received at birth—this, monk, is what is meant by the internal earth element.

Monk, whatever is the internal earth element and whatever is the external earth element, all of that is collectively called the earth element. All of it is not mine, I am not that, and it is not my self. On wisely contemplating it like this, knowing it as it really is, the mind does not become defiled with attachment in regard to this earth element. This, monk, is what is meant by not neglecting wisdom.

Again, monk, a monk does not neglect wisdom if he discerns in relation to the bodily elements: “in this present body of mine there is the internal water element, which was received at birth.” And what is it? It is this: brain fluid,<sup>318</sup> tears, sweat, mucus, saliva, pus, blood, fat, marrow, phlegm, bile, and urine—whatever is of this nature; and whatever else is found in this body internally, whatever is contained in it internally that is watery, that is of a watery nature and moist internally, having been received at birth—this, monk, is what is meant by the internal water element.

691a

Monk, whatever is the internal water element and whatever is the external water element, all of that is collectively called the water element. All of that is not mine, I am not that, and it is not my self. On wisely contemplating it like this, knowing it as it really is, the mind does not become defiled with attachment in regard to the water element. This, monk, is what is meant by not neglecting wisdom.

Again, monk, a monk does not neglect wisdom if he discerns in relation to the bodily elements: “in this present body of mine there is the internal fire element, which was received at birth.” And what is it? It is this: bodily heat, bodily warmth, bodily discomfort, warmth from bodily nourishment, that is, from digesting food and drink—whatever is of this nature; and whatever else is found in this body internally, whatever is contained in it internally that is fiery, that is of a fiery nature and hot internally, having been received at birth—this, monk, is what is meant by the internal fire element.

Monk, whatever is the internal fire element and whatever is the external fire element, all of that is collectively called the fire element. All of that is not mine, I am not that, and it is not my self. On wisely contemplating it like this, knowing it as it really is, the mind does not become defiled with attachment in regard to the fire element. This, monk, is what is meant by not neglecting wisdom.

Again, monk, a monk does not neglect wisdom if he discerns in relation to the bodily elements: “in this present body of mine there is the internal wind element, which was received at birth.” And what is it? It is this: upward-moving winds, downward-moving winds, forceful winds, pulling and contracting winds, disturbing winds, irregular winds, winds in the joints, the winds of out-breaths, and the winds of in-breaths—whatever is of this nature; and whatever else is found in this body internally, whatever is contained in it internally that is windy, that is of a windy nature and moves internally, having been received at birth—this, monk, is what is meant by the internal wind element.

Monk, whatever is the internal wind element and whatever is the external wind element, all of that is collectively called the wind element. All of that is not mine, I am not that, and it is not my self. On wisely contemplating it like this, knowing it as it really is, the mind does not become defiled with attachment in regard to the wind element. This, monk, is what is meant by not neglecting wisdom.

Again, monk, a monk does not neglect wisdom if he discerns in relation to the bodily elements: “in this present body of mine there is the internal space element, which was received at birth.” And what is it? It is the space for the eyes, the space in the ears, the space in the nostrils, the space in the mouth, the throat, and so on, through which [food] can pass; it is where food is chewed, held, dissolved, slowly passed through the throat, retained [for a while], and [eventually] discharged below—whatever is of this nature; and whatever else is found in this body internally, whatever is contained in it internally that is space-like, whatever is found to be space-like, not covered by flesh, skin, bone, or tendons—this, monk, is what is meant by the internal space element.

691b Monk, whatever is the internal space element and whatever is the external space element, all of that is collectively called the space element. All of that is not mine, I am not that, and it is not my self. On wisely contemplating it like this, knowing it as it really is, the mind does not become defiled with attachment in regard to the space element. This, monk, is what is meant by not neglecting wisdom.

Monk, if a monk knows these five elements as they truly are, having known them as they truly are, his mind is not defiled by them but liberated from them. There then remains just consciousness. Consciousness of what? Consciousness of pleasure, consciousness of pain, consciousness of mental joy, consciousness of mental sadness, consciousness of equanimity.<sup>319</sup>

Monk, because of pleasant contact there arises pleasant feeling; he feels a pleasant feeling. On feeling a pleasant feeling, he knows he is feeling a pleasant feeling. If for the monk this pleasant contact ceases, then once the pleasant contact has ceased, the pleasant feeling that had arisen from the pleasant contact also ceases and comes to an end; he knows it has become cool.

Monk, because of painful contact there arises painful feeling; he feels a painful feeling. On feeling a painful feeling, he knows he is feeling a painful feeling. If for the monk this painful contact ceases, then once the painful contact has ceased, the painful feeling that had arisen from the painful contact also ceases and comes to an end; he knows it has become cool.

Monk, because of mentally joyful contact there arises mentally joyful feeling; he feels a mentally joyful feeling. On feeling a mentally joyful feeling, he knows he is feeling a mentally joyful feeling. If for the monk this mentally joyful contact ceases, then once the mentally joyful contact has ceased, the mentally joyful feeling that had arisen from the mentally joyful contact also ceases and comes to an end; he knows it has become cool.

Monk, because of mentally sad contact there arises mentally sad feeling; he feels a mentally sad feeling. Having felt a mentally sad feeling, he knows he is feeling a mentally sad feeling. If for the monk this mentally sad contact ceases, then once the mentally sad contact has ceased, the mentally sad feeling that had arisen from the mentally sad contact also ceases and comes to an end; he knows it has become cool.

Monk, because of equanimous contact there arises equanimous feeling; he feels an equanimous feeling. On feeling an equanimous feeling, he knows he is feeling an equanimous feeling. If for the monk this equanimous contact ceases, then once the equanimous contact has ceased, the equanimous feeling that had arisen from the equanimous contact also ceases and comes to an end; he knows it has become cool.

Monk, because of this or that contact there arises this or that feeling; and once this or that contact has ceased, this or that feeling also ceases. He knows that this feeling comes from contact, has its root in contact, arises by way of contact, is born from contact, has contact as its beginning, and proceeds in dependence on contact.

Monk, it is just as, conditioned by a lower firestick, an upper firestick, and human effort, heat is produced and fire arises; but, monk, if the many pieces of firewood are scattered, then any fire that arises from those [firesticks]—fire that might have produced much heat if provided with much fuel—will all cease and come to an end, leaving just cold firewood.

691c

In the same way, monk, because of this or that contact there arises this or that feeling. Once this or that contact has ceased, this or that feeling also ceases. He knows that this feeling comes from contact, has its root in contact, arises by way of contact, is born from contact, has contact as its beginning, and proceeds in dependence on contact.

If a monk is not defiled by these three feelings but is liberated from them, then that monk just dwells in equanimity which is extremely pure. Monk, that monk reflects, “With this pure equanimity of mine, let me enter the sphere of infinite space, developing the mind accordingly, in dependence on that, dwelling in that, established on that, conditioned by that, bound to that. With this pure equanimity of mine, let me enter the sphere of infinite consciousness . . . the sphere of nothingness . . . the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, developing the mind accordingly, in dependence on that, dwelling in that, established on that, conditioned by that, bound to that.”

Monk, he is just like a skilled goldsmith who uses fire to refine gold, forging it so that it becomes extremely thin, heating it in the furnace in various ways so that it becomes pure, extremely malleable, and bright.

Monk, once that gold has been heated and refined in various ways by the goldsmith so that it becomes pure, extremely malleable, and bright, that goldsmith fashions it according to his will into [gold thread for] embroidery to adorn a new garment, or into a finger ring, an arm bracelet, a necklace, or a jeweled hair ornament.

In the same way, monk, that monk reflects, “With this pure equanimity of mine, I could enter the sphere of infinite space, and develop this mental state in dependence on that, dwelling in that, established on that, conditioned by that, bound to that. With this pure equanimity of mine, I could enter the sphere of infinite consciousness . . . the sphere of nothingness . . . the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, and develop this mental state in dependence on that, dwelling in that, established on that, conditioned by that, bound to that.”

That monk reflects further, “If this pure equanimity of mine were dependent on the sphere of infinite space, then it would be conditioned. What is conditioned, that is impermanent. What is impermanent, that is dukkha. What is dukkha, I know as dukkha.” Having known it as dukkha, he lets go of it and does not enter the sphere of infinite space.

[He reflects,] “If this pure equanimity of mine were based on the sphere of infinite consciousness . . . the sphere of nothingness . . . the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, then it would be conditioned. What is conditioned, that is impermanent. What is impermanent, that is dukkha. What is dukkha, I know as dukkha.” Having known it as dukkha, he lets go of it and does not enter the sphere of infinite consciousness . . . the sphere of nothingness . . . the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.”<sup>320</sup>

692a Monk, if a monk, by wisely contemplating these four spheres, knows them as they truly are, then his mind does not [wish to] attain them and does not enter them. At that time he is no longer conditioned and has no intentions in regard to becoming or nonbecoming. When he experiences the last feeling to be experienced by the body,<sup>321</sup> he will know that he is experiencing the last feeling to be experienced by the body. When he experiences the last feeling to be experienced in his life, he will know that he is experiencing the last feeling to be experienced in his life. He knows that with the breaking up of the body at the end of life, when the life span has been completed, all feelings completely cease and come to an end, becoming cool.

Monk, it is just like a lamp that burns in dependence on oil and a wick. If nobody adds oil and supplies a wick, then once what had earlier [been supplied] comes to an end, the lamp does not continue [burning], having no more fuel.

In the same way, when the monk experiences the last feeling to be experienced by the body, he will know that he is experiencing the last feeling to be experienced by the body. When he experiences the last feeling to be experienced in his life, he will know that he is experiencing the last feeling to be experienced in his life. With the breaking up of the body at the end of life, when the life span has been completed, all feelings completely cease and come to an end. He knows that they have become cool.

Monk, this is reckoned the foremost right wisdom for a monk, namely attaining supreme and complete cessation. A monk whose taints are destroyed has attained this; he has attained the foremost sphere of right wisdom. Monk, with this liberation he is established in truth and has attained imperturbability. Truth is what is in accordance with the Dharma. Falsehood is what has the nature of delusion. Monk, to attain that is the foremost sphere of truth.

Monk, suppose that a monk is practicing relinquishment.<sup>322</sup> Whereas he formerly would certainly have harbored resentment, he has now let go of that, vomited it out, become liberated from it, extinguished it completely. Monk, this is reckoned a monk's foremost right relinquishment, namely the complete giving up of worldliness, its fading away, ceasing, and coming to an end. A monk who achieves this achieves the foremost sphere of relinquishment.

Monk, that monk's mind [formerly] was defiled by sensual desire, ill will, and stupidity, for he had not attained liberation. Monk, when all sensual passion, anger, and stupidity end, [when they] fade away, cease, come to an end, that is to attain the foremost peace. Monk, one who achieves that achieves the foremost sphere of peace.

Monk, "I am" elevates oneself. "I shall be" also elevates oneself. "I shall neither be nor not be" also elevates oneself. "I shall be endowed with form" also elevates oneself. "I shall be formless" also elevates oneself. "I shall be neither endowed with form nor formless" also elevates oneself. "I shall be percipient" also elevates oneself. "I shall be nonpercipient" also elevates oneself. “I shall be neither percipient nor non-percipient” also elevates oneself. This is conceit; this is pride; this is negligence.<sup>323</sup>

692b Monk, if there is none of this self-elevation, conceit, pride, or negligence, then the mind is reckoned to be at peace. Monk, if the mind is at peace, then it does not dislike, is not sad, is not troubled, not agitated.<sup>324</sup> Why is that? Because that monk has attained Dharma, there is no longer what could be called dislike. Not disliking, he is not sad; not being sad, he is not worried; not being worried, he is not troubled; not being troubled, he is not agitated; and because of not being agitated he attains nirvana, knowing as it really is: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will be not be another experiencing of existence.”

As this Dharma was being taught, there arose in the venerable Pukkusāti the spotless, immaculate Dharma eye in regard to all phenomena.<sup>325</sup> Then the venerable Pukkusāti saw the Dharma, attained the Dharma, realized the bright pure Dharma; he abandoned doubt and went beyond perplexity; he became independent of other teachers; he would never again follow others; and he became free of hesitation. Having been established in the attainment of the fruit, he had attained fearlessness in the Dharma taught by the World-honored One.

He rose from his seat, paid homage at the feet of the Buddha, and said, World-honored One, I repent. Well-gone One, I confess. [I was] like a fool, like an ignorant [person], like an uncertain [person], like one who does not understand well and does not recognize good ground, unable to understand on my own. Why is that? Because I addressed the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, as “sir.” May the World-honored One accept my repentance. Having repented, I will not do it again.

The World-honored One said:

Monk, you truly were foolish and ignorant, you truly were uncertain. You did not understand well in that you addressed the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, as “sir.” Monk, if you are able to repent on your own, having seen it and disclosed it, and you guard against doing it again, then, monk, in this way there is benefit and no loss in the noble

Dharma and discipline; that is to say, when one is able to repent on one's own, having seen it and disclosed it, and guards against doing it again.<sup>326</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Pukkusāti was delighted and received it respectfully.

163. The Discourse on an Analysis of the Six Sense Spheres<sup>327</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, staying in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

I shall teach you the Dharma that is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and revealing the holy life,<sup>328</sup> namely a discourse on an analysis of the six sense spheres. Listen closely, listen closely and pay proper attention.

Then the monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One, we shall receive the teaching.”

The Buddha said:

You should internally understand the six sense spheres. You should internally understand the six contacts.<sup>329</sup> You should internally understand the eighteen mental activities. You should internally understand the thirty-six implements [of experience].<sup>330</sup> Herein, abandoning that, accomplish this. [You] should internally understand that the teaching of the Dharma is infinite. There are three establishments of mindfulness developed by the Noble One, having developed which the Noble One is capable of teaching the assemblies, as an unsurpassable trainer who trains people to advance in any direction. These are the topics of this discourse on an analysis of the six sense spheres.

692c

“The six sense spheres should be internally understood”—why has this been said? There are the eye sense sphere, the ear . . . nose . . . tongue . . . body and mind sense sphere. “The six sense spheres should be internally understood”—this has been said for this reason.

“The six contacts should be internally understood”—why has this been said? There is eye contact on seeing forms, ear contact on hearing sounds, nose contact on smelling odors, tongue contact on tasting flavors, body contact on touching tangibles, and mind contact on cognizing mind objects.<sup>331</sup> “The six contacts should be internally understood”—this has been said for this reason.

“The eighteen mental activities should be internally understood”—why has this been said? Monks, having seen a form with the eye, one discerns the form and abides in joy, [or] one discerns the form and abides in sadness, [or] one discerns the form and abides in equanimity. In the same way with the ear . . . nose . . . tongue . . . body . . . having cognized a mental object with the mind, one discerns the mental object and abides in joy, [or] one discerns the mental object and abides in sadness, [or] one discerns the mental object and abides in equanimity. This is reckoned as discerning six [types] of joy, discerning six [types] of sadness, discerning six [types] of equanimity. These are collectively called the eighteen mental activities. “The eighteen mental activities should be internally understood”—this has been said for this reason.

“The thirty-six implements [of experience] should be internally understood”—why has this been said? There are six [types] of joy that are based on attachment, six [types] of joy that are based on dispassion, six [types] of sadness that are based on attachment, six [types] of sadness that are based on dispassion, six [types] of equanimity that are based on attachment, and six [types] of equanimity that are based on dispassion.

What are the six [types] of joy that are based on attachment and what are the six [types] of joy that are based on dispassion? The eye having seen a form, there arises joy. One should know that this [can be] of two types, either based on attachment or based on dispassion.

What is joy based on attachment? The eye comes to know forms that are conducive to joy and the mind reflects on them, desiring those forms, experiencing happiness conjoined with desire. Those [forms] which one has not gotten, one desires to get; those which one has already gotten are recollected and give rise to joy. Joy of this type is called joy based on attachment.

What is joy based on dispassion? One understands that forms are impermanent, changing, [bound to] disappear, fade away, and cease; that all forms, both formerly and in the present, are impermanent, dukkha, and bound to cease. Recollecting this gives rise to joy. Joy of this type is called joy based on dispassion.<sup>332</sup>

693a

In the same way the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind having cognized a mental object, there arises joy. One should know that this [can be] of two types, either based on attachment or based on dispassion.

What is joy based on attachment? The mind comes to know mental objects that are conducive to joy and the mind reflects on them, desiring those mental objects, experiencing happiness conjoined with desire. Those [mental objects] which one has not yet got, one desires to get; those which one has already got are recollected and give rise to joy. Joy of this type is called joy based on attachment.

What is joy based on dispassion? One understands that mental objects are impermanent, changing, [bound to] disappear, to fade away and cease; that all mental objects, both formerly and in the present, are impermanent, dukkha, and bound to cease. Recollecting this gives rise to joy. Joy of this type is called joy based on dispassion.

What are the six [types] of sadness that are based on attachment and what are the six [types] of sadness that are based on dispassion? The eye having seen a form, there arises sadness. One should know that this [can be] of two types, either based on attachment or based on dispassion.

What is sadness based on attachment? The eye comes to know forms that are conducive to joy and the mind reflects on them, desiring those forms, experiencing happiness conjoined with desire. Those [forms] which one has not yet got, one is not able to get; those which one has already got are [soon] past and gone, scattered and decayed, having ceased or changed, which gives rise to sadness. Sadness of this type is called sadness based on attachment.

What is sadness based on dispassion? One understands that forms are impermanent, changing, [bound to] disappear, to fade away and cease; that all forms, both formerly and in the present, are impermanent, dukkha, and bound to cease.

Recollecting this, one reflects, “When will I attain and dwell in that sphere, namely the sphere that the noble ones attain and dwell in?” This is [one's] aspiration for the highest liberation. The frightening knowledge of dukkha and sadness gives rise to sadness. Sadness of this type is called sadness based on dispassion.

In the same way, the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind having cognized a mental object, there arises sadness. One should know that this [can be] of two types, either based on attachment or based on dispassion.

What is sadness based on attachment? The mind comes to know mental objects that are conducive to joy and the mind reflects on them, desiring those mental objects, experiencing happiness conjoined with desire. Those [mental objects] which one has not yet gotten, one is not able to get; those which one has already gotten are [soon] past and gone, scattered and decayed, having ceased or changed, which gives rise to sadness. Sadness of this type is called sadness based on attachment.

What is sadness based on dispassion? One understands that mental objects are impermanent, changing, [bound to] disappear, to fade away and cease; that all mental objects, both formerly and in the present, are impermanent, dukkha, and bound to cease.

Recollecting this, one reflects, “When will I attain and dwell in that sphere, namely the sphere that the noble ones attain and dwell in?” This is [one's] aspiration for the highest liberation. The frightening knowledge of dukkha and sadness gives rise to sadness. Sadness of this type is called sadness based on dispassion.

What are the six [types] of equanimity that are based on attachment and what are the six [types] of equanimity that are based on dispassion? The eye having seen a form, there arises equanimity. One should know that this [can be] of two types, either based on attachment or based on dispassion.

What is equanimity based on attachment? The eye comes to know forms and there arises equanimity. That is the indifference [of one] who is not learned, who lacks wisdom, an unlearned ignorant worldling. Such equanimity toward form is not detached from form. This is called equanimity based on attachment.

What is equanimity based on dispassion? One understands that forms are impermanent, changing, [bound to] disappear, to fade away and cease; that all forms, both formerly and in the present, are impermanent, dukkha, and bound to cease. Recollecting this, one is established in equanimity, equanimity that has been attained through mental development.<sup>333</sup> This is called equanimity based on dispassion.

In the same way, the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind having cognized a mental object, there arises equanimity. One should know that this [can be] of two types, either based on attachment or based on dispassion.

What is equanimity based on attachment? The mind comes to know mental objects and there arises equanimity that is the indifference [of one] who is not learned, who lacks wisdom, an unlearned ignorant worldling. Such equanimity toward mental objects is not detached from mental objects. This is called equanimity based on attachment.

What is equanimity based on dispassion? One understands that mental objects are impermanent, changing, [bound to] disappear, to fade away and cease; that all mental objects, both formerly and in the present, are impermanent, dukkha, and bound to cease. Recollecting this, one is established in equanimity, equanimity that has been attained through mental development. This is called equanimity based on dispassion.

Thus, there are six [types] of joy based on attachment, six [types] of joy based on dispassion, six [types] of sadness based on attachment, six [types] of sadness based on dispassion, six [types] of equanimity based on attachment, six [types] of equanimity based on dispassion. These are collectively called [the thirty-six implements of experience]. “The thirty-six implements [of experience] should be internally understood”—this has been said for this reason.

“Herein, abandoning that, accomplish this!”—why has this been said? By holding to the six [types] of joy that are based on dispassion, by depending on them and dwelling in them, extinguish the six [types] of joy that are based on attachment, remove them, vomit them out. In this way they are to be eradicated.

By holding to the six [types] of sadness that are based on dispassion, by depending on them and dwelling in them, extinguish the six [types] of sadness that are based on attachment, remove them, vomit them out. In this way they are to be eradicated.

By holding to the six [types] of equanimity that are based on dispassion, by depending on them and dwelling in them, extinguish the six [types] of equanimity that are based on attachment, remove them, vomit them out. In this way they are to be eradicated.

By holding to the six [types] of sadness that are based on dispassion, by depending on them and dwelling in them, extinguish the six [types] of joy based on dispassion, remove them, vomit them out. In this way they are to be eradicated.<sup>334</sup>

By holding to the six [types] of equanimity that are based on dispassion, by depending on them and dwelling in them, extinguish the six [types] of sadness that are based on dispassion, remove them, vomit them out. In this way they are to be eradicated.

There is equanimity that is of countless contacts, diverse contacts, and there is equanimity that is of a single contact, not of diverse contacts. What is equanimity that is of countless contacts, diverse contacts? Equanimity in regard to forms, sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles—this is equanimity that is of countless contacts, diverse contacts.

What is equanimity that is of a single contact, not of diverse contacts? This is equanimity that depends on the sphere of infinite space, or on the sphere of infinite consciousness, or on the sphere of nothingness, or on the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception—this is equanimity that is of a single contact, not of diverse contacts.

693c By holding to the equanimity that is of a single contact, not of diverse contacts, by depending on it and dwelling in it, extinguish the equanimity that is of countless contacts, diverse contacts, remove it, vomit it out. In this way it is to be eradicated.

Holding to boundlessness, depending on boundlessness, and dwelling in boundlessness—this is reckoned as the type of equanimity that is of a single contact, not of diverse contacts. Holding to this, depending on this, dwelling in this—this is reckoned as extinguishing the equanimity that is of countless contacts, diverse contacts, as removing that, vomiting that out. In this way it is to be eradicated.<sup>335</sup>

“Herein, abandoning that, accomplish this!”—this has been said for this reason.

“One should internally understand that the teaching of the Dharma is infinite”—why has this been said?<sup>336</sup> [Suppose that] the Tathāgata had four disciples who were of superior conduct, superior understanding, superior mindfulness, and superior wisdom, who were skilled in eloquence, having achieved foremost skill in eloquence, and had a life span of a hundred years. The Tathāgata could teach them the Dharma for one hundred years continuously—except for the time [required] for eating and drinking, the time for obeying the calls of nature, the time for resting when weary, and the time for [Sangha] meetings— and they would quickly see, with wisdom, the meaning of the Dharma taught by the Tathāgata, as regards wording, phrasing, and import, without needing to ask the Tathāgata further questions about the Dharma. Why is that? [Because] the Tathāgata’s teaching of the Dharma is without limit and could not be exhausted, as regards wording, phrasing, and import, before the lives of those four disciples would come to an end.

They would be just like four skilled archers, well trained, knowledgeable, and endowed with energy, who, powerfully shooting [their arrows], immediately penetrate [the target].

In the same way, [suppose that] the Tathāgata had four disciples who were of superior conduct, superior understanding, superior mindfulness, and superior wisdom, who were skilled in eloquence, having achieved foremost skill in eloquence, and had a life span of a hundred years. The Tathāgata could teach them the Dharma [even] for one hundred years continuously—except for the time [required] for eating and drinking, the time for obeying the calls of nature, the time for resting when weary, and the time for [Sangha] meetings— and they would quickly see, with wisdom, the meaning of the Dharma taught by the Tathāgata, as regards wording, phrasing, and import, without needing to ask the Tathāgata further questions about the Dharma. Why is that? [Because] the Tathāgata’s teaching of the Dharma is without limit and could not be exhausted. “One should internally understand that the teaching of the Dharma is infinite”—this has been said for this reason.

“[There are] three establishments of mindfulness that are developed by the Noble One, having developed which the Noble One is capable of teaching the assemblies”—why has this been said? The Tathāgata teaches the Dharma to his disciples with thoughts of sympathy and consideration, seeking their benefit and welfare, seeking their peace and happiness, with a mind full of compassion and kindness, [telling them,] “This is for your welfare, this is for your happiness, this is for your welfare and happiness.”

694a If those disciples are not respectful and do not act accordingly, not becoming established in knowledge, their minds not progressing in the Dharma, not following the Dharma, not receiving the true Dharma, disregarding the World-honored One’s instruction, and unable to attain certainty in it; then the World-honored One is not sad or sorrowful because of this.<sup>337</sup> Instead, the World-honored One is equanimous and unaffected, constantly mindful and constantly aware. This is reckoned the first establishment of mindfulness that is developed by the Noble One, such that, having developed it, the Noble One is capable of teaching the assemblies.

Again, the Tathāgata teaches the Dharma to his disciples with thoughts of sympathy and consideration, seeking their benefit and welfare, seeking their peace and happiness, with a mind full of compassion and kindness, [telling them,] “This is for your welfare, this is for your happiness, this is for your welfare and happiness.”

If the disciples are respectful and act accordingly, becoming established in knowledge, their minds surrendering and progressing in the Dharma, following the Dharma, receiving the true Dharma, not disregarding the World-honored One’s instruction and able to attain certainty in it; then the World-honored One is not glad or joyful because of this.<sup>338</sup> Instead, the World-honored One is equanimous and unaffected, constantly mindful and constantly aware. This is reckoned the second establishment of mindfulness that is developed by the Noble One, such that, having developed it, the Noble One is capable of teaching the assemblies.

Again, the Tathāgata teaches the Dharma to his disciples with thoughts of sympathy and consideration, seeking their benefit and welfare, seeking their peace and happiness, with a mind full of compassion and kindness, [telling them,] “This is for your welfare, this is for your happiness, this is for your welfare and happiness.”

Some disciples are not respectful and do not act accordingly, not becoming established in knowledge, their minds not progressing in the Dharma, not following the Dharma, not receiving the true Dharma, disregarding the World-honored One's instruction, and unable to attain certainty in it.

Some disciples are respectful and act accordingly, becoming established in knowledge, their minds surrendering to and progressing in the Dharma, following the Dharma, receiving the true Dharma, not disregarding the World-honored One's instruction, and able to attain certainty in it; the World-honored One is not sad or sorrowful because of this, nor is he glad or joyful. Instead, the World-honored One is equanimous and unaffected, constantly mindful and constantly aware.

This is reckoned the third establishment of mindfulness that is developed by the Noble One, such that, having developed it, the Noble One is capable of teaching the assemblies. "There are three establishments of mindfulness that are developed by the Noble One, such that, having developed them, the Noble One is capable of teaching the assemblies"—this has been said for this reason.

"The unsurpassable trainer of able men trains able men to advance in any direction"—why has this been said? "Trainer of able men": this is said of one who trains able men to advance in a certain direction: the eastern direction, or the southern direction, or the western direction, or the northern direction.

A trainer of elephants trains elephants to advance in a certain direction: the eastern direction, or the southern direction, or the western direction, or the northern direction. A trainer of horses trains horses to advance in a certain direction: the eastern direction, or the southern direction, or the western direction, or the northern direction. A trainer of oxen trains oxen to advance in a certain direction: the eastern direction, or the southern direction, or the western direction, or the northern direction.

The unsurpassable trainer of able men trains able men to advance in any direction. Herein, "direction" [signifies this]: One who is [possessed of] form contemplates form—this is reckoned the first direction.

Not perceiving forms internally, one contemplates forms externally—this is the second direction.

One dwells having accomplished direct experience of the liberation by purity—this is the third direction.

694b

Completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, not attending to perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, one dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space—this is the fourth direction.

Completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, one dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness—this is the fifth direction.

Completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] of nothingness, one dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness—this is the sixth direction.

Completely transcending the sphere of nothingness, [aware] of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, one dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception—this is the seventh direction.

Completely transcending the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, one dwells having directly realized and accomplished the liberation that is the cessation of perception and knowing, and seeing with wisdom one knows that all taints have been eradicated—this is the eighth direction.

“The unsurpassable trainer of able men trains able men to advance in any direction”—this has been said for this reason.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

164. The Discourse on an Analytical Contemplation of Dharmas<sup>339</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, staying in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

I shall teach you the Dharma that is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and revealing the holy life,<sup>340</sup> namely a discourse on an analytical contemplation of dharmas. Listen closely, listen closely and pay proper attention.

Then the monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One, we shall receive the teaching.”

The Buddha said:

Monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like this, the mind moves outward and becomes scattered—the mind is not settled within; and through <clinging> it becomes agitated.<sup>341</sup> [On the other hand,] monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like that, the mind does not move outward and does not become scattered—the mind is settled within;<sup>342</sup> and through not clinging it does not become agitated. In this way there will be no further birth, old age, disease, and death. This is called the end of dukkha.

Having spoken thus, the Buddha rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation.

Then the monks had this thought: “Venerable friends, it should be known that the World-honored One has risen from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having spoken about this matter in brief, without explaining its details, [namely:] ‘Monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like this, the mind moves outward and becomes scattered—the mind is not settled within; and through <clinging> it becomes agitated. [On the other hand,] monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like that, the mind does not move outward and does not become scattered—the mind is settled within; and through not clinging it does not become agitated. In this way there will be no further birth, old age, disease, and death. This is called the end of dukkha.’”

694c

They further had this thought: “Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?” They further had this thought: “The venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Mahākaccāna would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief. Venerable friends, let us together approach the venerable Mahākaccāna and request him to explain this matter. As the venerable Mahākaccāna explains it, so we should remember it well.”

Then the monks approached the venerable Mahākaccāna. Having exchanged greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side, they said:

Venerable Mahākaccāna, please know that the World-honored One rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having spoken on this matter in brief without explaining the details, [namely:] “Monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like this, the mind moves outward and becomes scattered—the mind is not settled within; and by <clinging> it becomes agitated. [On the other hand,] monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like that, the mind does not move outward and does not become scattered—the mind is settled within; and by not clinging it does not become agitated. In this way there will be no further birth, old age, disease, and death. This is called the end of dukkha.”

Then we had this thought: “Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?” We further had this thought: “The venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Mahākaccāna would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief.” May the venerable Mahākaccāna teach us in detail, out of compassion!

Then the venerable Mahākaccāna said:

Venerable friends, listen while I tell you a simile. On hearing a simile wise people understand the meaning. Venerable friends, it is as if there were a man wishing to search for heartwood. In search of heartwood, he enters the forest, carrying an ax. He sees a great tree possessed of roots, branches, joints, twigs, leaves, flowers, and heartwood. That man does not take hold of the roots, branches, joints, and heartwood, but only takes hold of the twigs and leaves.

Venerable friends, what you have said is just like this. The World-honored One was present, yet you have left him and come to ask me about this matter. Why is that? Venerable friends, know this: The World-honored One is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. The teaching of the true meaning, the revelation of all meaning comes from the World-honored One. Venerable friends, you should have approached the World-honored One himself to ask about this matter, saying: “World-honored One, how is this? What is the meaning of this?” As the World-honored One explained it, so, venerable friends, you should have remembered it well.

695a

Then the monks said:

Yes, indeed, venerable Mahākaccāna, the World-honored One is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. The teaching of the true meaning, the revelation of all meaning comes from the World-honored One. We should have approached the World-honored One to ask about this matter, saying: “World-honored One, how is this? What is the meaning of this?” As the World-honored One explained it, so we should have remembered it well.

However, the venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Mahākaccāna will be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One said in brief. May the venerable Mahākaccāna explain it in detail, out of compassion!

The venerable Mahākaccāna said to the monks:

Venerable friends, listen together to what I shall say. Venerable friends, how does a monk’s mind move outward and become scattered?

Venerable friends, a monk sees a form with the eye and his consciousness feeds on the characteristics of that form, his consciousness becomes attached to the pleasurable characteristics of that form, his consciousness becomes shackled to the pleasurable characteristics of that form. Being in bondage to the gratification [derived from] the characteristics of that form, his mind moves outward and becomes scattered.

In the same way, with his ear . . . his nose . . . his tongue . . . his body . . . his mind he cognizes a mental object and his consciousness feeds on the characteristics of that mental object, his consciousness becomes attached to the pleasurable characteristics of that mental object, his consciousness becomes shackled to the pleasurable characteristics of that mental object. Being in bondage to the gratification [derived from] the characteristics of that mental object, his mind moves outward and becomes scattered. Venerable friends, in this way a monk’s mind moves outward and becomes scattered.

Venerable friends, how does a monk's mind not move outward or become scattered? Venerable friends, a monk sees a form with the eye and his consciousness does not feed on the characteristics of that form, his consciousness does not become attached to the pleasurable characteristics of that form, his consciousness does not become shackled to the pleasurable characteristics of that form. Not being in bondage to the gratification [derived from] the characteristics of that form, his mind does not move outward or become scattered.

In the same way, with his ear . . . his nose . . . his tongue . . . his body . . . his mind he cognizes a mental object and his consciousness does not feed on the characteristics of that mental object, his consciousness does not become attached to the pleasurable characteristics of that mental object, his consciousness does not become shackled to the pleasurable characteristics of that mental object. Not being in bondage to the gratification [derived from] the characteristics of that mental object, his mind does not move outward or become scattered. Venerable friends, in this way a monk's mind does not move outward or become scattered.

Venerable friends, how is a monk's mind not settled within? Venerable friends, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, a monk dwells having attained the first absorption. His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] seclusion, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within.

Again, venerable friends, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, a monk dwells having attained the second absorption. His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] concentration, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within.

695b Again, venerable friends, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling with equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, a monk dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode. His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] the absence of joy, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within.

Again, venerable friends, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] purity of equanimity and mindfulness, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, not aware of perceptions of diversity, [aware] of infinite space, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space.<sup>343</sup> His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of space, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness. His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of consciousness, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware that] “there is nothing,” a monk dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness. His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of nothingness, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending the sphere of nothingness, [aware] of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. His consciousness is attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception, depends on that, is established in that, is conditioned by that, is shackled by that—his consciousness is not settled within. Venerable friends, in this way a monk's mind is not settled within.

Venerable friends, how is a monk's mind settled within? Venerable friends, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, a monk dwells having attained the first absorption. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] seclusion, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within.

Again, venerable friends, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, a monk dwells having attained the second absorption. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] concentration, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within.

Again, venerable friends, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling with equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, a monk dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] the absence of joy, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within.

695c

Again, venerable friends, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] purity of equanimity and mindfulness, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, not aware of perceptions of diversity, [aware] of infinite space, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of space, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of consciousness, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware that] “there is nothing,” a monk dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of nothingness, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within.

Again, venerable friends, by completely transcending the sphere of nothingness, [aware] of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. His consciousness is not attached to the gratification [derived from] knowledge of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception, does not depend on that, is not established in that, is not conditioned by that, is not shackled by that—his consciousness is settled within. Venerable friends, in this way a monk’s mind is settled within.

Venerable friends, how is there agitation for a monk through <clinging>? Venerable friends, [here] a monk is not separated from defilement by form, not separated from desire for form, not separated from craving for form, not separated from thirst for form.

Venerable friends, if a monk is not separated from defilement by form, not separated from desire for form, not separated from craving for form, not separated from thirst for form, then he desires to get form, seeks form, is attached to form, is established in form, [and he considers that] “I am form” and “form is mine.”<sup>344</sup> Desiring to get form, [seeking form,] attached to form, established in form, [and considering that] “I am form” and “form is mine,” his consciousness seizes on form. His consciousness having seized on form, when that form changes, his consciousness revolves around form. [As] his consciousness revolves around form, states of agitation arise and his mind becomes established in them. Because his mind does not understand, he is afraid and troubled. Through <clinging>, he is agitated.

It is the same with feeling . . . with perception . . . with formations. . . . A monk is not separated from defilement by consciousness, not separated from desire for consciousness, not separated from craving for consciousness, not separated from thirst for consciousness.

696a

Venerable friends, if a monk is not separated from defilement by consciousness, not separated from desire for consciousness, not separated from craving for consciousness, not separated from thirst for consciousness, then he desires to get consciousness, seeks consciousness, is attached to consciousness, is established in consciousness, [and he considers:] “I am consciousness” and “consciousness is mine.” Desiring to get consciousness, seeking consciousness, attached to consciousness, established in consciousness, [and considering:] “I am consciousness” and “consciousness is mine,” his consciousness seizes on consciousness. His consciousness having seized on consciousness, when that consciousness changes, his consciousness revolves around consciousness. [As] his consciousness revolves around consciousness, states of agitation arise and his mind becomes established in them. Because his mind does not understand, he is afraid and troubled. Through <clinging>, he is agitated. Venerable friends, in this way there is agitation for a monk through <clinging>.

Venerable friends, how is there no agitation for a monk who does not cling? Venerable friends, [here] a monk is separated from defilement by form, separated from desire for form, separated from craving for form, separated from thirst for form.

Venerable friends, if a monk is separated from defilement by form, separated from desire for form, separated from craving for form, separated from thirst for form, then he does not desire to get form, does not seek form, is not attached to form, is not established in form, and he does not [consider:] “I am form,” or “form is mine.” Not desiring to get form, not seeking form, not attached to form, not established in form, not [considering,] “I am form,” or “form is mine,” his consciousness does not seize on form. His consciousness not having seized on form, when that form changes, his consciousness does not revolve around form. [As] his consciousness does not revolve around form, states of agitation do not arise and his mind does not become established in them. Because his mind understands, he is not afraid and not troubled. Through not clinging, he is not agitated.

It is the same with feeling . . . with perception . . . with formations. . . . A monk is separated from defilement by consciousness, separated from desire for consciousness, separated from craving for consciousness, separated from thirst for consciousness.

Venerable friends, if a monk is separated from defilement by consciousness, separated from desire for consciousness, separated from craving for consciousness, separated from thirst for consciousness, then he does not desire to get consciousness, does not seek consciousness, is not attached to consciousness, is not established in consciousness, does not [consider], “I am consciousness,” or “consciousness is mine.” Not desiring to get consciousness, not seeking consciousness, not attached to consciousness, not established in consciousness, not [considering], “I am consciousness,” or “consciousness is mine,” his consciousness does not seize on consciousness. His consciousness not having seized on consciousness, when that consciousness changes, his consciousness does not revolve around consciousness. [As] his consciousness does not revolve around consciousness, states of agitation do not arise and his mind does not become established in them. Because his mind understands, he is not afraid and not troubled. Through not clinging, he does not become agitated. Venerable friends, in this way there is no agitation for a monk who does not cling.

Venerable friends, the World-honored One rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having spoken in brief about this matter, without explaining the details, [namely:] “Monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like this, the mind moves outward and becomes scattered—the mind is not settled within; and through <clinging> it becomes agitated. [On the other hand,] monks, one may keep contemplating in such and such a way. Monks, having contemplated like that, the mind does not move outward and does not become scattered—the mind is settled within; and by not clinging it does not become agitated. In this way there will be no further birth, old age, disease, and death. This is called the end of dukkha.”

696b

This matter, which the World-honored One spoke about in brief without explaining its details, I have explained in detail in this way, employing these phrases and words. Venerable friends, approach the Buddha and set out [my explanation] in full [to him]. As the World-honored One explains its meaning, venerable friends, remember it.

Then, having heard what the venerable Mahākaccāna had said, bearing well in mind [how] to recite it, the monks rose from their seats, circumambulated the venerable Mahākaccāna three times, and left. They approached the Buddha. Having paid homage to him, they stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, the instruction that the World-honored One gave in brief without explaining its meaning in detail, after which he rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation—the venerable Mahākaccāna has explained it to us in detail employing these phrases and words.

Having heard it, the World-honored One expressed praise:

It is well, it is well, my disciple is endowed with the eye, with knowledge, with Dharma, with meaning. Why is that? [Because] in regard to this matter which the teacher taught to the disciples in brief, without explaining its details, that disciple has taught it in detail employing these phrases and words. You should remember it like this, [just] as the monk Mahākaccāna has taught it. Why is that? According to this explanation, so you should contemplate the meaning.<sup>345</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

165. The Discourse on a Deva at the Hot Spring Grove<sup>346</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary.

At that time the venerable Samiddhi was also dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Hot Spring Grove. When the night was over, toward dawn, the venerable Samiddhi left his dwelling and approached the hot spring. Taking off his robes and [leaving] them on the bank, he entered the hot spring to bathe. Having bathed, he came out again, wiped his body [dry], and put on his robes.

Then, the night being over, toward dawn, a deva of fine physique and majestic appearance approached the venerable Samiddhi, paid homage with the head, stepped back, and stood to one side. The excellent splendor of that deva's appearance brilliantly illuminated the bank of the hot spring. Having stepped back and stood to one side, that deva said to the venerable Samiddhi, "Monk, do you remember the verses on an auspicious night?"<sup>347</sup>

The venerable Samiddhi replied to that deva, "I do not remember the verses on an auspicious night." He [then] asked the deva, "Do you remember the verses on an auspicious night?"

The deva replied, "I too do not remember the verses on an auspicious night."

The venerable Samiddhi asked the deva further, "Who does remember the verses on an auspicious night?"<sup>348</sup>

The deva answered:

The World-honored One is dwelling here at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. He will remember the verses on an auspicious night.

Monk, approach the World-honored One and from him memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and recite them. Why is that? [Because] the verses on an auspicious night pertain to the Teaching; they pertain to what is beneficial. They are the root of the holy life, leading to knowledge, to realization, and to nirvana.

[As] a son of good family who, out of faith, has left the household life to become homeless and practice the path [you] should memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and recite them.

Having spoken in this way, that deva paid homage with the head at the feet of the venerable Samiddhi and, having circumambulated him three times, vanished on the spot.

Then, not long after the deva had vanished, the venerable Samiddhi approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, today, when the night was over, toward dawn, I left my dwelling and approached the hot spring. I took off my robes and, [leaving] them on the bank, entered the hot spring to bathe. Having bathed, I came out and stood on the bank wiping my body [dry].

At that time, the night being over, toward dawn, a deva of fine physique and majestic appearance approached me, paid homage with the head, stepped back, and stood to one side. The excellent splendor of that deva's appearance brilliantly illuminated the bank of the hot spring. Having stepped back and stood to one side, that deva said to me, "Monk, do you remember the verses on an auspicious night?"

I replied to that deva, "I do not remember the verses on an auspicious night." [Then] I asked the deva, "Do you remember the verses on an auspicious night?"

The deva replied, "I too do not remember the verses on an auspicious night."

697a I asked [the deva] further, "Who does remember the verses on an auspicious night?"

The deva answered, "The World-honored One is dwelling here at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. He will remember the verses on an auspicious night.

"Monk, approach the World-honored One and from him memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and recite them. Why is that? [Because] the verses on an auspicious night pertain to the Teaching; they pertain to what is beneficial. They are the root of the holy life, leading to knowledge, to realization, and to nirvana.

"[As] a son of good family who, out of faith, has left the household life to become homeless and practice the path, [you] should memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and recite them."

Having spoken in this way, that deva paid homage with the head at my feet and, having circumambulated me three times, vanished on the spot.

The World-honored One asked, "Samiddhi, do you know that deva's name and where he came from?"

The venerable Samiddhi replied, "World-honored One, I do not know that deva's name and I also do not know where he came from."

The World-honored One said, “Samiddhi, that deva is called Main Hall and he is a general in the army of the devas of the Thirty-three.”<sup>349</sup>

Then the venerable Samiddhi said:

World-honored One, now is the right time. Well-gone One, now is the right time for the World-honored One to teach the monks the verses on an auspicious night. Having heard them from the World-honored One, the monks will remember them well.

The World-honored One said, “Samiddhi, listen closely. Listen closely and pay proper attention to what I shall teach you.”

The venerable Samiddhi said, “Yes, indeed.”

Then all the monks listened to receive instruction. The Buddha said:

Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,<sup>350</sup>
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,
Who need worry about death?
“I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!”

Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!
Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.

Having spoken in this way, the Buddha rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation.

Then the monks had this thought: “Venerable friends, you should know that the World-honored One has risen from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having given this instruction in brief, without explaining its details, [namely]:

697b “Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

“Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

“Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,
Who need worry about death?
‘I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!’

“Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!
Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.”

They further had this thought: “Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?” They further had this thought: “The venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Mahākaccāna would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief.

“Venerable friends, let us together approach the venerable Mahākaccāna and request him to explain its meaning. As the venerable Mahākaccāna explains it, we shall remember it well.”

Then the monks approached the venerable Mahākaccāna. Having exchanged greetings with him, they stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

Venerable Mahākaccāna, please know this. The World-honored One rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, after giving this instruction in brief, without explaining its details, [namely:]

Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,<sup>351</sup>
Who need worry about death?
“I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!”

Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!
Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.

Then we had this thought: “Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?” We further had this thought: “The venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Mahākaccāna would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief.” May the venerable Mahākaccāna give [us] a detailed explanation, out of compassion!

The venerable Mahākaccāna said:

697c

Venerable friends, listen while I tell you a simile. On hearing a simile wise people understand the meaning.

Venerable friends, it is just as if there were a man wishing to search for heartwood. In order to search for heartwood, [he] enters the forest, carrying an ax. He sees a great tree possessed of roots, branches, joints, twigs, leaves, flowers, and heartwood. That man does not take hold of the roots, branches, joints, and heartwood, but only takes hold of the twigs and leaves.

Venerable friends, what you have said is just like that. The World-honored One was present, yet you left him to come and ask me about this matter. Why is that?

Venerable friends, know this: the World-honored One is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. The teaching of the true meaning, the revelation of all meaning, comes from the World-honored One.

Venerable friends, you should have approached the World-honored One to ask him about this matter, [saying,] “World-honored One, how is this? What is the meaning of this?” As the World-honored One explained it, venerable friends, so you should have remembered it well.

Then the monks said:

Yes, indeed, venerable Mahākaccāna. The World-honored One is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. The teaching of the true meaning, the revelation of all meaning, comes from the World-honored One.

We should have approached the World-honored One to ask about this matter, saying, “World-honored One, how is this? What is its meaning?” As the World-honored One explained it, so we should have remembered it well.

However, the venerable Mahākaccāna is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Mahākaccāna will be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One said in brief. May the venerable Mahākaccāna explain it in detail, out of compassion!

The venerable Mahākaccāna said to the monks:

Venerable friends, listen together to what I shall say. Venerable friends, how does a monk think about the past? Venerable friends, with the really existing eye a monk comes to know forms,<sup>352</sup> which are agreeable, forms that the mind [then] recalls, forms that are yearned for, that are associated with desire, that the mind delights in, that [become] a source of grasping, a source that is in the past.

His consciousness of the past is defiled with desire. Because his consciousness is defiled with desire, he delights in those [forms]. Because he delights in them, he thinks about the past.

In the same way with the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . with the really existing mind a monk comes to know mind objects, which are agreeable, mind objects that the mind [then] recalls, mind objects that are yearned for, that are associated with desire, that the mind delights in, that [become] a source of grasping, a source that is in the past. His consciousness of the past is defiled with desire. Because his consciousness is defiled with desire, he delights in those [mind objects]. Because he delights in them, he thinks about the past. Venerable friends, this is how a monk thinks about the past.

Venerable friends, how does a monk not think about the past? Venerable friends, with the really existing eye a monk comes to know forms, which are agreeable, forms that the mind [then] recalls, forms that are yearned for, that are associated with desire, that the mind delights in, that [become] a source of grasping, a source that is in the past.

698a

His consciousness of the past is not defiled with desire. Because his consciousness is not defiled with desire, he does not delight in those [forms]. Because he does not delight in them, he does not think about the past.

In the same way with the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . with the really existing mind a monk comes to know mind objects, which are agreeable, mind objects that the mind [then] recalls, mind objects that are yearned for, that are associated with desire, that the mind delights in, that [become] a source of grasping, a source that is in the past. His consciousness of the past is not defiled with desire. Because his consciousness is not defiled with desire, he does not delight in those [mind objects]. Because he does not delight in them, he does not think about the past. Venerable friends, this is how a monk does not think about the past.

Venerable friends, how does a monk long for the future? Venerable friends, if there are the eye, forms, and eye consciousness of the future, and a monk wishes to obtain what has not yet been obtained, [or] his mind longs for [more of] what has already been obtained, [then] because his mind already has this longing, he delights in those [forms]. Because he delights in them, he longs for the future.

In the same way with the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . if there are the mind, mind objects, and mind consciousness of the future, and a monk wishes to obtain what has not yet been obtained, [or] his mind longs for [more of] what has already been obtained, [then] because his mind already has this longing, he delights in those [mind objects]. Because he delights in them, he longs for the future. Venerable friends, this is how a monk longs for the future.

Venerable friends, how does a monk not long for the future? Venerable friends, if there are the eye, forms, and eye consciousness of the future, and a monk does not wish to obtain what has not yet been obtained, and his mind does not long for [more of] what has already been obtained, [then] because his mind does not already have this longing, he does not delight in those [forms]. Because he does not delight in them, he does not long for the future.

In the same way with the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . if there are the mind, mind objects, and mind consciousness of the future, and a monk does not wish to obtain what has not yet been obtained, and his mind does not long for [more of] what has already been obtained, [then] because his mind does not have this longing, he does not delight in those [mind objects]. Because he does not delight in them, he does not long for the future. Venerable friends, this is how a monk does not long for the future.

Venerable friends, how does a monk cling to phenomena in the present? Venerable friends, if there are the eye, forms, and eye consciousness of the present, and a monk's consciousness of the present is defiled with desire, [then] because his consciousness is defiled with desire, he delights in those [forms]. Because he delights in them, he clings to phenomena in the present.

In the same way with the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . If there are the mind, mind objects, and mind consciousness of the present, and a monk's consciousness of the present is defiled with desire, [then] because his consciousness is defiled with desire, he delights in those [mind objects]. Because he delights in them, he clings to phenomena in the present. Venerable friends, this is how a monk clings to phenomena in the present.

Venerable friends, how does a monk not cling to phenomena in the present? Venerable friends, if there are the eye, forms, and eye consciousness of the present, and a monk's consciousness of the present is not defiled with desire, [then] because his consciousness is not defiled with desire, he does not delight in those [forms]. Because he does not delight in them, he does not cling to phenomena in the present. 698b

In the same way with the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . if there are the mind, mind objects, and mind consciousness of the present, and a monk's consciousness of the present is not defiled with desire, [then] because his consciousness is not defiled with desire, he does not delight in those [mind objects]. Because he does not delight in them, he does not cling to phenomena in the present. Venerable friends, this is how a monk does not cling to phenomena in the present.

Venerable friends, the World-honored One rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, after giving this instruction in brief without explaining the details, [namely:]

Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,
Who need worry about death?
"I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!"

Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!
Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.

This brief instruction that the World-honored One gave without explaining its details I have explained in detail in this way, employing these phrases and words. Venerable friends, approach the Buddha and set out [my explanation] in full [to him]. As the World-honored One explains its meaning, venerable friends, you can together remember it.

Then, having heard the venerable Mahākaccāna's explanation, the monks, having well memorized [how] to recite it, rose from their seats, circumambulated the venerable Mahākaccāna three times, and left. Approaching the Buddha, they paid homage with their heads, stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, the instruction that the World-honored One gave in brief without analyzing the meaning in detail, after which he rose from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, the venerable Mahākaccāna has explained in detail employing these phrases and words.

Having heard it, the World-honored One expressed praise:

It is well, it is well, my disciple is endowed with the eye, with knowledge, with meaning, with Dharma. Why is that?

[Because] in regard to this instruction, which the teacher taught to the disciples in brief, without explaining its details, that disciple has explained it in detail employing these phrases and words. You should remember it [just] as the monk Mahākaccāna has explained it. Why is that? [Because] his explanation is [just] how you should contemplate the meaning.<sup>353</sup>

698c Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, those monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

166. The Discourse on a Venerable One in a Meditation Hut among the Sakyans<sup>354</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, staying in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya was dwelling among the Sakyans in a meditation hut in a forest. Then, the night being over, toward dawn, the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya came out of his meditation hut, spread his sitting mat on a rope bed that was on open ground in the shade of the meditation hut, and sat down [on it] cross-legged.

Then, the night being over, toward dawn, a deva of fine physique and majestic appearance approached the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya. He paid homage with the head, stepped back, and stood to one side. The excellent splendor of that deva brilliantly illuminated the whole meditation hut. Standing there on one side, the deva addressed the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya, “Monk, do you remember the verses on an auspicious night and their meaning?”<sup>355</sup>

The venerable Lomasakaṅgiya replied to the deva, “I do not remember the verses on an auspicious night nor do I remember their meaning.” He [then] asked the deva, “Do you remember the verses on an auspicious night and their meaning?”

That deva replied, “I remember the verses on an auspicious night but not their meaning.”

The venerable Lomasakaṅgiya asked the deva further, “How is it that you remember the verses on an auspicious night but not their meaning?”

The deva replied:

At one time the World-honored One was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary.<sup>356</sup> At that time the World-honored One taught the monks the verses on an auspicious night [thus]:

Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,<sup>357</sup>
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,
Who need worry about death?
“I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!”

699a Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!
Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.

Monk, in this way I remember the verses on an auspicious night, but not their meaning.

The venerable Lomasakaṅgiya asked the deva further, “Who remembers the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning?”<sup>358</sup>

The deva answered:

The World-honored One is dwelling at Sāvattṥī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anātha-piṇḍika’s Park. He will remember the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning. Monk, approach the World-honored One and from him memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning, and recite them. Why is that?

[Because] the verses on an auspicious night and their meaning pertain to the Teaching; they pertain to what is beneficial. Being the root of the holy life, they lead to knowledge, to realization, and to nirvana. [As] a son of good family who, out of faith, has left the household life to become homeless and practice the path, [you] should memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning, and recite them.

Having spoken like this, that deva paid homage with the head at the feet of the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya and, having circumambulated him three times, vanished on the spot.

Then, not long after the deva had vanished, the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya, having completed the rains retreat among the Sakyans,<sup>359</sup> the three months being over, having mended his robes, took his robes and bowl and headed for Sāvattṥī. Traveling by stages he reached Sāvattṥī, where he stayed at Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

Blessed One, at one time I was dwelling among the Sakyans, in a meditation hut in a forest. Blessed One, then, the night being over, toward dawn, I came out of a meditation hut, spread my sitting mat on a rope bed that was on open ground in the shade of the meditation hut, and sat down on it cross-legged.

Then, the night being over, toward dawn, a deva of fine physique and majestic appearance approached me. He paid homage with the head, stepped back, and sat to one side. The excellent splendor of that deva's appearance brilliantly illuminated the whole meditation hut. Standing there on one side, the deva addressed me, "Monk, do you remember the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning?"

I replied to that deva, "I do not remember the verses on an auspicious night, nor do I remember their meaning." I [then] asked the deva, "Do you remember the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning?"

The deva replied, "I remember the verses on an auspicious night but not their meaning." I asked the deva further: "How is it that you remember the verses on an auspicious night but not their meaning?"

The deva replied to me, "At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary. At that time the World-honored One taught the monks the verses on an auspicious night [thus]:

699b

Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,
Who need worry about death?
"I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!"

Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!

Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.

Monk, in this way I remember the verses on an auspicious night, but not their meaning.”

I asked the deva further, “Who remembers the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning?”

The deva replied to me, “The Buddha is dwelling at Sāvattṥī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park. He will remember the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning. Monk, approach the World-honored One and from him memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning, and recite them. Why is that?”

“[Because] the verses on an auspicious night and their meaning pertain to the Teaching; they pertain to what is beneficial. Being the root of the holy life, they lead to knowledge, to realization, and to nirvana. [As] a son of good family who, out of faith, has left the household life to become homeless and practice the path, [you] should memorize well the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning, and recite them.”

So saying, that deva paid homage with the head at my feet and, having circumambulated me three times, vanished on the spot.

Then the World-honored One asked the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya, “Do you know that deva’s name and where it came from?”

The venerable Lomasakaṅgiya replied, “World-honored One, I do not know that deva’s name, nor do I know where it came from.”

The World-honored One said, “Kaṅgiya, that deva is called Candana, who is a general in the army of the devas of the Thirty-three.”

Then the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya said:

World-honored One, now is the right time. Well-gone One, now is the right time for the World-honored One to teach the monks the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning. Having heard them from the World-honored One, the monks will remember them well.

The World-honored One said, “Kaṅgiya, listen closely and pay proper attention. I shall teach you the meaning in detail.”

The venerable Lomasakaṅgiya said, “Yes, indeed. We shall listen and receive the teaching.”

The Buddha spoke [thus]:

Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

699c

Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,
Who need worry about death?
“I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!”

Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!
Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.

Kaṅgiya, how does a monk think about the past? If a monk delights in form of the past, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it; if he delights in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the past, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it—this is how a monk thinks about the past.

Kaṅgiya, how does a monk not think about the past? If a monk does not delight in form of the past, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it; if he does not delight in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the past, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it—this is how a monk does not think about the past.

Kaṅgiya, how does a monk long for the future? If a monk delights in form of the future, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it;

if he delights in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the future, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it—this is how a monk longs for the future.

Kaṅgiya, how does a monk not long for the future? If a monk does not delight in form of the future, does not desire it, is not attached to it, is not established in it; if he does not delight in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the future, does not desire it, is not attached to it, is not established in it—this is how a monk does not long for the future.

Kaṅgiya, how does a monk cling to phenomena in the present? If a monk delights in form of the present, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it; if he delights in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the present, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it—this is how a monk clings to phenomena in the present.<sup>360</sup>

Kaṅgiya how does a monk not cling to phenomena in the present? If a monk does not delight in form of the present, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it; if he does not delight in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the present, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it—this is how a monk does not cling to phenomena in the present.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Lomasakaṅgiya and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

167. The Discourse Spoken by Ānanda<sup>361</sup>

700a Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, staying in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the venerable Ānanda was teaching the monks, who had gathered at night in the assembly hall, the verses on an auspicious night and their meaning.

Then, when the night was over, toward dawn, a certain monk approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, the venerable Ānanda taught the monks, who had gathered at night in the assembly hall, the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning.<sup>362</sup>

Then the World-honored One told a certain monk, “Go to the monk Ānanda and say this, ‘Ānanda, the World-honored One summons you.’”

That monk, on receiving the World-honored One’s instruction, rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached the venerable Ānanda and said, “The World-honored One summons the venerable Ānanda.”

The venerable Ānanda then approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head, he stepped back, and stood to one side. The World-honored One asked, “Ānanda, is it true that you taught the monks, who had gathered at night in the assembly hall, the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning?”

The venerable Ānanda replied, “Yes, indeed.”

The World-honored One asked, “Ānanda, how did you teach the monks the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning?”

Then the venerable Ānanda said:

Be careful not to think about the past,
And do not long for the future.
Matters of the past have already ceased,
And the future has not yet arrived.

Phenomena in the present
Are what one should contemplate,<sup>363</sup>
Mindful of [their] lack of stability.
The wise awaken in this way.

Undertaking [such] practice of noble ones,
Who need worry about death?
“I shall disengage from that,
[This] great suffering and misery shall end!”

Practice diligently like this,
Day and night without negligence!
Therefore, one should regularly teach
The verses on an auspicious night.

The World-honored One asked further, “Ānanda, how does a monk think about the past?”<sup>364</sup>

The venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, if a monk delights in form of the past, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it; if he delights in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the past, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it—this is how a monk thinks about the past.

The World-honored One asked further, “Ānanda, how does a monk not think about the past?”

The venerable Ānanda replied:

700b World-honored One, if a monk does not delight in form of the past, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it; if he does not delight in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the past, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it—this is how a monk does not think about the past.

The World-honored One asked further, “Ānanda, how does a monk long for the future?”

The venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, if a monk delights in form of the future, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it; if he delights in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the future, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it—this is how a monk longs for the future.

The World-honored One asked further, “Ānanda, how does a monk not long for the future?”

The venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, if a monk does not delight in form of the future, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it; if he does not delight in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the future, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it—this is how a monk does not long for the future.

The World-honored One asked further, “Ānanda, how does a monk cling to phenomena in the present?”

The venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, if a monk delights in form of the present, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it; if he delights in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the present, has desire for it, is attached to it, is established in it—this is how a monk clings to phenomena in the present.<sup>365</sup>

The World-honored One asked further, “Ānanda, how does a monk not cling to phenomena in the present?”

The venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, if a monk does not delight in form of the present, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it; if he does not delight in feeling . . . in perception . . . in formations . . . in consciousness of the present, has no desire for it, is not attached to it, is not established in it—this is how a monk does not cling to phenomena in the present.

World-honored One, this is how I taught the monks, who had gathered at night in the assembly hall, the verses on an auspicious night and also their meaning.

Then the World-honored One told the monks:

It is well, it is well, my disciple is endowed with the eye, with knowledge, with meaning, with Dharma. Why is that? [Because my] disciple has explained the meaning [of the verses] in detail in the presence of the Teacher, employing these phrases and words. Just as the monk Ānanda has explained it, so you all should remember it. Why is that? [Because] this explanation is how [you] should contemplate the meaning.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

168. The Discourse on Mental Practice<sup>366</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattihī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

700c I shall now teach you the Dharma that is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing endowed with purity and revealing the holy life. Called the “Discourse on an Analysis of Mental Practice,” it is on rebirth according to mental practice. Listen closely. Listen closely and pay proper attention.

Then the monks listened to receive the instruction.

The Buddha said:

What is rebirth according to mental practice? Suppose that a monk, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, dwells having attained the first absorption. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the Brahmā devas.

The Brahmā devas, who are born there and established there, experience rapture and happiness born of seclusion, [just] as a monk here who becomes established on entering the first absorption experiences rapture and happiness born of seclusion. These two [instances of] rapture and happiness born of seclusion are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices this state of concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops this state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the Brahmā devas; it is rebirth according to mental practice.

Again, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, a monk dwells having attained the second absorption. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the devas of Streaming Radiance (ābhassarā-devā).

The devas of Streaming Radiance, who are born there and established there, experience rapture and happiness born of concentration, [just] as a monk here who becomes established on entering the second absorption experiences rapture and happiness born of concentration. These two [instances of] rapture and happiness born of concentration are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices this state of concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops this state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the devas of Streaming Radiance; it is rebirth according to mental practice.

Again, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity, not seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, a monk dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the devas of Refulgent Glory (subhakiṇṇā-devā).

The devas of Refulgent Glory, who are born there and established there, experience happiness free from rapture, [just] as a monk here who becomes established on entering the third absorption experiences happiness free from rapture. These two [instances of] happiness free from rapture are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices this state of concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops this state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the devas of Refulgent Glory; it is rebirth according to mental practice.

Again, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of joy and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with equanimity, mindfulness, and purity, a monk dwells, having attained the fourth absorption. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

701a

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the devas of Great Reward (ve-happhalā-devā).

The devas of Great Reward who are born there and established there experience equanimity, mindfulness, and the happiness of purity, [just] as a monk here who becomes established on entering the fourth absorption experiences equanimity, mindfulness, and the happiness of purity. These two [instances of] equanimity, mindfulness, and happiness of purity are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices this state of concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops this state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the devas of Great Reward; it is rebirth according to mental practice.

Again, by completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, not aware of perceptions of diversity, [aware] of infinite space, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the devas of the sphere of infinite space.

The devas of the sphere of infinite space, who are born there and established there, experience the perception of the sphere of infinite space, [just] as a monk here who is established in the sphere of infinite space experiences the perception of it. These two [instances of] the perception of the sphere of infinite space are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops this state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the devas of the sphere of infinite space; it is rebirth according to mental practice.

Again, by transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the devas of the sphere of infinite consciousness.

The devas of the sphere of infinite consciousness, who are born there and established there, experience the perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness, [just] as a monk here who is established in the sphere of infinite consciousness experiences the perception of it. These two [instances of] the perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices this state of concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops that state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the devas of the sphere of infinite consciousness; it is rebirth according to mental practice.

Again, by transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” a monk dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the devas of the sphere of nothingness.

The devas of the sphere of nothingness, who are born there and established there, experience the perception of the sphere of nothingness, [just] as a monk here who is established in the sphere of nothingness experiences the perception of it. These two [instances of] the perception of the sphere of nothingness are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices this state of concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops that state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the devas of the sphere of nothingness; it is rebirth according to mental practice. 701b

Again, by completely transcending the perception of the sphere of nothingness, [aware] of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. He delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it.

Since he delights in this state of concentration, desires it, and is established in it, it is certainly possible that, delighting in it and being established in it, he will at death be reborn among the devas of the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.

The devas of the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, who are born there and established there, experience the perception of the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, [just as] a monk here who is established in the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception experiences the perception of it. These two [instances of] the perception of it are not different; the two are completely equal. Why is that? [Because] one who first practices this state of concentration here will later be reborn there. He develops that state of concentration like this, practices it like this, extends it like this. Such is rebirth among the devas of the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception; it is rebirth according to mental practice.

Again, by completely transcending the perception of the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, a monk dwells knowing cessation. Having directly experienced it, by seeing with wisdom all his taints are destroyed and he has knowledge of their elimination. Among all these states of concentration, this one is reckoned supreme, the greatest, the highest, the best, the most excellent.

It is just as from the cow comes milk, from milk comes cream, from cream comes butter, from butter comes ghee, and from ghee comes cream of ghee; and [among these] cream of ghee is reckoned supreme, the greatest, the highest, the best, the most excellent.

In the same way, among all these states of concentrations, this one is reckoned supreme, the greatest, the highest, the best, the most excellent. Having attained this state of concentration, being based on this state of concentration, having become established in this state of concentration, one will no longer experience the dukkha of birth, old age, disease, and death. This is reckoned as the end of dukkha.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, those monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

169. The Discourse [Spoken among] the Kurus on Nonconflict<sup>367</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling among the Bhaggās,<sup>368</sup> staying at Kammāsadhamma, a Kuru town.

At that time the World-honored One told the monks:

I shall teach you the Dharma that is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and revealing the holy life.<sup>369</sup> It is called the “Discourse on Analysis of Nonconflict.” Listen closely. Listen closely and pay proper attention.

Then the monks listened to receive the teaching.
The Buddha said:

Do not seek sensual pleasure, which is an extremely degrading activity engaged in by ordinary worldlings; also do not seek self-mortification, which leads to suffering, is not the practice of noble ones, and is not connected to what is beneficial. Avoiding these two extremes is the middle way for attaining vision, for attaining knowledge, for naturally attaining stillness, which leads to knowledge, to awakening, to nirvana.

701c

There is praising, there is blaming, and there is neither-praising-nor-blaming, which is teaching the Dharma. Be committed to evenness and, having commitment and understanding, constantly seek happiness within.

Do not speak in an insinuating manner and also do not praise [someone] to [their] face. Speak in an even and restrained manner; do not speak in an uneven and unrestrained manner.<sup>370</sup>

Follow local customs, neither insisting on them nor rejecting them. This is the subject matter of this “Discourse on an Analysis of Nonconflict.”

“Do not seek sensual pleasures, which is an extremely degrading activity engaged in by ordinary worldlings; but also do not seek self-mortification, which leads to suffering, is not a practice of noble ones and is not connected to what is beneficial”—why was this said?

“Do not seek sensual pleasures, which is an extremely degrading activity engaged in by ordinary worldlings”—this describes one extreme; “also do not seek self-mortification, which leads to suffering, is not a practice of noble ones, and is not connected to what is beneficial”—this describes the second extreme.<sup>371</sup>

“Do not seek sensual pleasures, which is an extremely degrading activity engaged in by ordinary worldlings; and also do not seek self-mortification, which leads to suffering, is not a practice of noble ones, and is not connected to what is beneficial”—this has been said for this reason.

“Avoiding these two extremes is the middle way for attaining vision, for attaining knowledge, for naturally attaining stillness, which leads to knowledge, to awakening, to nirvana”—why has this been said? There is this noble eightfold path: right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight. “Avoiding these two extremes is the middle way for attaining vision, for attaining knowledge, for naturally attaining stillness, which leads to knowledge, to awakening, to nirvana”—this has been said for this reason.

“There is praising, there is blaming, and there is neither praising nor blaming, which is teaching the Dharma”—why has this been said? What is praising? What is blaming and [what is] not teaching the Dharma?

[Seeking] joy and happiness connected with sensual pleasure is an extremely degrading activity engaged in by ordinary worldlings. It is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. Having come to know this, one blames [such practitioners] personally. Why is that? [One thinks,] “Sensual pleasures are impermanent, dukkha, of a nature to wear away.” Knowing that sensual pleasures are impermanent, [one thinks,] “Therefore those [who engage in them] are entirely beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; such people are practicing wrongly.” Having come to know this, one therefore blames them personally.

Self-mortification which leads to suffering is not a practice of noble ones and is not connected to what is beneficial. It is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. Having come to know this, one blames personally [those who practice it]. Why is that? [One thinks,] “Those renunciants and brahmins, through fear of dukkha, shave off hair and beard, don yellow robes, and out of faith leave the household life and become homeless to train in the path. Yet those renunciants and brahmins embrace this dukkha, and therefore they are entirely beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing wrongly.” Having come to know this, one therefore blames them personally.

The presence of fetters that have not been eradicated is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. Having come to know this, one blames [such practitioners] personally. Why is that? [One thinks,] “Those who have not eradicated the fetters, have not eradicated becoming. Therefore they are entirely beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing wrongly.” Having come to know this, one therefore blames them personally.

702a

The eradication of fetters is a state that is not beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. Having come to know this, one praises [such practitioners] personally. Why is that? [One thinks,] “Those who have eradicated the fetters, have eradicated becoming. Therefore, they are entirely free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing rightly.” Having come to know this, one therefore praises them personally.

Not seeking happiness within is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice.<sup>372</sup> Having come to know this, one blames [such practitioners] personally. Why is that? [One thinks,] “Those who do not seek happiness within are not inner seekers. Therefore, they are entirely beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing wrongly.” Having come to know this, one therefore blames them personally.

Seeking happiness within is a state not beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. Having come to know this, one praises [such practitioners] personally. Why is that? [One thinks,] “Those who seek happiness within are inner seekers. Therefore, they are entirely free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing rightly.” Having come to know this, one therefore praises them personally.

In these ways, there is praising, and there is blaming, but no teaching of the Dharma. Neither praising them nor blaming them, one [should instead] teach them the Dharma. How does one neither praise nor blame, but [instead] teach the Dharma?

[Seeking] joy and happiness connected with sensual pleasure is an extremely degrading activity engaged in by ordinary worldlings. It is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. Having come to know this, one teaches [such people] the Dharma. Why is that? One does not say, “Sensual pleasures are impermanent, dukkha, of a nature to wear away. Knowing that sensual pleasures are impermanent, therefore those [who engage in them] are entirely beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; such people are practicing wrongly.” This method will not be successful. [Instead, one says,] there exists the state of being beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; this is wrong practice.” Having come to know this, one teaches the Dharma.

702b Self-mortification, which leads to dukkha, is not a practice of noble ones and is not connected to what is beneficial. It is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. Having come to know this, one teaches [such people] the Dharma. Why is that? One does not say, “Self-mortification which leads to dukkha is not a practice of noble ones and is not connected to what is beneficial. It is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice.” This method will not be successful. [Instead, one says,] there exists just the state of being beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; this is wrong practice.” Having come to know this, for this reason one teaches the Dharma.

The presence of fetters that have not been eradicated is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. Having come to know this, one teaches the Dharma. Why is that? One does not say, “Those who have not eradicated the fetters have not eradicated becoming. Therefore they are entirely beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing wrongly.” This method will not be successful. [Instead, one says,] there exists just the state of being beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; this is wrong practice.” Having come to know this, for this reason one teaches the Dharma.

The eradication of fetters is a state that is not beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. Having come to know this, one teaches the Dharma. Why is that? One does not say, “Those who have eradicated the fetters have eradicated becoming. Therefore, they are entirely free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing rightly.” This method will not be successful. [Instead, one says,] there exists just the state of not being beset by suffering, of no vexation, no trouble, and no sadness; this is right practice.” Having come to know this, for this reason one teaches the Dharma.

Not seeking happiness within is a state beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. Having come to know this, one teaches the Dharma. Why is that? One does not say, “Those who do not seek happiness within are not inner seekers. Therefore, they are entirely beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing wrongly.” This method will not be successful. [Instead, one says,] there exists just the state of being beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; this is wrong practice.” Having come to know this, for this reason one teaches the Dharma.

Seeking happiness within is a state not beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. Having come to know this, one teaches the Dharma. Why is that? One does not say, “Those who seek happiness within are inner seekers. Therefore, they are entirely free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; they are practicing rightly.” This method will not be successful. [Instead, one says,] there exists just the state of not being beset by suffering, of no vexation, no trouble, and no sadness; this is right practice.” Having come to know this, for this reason one teaches the Dharma.

In this way there is neither praising nor blaming, but [instead] teaching of the Dharma. “There is praising, there is blaming, and there is neither praising nor blaming, which is teaching the Dharma”—this has been said for this reason.

“Be committed to evenness and, having commitment and understanding, constantly seek happiness within”—why has this been said? There is happiness that is ignoble happiness, the happiness of the ordinary worldling, which is basically a disease, basically a carbuncle, basically an arrow or a thorn, which pertains to what is worldly (sāmisa), which pertains to birth and death, which should not be cultivated, should not be practiced, should not be made much of. This, I say, should not be cultivated.

702c

There is a happiness that is noble happiness, the happiness of dispassion, the happiness of separation, the happiness of appeasement, the happiness [leading to] full awakening, which does not pertain to what is worldly, does not pertain to birth and death, which should be cultivated, should be practiced, should be made much of. This, I say, should be cultivated.

What is the happiness that is ignoble happiness, the happiness of the ordinary worldling, which is basically a disease, basically a carbuncle, basically an arrow or a thorn, which pertains to what is worldly, pertains to birth and death, which should not be cultivated, should not be practiced, should not be made much of, of which I say that it should not be cultivated?

It is the pleasure and happiness that arise in dependence on the five strands of sensual pleasure. This happiness is ignoble happiness, the happiness of the ordinary worldling, which is basically a disease, basically a carbuncle, basically an arrow or thorn, which pertains to what is worldly, pertains to birth and death, which should not be cultivated, should not be practiced, should not be made much of, of which I say that it should not be cultivated.

What is the happiness that is noble happiness, the happiness of dispassion, the happiness of separation, the happiness of appeasement, the happiness [leading to] full awakening, which does not pertain to what is worldly, does not pertain to birth and death, which should be cultivated, should be practiced, should be made much of, of which I say that it should be cultivated?

If a monk, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This happiness is noble happiness, the happiness of dispassion, the happiness of separation, the happiness of appeasement, the happiness of right awakening, which does not pertain to what is worldly, does not pertain to birth and death, which should be cultivated, should be practiced, should be made much of, of which I say that it should be cultivated.

“Be committed to evenness and, having commitment and understanding, constantly seeks happiness within”—this has been said for this reason.

“Do not speak in an insinuating manner, and do not praise [someone] to [their] face”<sup>373</sup>—why has this been said? There is insinuating speech that is untrue, false, and not connected to what is beneficial; there is insinuating speech that is true, not false, but is not connected to what is beneficial; and there is insinuating speech that is true, not false, and is connected to what is beneficial.

Herein, if insinuating speech is untrue, false, and not connected to what is beneficial, then it should not be spoken. Herein, if insinuating speech is true, not false, but not connected to what is beneficial, then one should also train in not speaking it. Herein, if insinuating speech is true, not false, and is connected to what is beneficial, then if one knows the time is right, let it be accomplished with right comprehension and right mindfulness. It is the same with praising [someone] to [their] face. “Do not speak in an insinuating manner, and do not praise [someone] to [their] face”—this has been said for this reason.

“Speak evenly and with restraint; do not speak unevenly and without restraint”<sup>374</sup>—why has this been said? With uneven and unrestrained speech the body becomes troubled, mindfulness is lost, the mind becomes very fatigued, and the voice is spoiled and not easily understood. With speech that is even and restrained the body does not become troubled, mindfulness is not lost, the mind does not become very fatigued, the voice is not spoiled, and it is easily understood. “Speak evenly and with restraint; do not speak unevenly and without restraint”—this has been said for this reason.

703a

“Follow local customs; do not insist on them and do not reject them”—why has this been said? What is following local customs, [what is] insisting on them, and [what is] rejecting them?

Various people in various regions in various ways may speak of a tray, or they may speak of a dish, or they may speak of a platter, or they may speak of a plate, or they may speak of a salver. As various people in various regions in various ways may speak of a tray, or may speak of a dish, or may speak of a platter, or may speak of a plate, or may speak of a salver, each one is strong in always declaring: “This is true; anything else is false.” In this way there is insisting on or rejecting of local customs.

What is neither insisting on nor rejecting of local customs? Various people in various regions may, in various ways, speak of a tray, or speak of a dish, or speak of a platter, or speak of a plate, or speak of a salver. As various people in various regions may, in various ways, speak of a tray, or speak of a dish, or speak of a platter, or speak of a plate, or speak of a salver, each one is not strong in always declaring: “This is true; anything else is false.” In this way there is neither insisting on nor rejecting of local customs. “Follow local customs; do not insist on them and do not reject them”—this has been said for this reason.

There are states with conflict and there are states without conflict. What are states with conflict and what are states without conflict? [Seeking] joy and happiness connected with sensual pleasures, which is an extremely degrading activity engaged in by ordinary worldlings, this is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] this state is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason this is a state with conflict.

Self-mortification leads to suffering, is an ignoble practice, and is not connected to what is beneficial. This is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

Avoiding these two extremes is the middle way for attaining vision, for attaining knowledge, for naturally attaining stillness, which leads to knowledge, to awakening, to nirvana; this is a state without conflict. Why is it a state without conflict? [Because] it is a state that is free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. For this reason it is a state without conflict.

The presence of fetters that have not been eradicated is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

703b The eradication of fetters is a state without conflict. Why is it a state without conflict? [Because] it is a state that is free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. For this reason it is a state without conflict.

Not seeking happiness within is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

Seeking happiness within is a state without conflict. Why is it a state without conflict? [Because] it is a state that is free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. For this reason it is a state without conflict.

Herein, there is happiness that is ignoble happiness, the happiness of the ordinary worldling, which is basically a disease, basically a carbuncle, basically an arrow or a thorn, which pertains to what is worldly, pertains to birth and death, which should not be cultivated, should not be practiced, should not be made much of, of which I say that it should therefore not be cultivated; this is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

Herein, there is happiness that is noble happiness, the happiness of dispassion, the happiness of separation, the happiness of appeasement, the happiness [leading to] full awakening, which does not pertain to what is worldly, does not pertain to birth and death, which should be cultivated, practiced, and made much of, of which I say that it should therefore be cultivated; this is a state without conflict. Why is it a state without conflict? [Because] it is a state that is free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. For this reason it is a state without conflict.

Herein, insinuating speech that is untrue, false, and not connected to what is beneficial, this is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

Herein, insinuating speech that is true, not false, but is not connected to what is beneficial, this is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

Herein, insinuating speech that is true, not false, and is connected to what is beneficial, this is a state without conflict. Why is it a state without conflict? [Because] it is a state that is free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. For this reason it is a state without conflict.

Uneven and unrestrained speech is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

Even and restrained speech is a state without conflict. Why is it a state without conflict? [Because] it is a state that is free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. For this reason it is a state without conflict.

Insisting on or rejecting local customs is a state with conflict. Why is it a state with conflict? [Because] it is a state that is beset by suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is wrong practice. For this reason it is a state with conflict.

703c

Neither insisting on nor rejecting local customs is a state without conflict. Why is it a state without conflict? [Because] it is a state free from suffering, vexation, trouble, and sadness; it is right practice. For this reason it is a state without conflict.

These are reckoned states with conflict. You should understand states with conflict and states without conflict. Having understood states with conflict and states without conflict, discard states with conflict and cultivate states without conflict. [This is how] you should train.

In this way the clansman Subhūti, by following the path of nonconflict, subsequently came to understand the Dharma according to the Dharma.

Having known the Dharma as it really is Subhūti spoke this verse:

This practice is true emptiness;
Equanimity, this is dwelling in appeasement.<sup>375</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted in it and received it respectfully.

170. The Discourse to [a Brahmin Named] Parrot<sup>376</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattṥī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time, when the night was over, toward dawn, the World-honored One put on his [outer] robe, took his bowl, and entered Sāvattṥī to beg for almsfood.<sup>377</sup> While begging for almsfood, he approached the house of the young brahmin [named] Parrot, the son of Todeyya.

At this time the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, had gone out for some small matter and was not at home. At that time in the house of the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, there was a white dog, which was on a large bed eating from a golden feeding bowl.

704a Then the white dog saw the Buddha coming in the distance. Having seen him, it barked. The World-honored One said to the white dog, "You should not do that. You have gone from defaming [people in your previous existence] to barking [at them in this existence]."

On hearing this, the white dog became extremely angry, got down from the bed, went to a woodheap, and lay down beside it sad and distressed.

Later, on returning to the house, the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, saw that the white dog had become extremely angry and had gotten down from the bed, had gone to the woodheap, and was lying beside it sad and distressed. He asked the people in the house:

Who has harassed my dog, so that he has become extremely angry, has gotten down from the bed, and has gone to the woodheap, and is lying beside it sad and distressed?

The people of the house replied:

None of us has harassed the white dog, so that he has become very angry, has gotten down from the bed, has gone to the woodheap, and is lying beside it sad and distressed. Young brahmin, you should know that the renunciant Gotama came here today to beg for almsfood. On seeing him, the white dog chased him and barked at him.

The renunciant Gotama [then] said to the white dog, "You should not do that. You have gone from defaming [people in your previous existence] to barking [at them in this existence]." It is because of this, young brahmin, for this reason that the white dog became extremely angry, got down from the bed, went to the woodheap, and lay down beside it sad and distressed.

On hearing this the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, became very angry, wanting to defame the World-honored One, wanting to slander the World-honored One, wanting to disparage the World-honored One. So, [in order] to defame, slander, and disparage the renunciant Gotama, he right away went out of Sāvathī and approached Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One was teaching the Dharma, surrounded in front and behind by an immeasurably large assembly. Seeing the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, coming in the distance, the World-honored One said to the monks, "Do you see the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, coming?" They answered, "We see him."

The World-honored One said:

If the life of the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, were to end now, he would certainly be reborn in hell just as quickly as one might bend one's arm and stretch it out again. Why is that? Because he is extremely angry with me. Because of [such] a mind full of anger, at the breaking up of the body at death a living being will certainly go to a bad realm of existence and be reborn in hell.

Then the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, approached the Buddha and said to the World-honored One, "Renunciant Gotama, did you come to my house today to beg for almsfood?" The World-honored One replied, "I did go to your house today to beg for almsfood."

[The young brahmin asked:]

Gotama, what did you say to my white dog, so that my white dog became extremely angry, got down from the bed, went to the woodheap, and lay down beside it sad and distressed?

The World-honored One replied:

Today, toward dawn, I put on my [outer] robe, took my bowl, and entered Sāvattthī to beg for almsfood. Proceeding [from house to house] in turn, I approached your house to beg for almsfood. Then the white dog saw me coming in the distance. Having seen me, he barked. I said to the white dog, "You should not do that. You have gone from defaming [people in your previous existence] to barking [at them in this existence]." Because of this, the white dog became extremely angry, got down from the bed, went to the woodheap, and lay down beside it sad and distressed.

704b

The young brahmin Parrot asked the World-honored One, "In its former existence, what [relationship] did the white dog have to me?"

The World-honored One replied, "Stop, stop, young brahmin! Take care not to ask me this; for on hearing [the answer], you will certainly be displeased."

The young brahmin Parrot asked the World-honored One three times, "In its former existence, what [relationship] did the white dog have to me?" The World-honored One replied three times: "Stop, stop, young brahmin! Take care not to ask me this; for on hearing [the answer], you will certainly be displeased."

The World-honored One said to the young brahmin, "You asked me three times and would not stop. Young brahmin, you should know that in its former existence the white dog was your father, Todeyya."

On hearing this, the young brahmin Parrot became even more angry, wanting to defame the World-honored One, wanting to slander the World-honored One, wanting to disparage the World-honored One. Thus [in order] to defame, slander, and disparage the renunciant Gotama, he said to the World-honored One:

My father Todeyya was a great donor; he performed great sacrifices. With the breaking up of the body at death he [should] rightly have been reborn in the Brahmā world. Through what cause, what condition, would he have been reborn in this lowly condition among dogs?

The World-honored One said:

Your father Todeyya was very conceited. This is the reason why he was reborn in a lowly condition among dogs.

A brahmin who is very conceited

After death will be reborn in [one of] six types of existence:

As a chicken, a dog, a pig, or a jackal,

A donkey as the fifth, or in hell as the sixth.

Young brahmin Parrot, if you do not believe what I have said, return [home] and say to the white dog, “If in your former existence you were my father, white dog, then you should get back on the big bed.” Young brahmin, the white dog will certainly get back on the bed.

[Then say,] “White dog, if in your former existence you were my father, then go back to eating from the golden feeding bowl.” Young brahmin, the white dog will certainly go back to eating from the golden feeding bowl. [Then say this,] “If in your former existence you were my father, show me the place, unknown to me, where you hid gold, silver, crystal, and jewelry.” Young brahmin, the white dog will certainly show you a place, unknown to you, where gold, silver, crystal, and jewelry are hidden.

Then, on hearing what the Buddha said, the young brahmin Parrot memorized it well and recited it. Having circumambulated the World-honored One, he returned to his home. He said to the white dog, “If in your former existence you were my father, white dog, then you should get back on the big bed.” And the white dog promptly got back on the big bed.

[Then he said,] “White dog, if in your former existence you were my father, then you should go back to eating from the golden feeding bowl.” And the white dog promptly went back to eating from the golden feeding bowl.

704c [Again, he said,] “If in your former existence you were my father, show me the place, unknown to me, where my father earlier hid gold, silver, crystal, and jewelry.” The white dog promptly got down from the bed and went to the place where, in his previous existence, he used to spend the night. With its muzzle and paws it began digging beneath the four feet of the bed. From that place, the young brahmin Parrot recovered a great treasure.

Thereupon, having recovered the treasure, the young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya’s son, was extremely happy. He knelt with his right knee on the ground, extended his hands with joined palms in the direction of Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park, and three times expressed praise for the World-honored One aloud: “What the renunciant Gotama said was not false! What the renunciant Gotama said was true! What the renunciant Gotama said was according to reality!” Having praised [the Buddha] three times, he went out of Sāvattihī and approached Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One was teaching the Dharma surrounded in front and behind by an immeasurably large assembly. Seeing the young brahmin Parrot coming in the distance, the World-honored One said to the monks, “Do you see the young brahmin Parrot coming?” They answered, “We see him.”

The World-honored One said:

If the life of the young brahmin Parrot were to end now, he would certainly go to a good realm of existence, just as quickly as one might bend one’s arm and stretch it out again. Why is that? Because he has an extremely wholesome mental attitude toward me. Because of [such] a wholesome state of mind, at the breaking up of the body at death living beings will certainly go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven.

At that time the young brahmin Parrot approached the Buddha, exchanged friendly greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side. The World-honored One said, “How was it, young brahmin? Was it as I said regarding the white dog, or was it not so?”

The young brahmin Parrot replied, “Gotama, it really was as you said. Gotama, I wish to ask something else. Will you listen if I venture to express it?” The World-honored One said, “Ask as you wish.”

Gotama, what is the cause, what is the condition why living beings that have received a human body are superior or inferior, excellent or not excellent? Why is that?

Gotama, I see those who have a short life span and those who have a long life span. I see those who are often unwell and those who are seldom unwell. I see those who are ugly and those who are handsome. I see those who lack power and those who have power. I see those who are from lowly families and those who are from respected families. I see those who lack wealth and those who have wealth. I see those who have bad knowledge and those who have good knowledge.

The World-honored One replied:

Those living beings are [like this] because of the deeds that they themselves have done. The results obtained are caused by these deeds. Conditioned by [their own] deeds, dependent on [their own] deeds, having [their own] deeds as their abode, living beings are correspondingly superior or inferior, excellent or not excellent.

The young brahmin Parrot said to the World-honored One:

What the renunciant Gotama has said in brief, without analyzing it at length, I am unable to understand. May the renunciant Gotama explain it to me at length so that I get to understand the meaning.

705a

The World-honored One said, “Young brahmin, listen closely and pay proper attention. I will analyze it in detail for you.”

The young brahmin Parrot said, “Yes, indeed. I shall listen and receive the teaching.”

The Buddha said:

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be of extremely short life span?

Suppose that a man or a woman kills living beings, is wicked, bad, very evil, bloodthirsty, of harmful intent, attached to evil, devoid of mental states of kindness for living beings, even including insects.<sup>378</sup> One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will be of short life span.<sup>379</sup>

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive a short life span, namely: a man or woman kills living beings, is wicked, bad, very evil, bloodthirsty. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such results.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be of long life span?

Suppose that a man or a woman refrains from killing, abandons killing, discards sword and club, is endowed with a sense of shame and conscience, has mental states that are kind and compassionate, [wishing] to benefit all, even including insects. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will be of long life span.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive a long life span, namely: a man or a woman refrains from killing, abandons killing. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such results.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be often unwell?

Suppose that a man or a woman harasses living beings. He or she harasses living beings by [striking] them with the fists, or with sticks and stones, or with sword and club. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will often be unwell.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive many diseases, namely: a man or woman harasses living beings. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such results.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be healthy?

Suppose a man or a woman does not harass living beings. He or she does not harass living beings by [striking] them with the fists, or with sticks and stones, or with sword and club. One who has not undertaken or performed such deeds will, at the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will be healthy.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive good health, namely: a man or woman does not harass living beings. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such results.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be of ugly appearance?

705b

Suppose that a man or a woman has the nature of often becoming angry. On hearing some trifle, he or she becomes very angry, has ill will, shows dislike, is irritated, gives rise to sorrow, and generally gives rise to conflict and resentment. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will be of ugly appearance.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive an ugly appearance, namely: a man or a woman has the nature of often becoming angry. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such a result.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be of handsome bodily appearance?

Suppose that a man or a woman does not have the nature of often becoming angry. On hearing words, whether soft and tender or gross and crude, he or she does not become very angry or have ill will, does not show dislike or become irritated or sorrowful, does not often give rise to conflict and resentment. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will be of handsome bodily appearance.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive a handsome bodily appearance, namely: a man or a woman does not have the nature of often becoming angry. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such a result.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to lack power?

Suppose that a man or a woman harbors envy in the heart. On seeing others get support and respect, he or she is given to envy. On seeing the wealth of others, he or she wants to get it for himself or herself. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will lack power.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive no power, namely: a man or a woman harbors envy in the heart. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such a result.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to have great power?

Suppose that a man or a woman does not harbor envy in the heart. On seeing others get support and respect, he or she is not given to envy. On seeing the wealth of others, he or she does not want to get it for himself or herself. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will have great power.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive power, namely: a man or woman does not harbor jealousy or envy [in the heart]. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such a result.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be born into a lowly family?

705c

Suppose that a man or a woman is conceited and arrogant. He or she does not revere those who are worthy of reverence, does not esteem those who are worthy of esteem, does not appreciate those who are worthy of appreciation, does not respect those who are worthy of respect, does not support those who are worthy of support, does not give way to those who are worthy of being given way to, does not give a seat to those who are worthy of being given a seat, does not respectfully salute and greet those who are worthy of respectful salutation and greeting. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will be born into a lowly family.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive birth into a lowly family, namely: a man or a woman is conceited and arrogant. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such a result.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to be born into a respected family?

Suppose that a man or a woman is not conceited or arrogant. He or she reveres those who are worthy of reverence, esteems those who are worthy of esteem, appreciates those who are worthy of appreciation, respects those who are worthy of respect, supports those who are worthy of support, gives way to those who are worthy of being given way to, gives a seat to those who are worthy of being given a seat, respectfully salutes and greets those who are worthy of respectful salutation and greeting. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, at the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will be born into a respected family.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive birth into a respected family, namely: a man or woman is not conceited or arrogant. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such results.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to lack wealth?

Suppose that a man or a woman is not a donor, does not give gifts. He or she does not give to renunciants and brahmins, to the poor and destitute, to those who come from afar to beg [such things as] food and drink, clothes and blankets, flower garlands, fragrant unguents, shelter, beds and bedding, lamps, and servants. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will lack wealth.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive no wealth, namely: a man or a woman is not a donor, does not give gifts. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such results.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to have much wealth?

Suppose that a man or a woman is a donor, one who gives gifts. He or she gives to renunciants and brahmins, to the poor and destitute, to those who come from afar to beg [such things as] food and drink, clothes and blankets, flower garlands, fragrant unguents, shelter, beds and bedding, lamps, and servants. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will have much wealth.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive much wealth, namely: a man or woman is a donor, one who gives gifts. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such results.

706a Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to have bad knowledge?

Suppose that a man or a woman does not frequently approach others to ask questions. He or she does not approach well-known and virtuous renunciants and brahmins at the proper time to inquire about what is beneficial, [saying,] “Venerable sir, what is wholesome, what is unwholesome? What is an offense, what is not an offense? What is excellent, what is not excellent? What is white, what is black? Whence do white and black arise? What is beneficial and yields fruit in the present world, what is beneficial and yields fruit in the next world?”; and even supposing they do ask, they do not act [accordingly]. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will have bad knowledge.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive bad knowledge, namely: a man or woman does not frequently approach others to ask questions. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such a result.

Young brahmin, what is the cause, what is the condition for a man or a woman to have good knowledge?

Suppose that a man or a woman is able to approach others frequently to ask questions, that he or she often approaches well-known and virtuous renunciants and brahmins at the proper time to inquire about what is beneficial, [saying,] “Venerable sir, what is wholesome, what is unwholesome? What is an offense, what is not an offense? What is excellent, what is not excellent? What is white, what is black? Whence do white and black arise? What is beneficial and yields fruit in the present world, what is beneficial and yields fruit in the next world?" And having asked, they are able to act [accordingly]. One who has undertaken and performed such deeds will, on the breaking up of the body at death, certainly [either] go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heaven, [or else] on being reborn among human beings, he or she will have good knowledge.

Why is that? [Because] this is the way to receive good knowledge, namely: a man or a woman frequently approaches others to ask questions. Young brahmin, you should know that these deeds have such a result.

Young brahmin, you should know that performing deeds associated with a short life span will certainly lead to a short life span. Performing deeds associated with a long life span will certainly lead to a long life span.

Performing deeds associated with often being unwell will certainly lead to often being unwell. Performing deeds associated with seldom being unwell will certainly lead to seldom being unwell.

Performing deeds associated with being ugly will certainly lead to being ugly. Performing deeds associated with being handsome will certainly lead to being handsome.

Performing deeds associated with lacking power will certainly lead to lacking power. Performing deeds associated with having power will certainly lead to having power.

Performing deeds associated with a lowly family will certainly lead to a lowly family. Performing deeds associated with a respected family will certainly lead to a respected family.

Performing deeds associated with lacking wealth will certainly lead to lacking wealth. Performing deeds associated with much wealth will certainly lead to having much wealth.

Performing deeds associated with bad knowledge will certainly lead to having bad knowledge. Performing deeds associated with good knowledge will certainly lead to having good knowledge.

706b

Young brahmin, this is [the implication of] what I said earlier, "Living beings are [like this] because of the deeds that they themselves have done. The results obtained are caused by these deeds. Conditioned by [their own] deeds, dependent on [their own] deeds, having [their own] deeds as their abode, living beings are correspondingly superior or inferior, excellent or not excellent.

The young brahmin Parrot, Todeyya's son, said:

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have come to know it. World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.<sup>380</sup>

May the World-honored One from this day forth [please] approach the Todeyya household [for alms], just as he approaches the households of [other] lay disciples in Sāvattṥī, so that the Todeyya household may obtain benefit for a long time, so that it may obtain welfare, peace, and happiness.<sup>381</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the young brahmin [named] Parrot, Todeyya's son, and the immeasurably [large] assembly were delighted and received it respectfully.

171. The Discourse on a Great Analysis of Karma<sup>382</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary.

At that time the venerable Samiddhi was also dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in a meditation hut in the forest. Then the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta, while roaming around in the afternoon, approached the venerable Samiddhi. Having exchanged friendly greetings, he stepped back, sat to one side, [and said,] "Venerable friend Samiddhi, I would like to ask a question. Do you permit me to ask it?"

The venerable Samiddhi replied, "Venerable friend Potaliputta, ask what you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it."

The heterodox practitioner Potaliputta asked:

Venerable friend Samiddhi, I have heard face to face from the renunciant Gotama, received it face to face from the renunciant Gotama, that bodily and verbal actions are vain and false, and only mental action is real and true; and that there is a state of concentration such that, when a monk enters this state of concentration, nothing is felt.

The venerable Samiddhi replied:

Venerable friend Potaliputta, do not speak like this! Do not misrepresent the World-honored One! It is not good to misrepresent the World-honored One. The World-honored One does not speak like this, venerable friend Potaliputta.

The World-honored One has with countless skillful means explained: “If one intentionally performs an action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, then, I say, it is not the case that one does not experience its result. Either one experiences it in this life or one experiences it in a later life. If one unintentionally performs an action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, then I do not say that one must experience its result.”<sup>383</sup>

Three times the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta said to the venerable Samiddhi:

Venerable friend Samiddhi, I have heard face to face from the renunciant Gotama, received it face to face from the renunciant Gotama, that bodily and verbal actions are vain and false, and only mental action is real and true; and that there is a state of concentration such that, when a monk enters this state of concentration, nothing is felt.

706c

And three times the venerable Samiddhi replied:

Venerable friend Potaliputta, do not speak like this! Do not misrepresent the World-honored One! It is not good to misrepresent the World-honored One. The World-honored One does not speak like this, venerable friend Potaliputta.

The World-honored One has with countless skillful means explained: “If one intentionally performs an action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, then, I say, it is not the case that one does not experience its result; either one experiences it in this life or one experiences it in a later life. If one unintentionally performs an action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, then I do not say that one must experience its result.

The heterodox practitioner Potaliputta asked the venerable Samiddhi, “If one intentionally performs an action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, what result will one experience?”<sup>384</sup>

The venerable Samiddhi replied, “Venerable friend Potaliputta, if one intentionally performs an action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, one will certainly experience dukkha.”

The heterodox practitioner Potaliputta asked the venerable Samiddhi, “Venerable friend Samiddhi, how long have you been training on the path of this Dharma and discipline?”

The venerable Samiddhi replied, “Venerable friend Potaliputta, I have not been training on the path of this Dharma and discipline for long; [just] three years.”

Then the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta thought, “If even such a junior monk is capable of defending his teacher, how much more so would senior elders who are veterans in the training!” Then the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta, having heard what the venerable Samiddhi said, neither agreed nor disagreed with it, but rose from his seat and left, shaking his head.

At that time the venerable Mahācunda was seated for the day’s abiding in a place not far from the venerable Samiddhi. Then the venerable Mahācunda, who had memorized and borne well in mind the whole conversation that had taken place between the venerable Samiddhi and the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta, rose from his seat and approached the venerable Ānanda. Having exchanged friendly greetings, he stepped back, sat to one side, and reported to the venerable Ānanda the whole conversation that had taken place between the venerable Samiddhi and the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta.<sup>385</sup>

Having heard it, the venerable Ānanda said:

Venerable friend Cunda, in relation to this conversation, let us go and visit the Buddha and present it to the World-honored One. Venerable friend Cunda, let us now together approach the Buddha and tell the World-honored One all about this matter. Perhaps we will thereby get to hear from the World-honored One a teaching that differs [from Samiddhi’s reply].”

Then the venerable Ānanda and the venerable Mahācunda went together to the Buddha. The venerable Mahācunda paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side; the venerable Ānanda paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and stood to one side.

Then the venerable Ānanda said, "Venerable friend Mahācunda, please speak, please speak!" 707a

Then the World-honored One asked, "Ānanda, what matter does the monk Cunda wish to speak about?"

The venerable Ānanda said, "The World-honored One will now hear it from him directly."

Then the venerable Mahācunda reported to the Buddha the whole conversation that had taken place between the venerable Samiddhi and the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta. Having heard it, the World-honored One said:

See, Ānanda. The monk Samiddhi, this foolish man, is on the wrong track. Why is that? The heterodox practitioner Potaliputta asked about a matter that is not definite, but the monk Samiddhi, this foolish man, gave a definite answer.<sup>386</sup>

The venerable Ānanda said, "World-honored One, if the monk Samiddhi was speaking in relation to the dictum that whatever is felt is dukkha, then what is his fault?"<sup>387</sup>

The World-honored One reproved the venerable Ānanda:

See, the monk Ānanda is also on the wrong track. Ānanda, this foolish man Samiddhi was asked by the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta about all three feelings: pleasant feeling, painful feeling, and neutral feeling.

Ānanda, this foolish man Samiddhi [should have] answered the question by the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta like this: "Venerable friend Potaliputta, if one intentionally performs a pleasant action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, then one will experience a pleasant result. If one intentionally performs a painful action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, then one will experience a painful result. If one intentionally performs a neutral action which, having been performed, comes to fruition, then one will experience a neutral result."

Ānanda, if this foolish man Samiddhi had answered the question by the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta like this, then the heterodox practitioner Potaliputta would not even have dared to look this foolish man

Samiddhi in the eye, let alone ask him such a question. Ānanda, if you were to hear from the World-honored One the “Discourse on a Great Analysis of Karma,” then you would develop greater and superior mental tranquility and happiness with regard to the Tathāgata.

Then the venerable Ānanda, extending his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, said:

World-honored One, now is the right time; Well-gone One, now is the right time for the World-honored One to deliver the “Discourse on a Great Analysis of Karma.” Having heard it, the monks will remember it well.

The World-honored One said, “Ānanda, listen closely and pay proper attention. I will analyze it in detail for you.”

The venerable Ānanda said, “Yes, certainly.”

Then the monks listened to receive the teaching. The Buddha said:

Ānanda, suppose that someone does not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven.

Ānanda, suppose that someone [does] refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell.

Ānanda, suppose that someone does not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell.

707b     Ānanda, suppose that someone [does] refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven.<sup>388</sup>

Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who does not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. A renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, sees that.

Having seen it, he thinks, “There is no evil bodily conduct and there is no result of evil bodily conduct; there is no evil verbal or mental conduct and there is no result of evil verbal or mental conduct. Why is that? I saw someone who did not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view. Not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven.

“Hence those who in this way do not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; all of those who have not refrained, not exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. Whoever holds such a view has right view; for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false.” He strongly holds to what he has seen and known. Being attached to it, he declares as definite, “This is true, all else is wrong!”

Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who refrains from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. A renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, sees that.

Having seen it, he thinks, “There is no good bodily conduct and there is no result of good bodily conduct; there is no good verbal or mental conduct and there is no result of good verbal or mental conduct. Why is that? I saw someone who refrained from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell.

“Hence those who in this way refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view—all of those who have refrained, exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. Whoever holds such a view has right view; for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false.” He strongly holds to what he has seen and known. Being attached to it, he declares as definite, “This is true, all else is wrong!”

707c      Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who does not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. A renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, sees that.

Having seen it, he thinks, “There is evil bodily conduct and there is a result of evil bodily conduct; there is evil verbal or mental conduct and there is a result of evil verbal and mental conduct. Why is that? I saw someone who did not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell.

“Hence those who in this way do not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; all of those who have not refrained, not exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. Whoever holds such a view has right view; for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false.” He strongly holds to what he has seen and known. Being attached to it, he declares as definite, “This is true, all else is wrong!”

Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who refrains from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. A renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, sees that.

Having seen it, he thinks, “There is good bodily conduct and there is a result of good bodily conduct, there is good verbal or mental conduct, and there is a result of good verbal or mental conduct. Why is that? I saw someone who refrained from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven.

“Hence those who in this way refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view—all of those who have refrained, exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. Whoever holds such a view has right view; for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false.” He strongly holds to what he has seen and known. Being attached to it, he declares as definite, “This is true, all else is wrong!”

Herein, Ānanda, if a renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, makes a statement like this: “There is no evil bodily conduct and there is no result of evil bodily conduct; there is no evil verbal or mental conduct and there is no result of evil verbal or mental conduct”—I do not accept this.

If, [however,] he makes a statement like this: “I saw someone who did not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven”—I accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “Hence those who in this way do not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; all of those who have not refrained, not exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven”—I do not accept that.

708a

If he makes a statement like this: “Whoever holds such a view has right view; as for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false”—I do not accept that.

If he strongly holds to what he has seen and known, is attached to it and declares as definite: “This is true, all else is wrong!”—I do not accept that. Why is that? Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this man is otherwise.

Herein, Ānanda, if a renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, makes a statement like this:

“There is no good bodily conduct and there is no result of good bodily conduct; there is no good verbal or mental conduct and there is no result of good verbal or mental conduct”—I do not accept that.

If, [however,] he makes a statement like this: “I saw someone who refrained from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell”—I accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “Hence those who in this way refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; all of those who have refrained, exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell”—I do not accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “Whoever holds such a view has right view; as for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false”—I do not accept that.

If he strongly holds to what he has seen and known, is attached to it and declares as definite: “This is true, all else is wrong!”—I do not accept that. Why is that? Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this man is otherwise.

Herein, Ānanda, if a renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, makes a statement like this: “There is evil bodily conduct and there is a result of evil bodily conduct; there is evil verbal or mental conduct and there is a result of evil verbal or mental conduct”—I accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “I saw someone who did not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell”—I accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “Hence those who in this way do not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; all of those who have not refrained, not exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell”—I do not accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “Whoever holds such a view has right view; as for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false”—I do not accept that.

If he strongly holds to what he has seen and known, is attached to it and declares as definite: “This is true, all else is wrong!”—I do not accept that. Why is that? Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this man is otherwise.

708b

Herein, Ānanda, if a renunciant or brahmin who has attained the divine eye, who is accomplished in the divine eye, makes a statement like this: “There is good bodily conduct and there is a result of good bodily conduct; there is good verbal or mental conduct and there is a result of good verbal or mental conduct”—I accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “I saw someone who refrained from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained, having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he was reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven”—I accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “Hence those who in this way refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; all of those who have refrained, exercised restraint will, on the breaking up of the body at death, also be reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven”—I do not accept that.

If he makes a statement like this: “Whoever holds such a view has right view; as for those with other views, their knowledge inclines toward the false”—I do not accept that.

If he strongly holds to what he has seen and known, is attached to it and declares as definite: “This is true, all else is wrong!”—I do not accept that. Why is that? Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this man is otherwise.

Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who did not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained and not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven.

If he had earlier performed unwholesome deeds which, having been performed, come to fruition, then because of his lack of refraining and lack of restraint, [either] he has in the present [already] experienced the complete result and is therefore reborn there [in heaven], or [this happens] because he will experience the [painful] result later. [But in either case] it is not because of these [unwholesome deeds], not for this reason, that on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven.

Again, it may be that he had earlier performed wholesome deeds which, having been performed, come to fruition, and because of his [earlier] refraining and restraint the experiencing of results in a good realm of existence has not yet been exhausted, and because of these [wholesome deeds], for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. Again, it may also be that at the time of death he gave rise to a wholesome state of mind, a state of mind endowed with qualities connected with right view, and that because of this, for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this person is like this.<sup>389</sup>

Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who refrained from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained and having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. If he had earlier performed wholesome deeds which, having been performed, come to fruition, then because of his refraining and lack of restraint, [either] he has in the present [already] experienced the complete result and is therefore reborn there [in hell], or [this happens] because he will experience the [pleasant] result later. [But in either case] it is not because of these [wholesome deeds], not for this reason, that on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell.

708c Again, it may be that he had earlier performed unwholesome deeds which, having been performed, come to fruition, and because of his [earlier] lack of refraining and lack of restraint the experiencing of results in hell has not yet been exhausted, and because of these [unwholesome deeds], for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. Again, it may also be that at the time of death he gave rise to an unwholesome state of mind, a state of mind endowed with qualities connected with wrong view, and that because of this, for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this person is like this.

Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who did not refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; not having refrained, not having exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad destination, in hell. Because of this [unwholesome behavior], for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell.

Again, it may also be that he had earlier performed unwholesome deeds which, having been performed, come to fruition, and because of his [earlier] lack of refraining and lack of restraint, the results that he should experience in a bad realm of existence, in hell, have not yet been exhausted; and that because of this, for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. Again, it may also be that at the time of death he gave rise to an unwholesome state of mind, a state of mind endowed with qualities connected with wrong view; and that because of this, for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a bad realm of existence, in hell. Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this person is like this.

Ānanda, [consider the case of] someone who refrained from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from false speech . . . up to . . . wrong view; having refrained and exercised restraint, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. Because of this [wholesome behavior], for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven.

Again, it may also be that he had earlier performed wholesome deeds which, having been performed, come to fruition, and because of his [earlier] refraining and restraint, the results that he should experience in a good realm of existence have not yet been exhausted; and that because of this, for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. Again, it may also be that at the time of death he gave rise to a wholesome state of mind, a state of mind endowed with qualities connected with right view; and that because of this, for this reason, on the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn in a good realm of existence, in heaven. Ānanda, the Tathāgata knows that this person is like this.

Again, there are four types of person. It may be that someone does not have it but appears to have it, or that he has it but appears not to have it, or that he does not have it and appears not to have it, or that he has it and appears to have it.

Ānanda, it is just as four types of fruit. It may be that a fruit is unripe but appears ripe, or that it is ripe but appears unripe, or that it is unripe and appears unripe, or that it is ripe and appears ripe.<sup>390</sup>

In the same way, Ānanda, there are four types of person. It may be that someone does not have it but appears to have it, or that he has it but appears not to have it, or that he does not have it and appears not to have it, or that he has it and appears to have it.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Division 14

On the Mind

172. The Discourse on the Mind<sup>391</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park. 709a

At that time there was a monk who, while sitting in meditation in peaceful seclusion, had this thought in his mind: "By what are [people of] the world led? By what are they defiled and attached? By the arising of what are they controlled?"<sup>392</sup> Then, in the afternoon, the monk rose from his seated meditation and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at [the Buddha's] feet, he stepped back and sat to one side. He said:

World-honored One, just now, while sitting in meditation in peaceful seclusion, I had this thought in my mind, "By what are [people of] the world led? By what are they defiled and attached? By the arising of what are they controlled?"

On hearing this, the World-honored One praised him, saying:

It is well, monk, it is well, namely that, having a skillful approach, skillful contemplation, and superb eloquence, you have the proper reflection: "By what are [people of] the world led? By what are they defiled and attached? By the arising of what are they controlled?" Monk, is this what you are asking?

The monk replied, "That is so, World-honored One."

The World-honored One said:

Monk, by the mind [people of] the world are led, by the mind they are defiled and attached, by the arising of the mind they are controlled. By that [people of] the world are led, by that they are defiled and attached, by the arising of that they are controlled.

Monk, the learned noble disciple is not led by the mind, he is not defiled and attached by the mind, he is not controlled by the mind. Monk, the learned noble disciple does not follow the mind's control; rather, the mind follows the learned noble disciple.<sup>393</sup>

The monk said, "It is well, World-honored One, it is well indeed!" Then, having heard what the Buddha said, the monk was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked:

709b World-honored One, "a learned monk"; one speaks of "a learned monk." World-honored One, what makes a monk learned? How does one designate a monk as "learned"?

On hearing this, the World-honored One praised him, saying:

It is well, monk, it is well, namely that, having a skillful approach, skillful contemplation, and superb eloquence, you have the proper reflection: "World-honored One, 'a learned monk'; one speaks of 'a learned monk.'" World-honored One, what makes a monk learned? Whom does one designate as 'a learned monk'?" Monk, is this what you are asking?

The monk replied, "That is so, World-honored One."

The World-honored One said:

Monk, I have taught a great many things, namely: discourses (sutta), stanzas (geyya), expositions (veyyākaraṇa), verses (gāthā), causes (nidāna), inspired utterances (udāna), heroic tales (apadāna), [what has been] "thus said" (itivuttaka), birth stories (jātaka), answers to questions (vedalla), marvels (abbhutadhamma), and explanations of meaning (upadesa).<sup>394</sup>

Monk, if a son of good family, on being taught by me [just] a four-line verse, comes to know its meaning, comes to know the Dharma, progresses in the Dharma, moves toward the Dharma, progresses in the holy life, then, monk, what one speaks of as "a learned monk" is nothing more than this. Monk, such is a learned monk. Such a one the Tathāgata designates as a learned monk.

The monk said, "It is well, World-honored One, it is well indeed!" Then, having heard what the Buddha said, the monk was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked:

World-honored One, “a learned monk with penetrative wisdom”; one speaks of “a learned monk with penetrative wisdom.” World-honored One, what makes a monk learned with penetrative wisdom? Whom does one designate as “a learned monk with penetrative wisdom”?

On hearing this, the World-honored One praised him, saying:

It is well, monk, it is well, namely that, having a skillful approach, skillful contemplation, and superb eloquence, you have the proper reflection: “World-honored One, ‘a learned monk with penetrative wisdom’; one speaks of ‘a learned monk with penetrative wisdom.’ World-honored One, what makes a monk learned with penetrative wisdom? Whom does one designate as ‘a learned monk with penetrative wisdom’?” Monk, is this what you are asking?

The monk replied, “That is so, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said:

Monk, if a monk hears: “This is dukkha,” and with wisdom rightly sees dukkha as it really is; if he hears of the arising of dukkha . . . of the cessation of dukkha . . . of the path to the cessation of dukkha, and with wisdom rightly sees the path to the cessation of dukkha as it really is, then, monk, such is “a learned monk with penetrative wisdom.” This is what the Tathāgata designates as “a learned monk with penetrative wisdom.”

The monk said, “It is well, World-honored One, it is well indeed!” Then, having heard what the Buddha said, the monk was delighted and received it respectfully. He asked:

World-honored One, “an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom”; one speaks of “an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom.” World-honored One, what makes a monk intelligent, clever, and with vast wisdom? Whom does one designate as “an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom”?

709c

On hearing this, the World-honored One praised him, saying:

It is well, monk, it is well, namely that, having a skillful approach, skillful contemplation, and superb eloquence, you have the proper reflection: [“World-honored One, ‘an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom’;

one speaks of ‘an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom.’] World-honored One, what makes a monk intelligent, clever, and with vast wisdom? Whom does one designate as ‘an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom’?” Monk, is this what you are asking?

The monk replied, “That is so, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said:

If a monk does not think of harming himself, does not think of harming others, does not think of harming both; [if] instead a monk thinks of benefiting himself and others, benefiting many, with empathy for the world, seeking what is meaningful and of benefit for devas and human beings, seeking their ease and happiness; then monk, such is “an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom.” Such a one the Tathāgata designates as an intelligent monk, clever, and with vast wisdom.<sup>395</sup>

The monk said, “It is well, World-honored One, it is well indeed!”

Then the monk, having heard what the Buddha said, received it well, retained it well, and recited it well. He rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and returned.

Then the monk, having heard the World-honored One’s teaching, went and dwelled alone in a secluded place and practiced diligently, with his mind free of negligence. Having dwelled alone in a secluded place and practiced diligently, with his mind free of negligence, being a son of a good family who had shaved off hair and beard, donned the yellow robe, left home out of faith, and gone forth to practice the path, he attained fully the summit of the holy life. He dwelled having personally attained understanding, awakening, and realization here and now. He knew as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence.” That venerable one, having come to know the Dharma . . . up to . . . became an arahant.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

173. The Discourse to Bhūmija<sup>396</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary.

At that time the venerable Bhūmija was also staying at Rājagaha, in a secluded meditation hut. Then, when the night was over, at dawn, the venerable Bhūmija put on his robes and took his almsbowl, intending to go into Rājagaha to beg for almsfood. Then the venerable Bhūmija had this thought: “For the time being, never mind about going into Rājagaha to beg for food. Let me rather approach the house of Prince Jayasena.” Then the venerable Bhūmija approached the house of Prince Jayasena.

On seeing the venerable Bhūmija coming in the distance, Prince Jayasena rose from his seat, arranged his clothes so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the venerable Bhūmija, and said, “Welcome, venerable Bhūmija. It is a long time since the venerable Bhūmija came here. Please be seated on this seat.” Then the venerable Bhūmija sat down.

Prince Jayasena paid homage with his head at the venerable Bhūmija’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. He said, “Venerable Bhūmija, I would like to ask a question. Do you permit me to ask it?”

The venerable Bhūmija replied, “Prince, ask whatever you wish. Having heard [your question], I will consider it.”

The prince asked the venerable Bhūmija:

Sometimes there are renunciants and brahmins who come and call on me. They tell me: “Prince, if one makes an aspiration and <practices> the holy life, then one will certainly get results; or if one does not make an aspiration . . . or if one both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . or if one neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and practices the holy life, then one will certainly get results.”<sup>397</sup>

Venerable Bhūmija, what is the position of your venerable teacher? What does he say [regarding this]?<sup>398</sup>

The venerable Bhūmija said:

Prince, I have not myself heard [anything regarding this] from the World-honored One or from my companions in the holy life. However, prince, the World-honored One might speak in this manner: “If one makes an aspiration and properly practices the holy life, then one will certainly get results; or if one does not make an aspiration . . . or if one both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . or if one neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and properly practices the holy life, then one will certainly get results.”

The prince said:

If the position of the venerable teacher of the venerable Bhūmija is like this and he speaks like this, then in this world with its devas and māras, Brahmas, renunciants and brahmins, from human beings to devas, he is foremost and supreme. Venerable Bhūmija, please take your meal here.<sup>399</sup>

The venerable Bhūmija accepted by remaining silent. Knowing that the venerable Bhūmija had accepted by remaining silent, the prince rose from his seat and personally brought water for washing [the hands], and personally offered various kinds of fine dishes, delicious, plentiful, and easy to digest, making sure there was enough. After the meal, he gathered up the utensils, again brought water for washing, and then seated himself on a small seat to one side to listen to the Dharma.

710b The venerable Bhūmija expounded the Dharma to him, exhorting and inspiring him, fully delighting him, teaching him the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired him, having fully delighted him, [the venerable Bhūmija] rose from his seat and left. He approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, he stepped back and sat to one side. He reported to the Buddha the whole conversation he had had with the prince.

On hearing it, the World-honored One said, “Bhūmija, why did you not think to speak four similes to the prince?”<sup>400</sup>

The venerable Bhūmija asked, “World-honored One, which four similes?”

The World-honored One replied:

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view, makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results; if he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

Bhūmija, it is just as a man who, wanting to get milk by pulling on a cow's horn, will certainly not get milk. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get milk by pulling on a cow's horn, then he will certainly not get milk. Why is that? He is seeking milk in the wrong way, namely by pulling on the cow's horn.<sup>401</sup>

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view, makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

Bhūmija, it is just as a man who, wanting to get milk by pulling on the udder of a well-fed milking cow, will certainly get milk. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get milk by pulling on the udder of a well-fed milking cow, then he will certainly get milk. Why is that? He is seeking milk in the right way, namely by pulling on the cow's udder.

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

710c

Bhūmija, it is just as a man who, wanting to get butter by filling a vessel with water and churning it, will certainly not get butter. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get butter by filling a vessel with water and churning it, he will certainly not get butter. Why is that? He is seeking butter in the wrong way, namely by churning water.

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view, makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

Bhūmija, it is just as a man who, wanting to get butter by filling a vessel with cream and churning it, will certainly get butter. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get butter by filling a vessel with cream and churning it, then he will certainly get butter. Why is that? He is seeking butter in the right way, namely by churning cream.

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view, makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results; if he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

Bhūmija, it is just as a man who, wanting to get oil by filling a press with sand, sprinkling it with water, and then squeezing it, will certainly not get oil. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get oil by filling a press with sand, sprinkling it with water, and then squeezing it, he will certainly not get oil. Why is that? He is seeking oil in the wrong way, namely by squeezing sand.

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

711a

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view, makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

It is just as a man who, wanting to get oil by filling a press with sesame seed, sprinkling it with warm water, and squeezing it, will certainly get oil. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get oil by filling a press with sesame seed, sprinkling it with warm water, and squeezing it, he will certainly get oil. Why is that? He is seeking oil in the right way, namely by squeezing sesame seed.

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view, makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view, makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

Bhūmija, it is just as a man who, wanting to get fire by drilling a damp lower fire stick with a damp upper fire stick, will certainly not get fire. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get fire by drilling a damp lower fire stick with a damp upper fire stick, then he will certainly not get fire. Why is that? He is seeking fire in the wrong way, namely by drilling with damp sticks.

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has wrong view . . . and concentration [based] on wrong view, makes an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and wrongly practices the holy life, then he will certainly not get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the wrong way, namely by what is not the [right] path.

Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view, makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

711b

Bhūmija, it is just as a man who, wanting to get fire by drilling a dry lower fire stick with a dry upper fire stick, will certainly get fire. If he [makes an aspiration . . . if he] does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration, wanting to get fire by drilling a dry lower fire stick with a dry upper fire stick, then he will certainly get fire. Why is that? He is seeking fire in the right way, namely by drilling with dry sticks.

In the same way, Bhūmija, if a renunciant or brahmin who has right view . . . and concentration [based] on right view, makes an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. If he does not make an aspiration . . . if he both makes an aspiration and does not make an aspiration . . . if he neither makes an aspiration nor does not make an aspiration and rightly practices the holy life, then he will certainly get results. Why is that? He is seeking results in the right way, namely by the [right] path.

Bhūmija, if you had spoken these four similes to the prince, on hearing them the prince would certainly have been greatly pleased and would have supported you for the whole of your life, that is, with robes and blankets, food and drink, beds and bedding, medicine, and the various other requisites of life.

The venerable Bhūmija said:

World-honored One, I had never before heard these four similes. How could I have spoken them? Only now have I heard them from the World-honored One.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Bhūmija and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

174. The Discourse on Ways of Practice (1)<sup>402</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

In the world there are actually four ways of practice. What are the four? There is a way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain; there is a way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure; there is a way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain; and there is a way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure.<sup>403</sup>

What is the way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain? There are some renunciants and brahmins who amuse themselves with prettily adorned girls, saying, "What is the future dread that these [other] renunciants and brahmins see in sensual desires? What is the disaster [on account of which] they cut off sensual desires and advocate the cutting off of sensual desires? The bodies of these prettily adorned girls are pleasurable, pleasant to touch!" They amuse themselves with these girls, indulging themselves with them. While engaging in this practice, they are fully satisfied with it. [But] with the breaking up of the body at death they go to a bad realm, being reborn in hell.

711c

[Only] then do they think, “This is the future dread that those [other] renunciants and brahmins saw in sensual desires. This is the disaster on account of which they cut off sensual desires and advocated the cutting off of sensual desires. It is because of sensual desires, through being subject to sensual desires, on account of sensual desires, that we are now experiencing such extreme suffering, such severe suffering.”

It is just as when, in the last month of the hot season, in the extreme daytime heat, a pod of the māluva creeper splits open and a seed from it falls at the foot of a sāla tree. Then, because of that, dread arises in the tree spirit in that sāla tree. At this the relatives and friends of that tree spirit—village spirits in the vicinity of that seed [such as] the tree spirits of the numerous village cereal crops and medicinal plants—see future dread and disaster in that seed, and they therefore approach that tree spirit and console it, saying, “Tree spirit, do not be afraid! Tree spirit, do not be afraid! This seed will be eaten by a deer, or it will be eaten by a peacock, or it will be blown away by the wind, or it will be burned in a village fire, or it will be burned in a grass fire, or it will rot and become unable to sprout. In these ways, tree spirit, you will be safe.” [But] suppose that this seed is not eaten by a deer, not eaten by a peacock, not blown away by the wind, not burned in a village fire, not burned in a grass fire, and does not rot and become unable to sprout; this seed is not deficient, not punctured, and not cracked; it is not damaged by wind, rain, or sun. It is sprinkled with abundant rain and quickly grows.

Then that tree spirit thinks, “How is this? What is the future dread that my relatives and friends—village spirits in the vicinity of that seed [such as] the tree spirits of the numerous village cereal crops and medicinal plants—saw in that seed? What is the disaster on account of which they came and consoled me, saying, ‘Tree spirit, do not be afraid! Tree spirit, do not be afraid! This seed will be eaten by a deer, or it will be eaten by a peacock, or it will be blown away by the wind, or it will be burned in a village fire, or it will be burned in a grass fire, or it will rot and become unable to sprout. In these ways, tree spirit, you will be safe.’

“For this seed was not eaten by a deer, not eaten by a peacock, not blown away by the wind, not burned in a village fire, not burned in a grass fire, and did not rot and become unable to sprout; this seed was not deficient, not punctured, and not cracked; it was not damaged by wind, rain, or sun. It was sprinkled by abundant rain and has quickly grown.

“It has developed stems, branches, and leaves, tender and soft. It has developed joints and become very pleasant to the touch!”

712a Those stems, branches, and leaves, tender and soft, and those joints that have become very pleasant to the touch become ever more pleasant to the touch. Because of the tree they develop into great branches, joints, and leaves, which surround that tree and cover it up to the top. [Only] when it has become covered up right to the top does the tree spirit think, “This is the future dread that my relatives and friends—village spirits in the vicinity of that seed [such as] the tree spirits of the numerous village cereal crops and medicinal plants—saw in that seed. This is the disaster on account of which they came and consoled me, saying, ‘Tree spirit, do not be afraid! Tree spirit, do not be afraid! This seed will be eaten by a deer, or it will be eaten by a peacock, or it will be blown away by the wind, or it will be burned in a village fire, or it will be burned in a grass fire, or it will rot and become unable to sprout. In these ways, tree spirit, you will be safe.’

“Yet, this seed was not eaten by a deer, not eaten by a peacock, not blown away by the wind, not burned in a village fire, not burned in a grass fire, and did not rot and become unable to sprout; this seed was not deficient, not punctured, and not cracked; it was not damaged by wind, rain, or sun. It was sprinkled by abundant rain and quickly grew. It is because of that seed, on account of that seed, that I am now experiencing such extreme suffering, such severe suffering.”

In the same way, there are some renunciants and brahmins who amuse themselves with prettily adorned girls, saying, “What is the future dread that these [other] renunciants and brahmins see in sensual desires? What is the disaster [on account of which] they cut off sensual desires and advocate the cutting off of sensual desires? The bodies of these prettily adorned girls are pleasurable, pleasant to the touch.” They amuse themselves with these girls, indulging themselves with it. While engaging in this practice, they are fully satisfied with it. [But] with the breaking up of the body at death they go to a bad realm, being reborn in hell.

Only then do they think, “This is the future dread that those renunciants and brahmins saw in sensual desires; this is the disaster on account of which they cut off sensual desires and advocated the cutting off of sensual desires. It is because of sensual desires, through being subject to sensual desires, on account of sensual desires, that we are now experiencing such extreme suffering, such severe suffering.” This is the way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain.

What is the way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure? Suppose that someone is by nature strongly polluted by sensual desire, strongly polluted by anger, strongly polluted by delusion. Being frequently under the influence of sensual desire, his mind experiences pain, grief, and sorrow. Being frequently under the influence of anger . . . of delusion, his mind experiences pain, grief, and sorrow. Pained and aggrieved, he lives the holy life for his whole life . . . up to . . . crying and in tears. While engaging in this practice, he is fully satisfied with it; and with the breaking up of the body at death he certainly ascends to a good realm, being reborn in heaven. This is the way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure.

What is the way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain? There are some renunciants and brahmins who go naked, unclothed, who use their hands as clothes [to cover their private parts], or use leaves as clothes, or use beads as clothes; who will not use a pot to get water, or will not use a ladle to get water; who will not eat food [obtained by others] by robbery with blade and cudgel; who will not eat food obtained by deception, or by personally approaching [a donor], or by sending a messenger [to get it], or [when called thus]: “Come, venerable sir!” or “Welcome, venerable sir!” or “Stay, venerable sir!”

712b

Or who, when two are eating together, will not eat with them; or who will not eat food from a house where there is a pregnant woman, or from a house where there is a pet dog; or who will not eat food from a house where there are flies that have been around excrement; or who do not eat fish, do not eat meat, do not drink liquor, do not drink water [considered as] evil, or do not drink at all but train in the practice of not drinking; or who eat one mouthful and are content with one mouthful, or eat two mouthfuls, or three, four . . . or at most seven mouthfuls and are content with seven mouthfuls.

Or who eat [only the almsfood] they obtain at a single [house] and are content with what they obtain at a single [house], or at two [houses], or three, four . . . or at most seven [houses] and are content with what they obtain at seven [houses]; or who have one meal a day and are content with one meal, or one meal in two days, or in three, four, five, six, or seven days, or in a fortnight, or who have one meal in a month and are content with one meal [in a month].

Or who eat edible roots, or wild rice, or millet, or rice bran, or rice scum, or coarse food; who go to the forest and live off [what they find] in the forest, or eat roots or eat fruit, or eat fallen fruit.

Or who clothe themselves in patchwork robes, or in robes made of hair, or in robes made of coarse fabric, or in robes made of hair and coarse fabric; or who wear complete hides, or wear pierced hides, or wear complete pierced hides; who keep their hair disheveled, or keep their hair in braids, or keep their hair disheveled and in braids, or shave off their hair, or shave off their beard, or shave off their hair and beard,<sup>404</sup> or tear out their hair, or tear out their beard, or tear out their hair and beard.

Or who stand continuously, abstaining from sitting; or move about in a squatting position; or lie down on thorns, using a bed of thorns; or lie down on fruits, using a bed of fruit; or who worship water day and night, pouring it out with their hands; or who worship fire, keeping it burning continuously. Or who worship the sun and moon, revering them as spirits of great might, and extending their hands with joined palms toward them.

In these ways they experience immeasurable suffering, practicing self-mortification. While engaging in this practice, they are fully satisfied with it; and with the breaking up of the body at death they certainly go to a bad realm, being reborn in hell. This is the way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain.

What is the way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure? Suppose someone is by nature not strongly polluted by sensual desire, not strongly polluted by anger, not strongly polluted by delusion.

Not being frequently under the influence of sensual desire, his mind does not experience pain, grief, and sorrow. Not being frequently under the influence of anger . . . of delusion, his mind does not experience pain, grief, and sorrow. Happy and joyful, he lives the holy life for his whole life . . . up to . . . with a cheerful mind. While engaging in this practice, he is fully satisfied with it; and, having eradicated the five lower fetters, he will be spontaneously born <in between> and attain final nirvana there.<sup>405</sup> Having attained the condition of nonreturning, he will not come back to this world.<sup>406</sup> This is the way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure.

It was in relation to this that I said, “In the world there are actually these four ways of practice.”

712c

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

175. The Discourse on Ways of Practice (2)<sup>407</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying among the Kurus, at a Kuru town called Kammāsadhamma.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

People in this world have a desire like this, a hope like this, a craving like this, a source of happiness like this, an expectation like this: “May states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease! May states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise!” They have a desire like this, a hope like this, a craving like this, a source of happiness like this, an expectation like this. Yet, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease. This is a state of delusion.

My teaching is profound, difficult to see, difficult to awaken to, difficult to penetrate. In my teaching, which is profound, difficult to see, difficult to awaken to, difficult to penetrate, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable do cease, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable do arise. This is a state of nondelusion.<sup>408</sup>

In the world there are actually four ways of practice. What are the four? There is a way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain; there is a way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure; there is a way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain; and there is a way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure.<sup>409</sup>

What is the way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain? Suppose there is someone who is himself happy and joyful when he kills living beings, for whom killing living beings gives rise to happiness and joy. He is himself happy and joyful when he takes what is not given . . . commits sexual misconduct . . . speaks falsehood . . . up to . . . has wrong view, and for him having wrong view gives rise to happiness and joy. In these ways he has bodily pleasure and mental pleasure. [However,] unwholesomeness follows him, unwholesomeness arises. He does not advance toward knowledge, does not advance toward awakening, does not advance toward nirvana.<sup>410</sup> This is the way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain.

What is the way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure? Suppose there is someone who himself experiences pain and grief when he abstains from killing living beings, for whom abstaining from killing living beings gives rise to pain and grief. He himself experiences pain and grief when he abstains from taking what is not given . . . from sexual misconduct . . . from falsehood . . . up to . . . from wrong view, and for him abstaining from wrong view gives rise to pain and grief. In these ways he has bodily pain and mental pain. [However,] wholesomeness follows him, wholesomeness arises. He advances toward knowledge, advances toward awakening, advances toward nirvana. This is the way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure.

713a      What is the way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain? Suppose there is someone who himself experiences pain and grief when he kills living beings, for whom killing living beings gives rise to pain and grief. He himself experiences pain and grief when he takes what is not given . . . commits sexual misconduct . . . speaks falsehood . . . up to . . . has wrong view, and for him having wrong view gives rise to pain and grief. In these ways he has bodily pain and mental pain. Unwholesomeness follows him, unwholesomeness arises. He does not advance toward knowledge, does not advance toward awakening, does not advance toward nirvana. This is the way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain.

What is the way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure? Suppose there is someone who is himself happy and joyful when he abstains from killing living beings, for whom abstaining from killing living beings gives rise to happiness and joy. He is himself happy and joyful when he abstains from taking what is not given . . . from sexual misconduct . . . from falsehood . . . up to . . . from wrong view, and for him abstaining from wrong view gives rise to happiness and joy. In these ways he has bodily pleasure and mental pleasure. Wholesomeness follows him, wholesomeness arises. He advances toward knowledge, advances toward awakening, advances toward nirvana. This is the way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure.

That there is a way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain, this the deluded one does not understand as it really is. Not understanding as it really is that this way of practice is pleasant now but results in future pain, he cultivates it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated it and not refrained from it, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease.

It is just like a cupful of medicine that has an entirely attractive color, odor, and taste but is mixed with poison. Suppose a man swallows it because he is sick. At the time of being swallowed its attractive color, odor, and taste, make it palatable, and it does not afflict his throat; but when it has been swallowed and is in his stomach, it does not effect a cure.<sup>411</sup>

Such is the way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain, which the deluded one does not understand as it really is. Not understanding as it really is that this way of practice is pleasant now but results in future pain, he cultivates it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated it and not refrained from it, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease. This is a state of delusion.

That there is a way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure, this the deluded one does not understand as it really is. Not understanding as it really is that this way of practice is painful now but results in future pleasure, he does not cultivate it but refrains from it. Through his not having cultivated it and having refrained from it, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease. This is a state of delusion.

That there is a way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain, this the deluded one does not understand as it really is. Not understanding as it really is that this way of practice is painful now and results in future pain, he cultivates and practices it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated and practiced it and not refrained from it, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease.

It is just like feces and urine mixed with poison. Suppose a man swallows it [as medicine] because he is sick. At the time of being swallowed its bad color, stench, and foul taste make it unpalatable, and it afflicts his throat; and when it has been swallowed and is in his stomach, it does not effect a cure.

713b Such is the way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain, which the deluded one does not understand as it really is. Not understanding as it really is that this way of practice is painful now and results in future pain, he cultivates and practices it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated and practiced it and not refrained from it, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease. This is a state of delusion.

That there is a way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure, this the deluded one does not understand as it really is. Not understanding as it really is that this way of practice is pleasant now and results in future pleasure, he does not cultivate and practice it but refrains from it. Through his not having cultivated and practiced it but having refrained from it, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease. This is a state of delusion.

He does not know as it really is what should be cultivated and practiced, and he does not know as it really is what should not be cultivated and practiced. Not knowing as it really is what should be cultivated and practiced, and not knowing as it really is what should not be cultivated and practiced, he cultivates what should not be cultivated and practiced, and he does not cultivate what should be cultivated and practiced. Through his cultivating what should not be cultivated and practiced, and not cultivating what should be cultivated and practiced, states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable arise, and states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable cease. This is a state of delusion.

That there is a way of practice that is pleasant now but results in future pain, this the wise one understands as it really is. Understanding as it really is that this way of practice is pleasant now but results in future pain, he does not cultivate or practice it but refrains from it. Through his not having cultivated or practiced it but having refrained from it, states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise, and states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease. This is a state of wisdom.

That there is a way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure, this the wise one understands as it really is. Understanding as it really is that this way of practice is painful now but results in future pleasure, he cultivates and practices it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated and practiced it and not refrained from it, states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise, and states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease.

It is just like feces and urine mixed with several types of medicine. Suppose a man swallows it because he is sick. At the time of being swallowed its bad color, stench, and foul taste make it unpalatable, and it afflicts his throat; but once it has been swallowed and is in his stomach, it effects a cure.

Such is the way of practice that is painful now but results in future pleasure, which the wise one understands as it really is. Understanding as it really is that this way of practice is painful now but results in future pleasure, he cultivates and practices it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated and practiced it and not refrained from it, states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise, and states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease. This is a state of wisdom.

That there is a way of practice that is painful now and results in future pain, this the wise one understands as it really is. Understanding as it really is that this way of practice is painful now and results in future pain, he does not cultivate and practice it but refrains from it. Through his not having cultivated and practiced it but having refrained from it, states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise, and states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease. This is a state of wisdom.

713c

That there is a way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure, this the wise one understands as it really is. Understanding as it really is that this way of practice is pleasant now and results in future pleasure, he cultivates and practices it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated and practiced it and not refrained from it, states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise, and states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease.

It is just like curd and honey mixed with several types of medicine. Suppose a man swallows it because he is sick. At the time of being swallowed its attractive color, odor, and taste make it palatable, and it does not afflict his throat; and once it has been swallowed and is in his stomach, it effects a cure.

Such is the way of practice that is pleasant now and results in future pleasure, which the wise one understands as it really is. Understanding as it really is that this way of practice is pleasant now and results in future pleasure, he cultivates and practices it and does not refrain from it. Through his having cultivated and practiced it and not refrained from it, states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise, and states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease. This is a state of wisdom.

He knows as it really is what should be cultivated and practiced, and he knows as it really is what should not be cultivated and practiced. Knowing as it really is what should be cultivated and practiced, and knowing as it really is what should not be cultivated and practiced, he cultivates what should be cultivated and practiced and does not cultivate what should not be cultivated and practiced. Through his having cultivated what should be cultivated and practiced, and not having cultivated what should not be cultivated and practiced, states that are enjoyable, desirable, and agreeable arise, and states that are not enjoyable, not desirable, and not agreeable cease. This is a state of wisdom.

It was because of this that I said, “In the world there are actually these four ways of practice.”

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

176. The Discourse on Practitioners of the Absorptions

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

In the world there are actually four types of practitioners of the absorptions. What are the four?

There is the practitioner of the absorptions who is progressing but thinks he is regressing; there is the practitioner of the absorptions who is regressing but thinks he is progressing; there is the practitioner of the absorptions who is regressing and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing; and there is the practitioner of the absorptions who is progressing and knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

How does a practitioner of the absorptions who is progressing think that he is regressing? The practitioner of the absorptions, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, dwells having attained the first absorption.

Cultivating right attention, his mind moves on from the first absorption to the second absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, "My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and has moved to another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the first absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased."

714a

That practitioner of the absorptions does not know as it really is, that: "By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, has moved on from the first absorption to the second absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude."

Not knowing this as it really is, he [feels] as if he had regressed and his mind had lost [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses but thinks he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, dwells having attained the second absorption.

Cultivating right attention, his mind moves on from the second absorption to the third absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and has moved to another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the second absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

That practitioner of the absorptions does not know as it really is, that: “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, has progressed from the second absorption to the third absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Not knowing this as it really is, he [feels] as if he had regressed and his mind had lost [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses but thinks he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

Cultivating right attention, his mind moves on from the third absorption to the fourth absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and has moved to another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the third absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

That practitioner of the absorptions does not know as it really is, that: “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, has moved on from the third absorption to the fourth absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Not knowing this as it really is, he [feels] as if he had regressed and his mind had lost [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses but thinks he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, dwells having attained the fourth absorption.

Cultivating right attention, his mind moves on from the fourth absorption to the sphere of infinite space, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and has moved to another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the fourth absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

That practitioner of the absorptions does not know as it really is, that: “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, has moved on from the fourth absorption to the sphere of infinite space, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Not knowing this as it really is, he [feels] as if he had regressed and his mind had lost [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses but thinks he is regressing.

714b

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware of] infinite space, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space.

Cultivating right attention, his mind moves on from the sphere of infinite space to the sphere of infinite consciousness, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and has moved to another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the sphere of infinite space; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

That practitioner of the absorptions does not know as it really is, that: “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, has moved on from the sphere of infinite space to the sphere of infinite consciousness, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Not knowing this as it really is, he [feels] as if he had regressed and his mind had lost [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses but thinks he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

Cultivating right attention, his mind moves on from the sphere of infinite consciousness to the sphere of nothingness, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and has moved to another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the sphere of infinite consciousness; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

That practitioner of the absorptions does not know as it really is, that: “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, has moved on from the sphere of infinite consciousness to the sphere of nothingness, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Not knowing this as it really is, he [feels] as if he had regressed and his mind had lost [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses but thinks he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness.

Cultivating right attention, his mind moves on from the sphere of nothingness to the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and has moved to another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the sphere of nothingness; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

That practitioner of the absorptions does not know as it really is, that: “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, has moved on from the sphere of nothingness to the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Not knowing this as it really is, he [feels] as if he had regressed and his mind had lost [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses but thinks he is regressing.

How does a practitioner of the absorptions who is regressing think he is progressing? The practitioner of the absorptions, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, dwells having attained the first absorption. He gives attention to some other small perception in order to develop the path to the second absorption.

That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, will move from the first absorption toward the second absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

714c

[However,] that practitioner of the absorptions does not know, as it really is, that he should rather attend to a perception connected with disenchantment and enter the first absorption; he should not attend to some other small perception in order to enter the second absorption. Not knowing this as it really is, his mind inadvertently loses [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses but thinks he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, dwells having attained the second absorption.

He gives attention to some other small perception in order to develop the path to the third absorption. That practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, will move on from the second absorption to the third absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

[However,] that practitioner of the absorptions does not know, as it really is, that he should rather attend to a perception connected with disenchantment and enter the second absorption; he should not attend to some other small perception in order to enter the third absorption. Not knowing this, as it really is, his mind inadvertently loses [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses but thinks he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

He gives attention to some other small perception in order to develop the path to the fourth absorption. That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, will move from the third absorption to the fourth absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

[However,] that practitioner of the absorptions does not know, as it really is, that he should rather attend to a perception connected with disenchantment and enter the third absorption; he should not attend to some other small perception in order to enter the fourth absorption. Not knowing this as it really is, his mind inadvertently loses [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses but thinks he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, dwells having attained the fourth absorption. He gives attention to some other small perception in order to develop the path to the sphere of infinite space.

That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, will move from the fourth absorption to the sphere of infinite space, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

[However,] that practitioner of the absorptions does not know, as it really is, that he should rather attend to a perception connected with disenchantment and enter the fourth absorption; he should not attend to some other small perception in order to enter the sphere of infinite space. Not knowing this as it really is, his mind inadvertently loses [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses but thinks he is progressing.

715a Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space. He attends to some other small perception in order to develop the path to the sphere of infinite consciousness.

That practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, will progress from the sphere of infinite space to the sphere of infinite consciousness, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

[However,] that practitioner of the absorptions does not know, as it really is, that he should rather attend to a perception connected with disenchantment and enter the sphere of infinite space; he should not attend to some other small perception in order to enter the sphere of infinite consciousness. Not knowing this as it really is, his mind inadvertently loses [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses but thinks he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness. He gives attention to some other small perception in order to develop the path to the sphere of nothingness.

That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, will progress from the sphere of infinite consciousness to the sphere of nothingness, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

[However,] that practitioner of the absorptions does not know, as it really is, that he should rather attend to a perception connected with disenchantment and enter the sphere of infinite consciousness; he should not attend to some other small perception in order to enter the sphere of nothingness. Not knowing this as it really is, his mind inadvertently loses [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses but thinks he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness. He gives attention to some other small perception in order to develop the path to the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.

That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, will move from the sphere of nothingness to the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

[However,] that practitioner of the absorptions does not know, as it really is, that he should rather attend to a perception connected with disenchantment and enter the sphere of nothingness; he should not attend to some other small perception in order to enter the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. Not knowing this as it really is, his mind inadvertently loses [that level of] concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses but thinks he is progressing.

How does a practitioner of the absorptions who regresses know, as it really is, that he is regressing? The practitioner of the absorptions, having by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, completely transcended the sphere of nothingness, [aware] of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.

He does not keep to that practice and is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of nothingness, thereby fully regressing to that former [attainment].

The practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

715b He knows as it really is: “Had it not regressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, having by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, completely transcended the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness.

He does not keep to this practice, is not mindful of this characteristic and this mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of infinite consciousness, thereby fully regressing to that former [attainment].<sup>412</sup>

The practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the sphere of nothingness; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

He knows as it really is: “Had it not regressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, having by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, completely transcended the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of infinite space, thereby fully regressing to that former [attainment].

The practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind is separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the sphere of infinite <consciousness>; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”<sup>413</sup>

He knows as it really is: “Had it not regressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, having by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, completely transcended perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with delight in forms, thereby fully regressing to that former [experience].

The practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the sphere of infinite space; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

He knows as it really is: “Had it not regressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, dwells having attained the fourth absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with the third absorption, thereby fully regressing to that former [attainment].

That practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the fourth absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

He knows as it really is: “Had it not regressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

715c Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, having by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark become secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity, mindfulness, a happy abode.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with the second absorption, thereby fully regressing to that former [attainment].

The practitioner of the absorptions then thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the third absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

He knows as it really is: “Had it not regressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, dwells having attained the second absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with the first absorption, thereby fully regressing to that former [attainment].

That practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the second absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

He knows as it really is: “Had it not retrogressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, having by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, become secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, dwells having attained the first absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark. He practices only mindfulness and perception connected with delight in sensual pleasures, thereby fully regressing to that former [state].

That practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “My mind has separated from the earlier characteristics and is moving toward another sphere [of experience]. It has lost the first absorption; [that level of] concentration has ceased.”

He knows as it really is: “Had it not regressed, the mind would not have lost [that level of] concentration.” This is how a practitioner of the absorptions regresses and knows, as it really is, that he is regressing.

How does a practitioner of the absorptions who is progressing know, as it really is, that he is progressing? A practitioner of the absorptions, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, dwells having attained the first absorption.

By cultivating right attention his mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, moves on from the first absorption toward the second absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude. The practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, is moving on from the first absorption toward the second absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Knowing this as it really is, he realizes that his mind has not lost concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions who is progressing knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, dwells having attained the second absorption.

716a

By cultivating right attention his mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, moves on from the second absorption toward the third absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude. That practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, is moving on from the second absorption toward the third absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Knowing this it as it really is, he realizes that his mind has not lost concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses and knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity, not seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

By cultivating right attention his mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, moves on from the third absorption toward the fourth absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude. The practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, is moving on from the third absorption toward the fourth absorption, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Knowing this as it really is, he realizes that his mind has not lost concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses and knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, dwells having attained the fourth absorption.

By cultivating right attention his mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, moves on from the fourth absorption toward the sphere of infinite space, which is superior in calm and quietude. The practitioner of the absorptions thinks,

“By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, is moving on from the fourth absorption toward the sphere of infinite space, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Knowing this as it really is, he realizes that his mind has not lost concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses and knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space.

By cultivating right attention his mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, moves on from the sphere of infinite space toward the sphere of infinite consciousness, which is superior in calm and quietude. The practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, is moving on from the sphere of infinite space toward the sphere of infinite consciousness, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Knowing this as it really is, he realizes that his mind has not lost concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses and knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

By cultivating right attention his mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, moves on from the sphere of infinite consciousness toward the sphere of nothingness, which is superior in calm and quietude. The practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, is moving on from the sphere of infinite consciousness to the sphere of nothingness, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Knowing this as it really is, he realizes that his mind has not lost concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses and knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

716b

Again, a practitioner of the absorptions, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness.

By cultivating right attention his mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, moves on from the sphere of nothingness toward the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, which is superior in calm and quietude. The practitioner of the absorptions thinks, “By cultivating right attention my mind, joyful, calm, and quiet, is moving on from the sphere of nothingness toward the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, which is superior in calm and quietude.”

Knowing this as it really is, he realizes that his mind has not lost concentration. This is how a practitioner of the absorptions progresses and knows, as it really is, that he is progressing.

It was in relation to this that [I] earlier said, “In the world there are actually four types of practitioners of the absorptions.”

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

177. The Discourse on [Four Modes of] Explanation

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling in the Kuru country, at Kammāsadhamma, a town of the Kurus.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

I will now teach you the Dharma that is excellent in the beginning, excellent in the middle, and excellent in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and revealing the holy life, which is called the “Discourse on Four Modes of Explanation.”

I will analyze the meaning [of the absorptions] according to the “Discourse on Four Modes of Explanation.” Listen closely, listen closely and pay proper attention to what I will now teach you.

Then the monks listened to receive the instruction. The Buddha said:

How does one analyze the meaning according to the “Discourse on Four Modes of Explanation”?

Suppose that by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, having attained the first absorption.

Yet, he does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with delight in sensual pleasures, and [thereby] fully regresses.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither remain [at my level of concentration] nor advance it, nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will regress. This [level of] concentration of mine will not last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, having attained the first absorption.

He keeps up that practice, is mindful of that characteristic and that mark, with mindfulness established in accordance with the Dharma so as to maintain mental unification.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I am able to maintain my [level of] concentration; it will certainly last a long time.” That monk should know this. 716c

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, having attained the first absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the second absorption, and [thereby] fully advances.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor remain [at my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will advance. In this way I will soon attain the second absorption.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, having attained the first absorption.<sup>414</sup>

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with cessation and endowed with dispassion.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will not regress, nor maintain, nor advance [in concentration]. This state having arisen in me, I am able [to develop] disenchantment. In this way I will soon achieve the destruction of the taints.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, having attained the second absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the first absorption, and [thereby] fully regresses.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither maintain nor advance [my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will regress. This [level of] concentration of mine will not last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, having attained the second absorption.

He keeps up that practice, is mindful of that characteristic and that mark, with mindfulness established in accordance with the Dharma so as to maintain mental unification.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment.

This state having arisen in me, I am able to maintain my [level of] concentration; it will certainly last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, having attained the second absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the third absorption, and [thereby] fully advances.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor remain [at my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will advance. In this way I will soon attain the third absorption.” That monk should know this. 717a

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, having attained the second absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with cessation and endowed with dispassion.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will not regress, nor maintain, nor advance [in concentration]. This state having arisen in me, I am able [to develop] disenchantment. In this way I will soon achieve the destruction of the taints.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the second absorption, and [thereby] fully regresses.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither maintain nor advance [my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will regress. This [level of] concentration of mine will not last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

He keeps up that practice, is mindful of that characteristic and that mark, with mindfulness established in accordance with the Dharma so as to maintain mental unification.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I am able to maintain my [level of] concentration; it will certainly last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the fourth absorption, and [thereby] fully advances.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor maintain my [level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will advance. In this way I will soon attain the fourth absorption.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

717b

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with cessation and endowed with dispassion.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will not regress, nor maintain, nor advance [in concentration]. This state having arisen in me, I am able to [develop] disenchantment. In this way I will soon achieve the destruction of the taints.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, having attained the fourth absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the third absorption, and [thereby] fully regresses.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither maintain nor advance [my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will regress. This [level of] concentration of mine will not last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, having attained the fourth absorption.

He keeps up that practice, is mindful of that characteristic and that mark, with mindfulness established in accordance with the Dharma so as to maintain mental unification.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I am able to maintain my [level of] concentration; it will certainly last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, having attained the fourth absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of infinite space, and [thereby] fully advances.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor maintain my [level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will advance. In this way I will soon attain the sphere of infinite space.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, having attained the fourth absorption.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with cessation and endowed with dispassion.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will not regress, nor maintain, nor advance [in concentration]. This state having arisen in me, I am able to [develop] disenchantment. In this way I will soon achieve the destruction of the taints.” That monk should know this.

717c

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, having attained the sphere of infinite space.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with delight in form, and [thereby] fully regresses.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither maintain nor advance [my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will regress. This [level of] concentration of mine will not last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, having attained the sphere of infinite space.

He keeps up that practice, is mindful of that characteristic and that mark, with mindfulness established in accordance with the Dharma so as to maintain mental unification.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I am able to maintain my [level of] concentration; it will certainly last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, having attained the sphere of infinite space.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of infinite consciousness, and [thereby] fully advances.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor remain [at my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will advance. In this way I will soon attain the sphere of infinite consciousness.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware] of infinite space, having attained the sphere of infinite space.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with cessation and endowed with dispassion.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will not regress, nor maintain, nor advance [in concentration]. This state having arisen in me, I am able to [develop] disenchantment. In this way I will soon achieve the destruction of the taints.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of infinite space, and [thereby] fully regresses.

718a That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither maintain nor advance [my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will regress. This [level of] concentration of mine will not last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

He keeps up that practice, is mindful of that characteristic and that mark, with mindfulness established in accordance with the Dharma so as to maintain mental unification.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I am able to maintain my [level of] concentration; it will certainly last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of nothingness, and [thereby] fully advances.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor remain [at my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will advance. In this way I will soon attain the sphere of nothingness.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with cessation and endowed with dispassion.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will not regress, nor maintain, nor advance [in concentration]. This state having arisen in me, I am able [to develop] disenchantment. In this way I will soon achieve the destruction of the taints.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” having attained the sphere of nothingness.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of infinite consciousness, and [thereby] fully regresses.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither maintain nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will regress. This [level of] concentration of mine will not last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” having attained the sphere of nothingness.

He keeps up that practice, is mindful of that characteristic and that mark, with mindfulness established in accordance with the Dharma so as to maintain mental unification.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor advance [in concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I am able to remain [at my level of] concentration; it will certainly last long.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite 718b      consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” having attained the sphere of nothingness.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, and [thereby] fully advances.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will neither regress nor remain [at my level of concentration]; nor will I [develop] disenchantment. This state having arisen in me, I will advance. In this way I will soon attain the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.” That monk should know this.

Again, by a [certain] practice, a [certain] characteristic, and a [certain] mark, a monk dwells completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” having attained the sphere of nothingness.

He does not keep to that practice, is not mindful of that characteristic and that mark, but practices mindfulness and perception connected with cessation and endowed with dispassion.

That monk should know: “This state having arisen in me, I will not regress, nor maintain, nor advance [in concentration]. This state having arisen in me, I will [develop] disenchantment. In this way I will soon achieve the destruction of the taints.” That monk should know this.

Each [level of] perception has its [corresponding level of] knowledge. All of these are to be known, up to the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, which is foremost among them. The monk who practices the absorptions, on emerging from them, should explain this to others.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

178. The Discourse on the Hunter<sup>415</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels’ Sanctuary.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

A hunter who puts out fodder for deer does not have a state of mind like this: “May the deer become fat! May they look good, be strong, be happy, and live long!” A hunter who puts out fodder for deer has a state of mind like this: “May they come close in order to eat it! Having come close to eat, may they become careless and negligent! Having become negligent, they will come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter’s following.”<sup>2416</sup> A hunter who puts out fodder for deer has a state of mind like this.

The first herd of deer came close in order to eat the hunter’s fodder. Having come close in order to eat it, they became careless and negligent; and having become negligent, they came under the sway of the hunter and the hunter’s following. In this way that first herd of deer was unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter’s following. 718c

A second herd of deer had this thought: “The first herd of deer came close in order to eat the hunter’s fodder. Having come close in order to eat it, they became careless and negligent; and having become negligent, they came under the sway of the hunter and the hunter’s following. In this way the first herd of deer was unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter’s following. Now let us not eat the hunter’s fodder, avoiding it out of fear, and instead depend on the forest for eating grass and drinking water.”

Having had this thought, the second herd of deer abandoned the hunter’s fodder, avoiding it out of fear, and depended on the forest for eating grass and drinking water.

In the last month of the hot season, when the grass and water came to an end, their bodies became emaciated, their strength declined, and they came under the sway of the hunter and the hunter’s following. In this way the second herd of deer too was unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter’s following.

A third herd of deer had this thought: “The first and second herds of deer were both unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter’s following. Now let us avoid the hunter and the hunter’s following, and instead live in dependence [on a place] not far away. Living not far away, we will not come close in order to eat the hunter’s fodder. Not coming close in order to eat, we will not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, we will not come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter’s following.”

Having had this thought, the third herd of deer avoided the hunter and the hunter's following, living in dependence [on a place] not far away. Living not far away, they did not come close in order to eat the hunter's fodder; not coming close in order to eat, they did not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, they did not come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following.

The hunter and the hunter's following had this thought: "The third herd of deer is very cunning, extremely cunning. Why is that? Even if they eat our fodder, they cannot be caught. Now let us put up a long surrounding fence. By putting up a long surrounding fence, we will get control over the place in dependence on which the third herd of deer is living."

Having had this thought, the hunter and the hunter's following put up a long surrounding fence. By putting up this long surrounding fence, they took over the place in dependence on which the third herd of deer was living. In this way the third herd of deer was also unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following.

A fourth herd of deer had this thought: "The first, second, and third herds of deer were all unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following. Now let us live in dependence on [a place] that the hunter and the hunter's following cannot reach. Living in dependence on that [place], we will not come close in order to eat the hunter's fodder. Not coming close in order to eat, we will not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, we will not come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following."

719a

Having had this thought, the fourth herd of deer lived in dependence on [a place] that the hunter and the hunter's following could not reach. Living in dependence on that [place], they did not come close in order to eat the hunter's fodder. Not coming close in order to eat, they did not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, they did not come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following.

The hunter and the hunter's following had this thought: "The fourth herd of deer is very cunning, supremely cunning. If we were to chase after them, we would certainly not be able to catch them, and the other deer would become frightened and scatter in fear. Now let us abandon the fence and the fourth herd of deer."<sup>417</sup>

Having had this thought, the hunter and the hunter's following abandoned the fence. In this way the fourth herd of deer escaped from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following.

Monks, I have delivered this simile, wishing you to understand its meaning. I will now explain how you should contemplate its meaning. You should know that "the hunter's fodder" stands for the five strands of sensual pleasure: forms known by the eye, sounds known by the ear, odors known by the nose, flavors known by the tongue, and tangibles known by the body. You should know that "the hunter's fodder" stands for these five strands of sensual pleasure.

You should know that "the hunter" stands for the evil King Māra, and you should know that "the hunter's following" stands for King Māra's following. You should know that "the herd of deer" stands for renunciants and brahmins.

Renunciants and brahmins of the first [type] come close in order to eat King Māra's fodder, [that is,] the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world. Coming close in order to eat it, they become careless and negligent; and in becoming negligent they come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra's following.

In this way renunciants and brahmins of the first [type] are unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] King Māra. They are just like the first herd of deer, which came close in order to eat the hunter's fodder; and having come close in order to eat it, became careless and negligent; and having become negligent, came under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following. In this way the first herd of deer was unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following. Renunciants and brahmins of the first [type] should be seen as also like this.

Renunciants and brahmins of a second [type] have this thought: "Renunciants and brahmins of the first [type] come close in order to eat King Māra's fodder, [that is,] the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world. Having come close in order to eat it, they become careless and negligent; and having become negligent, they come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra's following. In this way renunciants and brahmins of the first [type] are unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] King Māra and King Māra's following. Now let us forgo the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world, avoiding it out of fear, and instead depend on eating fruit and roots in the forest.”

719b Having had this thought, renunciants and brahmins of the second [type] forgo the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world, avoiding it out of fear, and instead depend on eating fruit and roots in the forest. In the last month of the hot season, when all fruit and roots come to an end, their bodies become emaciated, and their strength declines. [Their strength] having declined, their liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom decline.<sup>418</sup> Their liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom having declined, they come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra’s following.

In this way renunciants and brahmins of the second [type] are unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] King Māra and King Māra’s following. They are just like the second herd of deer, which had this thought: “The first herd of deer came close in order to eat the hunter’s fodder. Having come close in order to eat it, they became careless and negligent; and having become negligent, they came under the sway of the hunter and the hunter’s following. In this way the first herd of deer was unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter’s following. Now, let us not eat the hunter’s fodder, avoiding it out of fear, and instead depend on the forest for eating grass and drinking water.”

Having had this thought, the second herd of deer abandoned the hunter’s fodder, avoiding it out of fear, and depended on the forest for eating grass and drinking water. In the last month of the hot season, when the grass and water came to an end, their bodies became emaciated, their strength declined, and they came under the sway of the hunter and the hunter’s following. In this way the second herd of deer was also unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter’s following. Renunciants and brahmins of the second [type] should be seen as also like this.

Renunciants and brahmins of a third [type] have this thought: “Renunciants and brahmins of the first and second [types] are both unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] King Māra and King Māra’s following. Now let us avoid King Māra and King Māra’s following, instead living in dependence on [a place] not far away. Living not far away, we will not come close in order to eat the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world. Not coming close in order to eat almsfood, we will not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, we will not come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra's following."

Having had this thought, renunciants and brahmins of the third [type] avoid King Māra and King Māra's following, living in dependence on [a place] not far away. Living not far away, they do not come close to eat the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world; not coming close to eat the almsfood, they do not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, they do not come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra's following.

However, they come to hold [either of] two views: the view of existence or the view of nonexistence.<sup>419</sup> Through holding [either of] these two views, they come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra's following. In this way renunciants and brahmins of the third [type] are unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] King Māra and King Māra's following.

They are just like the third herd of deer, which had this thought: "The first and second herds of deer were both unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following. Now let us avoid the hunter and the hunter's following, and instead live in dependence on [a place] not far away. Living not far away, we will not come close in order to eat the hunter's fodder; not coming close in order to eat, we will not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, we will not come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following."

719c

Having had this thought, the third herd of deer avoided the hunter and the hunter's following, living in dependence on [a place] not far away. Living not far away, they did not come close in order to eat the hunter's fodder; not coming close in order to eat, they did not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, they did not come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following.

The hunter and the hunter's following had this thought: "The third herd of deer is very cunning, extremely cunning. Why is that? Even if they eat our fodder, they cannot be caught. Now let us put up a long surrounding fence. By putting up a long surrounding fence, we will get control over the place in dependence on which the third herd of deer is living."

Having had this thought, the hunter and the hunter's following put up a long surrounding fence. By putting up a long surrounding fence, they took over the place in dependence on which the third herd of deer was living. In this way the third herd of deer was also unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following.

You should know that being "in dependence on" stands for the view of existence, and "living" stands for the view of nonexistence.<sup>420</sup> Renunciants and brahmins of the third [type] should also be seen like this.

Renunciants and brahmins of the fourth [type] have this thought: "Renunciants and brahmins of the first, second, and third [types] are all unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] King Māra and King Māra's following. Now let us rather live in dependence on [a place] that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach. Living in dependence on such [a place], we will not come close to eat the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world. Not coming close to eat almsfood, we will not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, we will not come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra's following."

Having had this thought, renunciants and brahmins of the fourth [type] live in dependence on [a place] which King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach. Living in dependence on such [a place], they do not come close to eat the almsfood offered by the faithful of the world; not coming close to eat the almsfood, they do not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, they do not come under the sway of King Māra and King Māra's following. In this way renunciants and brahmins of the fourth [type] escape from the territory [controlled by] King Māra and King Māra's following.

They are just like the fourth herd of deer, which had this thought: "The first, second, and third herds of deer were all unable to escape from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following. Now let us live in dependence on [a place] that the hunter and the hunter's following cannot reach. Living in dependence on such [a place], we will not come close in order to eat the hunter's fodder. Not coming close in order to eat, we will not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, we will not come under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following."

Having had this thought, the fourth herd of deer lived in dependence on [a place] that the hunter and the hunter's following could not reach. Living in dependence on such [a place], they did not come close in order to eat the hunter's fodder. Not coming close in order to eat it, they did not become careless and negligent; and not becoming negligent, they did not become under the sway of the hunter and the hunter's following. 720a

The hunter and the hunter's following had this thought: "The fourth herd of deer is very cunning, supremely cunning. If we were to chase after them, we would certainly not be able to catch them, and the other deer would become frightened and scatter in fear. Now let us abandon the fence and the fourth herd of deer."

Having had this thought, the hunter and the hunter's following abandoned the fence. In this way the fourth herd of deer escaped from the territory [controlled by] the hunter and the hunter's following. Renunciants and brahmins of the fourth [type] should also be seen like this.

Monks, you should train by living in dependence on places that Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach. What are the places that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach?

Here a monk, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the fourth absorption. These are places that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach.

What are other places that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach? Here a monk imbues his mind with loving-kindness. He dwells mentally pervading one direction [with loving-kindness], likewise the second, the third, and the fourth directions, the four intermediate directions, and also above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness—without bondage, resentment, ill will, and contention—[with a mind] that has become boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated, he dwells pervading the entire world. In the same way, he imbues [his mind] with compassion . . . with altruistic joy . . . with equanimity—without bondage, resentment, ill will, and contention—[with a mind] that has become boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated, he dwells pervading the entire world.<sup>421</sup> These are places that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach.

What are other places that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach? Here a monk, by completely transcending perceptions of form . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception. These are places that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach.

What is another place that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach? Here a monk, by completely transcending the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, dwells having attained and personally contacted the cessation of perception and knowing, and having seen with wisdom, all his taints are eradicated, and he knows it. This is a place that King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach.<sup>422</sup>

Monks, dwell in dependence on such places,<sup>423</sup> which King Māra and King Māra's following cannot reach. You should train like this.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

179. The Discourse to the Carpenter Pañcakaṅga<sup>424</sup>

720b Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the carpenter Pañcakaṅga had left Sāvathī at dawn and was approaching the place where the Buddha was staying with the intention of visiting the World-honored One and paying homage.

Then the carpenter Pañcakaṅga had this thought: "For the time being I will put off visiting the Buddha. The World-honored One may be sitting in meditation, and the venerable monks also. Let me now rather visit Mallikā's Single-halled Park for heterodox practitioners."

Then, to divert and amuse himself, the carpenter Pañcakaṅga took the path to the tinduka plantation, to visit Mallikā's Single-halled Park for heterodox practitioners.

At that time in Mallikā's Single-halled Park for heterodox practitioners there was a heterodox practitioner, the renunciant Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta, a great leader, teacher of a congregation, esteemed by the people, a teacher leading a great community of five hundred heterodox practitioners.

He was in a noisy crowd that was creating a great uproar, noisily talking various kinds of useless talk: talk about kings, talk about thieves, talk about battles and quarrels, talk about food and drink, talk about robes and blankets, talk about married women, talk about girls, talk about promiscuous women, talk about the world, talk about evil ways, and talk about what is in the ocean. They were gathered like this talking various kinds of useless talk.

Seeing the carpenter Pañcakaṅga coming in the distance, the heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta personally admonished his own congregation:

Keep quiet! Be quiet, all of you! Do not speak another word! You should collect and control yourselves. The carpenter Pañcakaṅga, a disciple of the renunciant Gotama, is coming.

Among the lay disciples of the renunciant Gotama that live in Sāvattṥi, none surpasses the carpenter Pañcakaṅga. Why is that? He delights in silence and praises silence. If he sees that this congregation is silent, perhaps he will come here.

Then the heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta, having stopped his congregation, remained silent himself. Then the carpenter Pañcakaṅga approached the heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta, exchanged greetings with him, stepped back, and sat to one side.

The heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta said:

Carpenter, if someone is endowed with four things, I describe him as accomplished in wholesomeness, foremost in wholesomeness, an unsurpassable person who has attained the supreme essence, a true renunciant.

What are the four? He does not do evil deeds with the body, he does not speak evil words with the mouth, he does not engage in wrong livelihood, and he does not think evil thoughts. Carpenter, if someone is endowed with these four things I describe him as accomplished in wholesomeness, foremost in wholesomeness, an unsurpassable person who has attained the supreme essence, a true renunciant.

On hearing this statement made by the heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta, the carpenter Pañcakaṅga neither agreed nor disagreed. He rose from his seat and left, [reflecting,] “I shall myself approach the Buddha and ask about the meaning of this statement.”

720c

He then approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head, stepped back, and sat to one side. He told the Buddha the whole conversation he had had with the heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta.

Having heard it, the World-honored One said:

Carpenter, if what the heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta said were indeed the case, then a small infant with tender limbs, lying on its back sleeping, would also be accomplished in wholesomeness, foremost in wholesomeness, an unsurpassable person who has attained the supreme essence, a true renunciant.

Carpenter, a small infant has, as yet, no perception of “body,” let alone of “doing evil bodily deeds.” All it can do is move its body.

Carpenter, a small infant has, as yet, no perception of “mouth,” let alone of “speaking evil words.” All it can do is cry.

Carpenter, a small infant has, as yet, no perception of “livelihood,” let alone of “engaging in wrong livelihood.” All it can do is moan.

Carpenter, a small infant has, as yet, no perception of “thoughts,” let alone of “thinking wrong thoughts.” All it can think of is the mother’s milk.<sup>425</sup>

Carpenter, if it were as the heterodox practitioner Samaṇamuṇḍikāputta proposes, then a small infant would be accomplished in wholesomeness, foremost in wholesomeness, an unsurpassable person who has attained the supreme essence, a true renunciant.

Carpenter, if someone is endowed with four things, I describe him as accomplished in wholesomeness, as foremost in wholesomeness, but not as an unsurpassable person, not as one who has attained the supreme essence, not as a true renunciant.<sup>426</sup>

What are the four? He does not do evil deeds with the body, he does not speak evil words with the mouth, he does not engage in wrong livelihood, and he does not think evil thoughts.

Carpenter, if someone is endowed with these four things, I describe him as accomplished in wholesomeness, as foremost in wholesomeness, but not as an unsurpassable person, not as one who has attained the supreme essence, not as a true renunciant.

Carpenter, bodily deeds and verbal deeds I refer to as being conduct. Carpenter, thoughts I refer to as belonging to the mind and connected with the mind.

Carpenter, I say one should know unwholesome conduct; one should know from where unwholesome conduct arises; one should know where unwholesome conduct ceases without remainder, where it is destroyed without remainder; and one should know by what practice a noble disciple brings about the cessation of unwholesome conduct.

Carpenter, I say one should know wholesome conduct; one should know from where wholesome conduct arises; one should know where wholesome conduct ceases without remainder, where it is destroyed without remainder; and one should know by what practice a noble disciple brings about the cessation of wholesome conduct.

Carpenter, I say one should know unwholesome thoughts; one should know from where unwholesome thoughts arise; one should know where unwholesome thoughts cease without remainder, where they are destroyed without remainder; and one should know by what practice a noble disciple brings about the cessation of unwholesome thoughts.

Carpenter, I say one should know wholesome thoughts; one should know from where wholesome thoughts arise; one should know where wholesome thoughts cease without remainder, where they are destroyed without remainder; and one should know by what practice a noble disciple brings about the cessation of wholesome thoughts. 721a

Carpenter, what is unwholesome conduct? Unwholesome bodily actions, unwholesome verbal and mental actions, these are reckoned as unwholesome conduct.<sup>427</sup>

Carpenter, from where does this unwholesome conduct arise? I will declare the place from which it arises. One should know that it arises from the mind. What kind of mind? It is a mind with sensual desire, with ill will, and with delusion. One should know that unwholesome conduct arises from this kind of mind.

Carpenter, where does unwholesome conduct cease without remainder, where is it destroyed without remainder? [If] a learned noble disciple abandons unwholesome bodily deeds and develops wholesome bodily deeds, abandons unwholesome verbal or mental deeds and develops wholesome verbal or mental deeds—this is where unwholesome conduct ceases without remainder, is destroyed without remainder.

Carpenter, by what practice does a noble disciple bring about the cessation of unwholesome conduct? If a learned noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas—if a noble disciple practices like this, he brings about the cessation of unwholesome conduct.<sup>428</sup>

Carpenter, what is wholesome conduct? Wholesome bodily deeds, wholesome verbal and mental deeds, these are reckoned as wholesome conduct.

Carpenter, from where does this wholesome conduct arise? I will declare the place from which it arises. One should know that it arises from the mind. What kind of mind? It is a mind free from sensual desire, free from ill will, and free from delusion. One should know that wholesome conduct arises from this kind of mind.

Carpenter, where does wholesome conduct cease without remainder, where is it destroyed without remainder? If a learned noble disciple practices virtue without being attached to virtue, this is where wholesome conduct ceases without remainder, is destroyed without remainder.<sup>429</sup>

Carpenter, by what practice does a noble disciple bring about the cessation of wholesome conduct? If a learned noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas—if a noble disciple practices like this, he brings about the cessation of wholesome conduct.

Carpenter, what are unwholesome thoughts? Thoughts of sensual desire, thoughts of ill will, and thoughts of harming; these are unwholesome thoughts.

Carpenter, from where do unwholesome thoughts arise? I will declare the place from which they arise. One should know that they arise from perception. What kind of perception? I declare that perceptions are of many kinds, of countless kinds, with various kinds of activities; they may be perceptions of sensual desire, or perceptions of ill will, or perceptions of harming.

Carpenter, because of perceptions based on the element of sensual desire, there arise in living beings unwholesome thoughts that are connected with the element of sensual desire. If there are [such] perceptions, [then] because of those perceptions there arise unwholesome thoughts connected with the element of sensual desire.

Carpenter, because of perceptions based on the element of ill will or the element of harming, there arise in living beings unwholesome thoughts that are connected with the element of ill will or the element of harming. If there are [such] perceptions, then because of those perceptions there arise unwholesome thoughts connected with the element of ill will or the element of harming. This is how unwholesome thoughts arise from this kind of perception.

Carpenter, where do unwholesome thoughts cease without remainder, where are they destroyed without remainder? When, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, a learned noble disciple dwells having attained the first absorption—this is how unwholesome thoughts cease without remainder, are destroyed without remainder. 721b

Carpenter, by what practice does a noble disciple bring about the cessation of unwholesome thoughts? If a learned noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings . . . states of mind . . . dhammas as dhammas—if a noble disciple practices like this, he brings about the cessation of unwholesome thoughts.

Carpenter, what are wholesome thoughts? Thoughts free from sensuality, thoughts free from ill will, and thoughts free from harming; these are wholesome thoughts.

Carpenter, from where do wholesome thoughts arise? I will declare the place from which they arise. One should know that they arise from perception. What kind of perception? I say, perceptions are of many kinds, of countless kinds, with several kinds of activity; they may be perceptions free from sensuality, or perceptions free from ill will, or perceptions free from harming.

Carpenter, because of perceptions based on the element of absence of sensual desire, there arise in living beings wholesome thoughts that are connected with the element of absence of sensual desire. If there are [such] perceptions, then because of those perceptions there arise wholesome thoughts connected with the element of absence of sensual desire.

Carpenter, because of perceptions based on the element of non-ill will or the element of nonharming, there arise in living beings wholesome thoughts that are connected with the element of non-ill will or the element of nonharming. If there are [such] perceptions, then because of those perceptions there arise wholesome thoughts connected with the element of non-<ill will> or the element of nonharming.<sup>430</sup> This is [how] wholesome thoughts arise from this kind of perception.

Carpenter, where do wholesome thoughts cease without remainder, where are they destroyed without remainder? If, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of joy and displeasure with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, equanimity, mindfulness, and purity, a learned noble disciple dwells having attained the fourth absorption—this is [where] wholesome thoughts cease without remainder, are destroyed without remainder.<sup>431</sup>

Carpenter, by what practice does a noble disciple bring about the cessation of wholesome thoughts? If a learned noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas, if a noble disciple practices like this, he brings about the cessation of wholesome thoughts.<sup>432</sup>

Carpenter, suppose a learned noble disciple by wise contemplation knows unwholesome conduct as it really is, knows as it really is from where unwholesome conduct arises, and by wise contemplation knows as it really is how this unwholesome conduct ceases without remainder, is destroyed without remainder. A noble disciple who practices like this comes to know as it really is the cessation of unwholesome conduct.

By wise contemplation [a noble disciple] knows wholesome conduct as it really is, knows as it really is from where wholesome conduct arises, and by wise contemplation knows as it really is how this wholesome conduct ceases without remainder, is destroyed without remainder. A noble disciple who practices like this comes to know as it really is the cessation of wholesome conduct.

By wise contemplation [a noble disciple] knows unwholesome thoughts as they really are, knows as it really is from where unwholesome thoughts arise, and by wise contemplation knows as it really is how these unwholesome thoughts cease without remainder, are destroyed without remainder. A noble disciple who practices like this comes to know as it really is the cessation of unwholesome thoughts.

721c

By wise contemplation [a noble disciple] knows wholesome thoughts as they really are, knows as it really is from where wholesome thoughts arise, and by wise contemplation knows as it really is how these wholesome thoughts cease without remainder, are destroyed without remainder. A noble disciple who practices like this comes to know as it really is the cessation of wholesome thoughts. Why is that?

Based on right view arises right intention, based on right intention arises right speech, based on right speech arises right action, based on right action arises right livelihood, based on right livelihood arises right effort, based on right effort arises right mindfulness, based on right mindfulness arises right concentration.<sup>433</sup> With a mind concentrated in this way, a noble disciple attains liberation from all sensual desire, anger, and delusion.

Carpenter, a noble disciple who has rightly liberated the mind in this way comes to know: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.” He knows this as it really is.<sup>434</sup>

This is the path of one in training and with vision, which is endowed with eight factors, while [that of] the arahant who has destroyed the taints is endowed with ten factors.

Carpenter, what are the eight factors with which the path of one in training and with vision is endowed? They are the right view of one in training . . . up to . . . the right concentration of one in training. These are the eight factors with which the path of one in training and with vision is endowed.

Carpenter, what are the ten factors with which the arahant who has destroyed the taints is endowed? They are the right view of one beyond training . . . up to . . . the right knowledge of one beyond training. These are the ten factors with which the arahant who has destroyed the taints is endowed.

Carpenter, when someone has these ten factors, I describe him as accomplished in wholesomeness, foremost in wholesomeness, an unsurpassable person who has attained the supreme essence, a true renunciant.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the carpenter Pañcakaṅga and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

180. The Discourse to Gotamī<sup>435</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling among the Sakyans, in the Nigrodha Park at Kapilavatthu.

At that time Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī approached the Buddha, holding a new robe of yellow color made out of thread with a golden [hue].<sup>436</sup> Having paid homage with her head at the Buddha's feet, she stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, I have made this new robe myself out of yellow-colored thread with a golden [hue] for the World-honored One. May he condescend to accept it, out of compassion for me.

The World-honored One said:

Gotamī, take this robe and offer it to the Sangha of monks. In offering it to the Sangha of monks, you will be honoring and supporting me as well as honoring and supporting the Sangha.

722a Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī made her request three times, saying:

World-honored One, I have made this new robe myself out of yellow-colored thread with a golden [hue] for the World-honored One. May he condescend to accept it, out of compassion for me.

The World-honored One replied three times, saying:

Gotamī, take this robe and offer it to the Sangha of monks. In offering it to the Sangha of monks, you will be honoring and supporting me as well as honoring and supporting the Sangha.

At that time the venerable Ānanda was standing behind the Buddha, holding a whisk and attending on him. Then the venerable Ānanda said:

World-honored One, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī has been of much benefit to the World-honored One. After the death of the World-honored One's mother she suckled and raised the World-honored One.

The World-honored One said:

Indeed, Ānanda. Indeed, Ānanda. Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī has been of much benefit to me. After the death of my mother she suckled and raised me.

Ānanda, I have also been of much benefit to Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī.<sup>437</sup> Why is that? Because of me, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī took refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. She is free of doubt in regard to the Three Jewels and in regard to dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path [to its cessation]. She is accomplished in faith, morality, much learning, generosity, and wisdom. She abstains from killing, having abandoned killing; [she abstains] from taking what is not given . . . from sexual misconduct . . . from false speech . . . and she abstains from alcoholic beverages, having abandoned alcoholic beverages.

Ānanda, if because of a certain person one takes refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks; [if one becomes] free of doubt in regard to the Three Jewels and in regard to dukkha, its arising, its cessation, and the path [to its cessation]; becomes accomplished in faith, morality, much learning, generosity, and wisdom; abstains from killing, having abandoned killing; [abstains] from taking what is not given . . . from sexual misconduct . . . from false speech . . . and abstains from alcoholic beverages, having abandoned alcoholic beverages—then one cannot possibly repay the kindness of such a person even if, for one’s whole life, one were to honor and support him with food and drink, robes and blankets, beds and seats, medicines, and the various [other] kinds of requisites.

Again, Ānanda, there are seven [types of] offering to the Sangha and fourteen [types of] offering to individuals that bring great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results.<sup>438</sup> Ānanda, what are the seven [types of] offering to the Sangha that bring great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results?

At a time when the Buddha is still in the world, a faithful clansman or clanswoman makes offerings to the Buddha and to the Sangha of monks headed by the Buddha.<sup>439</sup> This is the first [type of] offering to the Sangha that brings great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results.

A faithful clansman or clanswoman makes offerings to the two communities at a time not long after the World-honored One has attained final nirvana . . . makes offerings to the Sangha of monks . . . makes offerings to the Sangha of nuns . . . goes to a monastic dwelling for monks and says to the Sangha [there], “Whichever monks from this Sangha come, I will make offerings to them” . . . goes to a monastic dwelling for nuns and says to the Sangha [there], “Whichever nuns from this Sangha come, I will make offerings to them.”

This is the <sixth><sup>440</sup> [type of] offering to the Sangha that brings great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results.

722b

Ānanda, at a future time there will be monks called “of the lineage,” who are not diligent, who wear the yellow robe but are not diligent.<sup>441</sup> I say that when an offering is intentionally made to these [monks] who are not diligent, then because [it is made] in dependence on the Sangha, because [it is made] with the Sangha as its cause, because [it is made] in honor of the Sangha, because [it is made] with the Sangha as its condition, the donor will gain merit that is immeasurable, that cannot be counted or calculated, attaining what is wholesome and pleasant.

What is to be said, then, of [offerings made] to monks in the present who are accomplished in undertaking things, accomplished in discarding things, accomplished in undertaking and discarding things; accomplished in uprightness, accomplished in gentleness, accomplished in uprightness and gentleness; accomplished in patience, accomplished in joyfulness, accomplished in patience and joyfulness; accomplished in being accommodating, accomplished in getting things done, accomplished in being accommodating and getting things done; accomplished in decorum, accomplished in [proper behavior when] going, coming, and remaining still, accomplished in decorum and in [proper behavior when] going, coming, and remaining still; accomplished in faith, accomplished in morality, accomplished in much learning, accomplished in generosity, accomplished in wisdom, accomplished in faith, morality, much learning, generosity, and wisdom!

This is the seventh [type of] offering to the Sangha that brings great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results. These are the seven [types of] offering to the Sangha that bring great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results.

Ānanda, what are the fourteen [types of] offering to individuals that bring great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results?

A faithful clansman or clanswoman makes an offering to the Tathāgata . . . makes an offering to a paccekabuddha . . . makes an offering to an arahant . . . makes an offering to one on the path to arahantship . . . makes an offering to a nonreturner . . . makes an offering to one on the path to nonreturning . . . makes an offering to a once-returner . . . makes an offering to one on the path to once-returning . . . makes an offering to a stream-enterer . . . makes an offering to one on the path to stream-entry . . . makes an offering to a non-Buddhist seer who is free of sensual desires . . .

makes an offering to a diligent person . . . makes an offering to a person who is not diligent . . . makes an offering to an animal.

Ānanda, making an offering to an animal brings hundredfold merit; making an offering to a person who is not diligent brings thousandfold merit; making an offering to a diligent person brings hundred-thousandfold merit; making an offering to a non-Buddhist seer who is free of sensual desires brings hundred thousand times hundred-thousandfold merit; making an offering to one on the path to stream-entry brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to a stream-enterer brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to one on the path to once-returning brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to a once-returner brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to one on the path to nonreturning brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to a nonreturner brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to one on the path to arahantship brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to an arahant brings immeasurable [merit]; making an offering to a pacceka-buddha brings immeasurable [merit]; what is to be said of making an offering to the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened!

These are the fourteen [types of] offering to individuals that bring great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and extensive results.

Again, Ānanda, there are four types of offering and three purifications of gifts. What are the four? There is the offering that is purified on account of the donor but not the recipient; there is the offering that is purified on account of the recipient but not the donor; there is the offering that is not purified on account of either the donor or the recipient; and there is the offering that is purified on account of both the donor and the recipient. 722c Ānanda, what is the offering that is purified on account of the donor but not the recipient?

The donor is diligent, they practice the sublime teachings, they look toward the future, look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is giving, and there are fruits of giving.” The recipient is not diligent, they practice evil teachings, they do not look toward the future, do not look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is no giving, and there are no fruits of giving.”<sup>442</sup>

This is the offering that is purified on account of the donor but not the recipient.

Ānanda, what is the offering that is purified on account of the recipient but not the donor?

The donor is not diligent, they practice evil teachings, they do not look toward the future, do not look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is no giving, and there are no fruits of giving.” The recipient is diligent, they practice the sublime teachings, they look toward the future, look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is giving, and there are fruits of giving.”

This is the offering that is purified on account of the recipient but not the donor.

Ānanda, what is the offering that is not purified on account of either the donor or the recipient?

The donor is not diligent, they practice evil teachings, they do not look toward the future, do not look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is no giving, and there are no fruits of giving.” The recipient is also not diligent, they practice evil teachings, they do not look toward the future, do not look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is no giving, and there are no fruits of giving.”

This is the offering that is not purified on account of either the donor or the recipient.

Ānanda, what is the offering that is purified on account of both the donor and the recipient?

The donor is diligent, they practice the sublime teachings, they look toward the future, look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is giving, and there are fruits of giving.” The recipient is also diligent, they practice the sublime teachings, they look toward the future, look toward the fruits [of deeds], they have such a view and make such a declaration: “There is giving, and there are fruits of giving.”

This is the offering that is purified on account of both the donor and the recipient.

Then, the World-honored One spoke these stanzas:

A diligent one offers to one who is not diligent,
In accordance with the Dharma, attaining a joyful mind,
With faith that there are deeds and their results;
Such an offering is purified on account of the donor.

One who is not diligent offers to a diligent one,
Not in accordance with the Dharma and without a joyful mind,
Without faith in deeds and their results;
Such an offering is purified on account of the recipient.

A negligent one offers to one who is not diligent,
Not in accordance with the Dharma and without a joyful mind,
Without faith in deeds and their results;
Such an offering is not of great result.

A diligent one offers to one who is diligent,
In accordance with the Dharma, attaining a joyful mind,
With faith in deeds and their results;
Such an offering is of great result.

723a

Male and female slaves and the poor<sup>443</sup>
Joyfully part with their own [property] to make an offering,
With faith in deeds and their results;
Such an offering is wholesome and people praise it.

With right restraint, with wholesome bodily and verbal [actions],
As he holds out [his bowl] when begging for alms according to the Dharma,
A dispassionate one makes an offering to a dispassionate one;
This is foremost among material offerings.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

181. The Discourse on Many Elements<sup>444</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was living at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's
Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the venerable Ānanda, who was seated in meditation alone in a tranquil place, had this thought in his mind: “All fears, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom. All misfortunes, disasters, and worries, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom.”

Then, in the late afternoon, the venerable Ānanda rose from sitting in meditation and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, he stepped back, stood to one side, and said:

World-honored One, today [while] I was seated in meditation alone in a tranquil place, I had this thought in my mind: “All fears, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom.”<sup>445</sup> All misfortunes, disasters, and worries, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom.”

The World-honored One said:

It is like this, Ānanda; it is like this, Ānanda. All fears, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom. All misfortunes, disasters, and worries, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom.

Ānanda, just as from a heap of reeds and grass a fire may start, [which then] burns down a house or a hall, in the same way all fears, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom. All misfortunes, disasters, and worries, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom.

Ānanda, whatever fears there were in times past, they all arose from foolishness, not from wisdom. All misfortunes, disasters, and worries, they arose from foolishness, not from wisdom.<sup>446</sup> 723b Ānanda, whatever fears there will be in future times, they will all arise from foolishness, not from wisdom. All misfortunes, disasters, and worries, they will arise from foolishness, not from wisdom.

Ānanda, whatever fears there are at the present time, they all arise from foolishness, not from wisdom. All misfortunes, disasters, and worries, they arise from foolishness, not from wisdom.

This means, Ānanda, that with foolishness there is fear; with wisdom there is no fear. With foolishness there are misfortunes, disasters, and worries; with wisdom there are no misfortunes, disasters, or worries. Ānanda, whatever fears, misfortunes, disasters, and worries exist, all of them come from foolishness, not from wisdom.

Then the venerable Ānanda, moved to tears,<sup>447</sup> extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said, “World-honored One, how is a monk foolish and not wise?”<sup>448</sup>

The World-honored One replied:

Ānanda, if a monk does not know the elements, does not know the sense spheres, does not know causes and conditions, and does not know what is possible and what is impossible—such a monk, Ānanda, is foolish and not wise.

The venerable Ānanda said, “World-honored One, such a monk is foolish and not wise. World-honored One, how is a monk wise and not foolish?”

The World-honored One replied:

Ānanda, if a monk knows the elements, knows the sense spheres, knows causes and conditions, and knows what is possible and what is impossible—such a monk, Ānanda, is wise and not foolish.

The venerable Ānanda said, “World-honored One, such a monk is wise and not foolish. World-honored One, how does a monk know the elements?”

The World-honored One replied:

Ānanda, a monk sees eighteen elements and knows them as they really are: the eye element, the form element, and the eye consciousness element; the ear element, the sound element, and the ear consciousness element; the nose element, the odor element, and the nose consciousness element; the tongue element, the taste element, and the tongue consciousness element; the body element, the tangible element, and the body consciousness element; the mind element, the mind object element, and the mind consciousness element. Ānanda, he sees these eighteen elements and knows them as they really are.<sup>449</sup>

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees six elements and knows them as they really are: the earth element, the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element. Ānanda, he sees these six elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees six elements and knows them as they really are: the element of sensual desire, the element of ill will, the element of harming, the element of absence of sensual desire, the element of non-ill will, and the element of nonharming. Ānanda, he sees these six elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees six elements and knows them as they really are: the element of pleasure, the element of pain, the element of joy, the element of sadness, the element of equanimity, and the element of ignorance. Ānanda, he sees these six elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees four elements and knows them as they really are: the element of feeling, the element of perception, the element of formations, the element of consciousness. Ānanda, he sees these four elements and knows them as they really are.<sup>450</sup>

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees three elements and knows them as they really are: the sense sphere element, the [fine-]material element, and the immaterial element. Ānanda, he sees these three elements and knows them as they really are.

723c Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees three elements and knows them as they really are: the material element, the immaterial element, and the element of cessation. Ānanda, he sees these three elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees three elements and knows them as they really are: the element of the past, the element of the future, and the element of the present. Ānanda, he sees these three elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees three elements and knows them as they really are: the superior element, the inferior element, and the middling element. Ānanda, he sees these three elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees three elements and knows them as they really are: the wholesome element, the unwholesome element, and the undetermined element. Ānanda, he sees these three elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees three elements and knows them as they really are: the element of the trainee, the element of the one beyond training, and the element of the one who is neither a trainee nor beyond training. Ānanda, he sees these three elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees two elements and knows them as they really are: the element with taints and the element without taints. Ānanda, he sees these two elements and knows them as they really are.

Again, Ānanda, [a monk] sees two elements and knows them as they really are: the conditioned element and the unconditioned element. Ānanda, he sees these two elements and knows them as they really are.

Ānanda, he sees these sixty-two elements and knows them as they really are. Ānanda, this is how a monk knows the elements.

The venerable Ānanda said, “World-honored One, this is how a monk knows the elements. World-honored One, how does a monk know the sense spheres?”

The World-honored One replied:

Ānanda, a monk sees the twelve sense spheres and knows them as they really are: the eye sense sphere and the form sense sphere; the ear sense sphere and the sound sense sphere; the nose sense sphere and the odor sense sphere; the tongue sense sphere and the taste sense sphere; the body sense sphere and the tangible sense sphere; the mind sense sphere and the mind object sense sphere. Ānanda, he sees these twelve sense spheres and knows them as they really are. Ānanda, this is how a monk knows the sense spheres.

The venerable Ānanda said, “World-honored One, this is how a monk knows the sense spheres. How does a monk know causes and conditions?”

The World-honored One replied:

Ānanda, a monk sees causes and conditions as well as what has arisen through causes and conditions, and he knows them as they really are. [He knows:] dependent on this, that exists; if this does not exist, that does not exist; if this arises, that arises; if this ceases, that ceases. That is to say: conditioned by ignorance are formations . . . up to . . . conditioned by birth are old age and death; if ignorance ceases, formations cease . . . up to . . . if birth ceases, old age and death cease. Ānanda, this is how a monk knows causes and conditions.

The venerable Ānanda said, “World-honored One, this is how a monk knows causes and conditions. How does a monk know what is possible and what is impossible?”

The World-honored One replied:

Ānanda, a monk sees what is possible as possible and knows it as it really is; and he sees what is impossible as impossible and knows it as it really is.

724a      Ānanda, it is not possible for there to be two wheel-turning monarchs ruling in the world [at the same time]; [but] it is certainly possible for there to be one wheel-turning monarch ruling in the world.

Ānanda, it is not possible for there to be two tathāgatas in the world [at the same time]; [but] it is certainly possible for there to be one tathāgata in the world.

Ānanda, it is not possible for a person who has seen the truth to intentionally kill his father or mother, kill an arahant, cause a schism in the noble Sangha, or, out of an evil mental disposition toward the Buddha, cause the Tathāgata’s blood to flow; [but] it is certainly possible for an ordinary worldling to intentionally kill his father or mother, kill an arahant, cause a schism in the noble Sangha, or, out of an evil mental disposition toward the Buddha, cause the Tathāgata’s blood to flow.

Ānanda, it is not possible for a person who has seen the truth to intentionally violate the moral precepts, abandon the moral precepts, and stop [practicing] the path; [but] it is certainly possible for an ordinary worldling to intentionally violate the moral precepts, abandon the moral precepts, and stop [practicing] the path.<sup>451</sup>

It is [also] not possible for a person who has seen the truth to abandon this [dispensation of the Buddha] and seek a perfected one, a field of merit, outside of it; [but] it is certainly possible for an ordinary worldling to abandon this [dispensation of the Buddha] and seek a perfected one, a field of merit, outside of it.

Ānanda, it is not possible for a person who has seen the truth to declare to non-Buddhist renunciants and brahmins: “Venerable sirs, you see what can be seen and know what can be known”; [but] it is certainly possible for an ordinary worldling to declare to non-Buddhist renunciants and brahmins: “Venerable sirs, you see what can be seen and know what can be known.”

Ānanda, it is not possible for a person who has seen the truth to have faith in divination and to inquire about auspicious and inauspicious [omens]; [but] it is certainly possible for an ordinary worldling to have faith in divination and to inquire about auspicious and inauspicious [omens].

Ānanda, it is not possible for a person who has seen the truth to inquire from non-Buddhist renunciants or brahmin diviners concerning auspicious and inauspicious [omens], to see whether there is some [impending] suffering or trouble, or to see whether [something] is true; [but] it is certainly possible for an ordinary worldling to inquire from non-Buddhist renunciants or brahmin diviners concerning auspicious and inauspicious [omens], to see whether there is some [impending] suffering or trouble, or to see whether [something] is true.

Ānanda, it is not possible that a person who has seen the truth, on experiencing extreme pain, severe pain, pain that is not [at all] agreeable, not [at all] pleasurable, not [at all] wished for, unthinkable pain that is even life threatening, should abandon this and seek outside [the Buddha's dispensation] for some renunciant or brahmin who might know a spell consisting of one verse, [or] of two verses, three verses, four verses, many verses, [even] a spell consisting of a hundred-thousand verses, [thinking,] "This will free me from my suffering," [rather than] seeking [insight into] dukkha, the arising of dukkha, the path [leading to the cessation of] dukkha, and the cessation of dukkha; [but] it is certainly possible that an ordinary worldling [on similarly experiencing such pain] should abandon this and seek outside [the Buddha's dispensation] for some renunciant or brahmin who might know a spell consisting of one verse, [or] of two verses, three verses, four verses, many verses, [even] a spell consisting of a hundred thousand verses, [thinking,] "This will free me from my suffering," [rather than] seeking [insight into] dukkha, the arising of dukkha, the path [leading to the cessation of] dukkha, and the cessation of dukkha.<sup>452</sup>

Ānanda, it is not possible for a person who has seen the truth to experience [rebirth into] an eighth existence; [but] it is certainly possible for an ordinary worldling to experience [rebirth into] an eighth existence.<sup>453</sup>

Ānanda, it is not possible that, on account of evil conduct of body, speech, and mind, because of this, [one] should, when the body breaks up at death, proceed to a good destination, being reborn in a heavenly realm; [but] it is certainly possible that, on account of evil conduct of body, speech, and mind, because of this, [one] should, when the body breaks up at death, proceed to a bad destination, being reborn in a hellish realm.

724b

Ānanda, it is not possible that, on account of pure conduct of body, speech, and mind, because of this, [one] should, when the body breaks up at death, proceed to a bad destination, being reborn in a hellish realm; [but] it is certainly possible that, on account of pure conduct of body, speech, and mind, because of this, [one] should, when the body breaks up at death, proceed to a good destination, being reborn in a heavenly realm.

Ānanda, it is not possible that evil conduct of body, speech, and mind should have as its fruit the experience of pleasure; [but] it is certainly possible that evil conduct of body, speech, and mind should have as its fruit the experience of pain.

Ānanda, it is not possible that pure conduct of body, speech, and mind should have as its fruit the experience of pain; [but] it is certainly possible that pure conduct of body, speech, and mind should have as its fruit the experience of pleasure.

Ānanda, it is not possible to establish the mind properly in the four establishments of mindfulness if [one] has not overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom; [but] it is certainly possible to establish the mind properly in the four establishments of mindfulness if [one] has overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom.<sup>454</sup>

Ānanda, it is not possible to aspire to developing the seven factors of awakening if [one] has not overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom and has not properly established the mind in the four establishments of mindfulness; [but] it is certainly possible to develop the seven factors of awakening if [one] has overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom and has properly established the mind in the four establishments of mindfulness.

Ānanda, it is not possible to aspire to attaining unsurpassable and complete awakening if [one] has not overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom, has not properly established the mind in the four establishments of mindfulness, and has not developed the seven factors of awakening; [but] it is certainly possible to attain unsurpassable and complete awakening if [one] has overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom, has properly established the mind in the four establishments of mindfulness, and has developed the seven factors of awakening.

Ānanda, it is not possible to eradicate and make an end of dukkha if [one] has not overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom, has not properly established the mind in the four establishments of mindfulness, has not developed the seven factors of awakening, and has not attained unsurpassable and complete awakening; [but] it is certainly possible to eradicate and make an end of dukkha if [one] has overcome the five hindrances that defile the mind and weaken wisdom, has properly established the mind in the four establishments of mindfulness, has developed the seven factors of awakening, and has attained unsurpassable and complete awakening.

Ānanda, this is how a monk knows what is possible and what is impossible.

The venerable Ānanda said, “World-honored One, this is how a monk knows what is possible and what is impossible.”

Then the venerable Ānanda extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said, “World-honored One, what is the name of this discourse? How should we remember it?”

The World-honored One said:

Ānanda, you should remember this [discourse] as “Many Elements, “Dharma Elements,” “Elements of the Deathless,” “Many Drums,” “Dharma Drum,” “Drum of the Deathless,” “Mirror of the Dharma,” “Four Sections.” For this reason, call this discourse by the name “Many Elements.”<sup>2455</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Notes

Division 11

- <sup>1</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta, MN 82 at MN II 54; for a comparative study, see Bhikkhu Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2011), pp. 451–466.
- <sup>2</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta the parents try three times to convince the fasting Raṭṭhapāla before enlisting the help of his friends.
- <sup>3</sup> The Raṭṭhapāla-sutta does not mention an attempt to enlist yet another group of friends, although in relation to the first group it reports that these tried three times in succession to convince the fasting Raṭṭhapāla to change his mind.
- <sup>4</sup> The Raṭṭhapāla-sutta does not specify how much time had elapsed.
- <sup>5</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta the Buddha simply gives him permission, without any further instructions that he should rescue others.
- <sup>6</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta she informs the mother.
- <sup>7</sup> The Raṭṭhapāla-sutta reports no apology by the father. When Raṭṭhapāla refuses to come along to the house right away, as he has already had his meal, the father invites him for a meal the next day.
- <sup>8</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta it is the father who arranges a heap of the coins and invites Raṭṭhapāla to disrobe, and who tells his former wives to dress up.
- <sup>9</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta he does not announce his attainment of liberation. On hearing him address them as “sisters,” his former wives faint.
- <sup>10</sup> The Raṭṭhapāla-sutta does not report a departure by supernormal means.
- <sup>11</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta the king invites Raṭṭhapāla to sit on his elephant rug, which Raṭṭhapāla declines.
- <sup>12</sup> This first exchange has no counterpart in the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta, where the king directly takes up the topic of the four kinds of deterioration.
- <sup>13</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta the king mentions first old age and then disease.
- <sup>14</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 謂. Here and below, in the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta the rationale for going forth is the inability to acquire or increase wealth.

- <sup>15</sup> The text reads 欲, literally “desire,” which according to Akira Hirakawa, Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary (Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1997), p. 673, can also render abhipreta, “intended, accepted,” a nuance of meaning that fits the present context better.
- <sup>16</sup> The four maxims in the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta take up the basic themes that the world is unstable, offers no shelter, has nothing of its own, and is unsatisfactory.
- <sup>17</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta, where this is the second topic of discussion, the king only mentions the four parts of his army.
- <sup>18</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta the king does not mention karmic retribution.
- <sup>19</sup> In the Raṭṭhapāla-sutta the king replies that he will leave all his possessions behind and pass on according to his karma.
- <sup>20</sup> The Raṭṭhapāla-sutta ends with the last of Raṭṭhapāla’s verses and does not report the king’s delight.
- <sup>21</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Upāli-sutta, MN 56 at MN I 371; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 320–333.
- <sup>22</sup> 罰, literally “punishment,” corresponding to daṇḍa, which in the present context would have the sense of “restraint.”
- <sup>23</sup> The corresponding simile in the Upāli-sutta is the third and involves shaking a strainer.
- <sup>24</sup> The simile in the Upāli-sutta does not mention a man washing the elephant.
- <sup>25</sup> The corresponding argument in the Upāli-sutta is the second and involves a Jain who undertakes the fourfold restraint.
- <sup>26</sup> The corresponding argument in the Upāli-sutta is the first and involves a Jain who is sick.
- <sup>27</sup> The Upāli-sutta lists the Daṇḍaka, Kāliṅga, Mejjha, and Mātāṅga forests.
- <sup>28</sup> In the Upāli-sutta he replies right away and thus without remaining silent and without being pressed by the Buddha to reply.
- <sup>29</sup> In the Upāli-sutta his conversion takes place earlier, as he explains that he had already been convinced by the Buddha’s first argument and had continued just for the sake of having a discussion.
- <sup>30</sup> In the Upāli-sutta the Buddha advises him to reflect carefully (about his decision to convert).
- <sup>31</sup> The Upāli-sutta does not report the Buddha explicitly stating his position on how gifts should be given.
- <sup>32</sup> Here and below, the Upāli-sutta does not depict Nātaputta as needing to be reminded of what had been said earlier.

- <sup>33</sup> Here and below, in the Upāli-sutta Nātaputta states three times that it is impossible for Upāli to be converted by the Buddha.
- <sup>34</sup> Here and below, in the Upāli-sutta Dīghatāpassin does not suggest that Nātaputta should go and find out himself.
- <sup>35</sup> Adopting the variant 施 instead of 抱.
- <sup>36</sup> Such a remark and a reply by Upāli affirming his ownership of the seats is not found in the Upāli-sutta.
- <sup>37</sup> The text appears to involve a word play on akkha, which can mean “eye” as well as “myrobalan fruit.” In the Upāli-sutta this is the second simile used by Nātaputta; the first seems to involve a word play on aṇḍa, which can mean “egg” or “testicle.”
- <sup>38</sup> In the Upāli-sutta at this juncture Nātaputta refers to the Buddha’s converting magic, which in MĀ 133 comes after Upāli has delivered his simile of the monkey.
- <sup>39</sup> Here and below the dyer, whom the Upāli-sutta introduces by name, does not speak a verse.
- <sup>40</sup> The translation is based on emending 祠 to 祀.
- <sup>41</sup> Adopting the variant 歎 instead of 難. This stanza, apparently spoken by the reciters of the discourse, has no counterpart in the Upāli-sutta.
- <sup>42</sup> The Upāli-sutta does not report that Nātaputta died; that information is found only in the commentary, Ps III 100.
- <sup>43</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Sakkapañha-sutta, DN 21 at DN II 263.
- <sup>44</sup> Several of the verses in the Sakkapañha-sutta differ.
- <sup>45</sup> Adopting the variant 活 instead of 沽.
- <sup>46</sup> In the Sakkapañha-sutta she instead tells Sakka that it is not the time for him to visit the Buddha.
- <sup>47</sup> In the Sakkapañha-sutta Gopaka first rebukes them in prose. Several of the ensuing verses differ from those found in MĀ 134.
- <sup>48</sup> 非法, which usually renders adharmā. Yet if their practice had been adharmā, they would not have been reborn in any heaven; therefore the meaning “inappropriate” seems to fit the context better.
- <sup>49</sup> Adopting the variant 子 instead of 等.
- <sup>50</sup> On Vāsava (婆婆婆) as one of the many names of the ruler of the devas (along with Sakka, Kosiya, Indra, etc.), see Marcus Bingenheimer, Studies in Āgama Literature, With Special Reference to the Shorter Chinese Saṃyuktāgama (Taiwan: Shin Weng Feng Print Co., 2011), p. 194f.

- <sup>51</sup> The Sakkapañha-sutta traces thought back not to intention but to perceptions and notions (related to) conceptual proliferation.
- <sup>52</sup> The Sakkapañha-sutta does not mention the noble eightfold path at this juncture. Instead the Buddha expounds two types of joy, of sadness, and of equanimity, which are either to be pursued or not to be pursued—a topic taken up later in MĀ 134.
- <sup>53</sup> The corresponding section of the Sakkapañha-sutta discusses two kinds of bodily conduct, of verbal conduct, and of pursuits. Here and below, the Pāli version does not specify that the wholesome types of any of these should be done at the right time with mindfulness and comprehension.
- <sup>54</sup> In the Sakkapañha-sutta the previous discussion was on the topic of restraint by the code of rules, whereas the present one is concerned with restraint of the sense faculties.
- <sup>55</sup> In the Sakkapañha-sutta a corresponding exposition is given by Sakka, who has understood the matter on hearing the brief introductory remark by the Buddha.
- <sup>56</sup> No reference to the momentary nature of the path is found in the Sakkapañha-sutta.
- <sup>57</sup> In the Sakkapañha-sutta Sakka directly relates his past encounters with other recluses, without reporting a meeting in the Heaven of the Thirty-three, the devas' indulgence in sensuality, or distress arising from witnessing another deva passing away.
- <sup>58</sup> The translation is based on emending 曾 to 未曾. According to the original reading, the renunciant or brahmin affirms having “formerly,” 曾, met Sakka, which in the narrative context fails to make sense, since it is clearly the first time of such meeting.
- <sup>59</sup> No explanation of Sakka's name is given in the Sakkapañha-sutta.
- <sup>60</sup> A comparable set of verses (although with several differences) occurs later in the Sakkapañha-sutta; at the present juncture Sakka instead proclaims his attainment of stream-entry.
- <sup>61</sup> In the Sakkapañha-sutta such a question by the Buddha is preceded by Sakka proclaiming his stream-entry.
- <sup>62</sup> The Sakkapañha-sutta has a comparable description by Sakka only in verse, introduced by distinguishing six occasions for rejoicing.
- <sup>63</sup> The Sakkapañha-sutta does not report an inquiry by the Buddha regarding Sakka's attainment of stream-entry. Consequently, it also has no verse reply by Sakka to this inquiry.
- <sup>64</sup> Adopting a variant according to which “sentient beings” occurs only once.
- <sup>65</sup> The Sakkapañha-sutta does not report Sakka referring to Brahmā, nor does it have verses spoken by Brahmā.
- <sup>66</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Sigālaka-sutta (or Siṅgalovāda-sutta), DN 31 at DN III 180, which has the Squirrels' Sanctuary in the Bamboo Grove by Rājagaha as its location; for a comparative study, see Bhadanta Pannasiri, “Sigālovāda-Sutta,” Visva-Bharati Annals 3 (1950): 150–228.

- <sup>67</sup> In the Pāli version his name is Si(ṇ)gālaka.
- <sup>68</sup> The Sigālaka-sutta begins by describing his paying homage and has a reference to his father’s instruction only as part of Sigālaka’s reply to an inquiry by the Buddha.
- <sup>69</sup> In the Sigālaka-sutta the Buddha points out that this is not the way to pay respect to the six directions according to the discipline of the noble ones, without mentioning the prospect of being respected and having a good rebirth.
- <sup>70</sup> The six problems of gambling, which is the fourth topic in the Sigālaka-sutta, do not include uneasy sleep or the happiness of one’s enemies; instead it mentions the problems of loss of wealth and of not being wanted for marriage.
- <sup>71</sup> Here and below the text refers to 妻子, which can mean “wife and children” but also just “wife.” The context of subsequent occurrences makes it clear that the second of these two senses is appropriate here.
- <sup>72</sup> The verses in the Sigālaka-sutta show several differences, although touching on the same main themes.
- <sup>73</sup> The Sigālaka-sutta only has a verse summary after all four enemies in disguise have been expounded in prose.
- <sup>74</sup> The exposition of the four type of friends in the Sigālaka-sutta shows several differences.
- <sup>75</sup> The Sigālaka-sutta differs in identifying friends with the north and servants with the nadir. The exposition of each also shows several differences. Throughout, this exposition in the Sigālaka-sutta adopts the pattern of listing five qualities in each case, unlike MĀ 135, which has thirteen qualities for a wife and nine for servants.
- <sup>76</sup> The Sigālaka-sutta does not mention four ways of caring.
- <sup>77</sup> Adopting the variant 護無貢 instead of 獲無功.
- <sup>78</sup> The original speaks of only four parts, even though the ensuing verse mentions six.
- <sup>79</sup> In the Sigālaka-sutta the householder asks to be accepted as a lay disciple.
- <sup>80</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Valahassa-jātaka, Jā 196 at Jā II 127.
- <sup>81</sup> In the Valahassa-jātaka she had secretly gone out at night to eat some of the formerly caught merchants. The wise merchant noticed that her body was cold from having been secretly out at night and realized what was going on. The Pāli version has no counterpart to the ensuing tale in MĀ 136 of the wise merchant secretly visiting the place where the formerly caught merchants were kept imprisoned.
- <sup>82</sup> As in the previous discourse, 妻子 is just rendered “wife” or “wives.”

- <sup>83</sup> In the Valahassa-jātaka the wise merchant and half of the group who are willing to heed his words run away and happen to encounter the horse, which is identified as a former life of the Buddha. The horse carries the whole group to safety, so that here only those who did not heed the wise merchant's advice to escape are eventually devoured by the female yakkhas, once a new group of shipwrecked merchants has arrived.
- <sup>84</sup> Instead of functioning as an illustration of the not-self teaching, in the Valahassa-jātaka the tale serves as a warning to a monk who is infatuated by a woman.
- <sup>85</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Loka-sutta, AN 4.23 at AN II 23, found again in It 112 at It 121.
- <sup>86</sup> The Loka-sutta continues by proclaiming that the Tathāgata speaks as he acts and acts as he speaks; it does not have the comparison to a lion in its prose section, but only among the verses spoken by the Buddha. Although touching on similar themes, these verses show several differences from MĀ 137.
- <sup>87</sup> Adopting the variant 知 instead of 如.
- <sup>88</sup> Adopting the variant 有 instead of 真.
- <sup>89</sup> The verses in the Loka-sutta conclude on the theme of homage and have no counterpart to the ensuing verse in MĀ 137.
- <sup>90</sup> The Pāli parallel is the second part of the Pacalāyamāna-sutta, AN 7.58 at AN IV 88. (The PTS edition seems to have conflated two separate discourses, the Pacalāyamāna-sutta, AN 7.58 at AN IV 85 to 88, which corresponds to MĀ 83, and the second part AN IV 88 to 91, which is a parallel to the present discourse, MĀ 138.)
- <sup>91</sup> The (second part of the) Pacalāyamāna-sutta does state that lack of merits is dukkha.
- <sup>92</sup> The (second part of the) Pacalāyamāna-sutta does not give the name of the wheel-turning king and does not have a counterpart to the detailed description of his various possessions. Comparable descriptions can be found in the Mahāsudassana-sutta, DN 17 at DN II 187, and in the Gomaya-sutta, SN 22.96 at SN III 144.
- <sup>93</sup> The verses at the end of the Pacalāyamāna-sutta show several differences.
- <sup>94</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Jīvika-sutta, It 91 at It 89, an exposition also found in the latter part of the Pinḍolyaṃ-sutta, SN 22.80 at SN III 93.
- <sup>95</sup> The Jīvika-sutta and the Pinḍolyaṃ-sutta have no counterpart to this comparison, but only to the later comparison to a piece of wood from a cremation fire.
- <sup>96</sup> The Jīvika-sutta instead proclaims in verse that for such a one it would be better to swallow a burning iron ball instead of partaking of offerings without being restrained.
- <sup>97</sup> The Pāli parallels are a series of discourses in the repetition section of the Magga-saṃyutta, beginning at SN V 43, with the comparison to the elephant's footprint found in SN 45.140, to the roof peak in SN 45.141, to a type of root in SN 45.142, to sandalwood in SN 45.143, to jasmine in SN 45.144, to the wheel-turning king in SN 45.145, to the moon in SN 45.146, and to types of cloth in SN 45.148 (which unlike MĀ 141 reckons Kāsī cloth as supreme).

Division 12

- <sup>98</sup> The Pāli parallel for the first part of MĀ 142 is the Vassakāra-sutta, AN 7.20 at AN IV 17, and for the remainder of MĀ 142 the parallels are discourses AN 7.21 to AN 7.25 at AN IV 21; see also the Mahāparinibbāna-sutta, DN 16 at DN II 72.
- <sup>99</sup> In the Vassakāra-sutta the Buddha directly turns to Ānanda and addresses his entire exposition to him, only turning to Vassakāra at the end of his exposition of the seven principles of non-decline.
- <sup>100</sup> In the Vassakāra-sutta, where this principle occurs before the one concerned with not abducting women, the respect and esteem is given to elders.
- <sup>101</sup> The Vassakāra-sutta does not mention support with requisites.
- <sup>102</sup> The Vassakāra-sutta concludes at this point.
- <sup>103</sup> The ensuing exposition has a counterpart in AN 7.21 at AN IV 21; see also DN 16 at DN II 76.
- <sup>104</sup> AN 7.21 concludes at this point.
- <sup>105</sup> A list of seven types of respect as a factor preventing decline is also found in AN 7.56 at AN IV 84, although with the difference that all four assemblies should have such respect, not only the monks.
- <sup>106</sup> The ensuing exposition has a counterpart in AN 7.22 at AN IV 22; see also DN 16 at DN II 77.
- <sup>107</sup> The ensuing exposition has a counterpart in AN 7.23 at AN IV 22; see also DN 16 at DN II 78.
- <sup>108</sup> The ensuing exposition has a counterpart in AN 7.24 at AN IV 23; see also DN 16 at DN II 79.
- <sup>109</sup> The seven principles for settling a monastic dispute are discussed in more detail in MĀ 196 (in which case they are also found in the Pāli parallel, the Sāmagāma-sutta, MN 104 at MN II 247).
- <sup>110</sup> The ensuing exposition has a counterpart in DN 16 at DN II 80.
- <sup>111</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Saṅgārava-sutta, AN 3.60 at AN I 168.
- <sup>112</sup> In the Saṅgārava-sutta the Buddha replies by describing the arising of a tathāgata and his teaching others the path to liberation.
- <sup>113</sup> In the Saṅgārava-sutta the topic of their discussion is that formerly there were fewer monks but more of them performed supernormal feats. In reply the Buddha expounds the three types of miracles.

- <sup>114</sup> The miracle of instruction in the Saṅgārava-sutta consists only in instructions on how to think and give attention, and on what should be abandoned or established in the mind.
- <sup>115</sup> In relation to this and the following miracle in the Saṅgārava-sutta, Saṅgārava comments that they appear to him like magical tricks.
- <sup>116</sup> In the Saṅgārava-sutta the Buddha rather seems to censure him for having stated that he thinks the Buddha has the ability to perform these three miracles.
- <sup>117</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta, MN 107 at MN III 1; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 618–623.
- <sup>118</sup> The brahmin in the Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta does not mention horse and elephant trainers, although the Buddha in his reply refers to horse trainers.
- <sup>119</sup> The Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta instead speaks of observance of the monastic rules. It does not have a counterpart to the ensuing description in MĀ 144 of satipaṭṭhāna meditation.
- <sup>120</sup> After sense restraint, the Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta describes moderation with food and the practice of wakefulness, before turning to clear comprehension with bodily activities.
- <sup>121</sup> The Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta also mentions eating, drinking, consuming food, tasting, defecating, and urinating.
- <sup>122</sup> Here and below adopting the variant 耳 instead of 耶.
- <sup>123</sup> The simile of the sāla grove is not found in the Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta.
- <sup>124</sup> The Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta has three comparisons: black orris as the best of roots, sandalwood as the best of woods, and jasmine as the best of flower perfumes. In the Pāli version the brahmin then illustrates the nature of the exposition he has received with a standard set of similes that describe setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.
- <sup>125</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta, MN 108 at MN III 7; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 623–630.
- <sup>126</sup> Instead of mentioning the Vajjis, the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta reports that the king of Magadha was apprehensive of King Pajjota.
- <sup>127</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 欲.
- <sup>128</sup> In the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta Ānanda replies that there is not a single monk equal to the Buddha.
- <sup>129</sup> The translation follows an emendation in the CBETA edition. The original speaks of gathering in “two” places, which in the present context does not make sense.
- <sup>130</sup> The Gopakamoggallāna-sutta does not mention the giving of a talk on the Dharma.

- <sup>131</sup> Following these first two qualities, the remainder of the list of ten qualities in the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta is rather different, with the two versions agreeing only on contentment and the destruction of the taints. Six qualities mentioned only in the Pāli version are attaining the four absorptions and each of the five higher knowledges.
- <sup>132</sup> Although the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta does mention contentment, which is its third quality, it does not illustrate this with the simile of a bird taking along just its two wings (a simile found elsewhere also among Pāli discourses).
- <sup>133</sup> Instead of an exclamation by the assembled crowd, the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta reports a remark made by Vassakāra to the general Upananda on the appropriateness of respecting a monk endowed with the ten qualities listed earlier.
- <sup>134</sup> Adopting the variant 整 instead of 政.
- <sup>135</sup> The Gopakamoggallāna-sutta does not mention the absence of insect pests. Instead of referring to the Buddha's commending of the Squirrel's Sanctuary, it reports that Ānanda acknowledged the protection of the Squirrel's Sanctuary afforded by Vassakāra.
- <sup>136</sup> The Gopakamoggallāna-sutta does not report this remark by the general Upananda.
- <sup>137</sup> The location mentioned in the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta by Vassakāra is the Kūṭagāra in the Mahāvana by Vesālī.
- <sup>138</sup> The term employed in the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta is jhāna, which here clearly stands for meditation in general, not for the recognized stages of concentrative absorption.
- <sup>139</sup> The supplementation is guided by the fact that the text lacks a reference to the hindrance of restlessness-and-worry, which, besides being mentioned in the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta, MN III 14, is clearly required by the context.
- <sup>140</sup> Here and below, the original speaks of "fourth" or "four," which is related to the error mentioned in the previous footnote and may have been due to influence from the correct occurrence of "four" in the next exposition on praiseworthy application of the mind, which is the four absorptions.
- <sup>141</sup> Adopting the variant 憎 instead of 增.
- <sup>142</sup> In the Gopakamoggallāna-sutta he clarifies that he has already replied to the question (which in the Pāli version he does before Vassakāra's arrival). The Gopakamoggallāna-sutta concludes here, so it has no counterpart for the next question and the meal offering reported in MĀ 145.
- <sup>143</sup> Adopting the variant 二 instead of 三.
- <sup>144</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta, MN 27 at MN I 175; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 189–192.
- <sup>145</sup> The Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta does not report Pilotika's visit to the Buddha, beginning instead with his meeting with Jāṇussoṇi, which takes place at midday.

- <sup>146</sup> Adopting the variant 誦 instead of 讀. The Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta does not mention for what purpose Jāṇussoṇi was driving out of Sāvatthī.
- <sup>147</sup> The Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta has no reference to four principles found in the sacred texts.
- <sup>148</sup> Here and below, in the Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta they even become the Buddha's disciples.
- <sup>149</sup> In the Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta he speaks of this, along with the other three reasons, as a "footprint."
- <sup>150</sup> Abstention from alcohol is not explicitly mentioned in the Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta.
- <sup>151</sup> The Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta additionally mentions abstention from accepting raw meat, from going on messages, from buying and selling, from cheating with false weights and measures, etc., from accepting bribes and fraud, and from murder, brigandage, and violence.
- <sup>152</sup> Adopting the variant 掘 instead of 屈.
- <sup>153</sup> According to the Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta, this is a footprint of the Tathāgata.
- <sup>154</sup> The Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta describes attainment of all three higher knowledges, including recollection of past lives and the divine eye.
- <sup>155</sup> In the Cūḷahatthipadopama-sutta he illustrates the nature of the exposition he has received with a standard set of similes: setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.
- <sup>156</sup> This set of verses has a parallel in the otherwise different Sumanā-sutta, AN 5.31 at AN III 34.
- <sup>157</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Khattiya-sutta, AN 6.52 at AN III 362.
- <sup>158</sup> According to the Khattiya-sutta, warriors have strength (bala) as their support, they rely on territory (paṭhavī), and their end (or final goal) is sovereignty (issariya).
- <sup>159</sup> In relation to renunciants, the Khattiya-sutta mentions patience and mildness instead of truth, and nothingness instead of secluded places.
- <sup>160</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Esukārī-sutta, MN 96 at MN II 177, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvatthī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 563–566.
- <sup>161</sup> In the Esukārī-sutta the Buddha instead queries if the whole world had authorized the brahmins to prescribe these four types of services.
- <sup>162</sup> The translation follows an emendation of 直 to 值, suggested in the Foguang edition of MĀ 150.
- <sup>163</sup> A comparable exposition by the Buddha in the Esukārī-sutta does not take the form of a question-and-answer exchange.

- <sup>164</sup> In the Esukāri-sutta the Buddha points out that even someone having a high social position or endowed with much wealth can commit unwholesome conduct.
- <sup>165</sup> Instead of inability to watch over cows, the Esukāri-sutta speaks of taking something by theft.
- <sup>166</sup> The Esukāri-sutta instead mentions sickle and carrying pole for the case of the worker.
- <sup>167</sup> As in relation to the previous topic, here again the Buddha in the Esukāri-sutta instead queries if the whole world had authorized the brahmins to prescribe these four types of property or wealth.
- <sup>168</sup> In the Esukāri-sutta the Buddha just mentions the noble supramundane Dharma, followed by comparing the four castes to fires that burn in dependence on different materials and noting that members of all four castes can go forth under him and become accomplished in the Dharma.
- <sup>169</sup> The topic of being affected by empty space is not covered in the Esukāri-sutta.
- <sup>170</sup> In the Esukāri-sutta the simile of being able to wash oneself clean does not involve a hundred types of people, which in the Pāli version are only mentioned in the simile about the ability to make a fire.
- <sup>171</sup> This additional query about employing different fuel to feed the fire is not found in the Esukāri-sutta.
- <sup>172</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Assalāyana-sutta, MN 93 at MN II 147; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 549–556.
- <sup>173</sup> The Assalāyana-sutta does not report the brahmins' claims to superiority, but only their wish to dispute the Buddha's proclamation of purification for all four castes.
- <sup>174</sup> The Assalāyana-sutta speaks of only three Vedas.
- <sup>175</sup> In the Assalāyana-sutta he agrees only after they have made their request three times.
- <sup>176</sup> In the Assalāyana-sutta, before referring to the two-class society in Yona and Kamboja, the Buddha points out that brahmin women are seen to become pregnant, which contradicts the claim that brahmins are born from Brahmā's mouth.
- <sup>177</sup> In the Assalāyana-sutta the Buddha does not draw out the implications of the example of the two-class society in this way. Instead, here and below after other arguments, he questions what then constitutes the basis for the brahmins' claim to superiority.
- <sup>178</sup> Here and below, the Assalāyana-sutta contains no acknowledgement of the Buddha's ability in swiftly coming out with a simile.
- <sup>179</sup> The topic of being affected by empty space is not covered in the Assalāyana-sutta.
- <sup>180</sup> In the Assalāyana-sutta the Buddha, before referring to the ability to practice loving-kindness, makes two arguments based on both retribution for evil and reward for restraint being independent of one's caste.

- <sup>181</sup> The simile of being able to wash oneself in the Assalāyana-sutta does not involve a hundred types of people, which in the Pāli version are only mentioned in the simile about the ability to make a fire.
- <sup>182</sup> This additional argument related to classifying fires according to the fuel used to feed them is not found in the Assalāyana-sutta.
- <sup>183</sup> Before coming to the tale of the seers of the past, the Assalāyana-sutta has a simile involving brothers, found later in MĀ 151.
- <sup>184</sup> Adopting the variant 屨 instead of 變.
- <sup>185</sup> In the Assalāyana-sutta he also speaks, asking where the brahmin seers have gone.
- <sup>186</sup> Instead of inquiring about the identity of their unexpected visitor, in the Assalāyana-sutta they think that their asceticism is in vain, whereupon Asita tells them that this is not the case and that they should let go of their hatred toward him.
- <sup>187</sup> In the Assalāyana-sutta they are instead not sure that their mothers only cohabited with a brahmin.
- <sup>188</sup> Asita's question in the Assalāyana-sutta is just about the caste of the one to be born.
- <sup>189</sup> Instead of referring to their clothing, in the Assalāyana-sutta the Buddha remarks that Assalāyana and his teachers are not even fit to be the spoon-holder of those seers.
- <sup>190</sup> The corresponding simile in the Assalāyana-sutta (found before the tale of the seers) speaks of two brothers only.
- <sup>191</sup> Instead of Assalāyana being prevented from paying respect, the Assalāyana-sutta describes his sitting in silent embarrassment at this point. It does not report that Assalāyana received an additional teaching on the Dharma from the Buddha or that he was later rebuked by the other brahmins for not standing his ground in debate.
- <sup>192</sup> The reference appears to involve a word play on akkha, translated here as 眼, which can mean “eye” as well as “myrobalan fruit.”
- <sup>193</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Subha-sutta, MN 99 at MN II 196, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvattthī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 572–579.
- <sup>194</sup> 鸚鵡, “parrot,” corresponding to Suka, which must go back to an original that differs from the name of this brahmin in the Pāli parallel, which is instead Subha.
- <sup>195</sup> The Subha-sutta does not describe the Buddha's dignified appearance or compare it to the moon.
- <sup>196</sup> In the Subha-sutta the Buddha on his own announces that he will give an analytical exposition, vibhajjavāda, without being asked to do so by his visitor.
- <sup>197</sup> Here and below, the Subha-sutta does not provide a contrast to one-sided truth claims.

- <sup>198</sup> The text here uses the expression 熱行, but recapitulations of the list of five principles later in MĀ 152 instead speak of 行施, “practice of generosity,” which judging from the context must be the correct sense in the present passage as well; see also Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 576, n. 238. In fact, the Subha-sutta names the same five principles, including generosity, differing only in the sequence of listing them.
- <sup>199</sup> Here and below, the Subha-sutta does not record a rebuttal by the young brahmin until after the Buddha has delivered the simile of the blind people, who in the Pāli version are not specified as children.
- <sup>200</sup> In the Subha-sutta the Buddha queries if these brahmins should not better make statements that accord with conventions, that are made thoughtfully, after reflection, and that are beneficial.
- <sup>201</sup> The Subha-sutta instead lists the five hindrances.
- <sup>202</sup> Adopting the variant 倚 instead of 猗.
- <sup>203</sup> In the Subha-sutta the Buddha illustrates this type of pleasure with the example of the first and second absorptions. He then inquires which of the five principles declared earlier by his visitor is reckoned most fruitful by the brahmins, which receives the reply that this is generosity. This then provides the background for the ensuing description by the Buddha of a brahminical sacrifice, also found in MĀ 152.
- <sup>204</sup> In the simile in the Subha-sutta those who come to the sacrifice are also brahmins.
- <sup>205</sup> In the Subha-sutta the Buddha reckons the five principles to be equipments of the mind for cultivating a mind free from anger and ill will.
- <sup>206</sup> At this juncture in the Subha-sutta the brahmin inquires about the path to Brahmā, and it is in reply to this inquiry that the Buddha, after illustrating his knowledge of the path to Brahmā with the example of someone who knows the way to his home village, teaches the brahmavihāras.
- <sup>207</sup> In the Subha-sutta the young brahmin expresses his appreciation and leaves. Thus the Subha-sutta has no counterpart to the ensuing discussion on aspiration for rebirth as a deva; instead it continues by reporting that the young brahmin met the brahmin Jāpussoṇi, to whom he expressed his favorable impression of the Buddha.
- <sup>208</sup> This inquiry and the simile by the Buddha occur earlier in the Subha-sutta, before the Buddha teaches the brahmavihāras as the path to Brahmā.
- <sup>209</sup> The Subha-sutta does not report that the young brahmin took refuge.
- <sup>210</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Māgandiya-sutta, MN 75 at MN I 501; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 407–413.
- <sup>211</sup> The Māgandiya-sutta does not describe the manner of lying down.

- <sup>212</sup> The Māgandiya-sutta does not refer to the Buddha's dignified appearance or compare it to the moon.
- <sup>213</sup> According to the Māgandiya-sutta, he was so surprised that his hair stood on end.
- <sup>214</sup> The corresponding inquiry in the Māgandiya-sutta just takes up the case of being oneself free from the former attraction of sense objects, without bringing in the seeing of another who is under the influence of such attraction.
- <sup>215</sup> In the Māgandiya-sutta the Buddha directly relates his own experiences.
- <sup>216</sup> The Māgandiya-sutta describes three palaces in which the Buddha-to-be enjoyed himself in the company of females.
- <sup>217</sup> In the Māgandiya-sutta he only states that heavenly sensual pleasures are more sublime, without qualifying human sensual pleasures as foul and impure.
- <sup>218</sup> The sequence of similes in the Māgandiya-sutta differs, as here the first two similes are about a healed leper who does envy another leper cauterizing his wounds and who resists being dragged close to a fire. Third comes the simile that corresponds to the present passage, followed by the simile of a king who partakes of sensual pleasures.
- <sup>219</sup> Adopting the variant 慍 instead of 惛.
- <sup>220</sup> In the Māgandiya-sutta this first instance of the verse spoken by the Buddha already comes with a reference to the eightfold path.
- <sup>221</sup> In the Māgandiya-sutta he adds that he is now healthy and happy, without afflictions.
- <sup>222</sup> Adopting the variant 往 instead of 住.
- <sup>223</sup> The Māgandiya-sutta has no remark on foolish heterodox practitioners.
- <sup>224</sup> In the Māgandiya-sutta a teaching on the dependent arising of dukkha, based on clinging, is found only later.
- <sup>225</sup> In the corresponding simile in the Māgandiya-sutta a doctor unsuccessfully tries to heal the blind person.
- <sup>226</sup> The Māgandiya-sutta does not mention giving proper attention and thus recommends only three practices.
- <sup>227</sup> Instead of an exposition of the four truths, in the Māgandiya-sutta the Buddha teaches the dependent arising of dukkha based on clinging, etc.
- <sup>228</sup> The Māgandiya-sutta does not report his stream-entry.
- <sup>229</sup> In the Māgandiya-sutta the Buddha first explains that those who come from other traditions need to go through a probation period of four months. Māgandiya then states he is willing to accept being on probation even for four years.
- <sup>230</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Aggañña-sutta, DN 27 at DN III 80; for a comparative study see Konrad Meisig, Das Sūtra von den vier Ständen, Das Aggañña-Sutta im Licht seiner chinesischen Parallelen (Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1988).

- <sup>231</sup> In the Aggañña-sutta they have not yet received full ordination.
- <sup>232</sup> In the Aggañña-sutta the abuse by other brahmins occurs only as a part of Vāseṭṭha's report to the Buddha.
- <sup>233</sup> Adopting the variant 困 instead of 自.
- <sup>234</sup> The Aggañña-sutta does not report such an evaluation of the position taken by the brahmins; instead the Buddha points out that brahmin women are seen to become pregnant, an argument similar to the one found later in MĀ 154.
- <sup>235</sup> A statement that the Buddha does not talk about superiority of birth, etc., and a contrast to those who are getting married, is not made in the Aggañña-sutta.
- <sup>236</sup> A comparable exposition in the Aggañña-sutta deals with all four castes. It also differs, here and below, in not taking the form of a question-and-answer exchange.
- <sup>237</sup> In the PTS edition of the Aggañña-sutta the king does think that the Buddha is superior to him in terms of being well-born, having strength, being good-looking, and being influential.
- <sup>238</sup> After the topic of Pasenadi's respect, in the Aggañña-sutta the Buddha presents those gone forth under him as his children in the Dharma, born of his mouth, etc.
- <sup>239</sup> Here and below, the translation is based on emending 不 to 亦; cf. Meisig, Das Sūtra von den vier Ständen, p. 113, n. 1. For the same formulation in relation to the creeper see the parallel T. 10 at T. I:219a.
- <sup>240</sup> Adopting the variant 機 instead of 襍.
- <sup>241</sup> Adopting a variant without 事.
- <sup>242</sup> In the Aggañña-sutta the thief does not complain about being beaten.
- <sup>243</sup> See T. W. Rhys Davids and William Stede, Pali-English Dictionary (1921) (Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1993), p. 487a, s.v. bāheti 1; also K. R. Norman, A Philological Approach to Buddhism: The Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai Lectures, 1994 (London: School of Oriental and African Studies, 1997), p. 160.
- <sup>244</sup> The Aggañña-sutta just states that they were unable to meditate.
- <sup>245</sup> The Aggañña-sutta instead introduces the fourth caste of the workers, and then discusses renunciants from any of the four castes.
- <sup>246</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Velāma-sutta, AN 9.20 at AN IV 392.
- <sup>247</sup> The Velāma-sutta instead refers to him by his well-known name Anāthapiṇḍika.
- <sup>248</sup> Here and below the Velāma-sutta also mentions that one's family and servants will not listen to one (or in the case of giving carefully, they will listen to one).

- <sup>249</sup> In the Velāma-sutta the exposition takes up giving either coarse or excellent food together, so that it only distinguishes between giving carelessly, etc., and giving carefully, etc.
- <sup>250</sup> In the Velāma-sutta at this point the Buddha explains that he was Velāma in a past life.
- <sup>251</sup> The Velāma-sutta does not mention giving to all worldlings in Jambudīpa.
- <sup>252</sup> Before referring to the construction of a monastery, the Velāma-sutta mentions an offering given to the Sangha with the Buddha at its head.
- <sup>253</sup> The Velāma-sutta only mentions perception of impermanence, cultivated for the time it takes to snap a finger.
- <sup>254</sup> The identification as a past life of the Buddha occurs earlier in the Velāma-sutta, which concludes after the recommendation of perception of impermanence and thus has no counterpart to the final section in MĀ 155.
- <sup>255</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Brahmaṇadhammika-sutta, Sn 2.7 at Sn 284 to 315.
- <sup>256</sup> The verses in the Brahmaṇadhammika-sutta show several differences.
- <sup>257</sup> Adopting the variant 去 instead of 法.
- <sup>258</sup> Adopting the variant 牛 instead of 馬.
- <sup>259</sup> Adopting the variant 老 instead of 者.
- <sup>260</sup> In the Brahmaṇadhammika-sutta they illustrate the nature of the exposition received with a standard set of similes that describe setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.
- <sup>261</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Verañjā-sutta, AN 8.11 at AN IV 172, which has the base of a particular tree in Verañjā as its location.
- <sup>262</sup> A reference to flavors, which seems to have been lost in the original, is clearly required by the context and also found in the Verañjā-sutta.
- <sup>263</sup> After the accusation of lacking taste, the Verañjā-sutta continues with seven other accusations by the brahmin, each of which the Buddha takes up and reinterprets in such a way that it expresses his realization of awakening. None of these seven corresponds to the present reference to fear; the last one in the Pāli list, apagabbho, corresponds to the third and last accusation in MĀ 157 of not entering a womb.
- <sup>264</sup> The Verañjā-sutta does not describe the preparation of the seat of awakening or the resolve not to change posture until awakening had been reached.
- <sup>265</sup> No reference to the Buddha's teaching activity is found in the Verañjā-sutta.
- <sup>266</sup> In the Verañjā-sutta he states only that the Buddha is the eldest and foremost.
- <sup>267</sup> In the Verañjā-sutta he illustrates the nature of the exposition received with a standard set of similes that describe setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.

- <sup>268</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Doṇa-sutta, AN 5.192 at AN III 223.
- <sup>269</sup> The Doṇa-sutta instead reports Doṇa complaining that the Buddha does not respect elder brahmins.
- <sup>270</sup> The Doṇa-sutta speaks only of three Vedas.
- <sup>271</sup> Here and below, the list of possible occupations is shorter in the Doṇa-sutta, which, for example, does not mention writing.
- <sup>272</sup> The Doṇa-sutta mentions going forth, after giving wealth to the teacher and before the practice of the brahmavihāras.
- <sup>273</sup> The Doṇa-sutta instead describes getting married and subsequently going forth and cultivating the four absorptions.
- <sup>274</sup> Adopting the variant 淫 instead of 婬.
- <sup>275</sup> In the Doṇa-sutta the overstepping of boundaries comes through engaging in sex for sensual pleasure with any type of wife, even one who is pregnant or nursing.
- <sup>276</sup> In the Doṇa-sutta the outcaste brahmin not only takes up various kinds of employment, but also seeks wealth for his teacher by means some of which are in accordance with the Dharma and some contrary to it. He also has intercourse with any type of wife, even with ones who are pregnant or nursing.
- <sup>277</sup> In the Doṇa-sutta the Buddha, before asking this question, refers again to the ancient seers as the source of the fivefold classification of brahmins.
- <sup>278</sup> In the Doṇa-sutta he illustrates the nature of the exposition received with a standard set of similes that describe setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.
- <sup>279</sup> A part of MĀ 160 has a Pāli parallel in the Araka-sutta, AN 7.70 at AN IV 136.
- <sup>280</sup> The Araka-sutta does not mention the monks' discussion, life conditions in the past, a former king, and Araka's going forth. It begins with the Buddha briefly introducing Araka as a teacher who was free of sensual desire, then goes on to Araka's teachings on the brevity of human life.
- <sup>281</sup> The Araka-sutta speaks of a line drawn on the surface of water with a stick.
- <sup>282</sup> Adopting the variant 盂 instead of 杓.
- <sup>283</sup> This simile has no counterpart in the Araka-sutta.
- <sup>284</sup> The Araka-sutta, where this is the sixth simile, speaks of a piece of meat thrown into an iron pan heated all day.
- <sup>285</sup> This simile has no counterpart in the Araka-sutta.
- <sup>286</sup> This simile has no counterpart in the Araka-sutta.

- <sup>287</sup> Adopting the variant 暴長 instead of 瀑湜.
- <sup>288</sup> Adopting the variant 駛 instead of 駛. The image of a quickly flowing river is the fourth simile in the Araka-sutta.
- <sup>289</sup> This simile has no counterpart in the Araka-sutta.
- <sup>290</sup> After the similes, in the Araka-sutta the Buddha contrasts the long life span at the time of Araka to the life span at present, and then divides this into fortnights, days and nights, and meals, more or less as in MĀ 160. The Araka-sutta does not mention Araka's removal of the hindrances and cultivation of the brahmavihāras or the rebirths achieved by his disciples; nor does it identify Araka as a past life of the Buddha.
- <sup>291</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Brahmāyu-sutta, MN 91 at MN II 133; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 527–545.
- <sup>292</sup> The Brahmāyu-sutta, which has a similar description for Brahmāyu himself, speaks only of three Vedas.
- <sup>293</sup> The Brahmāyu-sutta does not report that Brahmāyu had heard that the Buddha was endowed with the thirty-two marks.
- <sup>294</sup> Adopting a variant without 世.
- <sup>295</sup> In the Brahmāyu-sutta Uttara inquires how he should verify the Buddha's accomplishment. In reply to this inquiry, Brahmāyu speaks of the thirty-two marks and the two destinies open to those who are endowed with these marks.
- <sup>296</sup> In the Brahmāyu-sutta he observes the Buddha for seven months. The Pāli version does not report that he took leave after that from the Buddha.
- <sup>297</sup> Adopting the variant 平 instead of 牙.
- <sup>298</sup> After reporting on the thirty-two marks, in the Brahmāyu-sutta Uttara does not depict the comprehensiveness of his observation, but right away describes the Buddha's behavior, starting with how the Buddha walked. This description shows some variations in details compared to MĀ 161.
- <sup>299</sup> Adopting the variant 飯 instead of 飲.
- <sup>300</sup> Adopting the variant 暫 instead of 慚.
- <sup>301</sup> The Brahmāyu-sutta does not report Uttara's wish to go forth under the Buddha or this being granted. Instead it depicts Brahmāyu expressing his reverence for the Buddha after having heard Uttara's report.
- <sup>302</sup> In the Brahmāyu-sutta Brahmāyu sends someone to announce his visit as a matter of propriety, not because he feels intimidated.
- <sup>303</sup> In the Brahmāyu-sutta the Buddha simply gives his permission, without expressing a wish for the well-being of the visitor or others.

- <sup>304</sup> In the Brahmāyu-sutta the Buddha continues right away with the next stanza granting Brahmāyu permission to ask a question.
- <sup>305</sup> The inquiry in the Brahmāyu-sutta takes up more epithets of a liberated one.
- <sup>306</sup> Adopting the variant 行 instead of 正.
- <sup>307</sup> Adopting the variant 訖 instead of 說.
- <sup>308</sup> In the Brahmāyu-sutta he even goes so far as to kiss the Buddha's feet.
- <sup>309</sup> The Brahmāyu-sutta does not report the crowd specifying the qualities in which Brahmāyu was foremost among brahmins of Mithilā.
- <sup>310</sup> In the Brahmāyu-sutta he illustrates the nature of the exposition received with a standard set of similes that describe setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.
- <sup>311</sup> The Brahmāyu-sutta does not report the blessing given by the Buddha after the meal; according to its presentation, Brahmāyu offered food for a whole week.
- <sup>312</sup> The translation is based on emending 生彼 to read 生(於)彼間, the formulation usually employed in the Madhyama-āgama to describe the rebirth of a nonreturner.

Division 13

- <sup>313</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta, MN 140 at MN III 237; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 797–802.
- <sup>314</sup> In the Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta the Buddha also asks Pukkusāti where his teacher is dwelling at present.
- <sup>315</sup> The Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta does not refer to the sublime nature of the Dharma or the purity of the holy life.
- <sup>316</sup> According to the corresponding passage in the Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta, one established in the four foundations is not overwhelmed by conceiving and is reckoned a sage at peace.
- <sup>317</sup> The Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta lists the six contacts by way of the respective sense organ, without mentioning their objects.
- <sup>318</sup> The text refers to the brain stem, 腦膜, with brain marrow as a variant, 腦髓. Since both are out of place in a list of bodily parts that belong to the water element, the compound has been emended to brain fluid, on the supposition that 腦膜 is an error for 腦液 or some equivalent term.
- <sup>319</sup> The Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta lists only happy, painful, and neutral experiences.
- <sup>320</sup> The Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta continues by describing how in this way liberation is attained.
- <sup>321</sup> Before turning to feelings that are limited to the body, the Dhātuvibhaṅga-sutta discusses the detached experience of happy, painful, and neutral feelings by one who knows their impermanent and unsatisfactory nature.

- <sup>322</sup> Adopting the variant 設若 instead of 說施若.
- <sup>323</sup> The Dhātuviḥaṅga-sutta instead qualifies these various ideas as something “conceived,” maññita, concluding that all such conceivings are a disease, a tumor, and a barb.
- <sup>324</sup> In the Dhātuviḥaṅga-sutta the result of going beyond conceivings is that the sage, who is at peace, is not born, does not grow old, does not die, is not shaken or agitated.
- <sup>325</sup> The corresponding section in the Dhātuviḥaṅga-sutta does not mention Pukkusāti’s attainment of stream-entry, although in its concluding part the Buddha states that Pukkusāti passed away as a nonreturner.
- <sup>326</sup> The Dhātuviḥaṅga-sutta continues by narrating that Pukkusāti requested full ordination from the Buddha, which he could not receive as his bowl and robes were not complete. Searching for the missing requisites, he was accidentally killed by a cow. The monks reported this to the Buddha, who told them that Pukkusāti passed away as a nonreturner.
- <sup>327</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta, MN 137 at MN III 215; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 781–787.
- <sup>328</sup> The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta does not refer to the sublime nature of the Dharma or the purity of the holy life.
- <sup>329</sup> The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta lists the six internal sense spheres, the six external sense spheres, the six types of consciousness, and the six types of contact.
- <sup>330</sup> The text reads 刀, literally “knife,” which appears to be a translation error that confuses satta (Skt. sattva) with sattha (Skt. śāstra). The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta speaks of thirty-two “positions of beings,” sattapadā. In order to render 刀 in a way that makes some sense, the translation follows the indication in Hirakawa, Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary, p. 182, that 刀 can render āyudha, “weapon” or “implement.”
- <sup>331</sup> The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta lists only the contacts, without their objects.
- <sup>332</sup> The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta differs in speaking of joy related to “the household life,” gehasita, instead of related to “attachment.” It also differs in first working through all six senses in relation to the first of these two aspects before turning to sense experience related to renunciation or dispassion.
- <sup>333</sup> The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta qualifies such equanimity as transcending its object.
- <sup>334</sup> The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta rather recommends overcoming sadness with joy (both of course being of the type related to renunciation).
- <sup>335</sup> The Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta recommends relying on nonidentification, atammayatā, to abandon and go beyond unified equanimity.
- <sup>336</sup> This part is without a counterpart in the Salāyatanaviḥaṅga-sutta. The situation of teaching four disciples has a parallel in the Mahāsīhanāda-sutta, MN 12 at MN I 82.

- <sup>337</sup> According to the Saḷāyatanaṭṭhapaṇṇāsa-sutta, the Buddha is not satisfied because of this.
- <sup>338</sup> According to the Saḷāyatanaṭṭhapaṇṇāsa-sutta, the Buddha is satisfied because of this. Another difference is that in the Pāli version this is the third of the three establishments of mindfulness.
- <sup>339</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Uddesavibhaṅga-sutta, MN 138 at MN III 223; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 787–793.
- <sup>340</sup> The Uddesavibhaṅga-sutta does not refer to the sublime nature of the Dharma or the purity of the holy life.
- <sup>341</sup> Here and below, the translation is based on emending 不受 to 受, which is clearly the reading required by the context.
- <sup>342</sup> The Uddesavibhaṅga-sutta instead contrasts consciousness distracted externally to its being stuck internally.
- <sup>343</sup> Here and below, the Uddesavibhaṅga-sutta does not discuss the immaterial attainments.
- <sup>344</sup> The Uddesavibhaṅga-sutta instead brings in the four modes of construing a sense of self in regard to each aggregate. It also differs inasmuch as the one who experiences agitation is the unlearned worldling.
- <sup>345</sup> In the Uddesavibhaṅga-sutta the Buddha states that he would have explained it in the same way.
- <sup>346</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahākaccānabhaddekaratta-sutta, MN 133 at MN III 192, which has the Tapodārāma in Rājagaha as its location; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 760–763, and Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 421–448.
- <sup>347</sup> In the Mahākaccānabhaddekaratta-sutta the deva asks if Samiddhi knows the summary and analysis on an auspicious night, and afterward asks him again if he knows the verses on an auspicious night.
- <sup>348</sup> In the Pāli version the deva states that these verses are beneficial and important for the holy life, after which it disappears. It does not have Samiddhi's question about who knows the verses, as well as the deva's reply.
- <sup>349</sup> In the Mahākaccānabhaddekaratta-sutta Samiddhi does not report the meeting he had with the deva and the Buddha does not inform him of the deva's name. Instead Samiddhi directly asks about the verses and the Buddha replies by uttering them.
- <sup>350</sup> From here onward the verses in the Mahākaccānabhaddekaratta-sutta show several differences.
- <sup>351</sup> Adopting the variant reading 作 instead of 學.

- <sup>352</sup> The qualification of the senses as “really existing,” 實有, is not made in the Mahākaccānabhaddekaratta-sutta.
- <sup>353</sup> In the Mahākaccānabhaddekaratta-sutta the Buddha states that he would have explained it in the same way.
- <sup>354</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekaratta-sutta, MN 134 at MN III 199; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 763–767.
- <sup>355</sup> In the Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekaratta-sutta the deva asks if Lomasakaṅgiya knows the summary and analysis on an auspicious night, and afterward asks him again if he knows the verses on an auspicious night.
- <sup>356</sup> According to the Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekaratta-sutta, the Buddha had taught the verses during a visit to the Heaven of the Thirty-three.
- <sup>357</sup> From here onward the verses in the Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekaratta-sutta show several differences.
- <sup>358</sup> The Pāli version lacks Lomasakaṅgiya’s question about who knows the meaning of the verses, and also the deva’s reply.
- <sup>359</sup> In the Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekaratta-sutta he approaches the Buddha the next morning.
- <sup>360</sup> The Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekaratta-sutta instead discusses the twenty modes of construing a sense of self: identifying any one of the five aggregates as self, postulating the self as the owner of the aggregate, assuming the aggregate to exist within the self, or locating the self within the aggregate.
- <sup>361</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Ānandabhaddekaratta-sutta, MN 132 at MN III 189; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 755–759.
- <sup>362</sup> In the Ānandabhaddekaratta-sutta the Buddha joins the monks, is told about the exposition given by Ānanda, and then asks Ānanda to repeat it.
- <sup>363</sup> From here onward the verses in the Ānandabhaddekaratta-sutta show several differences.
- <sup>364</sup> Instead of a question and answer exchange between the Buddha and Ānanda, in the Ānandabhaddekaratta-sutta all questions and explanations are given by Ānanda. Once he has completed his exposition, the Buddha approvingly repeats it all.
- <sup>365</sup> The Ānandabhaddekaratta-sutta instead discusses the twenty modes of construing a sense of self: identifying any one of the five aggregates as self, postulating the self as the owner of the aggregate, assuming the aggregate to exist within the self, or locating the self within the aggregate.
- <sup>366</sup> For MĀ 168, Chizen Akanuma, The Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas & Pāli Nikāyas (1929) (Delhi: Sri Satguru, 1990), p. 21, lists as a parallel the Saṅkhārūpapatti-sutta, MN 120 at MN III 99. Yet these two discourses differ considerably

- from each other, making it difficult to consider them to be parallels properly speaking; see the discussion in Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 678f.
- <sup>367</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta, MN 139 at MN III 230, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvattihī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 793–796.
- <sup>368</sup> The reference to the Bhaggās appears to be an error, as the Bhaggā country is at a different location from the Kuru country.
- <sup>369</sup> The Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta does not refer to the sublime nature of the Dharma or the purity of the holy life.
- <sup>370</sup> Adopting the variant 不 instead of 求.
- <sup>371</sup> The Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta qualifies each of these two extremes as the wrong path.
- <sup>372</sup> The Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta does not have the theme of searching for happiness within under the heading of blame and praise.
- <sup>373</sup> Instead of praising someone to his face, the issue in the Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta is speaking roughly.
- <sup>374</sup> The Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta contrasts speaking hurriedly to speaking unhurriedly.
- <sup>375</sup> The verse is not found in the Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta.
- <sup>376</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷakammavibhaṅga-sutta, MN 135 at MN III 202; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 767–775.
- <sup>377</sup> The introductory narration on the Buddha's meeting with the dog is not found in the Cūḷakammavibhaṅga-sutta, which instead begins with the young brahmin approaching the Buddha and inquiring about the cause for the diversity among human beings. The Pāli commentary, Ps V 9, however, contains a report similar to the introductory account in MĀ 170.
- <sup>378</sup> Insects are not mentioned in the Cūḷakammavibhaṅga-sutta.
- <sup>379</sup> The addition of “[either]” and “[or else]” seems to be required by the context, since later on the exposition takes up issues such as giving gifts of asking questions, the not doing of which could hardly be reckoned as something that certainly leads to rebirth in hell. In fact in the Cūḷakammavibhaṅga-sutta rebirth among humans is clearly an alternative to rebirth in hell.
- <sup>380</sup> In the Cūḷakammavibhaṅga-sutta he illustrates the nature of the exposition received with a standard set of similes that describe setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.
- <sup>381</sup> Such an invitation is not reported in the Cūḷakammavibhaṅga-sutta.
- <sup>382</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta, MN 136 at MN III 207; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 775–781.

- <sup>383</sup> In the Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta Samiddhi does not quote any such saying by the Buddha, nor does that version record three instances of the same exchange between Potaliputta and Samiddhi.
- <sup>384</sup> In the Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta Potaliputta first asks how long Samiddhi has been a monk, and then inquires after the result of intentional deeds.
- <sup>385</sup> The Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta does not mention Mahācunda; instead it reports that Samiddhi himself related to Ānanda what had happened.
- <sup>386</sup> In the Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta the Buddha also points out that he has never met Potaliputta.
- <sup>387</sup> According to the Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta, a remark of this type was made by Udāyin instead of Ānanda.
- <sup>388</sup> The Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta adopts a different sequence for these topics. It begins with evil conduct leading to hell, followed by evil conduct leading to heaven, and then discusses good conduct leading to heaven or to hell.
- <sup>389</sup> Here and below, the Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta does not mention the possibility that retribution for unwholesome (or later wholesome) conduct could have already been experienced earlier. For the present case, the Pāli version mentions wholesome conduct performed either before or after the unwholesome conduct (which had been witnessed by others with the divine eye), as well as the holding of right view at the time of death. The Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta concludes by stipulating that the results of the unwholesome (or later wholesome) conduct are to be experienced, be it now, or in the next life, or at a later time.
- <sup>390</sup> The simile of the four types of fruit is not found in the Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta.

Division 14

- <sup>391</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Ummagga-sutta, AN 4.186 at AN II 177.
- <sup>392</sup> The Ummagga-sutta begins with the monk visiting the Buddha and does not report the monk's earlier reflection while in seclusion.
- <sup>393</sup> The Ummagga-sutta does not describe the one who is not led by the mind.
- <sup>394</sup> As is usual in Pāli discourses, the Ummagga-sutta lists just nine aṅgas, not mentioning nidāna, apadāna, or upadesa.
- <sup>395</sup> The Ummagga-sutta concludes with this exposition by the Buddha and does not report what happened subsequently with the monk.
- <sup>396</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Bhūmija-sutta, MN 126 at MN III 138; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 723–726.
- <sup>397</sup> The emendation involves deleting a qualification of “practice” as being done “properly,” a qualification that has its proper place only in the reply by the monk, when it is the introduction of this qualification that then causes the prince to be satisfied with the monk's reply. This is in fact how the Pāli parallel proceeds, supporting the impression that the qualification of practicing the holy life "properly" originally only belonged to the monk's reply and would have become part of the preceding question by the prince through an error in transmission.

- <sup>398</sup> The similar inquiry of the prince in the Bhūmija-sutta is concerned with inability to get results.
- <sup>399</sup> The Bhūmija-sutta reports that the prince offered his own dish of milk rice to Bhūmija; it does not report a formal invitation to a meal or a Dharma talk by Bhūmija.
- <sup>400</sup> In the Bhūmija-sutta the Buddha first acknowledges that Bhūmija had spoken correctly.
- <sup>401</sup> The Bhūmija-sutta begins with the simile on wrongly trying to get oil, followed by wrongly trying to get milk, butter, and fire, and then has the four similes corresponding to the case of doing these actions in the right way.
- <sup>402</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷadhammasamādāna-sutta, MN 45 at MN I 305; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 286–289.
- <sup>403</sup> The Cūḷadhammasamādāna-sutta has the second and third cases in the reverse sequence.
- <sup>404</sup> One of several differences in the description of ascetic practices is that the Cūḷadhammasamādāna-sutta does not mention shaving off the hair and beard (a practice in fact followed by Buddhist monastics themselves).
- <sup>405</sup> The translation is based on emending 生彼 to read 生(於)彼間, the formulation usually employed in the Madhyama-āgama to describe the rebirth of a nonreturner.
- <sup>406</sup> Instead of the attainment of nonreturn, the Cūḷadhammasamādāna-sutta mentions attainment of the four absorptions and rebirth in heaven.
- <sup>407</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahādhammasamādāna-sutta, MN 46 at MN I 309, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvattī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 289–291.
- <sup>408</sup> The Mahādhammasamādāna-sutta, instead of referring to the profundity of the Buddha's teaching, has the monks request the Buddha to explain the issue. It also takes up the four ways of practice only later, after having described the ignorant person and the wise.
- <sup>409</sup> In the Mahādhammasamādāna-sutta the sequence of these four is: pain leading to pain, pleasure leading to pain, pain leading to pleasure, pleasure leading to pleasure.
- <sup>410</sup> Here and below, the Mahādhammasamādāna-sutta speaks of good and bad rebirth, instead of evaluating the mode of conduct in terms of its conduciveness to nirvana.
- <sup>411</sup> Here and below, in the Mahādhammasamādāna-sutta the person is informed of the properties of the drink, and consuming it results in his death or deadly pain. Another difference is that all four similes are located together at the end of the discourse.

- <sup>412</sup> Adopting the variant 退具 instead of 所行, in keeping with the formulation found subsequently.
- <sup>413</sup> The translation is based on emending the original, which reads “infinite space”; the context shows this to be an error.
- <sup>414</sup> Adopting the variant 禪 instead of 離, in keeping with the formulation found in other parts of the present description.
- <sup>415</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Nivāpa-sutta, MN 25 at MN I 151, which has Jeta’s Grove at Sāvattṥi as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 167–169.
- <sup>416</sup> Adopting a variant reading that adds 便 before 隨.
- <sup>417</sup> In the Nivāpa-sutta, before deciding to forsake the fourth herd of deer, the hunter and his following had tried to catch them with the same stratagem they had successfully employed with the third herd.
- <sup>418</sup> The Nivāpa-sutta mentions only loss of their liberation of the mind, not of their liberation by wisdom.
- <sup>419</sup> In the Nivāpa-sutta the renunciants and brahmins take up the ten types of undeclared views (the world is eternal, the world is not eternal, the world is finite . . . a tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death).
- <sup>420</sup> No such explanation is given in the Nivāpa-sutta.
- <sup>421</sup> The Nivāpa-sutta does not mention the brahmavihāras.
- <sup>422</sup> The Nivāpa-sutta adds that in this way one has become invisible to Māra.
- <sup>423</sup> Adopting the variant reading 止令 instead of 正命.
- <sup>424</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta, MN 78 at MN II 22; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 424–431, and Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 105–138.
- <sup>425</sup> In the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta the child expresses its thoughts by sulking and its livelihood is the mother’s milk.
- <sup>426</sup> According to the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta, such a person is not even accomplished in what is wholesome.
- <sup>427</sup> Here and below, in addition to bodily and verbal conduct the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta speaks of livelihood.
- <sup>428</sup> Here and below, in the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta the path to the cessation of conduct or thoughts is to be found in the four right efforts.
- <sup>429</sup> The Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta adds understanding of liberation of the mind and liberation by wisdom.

- <sup>430</sup> Following an emendation in the CBETA edition of 慈 to read 悲, in keeping with the reading found in the rest of the passage.
- <sup>431</sup> The cessation of wholesome thoughts occurs in the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta already with the second absorption.
- <sup>432</sup> The Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta continues at this point with the ten path factors of an arahant.
- <sup>433</sup> This conditional sequence of the path factors is not mentioned in the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta; a similar presentation is, however, found in the Mahācattārīsaka-sutta, MN 117 at MN III 76 (which covers all ten path factors).
- <sup>434</sup> A description of the noble disciple who contemplates wisely, develops the factors of the noble eightfold path, and attains liberation is not found in the Samaṇamuṇḍikā-sutta.
- <sup>435</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta, MN 142 at MN III 253; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 810–819; Ingo Strauch, “The Bajaur Collection of Kharoṣṭhī Manuscripts: Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī and the Order of Nuns in a Gandhāran Version of the Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra,” in Alice Collett, ed., Women in Early Indian Buddhism: Comparative Textual Studies (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2014), pp. 17–45, and “The Indic Versions of the *Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra: Some Thoughts about the Early Transmission of Buddhist Āgama Texts,” in Dhammaddinā, ed., Research on the Madhyama-āgama (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2017), pp. 327–373.
- <sup>436</sup> The Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta does not specify the color of the robe.
- <sup>437</sup> In the Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta it is Ānanda who lists the ways in which the Buddha has benefited Mahāprajāpatī Gotamī.
- <sup>438</sup> The Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta takes these up in the reverse sequence, discussing first the fourteen kinds of personal offerings and then the seven offerings to the Sangha.
- <sup>439</sup> The Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta instead speaks of a gift given to both communities headed by the Buddha.
- <sup>440</sup> The emendation is guided by the context; the original speaks of the fifth, 第五.
- <sup>441</sup> In the Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta these are even described as “immoral and evil,” dussīla pāpadhamma.
- <sup>442</sup> Here and below, the Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta distinguishes between donor and recipients who are either of moral or else of immoral behavior.
- <sup>443</sup> No reference to offerings made by slaves and the poor is found in the Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta.
- <sup>444</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Bahudhātuka-sutta, MN 115 at MN III 61; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 645–654, and Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 249–288.

- <sup>445</sup> In the Bahudhātuka-sutta the contrast is between a fool and a wise person, and this contrast is directly broached by the Buddha himself, without a preceding report that Ānanda had been reflecting on this.
- <sup>446</sup> The application of the same principle to past and future times is not made in the Bahudhātuka-sutta.
- <sup>447</sup> The Bahudhātuka-sutta does not mention that Ānanda was in tears.
- <sup>448</sup> In the Bahudhātuka-sutta Ānanda directly asks about a monk who is wise, without bringing up the topic of a monk who is foolish.
- <sup>449</sup> In the Bahudhātuka-sutta Ānanda intervenes each time and asks if there could be still another way of being skilled in the elements.
- <sup>450</sup> These four elements are not listed in the Bahudhātuka-sutta, which also has no counterparts for the sets of three elements, except the first set of three (sense sphere, etc.), and for the two elements related to the taints.
- <sup>451</sup> This and the six following qualities have a single counterpart in the Bahudhātuka-sutta, according to which a person who has right view will not follow another teacher.
- <sup>452</sup> The presentation here departs from the usual sequence of listing the four truths, which has the cessation of dukkha as third and the path as fourth.
- <sup>453</sup> The impossibility of a stream-enterer experiencing an eighth existence is not discussed in the Bahudhātuka-sutta.
- <sup>454</sup> This and the subsequent impossibilities are not mentioned in the Bahudhātuka-sutta.
- <sup>455</sup> The Bahudhātuka-sutta gives five names for the discourse: “Many Kinds of Elements,” “Four Turnings,” “Mirror of Dharma,” “Drum of the Deathless,” and “Unsurpassable Victory in Battle.”

Bibliography

- Akanuma, Chizen. The Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas & Pāli Nikāyas (1929). Delhi: Sri Satguru, 1990.
- Anālayo, Bhikkhu. A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2011.
- . Madhyama-āgama Studies. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2012.
- . Perspectives on Satipaṭṭhāna, Cambridge: Windhorse, 2013.
- . “Selected Madhyama-āgama Discourse Passages and Their Pāli Parallels,” Dharma Drum Journal of Buddhist Studies 19 (2016): 1–61.
- . The Foundation History of the Nuns’ Order. Bochum: Projektverlag, 2016.
- . “The Luminous Mind in Theravāda and Dharmaguptaka Discourses,” Journal of the Oxford Centre for Buddhist Studies 13 (2017): 10–50.
- Anālayo, Bhikkhu, and Roderick S. Bucknell. “Correspondence Table for Parallels to the Discourses of the Majjhima Nikāya: Toward a Revision of Akanuma’s Comparative Catalogue,” Journal of the Centre for Buddhist Studies, Sri Lanka 4 (2006): 215–238.
- Bareau, André. Recherches sur la Biographie du Buddha dans les Sūtrapīṭaka et les Vinayapīṭaka Anciens: De la Quête de l’Éveil à la Conversion de Śāriputra et de Maudgalyāyana. Paris: École Française d’Extrême-Orient, 1963.
- Bingenheimer, Marcus. Studies in Āgama Literature, With Special Reference to the Shorter Chinese Saṃyuktāgama. Taiwan: Shin Weng Feng Print Co., 2011.
- Bodhi, Bhikkhu. The Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Anguttara Nikāya. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2012.
- Bucknell, Roderick S. “Catalogues of Parallel Buddhist Sūtras in Pali, Chinese, Sanskrit, and Other Languages,” in Proceedings of the 13th Wuyue Buddhist Academic Forum, pp. 427–441. Hangzhou: Hangzhou Buddhist Academy, 2016.
- . “Ekottarika-type Material in the Chinese Madhyama-āgama,” in Bhikkhunī Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Madhyama-āgama, pp. 77–112. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2017.
- . “Taking Account of the Indic Source-text,” in Konrad Meisig, ed., Translating Buddhist Chinese, Problems and Prospects, pp. 45–52. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2010.

Bibliography

- . “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama from Gilgit vis-à-vis the Pali Dīgha-nikāya,” in Bhikkhunī Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Dīrgha-āgama, pp. 57–101. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2014.
- Chung, Jin-il, and Takamichi Fukita. A Survey of the Sanskrit Fragments Corresponding to the Chinese Madhyamāgama, Including References to Sanskrit Parallels, Citations, Numerical Categories of Doctrinal Concepts and Stock Phrases. Tokyo: Sankibo Press, 2011.
- Collett, Alice, and Bhikkhu Anālayo. “Bhikkhave and Bhikkhu as Gender-inclusive Terminology in Early Buddhist Texts,” Journal of Buddhist Ethics 21 (2014): 760–797.
- Hartmann, Jens-Uwe, and Klaus Wille. “The Manuscript of the Dīrghāgama and the Private Collection in Virginia,” in Paul Harrison and Jens-Uwe Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research, pp. 137–155. Wien: Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 2014.
- Hirakawa, Akira. Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary. Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1997.
- Honjō, Yoshifumi. A Table of Āgama Citations in the Abhidharmakośa and the Abhidharmakośopāyikā. Kyoto: n.p., 1984.
- Meisig, Konrad. Das Sūtra von den vier Ständen, Das Aggañña-Sutta im Licht seiner chinesischen Parallelen. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1988.
- Ñāṇamoli, Bhikkhu. The Middle Length Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Majjhima Nikāya (1995), Bhikkhu Bodhi, ed. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2005.
- Norman, K. R. A Philological Approach to Buddhism: The Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai Lectures, 1994. London: School of Oriental and African Studies, 1997.
- Pannasiri, Bhadanta. “Sigālovāda-Sutta,” Visva-Bharati Annals 3 (1950): 150–228.
- Pradhan, Prahlad. Abhidharmakośabhāṣya of Vasubandhu. Patna: K. P. Jayaswal Research Institute, 1967.
- Rhys Davids, T. W., and William Stede. Pali-English Dictionary (1921). Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1993.
- Silverlock, Blair Alan. An Edition and Study of the Gosiga-sutra, The Cow-horn Discourse (Senior Collection Scroll no. 12): An Account of the Harmonious Aṇarudha Monks. Ph.D thesis, University of Syney, 2015.
- Strauch, Ingo. “The Bajaur Collection of Kharoṣṭhī Manuscripts: Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī and the Order of Nuns in a Gandhāran Version of the Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra,” in Alice Collett, ed., Women in Early Indian Buddhism: Comparative Textual Studies, pp. 17–45. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2014.

- . “The Indic Versions of the *Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra: Some Thoughts about the Early Transmission of Buddhist Āgama Texts,” in Bhikkhunī Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Madhyama-āgama, pp. 327–373. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2017.
- Watanabe, Fumimaro. “Logical Arguments in the Dialogues (Suttas),” Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies 20/2 (1972): 988–976.
- Wogihara, Unrai. Sphuṭārthā Abhidharmakośavyākhyā by Yaśomitra, Part II. Tokyo: The Publishing Association of Abhidharmakośavyākhyā, 1936.

Index

A

- Abhidharma. See Dharma, higher
- absorptions (four), 415–427, 438,
477nn131, 138, 140; 485n273,
493n406
- first, 159, 259, 328, 330, 354, 415,
418–419, 424–425, 429–430, 451,
481n203
- fourth, 136–137, 150, 160, 165, 259,
329–330, 355–356, 364, 416–417,
419–420, 423–427, 432–434, 445,
452
- second, 160, 259, 328, 330, 354–355,
415–416, 418–419, 424–426,
429–431, 481n203, 495n431
- third, 160, 259, 328, 330, 355, 416,
419–420, 424, 426, 431–433
- See also* concentration
- actions/conduct, bodily, mental, and verbal, 27–28, 32, 170, 260–261, 265,
380–381, 385–389, 449–450, 459,
472n53, 494n427
- See also* restraint(s), three
- affliction(s), 46, 259–261, 273, 482n221
- Aggilāyana, 268, 271
- aggregate(s), 101, 229, 489n344,
490nn360, 365
- Ajātasattu Vedehiputta, King, 115–116,
120, 282, 301
- alms/almsfood/almsround, 9–11, 16, 35–
36, 72, 76, 109–110, 141, 216, 243,
247, 303, 368–370, 380, 397, 408,
441–444, 459
- ambrosia, 28, 31
- Ānanda, 116–120, 126–127, 133, 141–
151, 350–353, 382–392, 454–467,
475n99, 476n128, 477n135,
490nn362, 364; 492nn385, 387;
495n437, 496nn445, 447–449
- Anāthapiṇḍika, 483n247
- See also* forest(s)/grove(s)/park(s),
Anāthapiṇḍika's Park
- Angīrasa, 204–205, 263
- animal(s)/bird(s)/insect(s), 32, 108–109,
113, 129, 156, 277, 373–374, 457,
477nn132, 135; 491n378
- cattle/cow(s), 114, 157, 180, 249–250,
253–256, 358, 399, 479n165,
488n326
- chicken(s), 157, 273, 371
- deer, 14, 288, 405–406, 438–445,
494n417
- dog(s), 183, 191, 368–372, 407, 491n377
- donkey/mule, 195, 371
- elephant(s), 19–20, 29, 48, 52, 55,
105–107, 113, 134, 151–152, 154–
155, 157, 161, 248, 255, 273,
282–284, 286, 289, 291, 298, 323,
469n11, 470n24, 474–475n97,
476n118
- fleas, 147–148, 164
- gadflies/flies, 147–148, 164, 291, 407
- goose, 146, 158, 287

Index

animal(s)/bird(s)/insect(s) (continued):

- jackal, 371
- horse(s), 97–102, 105–106, 134, 157, 195, 248, 255, 273, 282–284, 286, 288–289, 298, 323, 474n83, 476n118
- leopards, 105–106
- lion(s), 103, 105–106, 113, 216, 288, 474n86
- monkey, 42, 471n38
- mosquitoes, 147–148, 164, 291
- ox/oxen, 276, 289, 323
- peacock, 405–406
- pig(s)/swine, 157, 183, 191, 255, 371
- sheep/sheepskin, 29, 91, 93, 95, 157
- tiger(s), 48, 105–106
- worms, 109
- arahant(s)/arahantship, 9, 47–50, 119, 147, 150, 230, 249–250, 396, 453, 456–457, 464, 495n432
- Araka, 271, 273–279, 485n280, 486n290
- Asita Devala, 196–198, 480nn186, 188
- Assalāyana, 185–195, 198–200, 480nn189, 191
- asura(s), 51, 53, 57, 71, 113, 170, 296
- At̥ṭhaka, 204–205, 263
- awakening, 3, 9, 36, 44, 48, 71, 124, 127–128, 130–132, 258, 359–360, 366, 396, 410–411, 484nn263–264
- full/highest/right/unsurpassable, 24, 48, 70, 103, 165, 201, 216, 299, 306, 363–364, 367, 466–467
- path to, 24, 50, 71, 181–184
- seven factors of, 245–246, 466–467
- awareness, directed, 130, 159–160, 259, 328, 330, 354, 415, 418–419, 424–426, 429–431, 451
- See also* concentration

B

Bhaddā, 47, 49–50, 73

- Bhaggās, 358, 491n368
- Bhagu, 204–205, 263
- Bhāradvāja, 204–205, 215–218, 230–231, 246, 263
- Bhūmija, 396–404, 493nn399, 400
- Bhuñjatī, 52
- birth(s), 9, 54, 105, 107, 110, 127–128, 130–133, 147, 155, 161, 166, 186–187, 227, 229, 232, 245–246, 251, 258, 260–261, 263–267, 273, 280, 282, 300, 304, 308–309, 314, 325–326, 334, 358, 377, 394, 396, 453, 463, 483n235
- birth and death, 25, 36, 103, 166, 301, 363–364, 366–367
- See also* rebirth
- Brahmā(s), 3, 43, 55, 74–75, 103, 105, 107, 155, 174–175, 181, 186–193, 195, 197–198, 214–215, 230–232, 234, 246, 257, 263–264, 270, 282–283, 294–295, 398, 472n65, 479n176, 481nn206, 208
- heaven, 56, 107, 214, 279, 354
- palace/realm/world, 74, 105, 129, 131–132, 270, 278–279, 371
- brahmavihāras*, 279, 481nn206, 208; 485n272, 486n290, 494n421
- Brahmāyu, 281–283, 285–286, 293, 295–304, 486nn292–293, 295, 301–302; 487nn304, 309, 311
- brahmin(s), 3–4, 33, 35, 41–43, 66–71, 76–77, 81, 87–89, 91, 103, 115, 126–134, 141–142, 150–155, 160–195, 197–218, 230–234, 243–246, 248–271, 273–278, 282–283, 285–286, 293–304, 360, 368–380, 385–407, 441–445, 464–465, 472n58, 476nn118, 124; 478n161, 479nn167, 173, 176–177; 480nn185, 187, 191, 194; 481nn199–200, 203–204, 206–207, 209; 483nn232–234;

484n263, 485nn269, 276–277;
 487n309, 491n377, 494n419
See also four castes; three classes buddha(s), xvi, 3, 36, 37, 50, 53, 108, 155, 251, 280, 301, 306
See also tathāgata(s)/Tathāgata(s)
 Buddha, xv, 3–6, 8–9, 13, 25, 31, 37, 39, 40, 44–47, 49–56, 58–63, 65–68, 70,
 73–75, 91, 102–104, 108–112,
 114–116, 120–126, 133, 141, 151,
 154, 161–162, 167, 172–174, 185–
 186, 199–202, 215, 217, 227,
 230–231, 246–247, 251, 256–257,
 262, 264, 268, 271, 281–283,
 285–286, 293–297, 300–306,
 314–315, 324–325, 334–335, 337,
 344, 346–351, 353–354, 358–359,
 368, 370–373, 380, 382–384, 392–
 396, 398, 404, 409, 414–415, 428,
 438, 446–447, 453–455, 459–461,
 464–465, 467, 469n5, 470nn28–31,
 471nn33, 38, 46; 472nn52, 55, 61, 63,
 65; 473nn68–69; 474nn83, 86;
 475nn99, 112–113; 476nn116, 118,
 128; 477nn138, 145; 478nn148, 161,
 163; 479nn164, 167–168, 173, 176–
 178, 180; 480nn189, 191, 195–196;
 481nn199–200, 203, 205–208;
 482nn212, 215–216, 220, 227, 229;
 483nn232, 234–235, 237–238;
 484nn250, 252, 254, 263, 265–266;
 485nn269, 277, 280; 486nn290, 293,
 295–296, 298, 301, 303; 487nn304,
 308, 311, 314; 488nn325–326;
 489nn337–338, 345, 349; 490nn353,
 356, 359, 362, 364; 491n377,
 492nn383, 386, 392, 395; 493nn400,
 408; 495nn437, 439; 496n445
See also Gotama; tathāgata(s)/Tathā-gata(s); World-honored One

Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, 34, 36–37,
 54, 73, 91, 133, 141, 161, 167, 174,
 185, 215, 250, 256, 262, 268, 271,
 302, 380, 454–455
See also Triple Gem

C

Candana, 348
 Caṅkī, 208
 cloth/clothes/clothing, 4, 12, 14, 43,
 105–106, 119, 141, 196, 226, 228,
 247–248, 253, 277, 290, 377–378,
 397, 407, 474–475n97, 480n189
 antelope hide, 105–106
 Benares cloth, 43
 brocade and silk, 105–106
 cotton, 105–106
 Kāsī cloth, 474–475n97
 linen, 76–77, 105–106
 white, 196, 226, 301
See also robe(s)
 concentration, 50, 56, 122–124, 130, 140,
 160, 259, 328, 330, 354–358, 381,
 415–428, 429–438
 based on right or wrong views, 398–403
 meditative, 44, 49, 52–53, 73
 right, 61–62, 111, 229, 360, 453
See also absorptions (four); awareness, directed; meditation
 consciousness, 101–102, 310, 327–333,
 341–343, 349–350, 352–353, 488n329,
 489n342
 element, 307, 310, 461–462
 eye, 343, 461
 infinite, 324, 329, 331, 356, 423, 427, 436–437
 contemplation, 44, 281, 324, 452 skillful, 393–395
 sustained, 130, 159–160, 259, 328, 330, 354, 415, 418–419, 424–426,
 429–431, 451
See also meditation

Index

craving, 19, 22–23, 45, 49, 68, 71, 109,
114, 121, 219–225, 229, 239, 255,
265–277, 331–333, 409

See also desire

Cunda, 382–383

D

defilement(s), 36, 44, 46, 73–75, 77–78, 104, 156, 161, 259–261, 301, 331–333

delusion(s), 56, 110, 124, 168, 262, 299, 313, 407–409, 411–413, 449–450, 453

desire(s), 24, 32, 45, 47–50, 55, 59–61,
66–67, 78, 10–112, 121, 156, 158,
164, 173–174, 229, 255–256,
316–318, 331–333, 340–343,
349–350, 352–353, 409, 470n15

sensual, 17, 25, 36, 53–56, 136–137,
148–150, 159, 161, 165, 168,
208–210, 218–225, 245–246, 259,
261, 273, 279, 301, 313, 328, 330,
354, 364, 404–409, 415, 418, 425,
428–430, 445, 449–451, 453,
456–457, 461–462, 485n280

deva(s), 3, 43 46–47, 49–57, 69–75, 97,
99–104, 107, 129–130, 155, 169–170,
172, 175, 181, 213–215, 221, 246,
250–251, 257, 263–265, 270, 279–
280, 282–283, 294–296, 300, 303,
306, 334–337, 345–348, 356–358,
396, 398, 472n57, 481n207,
489nn347–349; 490nn355, 358

king/ruler, 46–47, 50–52, 56–75, 105,
471n50

See also heaven(s); sphere(s)

dharma(s), 114, 134–135, 324, 449–452

Dharma, 3–6, 9, 14, 16, 25, 36–37, 44, 46,
48, 52, 54–56, 58–63, 65–68, 71,
72–75, 78, 88, 99–102, 107–109,
121–125, 134–135, 144–145, 151–153,
157, 160–162, 170–171, 186–193,
199–202, 206–207, 227, 229–231,

234–235, 239, 242–244, 251–253,
255–256, 258, 262, 264–267, 273,
275–278, 280, 282–286, 290, 292–296,
298–299, 301–306, 313–315, 321–324,
326–327, 334, 340, 344, 353, 359–363,
368–369, 372, 394, 396, 398, 428–430,
432–433, 435–437, 459, 467, 476n130,
479n168, 480n191, 483n238, 485n276,
493n399

eye, 46, 54, 73–75, 229, 314

good/noble/pure/sublime, 37, 73, 86–89,
229–231, 302, 306, 314–315, 354,
359, 479n168, 487n315, 488n328,
489n340, 491n369

higher, 56, 299

king, 273, 282–284, 286, 289, 298

path of, 3, 50, 53, 155, 251, 280,
282–283, 294–295, 306, 382 practice of, 271–272, 274–275

true, 4–8, 37, 102, 155, 171, 234, 298,
301, 322–323

See also Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha
Dīghatapassin/Tapassin, 25–31, 38–40,
471n34

disciple(s), xv, 28, 30–31, 35–40, 43–46, 53–54, 56, 86–87, 90, 114, 126, 128,
137, 151–153, 160–166, 274–282,
321–323, 334, 344, 353, 394, 447–453,
478n148, 486n290, 488n336, 495n434
lay, 34, 36–37, 73, 133, 141, 162, 167,
174, 185, 215, 256, 262, 268, 271,
302, 380, 473n79

See also laymen; laywoman/laywomen;
monk(s); renunciant(s)

divine, 52, 106, 129, 131–132

body, 72–73

ear, 166, 217, 271

eye, 260, 385–389, 478n154, 492n389

Doṇa, 262–268, 485n269

dukkha, 24, 37, 57–58, 60–61, 104, 110, 125, 146, 161, 165, 226–227, 229,

- 250–251, 261, 280, 301, 312, 317–319,
325–326, 334, 358, 360–362, 382–383,
395, 454–455, 465, 467, 474n91,
482nn224, 227; 496n452
See also four (noble) truths
- E
- eighteen elements, 461
eighteen mental activities, 307, 315–316
eightfold path, 61, 227, 229, 360,
472n52, 482n220, 495n434
eloquence, 46, 321, 393–395
Esukārī, 174–176, 178–179, 181–185
evil, 25, 69, 81, 83, 85, 164–165, 170,
198, 230, 232–233, 239, 242,
373–374, 408, 441, 446–448, 464,
479n180, 495n441
actions/conduct/deeds, 25–29, 31, 34,
77, 170, 260, 385–388, 447,
465–466, 492n388
speech/words, 164, 448
states, 60–61, 63–66, 85, 135–137, 146,
150, 158–159, 165, 210, 237–238,
240–244, 259, 299, 328, 330, 354,
364, 415, 418, 425, 429–430, 445, 451 teachings, 457–458
view, 195–197
- F
- fear(s), 16, 25, 78, 82, 92, 94, 104, 164,
224, 253, 257–259, 360, 439–440,
442, 445, 460, 484n263
fearless/fearlessness, 28, 31, 45, 230,
234, 273, 283–284, 286, 290, 298,
302, 314
fetter(s), 44–45, 55, 57–58, 70, 165, 182,
190, 212–214, 264, 278, 304,
360–362, 366, 409
flower(s)/grass(es)/root(s), 46, 90, 113,
140–141, 158, 185, 193, 209–210,
239, 243, 258, 275, 281, 326, 339,
377–378, 405–406, 408, 439, 442,
460, 474–475n97, 476n124
aloe root/aloeswood, 113, 140
black orris root, 476n124
blue lotus/lotuses, 113, 141, 287 jasmine, 113, 141, 474–475n97, 476n124
kadamba, 238, 241 kusa grass, 76–77
māluva creeper, 405
mugwort grass, 258
forests(s)/grove(s)/park(s), 15, 18, 34, 41, 47, 69, 92–93, 95, 98–99, 106–107,
111–112, 121, 136, 138–140, 148,
151–152, 154, 159, 195–196, 198,
200–201, 216–217, 243–244, 281,
290–291, 293, 326, 339, 344, 346,
380, 408, 439, 442, 476n123
Anāthapiṇḍika's Park, 8, 91, 102, 104,
108, 110–111, 126, 151, 154, 162,
167, 173, 185, 247, 251, 262, 268,
271, 303, 315, 324, 344, 346, 348,
350, 353, 368–369, 372, 393, 404,
415, 446, 459
Bamboo Grove, 141, 147–148, 174,
200–201, 334–336, 345, 347, 380,
396, 438, 472–473n66
Daṇḍaka, 470n27
Deer Forest, 34
Eastern Park, 133, 230
Empty Field Forest, 34
Great Marshy Forest, 34
Grove of Many Toads, 75
Hot Spring Grove, 334–335
Jeta's Grove, 8, 91, 102, 104, 108,
110–111, 126, 151, 154, 162, 167,
173, 185, 247, 251, 262, 268, 271,
303, 315, 324, 344, 346, 348, 350,
353, 368–369, 372, 393, 404, 415,
446, 459, 478n160, 480n193,
491n367, 493n407, 494n415

forests(s)/grove(s)/park(s) (continued):

Kāliṅga, 470n27

Kimbilā, 148

Mahāvana, 477n137

Mallikā's Single-halled Park, 446

Mango Grove, 46–47

Mahādeva's, 294–295

Pāvārika's 25, 28

Mātaṅga, 470n27

Mejjha, 470n27

Nigrodha Park, 453

rosewood grove, 3–4, 9

Squirrels' Sanctuary, 141, 147–148, 174,

200–201, 334–336, 345, 347, 380,

396, 438, 472–473n66, 477n135

Tapodārāma, 489n346

Thullakoṭṭhita Forest, 14–15, 18

Tranquil Forest, 34

Unicorn Forest, 34

Yellow Reed Park, 257

See also tree(s)

four assemblies, 35, 37–40, 475n105

See also laymen; laywoman/laywomen;
monk(s); nuns

four castes, 106, 174–175, 179, 180–181,

186–187, 199, 479nn168, 173, 180;

480n188, 483nn236, 245

See also brahmin(s); merchant(s);
warrior(s); worker(s)

four divine abodes. See brahmavihāras

Four Heavenly Kings, 269, 279

four kinds of deterioration, 17–18, 469n12

four (noble) truths, 37, 301, 482n227,
496n452

fruit, 25, 392, 408, 442, 492n390

myrobalan, 41, 471n37, 480n192

G

Gaṇaka Moggallāna, 133–141

gandhabba(s), 46–47, 49–52, 54–57, 73–
75, 104, 197, 296

Gopaka/Gopikā (deva), 53–56, 471n47

Gopaka Moggallāna, 141–142, 150–151

Gotama, 3, 26–34, 39–41, 43, 46, 54–55,

115–116, 120, 126–128, 131–134, 137,

139–144, 148–150, 152–153, 161–163,

167–171, 173–184, 186–195, 198–199,

201–211, 214–222, 224–228, 235,

251–252, 257–258, 263–264, 268–270,

282–283, 285–298, 300–301, 306,

369–373, 380–381, 447

Great Seer/Seer. See Buddha; World-honored One

H

Hall of Migāra's Mother, 133–134, 230

hatred, 33, 34, 45, 57, 60–61, 71, 78,

109–111, 115–116, 256, 480n186

heaven(s), 36, 53, 56, 78, 91, 172, 221,

246, 265, 277, 301, 372, 374–379,

384–387, 389–392, 407, 471n48,

492n388, 493n406

Ābhassara/of Radiance/Streaming

Radiance, 105, 107, 235–236,

279–280, 354–355

Akaniṭṭha, 72

Brahmā, 56, 107, 214, 279, 354

Great Reward, 356

Mind with Attachment, 32

Refulgent Glory, 355

Thirty-three, 47, 49–56, 69, 71, 74–75,

269–270, 279, 337, 348, 472n57,

490n356

Tusita, 270, 279

Yāma, 270, 279

heavenly, 12–13, 52, 72, 75

realm(s), 165, 261, 465–466

sensual pleasure, 221–222, 482n217

hell, 104, 261, 277, 369–371, 374–378,

384–386, 388, 390–391, 405,

407–408, 466, 491n379, 492n388

heterodox practitioner(s), 151–154, 162,

216–218, 226–227, 229–230, 380–383, 446–448, 482n223
hindrance(s), 37, 301, 477n139, 486n290
five, 136, 159, 466–467, 481n201
holy life, 3–6, 9, 12–13, 53–54, 67–68, 72, 121–122, 125, 127–128, 130–133, 137, 140, 145, 147, 155, 161, 166, 226, 230, 244–246, 251–252, 261, 264–267, 271–272, 274–275, 280, 282–283, 293–295, 306, 314–315, 324–327, 335–336, 338–340, 346, 348, 354–359, 394, 396–403, 407, 409, 428, 453, 487n315, 488n328, 489nn340, 348; 491n369, 492–493n397 householder(s), 3–8, 11–13, 29–41, 43, 46, 55, 71, 75–80, 82–91, 153, 155, 173, 200–201, 217, 221, 247–251, 292, 294–295, 300–301, 473n79
See also disciple(s), lay

I

ignorance, 44, 72, 78–79, 110, 161, 165, 245–246, 258, 260–262, 277, 299, 462–463
Indra, 55, 471n50

J

Jaina, 470nn25–26
Jambudīpa, 91–99, 249–250, 273, 484n251
Jāṇussoṇi, 151–154, 161–163, 166–174, 208, 477n145, 478n146, 481n207
Jayasena, Prince, 397
jewel(s)/jewelry, 14, 92–93, 95, 106, 371–372
agate, 92–93, 95, 98–99
amber, 92–93, 95, 98–99
beryl, 92–93, 95, 98–99, 105–106, 167–168
carnelian, 92
conch-shell, 93, 95, 98–99

coral, 92–93, 95, 98–99
crystal, 92–93, 95, 98–99, 105–106, 167–168, 371–372 gold, 92–93, 95, 98–99, 105–106, 158, 167–168, 248, 288, 311–312, 371–372 jade/jade-pearl, 12–14, 92–93, 95, 98–99, 106
maṇi-, 92–93, 95, 98–99 pearl(s), 12–14, 92–93, 95, 98–99, 105–106, 167–168
ruby, 92–93, 95, 98–99
silver, 92–93, 95, 98–99, 105–106, 158, 167–168, 248, 371–372
tortoiseshell, 92–93, 95, 98–99
See also seven treasures

K

Kamboja, 188, 479n176
Kammāsadhamma, 216, 358, 409, 428
Kaṅgiya, 348–350
Kapilavatthu, 453
karma/karmic, 103, 236, 380, 384, 470nn18–19
Kassapa, 204–205, 263
Kinsman of the Sun, 49, 71
See also Buddha
knowledge(s), 3, 50, 53, 82, 129, 152, 155, 161, 201, 206, 217, 246, 251, 253, 280, 282–283, 294–295, 306, 322–323, 326–327, 334–336, 340, 344, 346, 348, 353, 359–360, 366, 410–411, 438, 481n206 ancient, primary, 239, 243–244
bad, 235, 373, 378–379
of consciousness, 329, 331
of dukkha, 229, 318
final, 72, 137, 139
good, 235, 373, 378–379
higher, 260–262, 299, 477n131, 478n154 inclining toward the false, 385–389 knowledge(s) (continued):

of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, 329, 331

of nothingness, 329, 331

of other minds, 166, 301

penetrative, 71, 146

right/supreme/unobstructed/unsurpassable, 232, 291–292, 453

of space, 329, 331

three/threefold, 45, 299, 478n154

of the death and (re)birth [of beings], 166, 260–261

of the destruction of the taints, 261– 262, 358

of former/past lives, 166, 260, 299,
478n154

Koravya, King, 15–16, 19–23, 25, 273

Kosala(n), 186–188, 200, 234–235, 251, 256

Kosiya, 51, 53, 57–63, 65–69, 71–72,
471n50

See also deva(s), king/ruler; Sakka

Kuru(s), 3, 21–22, 215, 358, 409, 428,
491n368

Kusāvatī, 105–106

L

laymen, 30, 35, 37–40

laywoman/laywomen, 30, 35, 37–40, 54 liberation(s), 44, 114, 150, 254, 313, 318,

323–324, 453, 469n9, 475n112,
487n320, 495n434

from dukkha, 251, 280

of the mind and by wisdom, 127–128,
130–133, 147, 166, 442, 494nn418,
429

peaceful, 165–166

Lion. See Tathāgata

lion's roar, 103

See also eloquence

Lomasakaṅgiya, 344–346, 348–350,
490nn355, 358

loving-kindness, 104, 107, 109, 125,
156, 182, 190, 212–213, 250, 264,
278–280, 445, 479n180

M

Madhyama-āgama, xv–xvi, 487n312,
493n405

Magadha, 46–47, 57, 74–75, 115–116,
120, 141–144, 147–151, 282, 301,
305, 476n126

Māgandiya, 215–230, 482n229

Magga-saṃyutta, 474–475n97

magic/magical, 30, 38–39, 43, 471n38,
476n115

Mahācunda, 382–383, 492n385

Mahādeva, 294–295

Mahākaccāna, 325–327, 334, 338–340,
344

Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī. 453–454, 495n437

Main Hall (deva), 337

makara sea monster(s), 91, 93–96

Mandhātu, 105–107, 113

Māra, 113, 441–446, 494n422

māras, 3, 43, 103, 155, 175, 181, 257, 282–283, 294–295, 398

mark(s), 422–425, 428–438, 486n295 of a great man, thirty-two, 282–289,

297–298, 486nn293, 295, 298

Mātali, 50

meditation, 48, 55, 69–70, 104, 121, 146, 217, 231, 243–244, 272–274, 281,
293, 305, 325–326, 333–334,
337–338, 343–344, 393, 446, 460,
477n138

hut, 344–347, 380, 397

satipaṭṭhāna, 476n119

See also concentration, meditative

merchant(s), 71, 90–102, 174–183,

188–195, 197, 210, 232–234,
244–246, 473n81, 474n93
See also four castes; three classes
mindfulness, 24, 44, 56, 62–66,
123–124, 135–136, 140, 146,
158–160, 259, 321–323, 329–330,
355–356, 365, 416, 419–420,
422–426, 429–438, 452, 472n53
establishments of, four/three, 315, 321–
323, 466–467, 489n338
right, 109, 111, 146, 160, 259, 328,
330, 355, 365, 416, 419, 424, 426,
431–432, 453
Mithilā, 282, 294–295, 300–301, 303,
487n309
monk(s), 3–4, 8, 30, 34–40, 53–54, 61–66,
73, 91, 99–102, 104, 108–112, 114,
120–125, 127, 133–137, 139, 141–147,
150, 156, 160–161, 167, 174, 185,
212–213, 215, 230–231, 235, 246,
250–251, 256, 262, 268, 271–273,
279–283, 294–295, 302–305, 307–316,
324–334, 337–338, 340–359, 364,
368–369, 372, 380–384, 392–396, 404,
409, 414–415, 428–438, 445–446,
453–456, 459, 461–467, 474n84,
475nn105, 113; 476n128, 477n133,
485n280, 488n326, 490n362,
492nn384, 392, 395; 492–493n397,
493n408, 496n448
See also disciple(s); renunciant(s)
Moon, 48
mountain(s), 47, 69, 113, 121, 136, 159, 201, 217, 277, 281
Indasāla cave, 46–47, 52
Mount Vēdiya, 46–47
Mount Vulture Peak, 115–116, 120
Sumeru, 113

N

nāga(s), 47, 49–50
great/mahā-, 29, 44, 172

Nalākāra, 214–215
Nālandā(s), 25, 28, 32–33, 35, 43
Nātaputta, 26, 28–32, 38–41, 43, 46,
470n32, 471nn33, 34, 37–38, 42
Nigaṇṭha(s), 25–32, 34–41, 43, 46
nirvana, 71, 103, 114, 125, 137, 139, 174,
208–209, 225–228, 259, 270–271,
314, 335–336, 346, 348, 359–360,
366, 410–411, 493n410
final, 141–145, 165, 304, 409, 455
nonreturn/nonreturner(s)/nonreturning,
72, 165, 249–250, 304, 409, 456–457,
487n312, 488nn325–326;
493nn405–406
nuns, 30, 35, 37–40, 455

O

offering(s), 45, 48, 87, 118–119, 122,
198, 252–253, 455–459, 474n96,
477n142, 484n252, 495n443
to individuals, fourteen types of, 456–
457, 495n438
to the Sangha, seven types of, 455–456,
495n438
once-returner(s)/once-returning, 165,
249–250, 456–457

P

paccekabuddha(s), 249–250, 456–457
Pajjota, King, 476n126
Pāli, xv, xvi, 472n53, 473nn67, 81;
477nn131, 132, 142; 479n170, 480n181,
481n199, 484n263, 486n296, 489nn338,
348; 491n377, 492nn389, 394
Pāli texts (parallels to discourses):
Aggañña-sutta, 482–483n230,
483nn231–232, 234–238, 242,
244–245
Ānandabhaddekaratta-sutta,
490nn361–365
Araka-sutta, 485nn279–281, 283–286;
486nn288–290

Pāli texts (parallels to discourses) (continued):

Araṇavibhaṅga-sutta, 491nn367, 369, 371–375

Assalāyana-sutta, 479nn172–180; 480nn181–183, 185–191

Bahudhātuka-sutta, 495n444, 496nn445–451, 453–455

Bhūmija-sutta, 492n396, 493nn398–401

Brahmaṇadhammika-sutta, 484nn255, 256, 260

Brahmāyu-sutta, 486nn291–293, 295–296, 298, 301–303; 487nn304–305, 308–311

Cūladhammasamādāna-sutta, 493nn402–404, 406

Cūlahatthipadopama-sutta, 477nn144–145; 478nn146–151, 153–155

Cūlakammavibhaṅga-sutta, 491nn376–381

Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga-sutta, 495nn435–439, 441–443

Dhāruvibhaṅga-sutta, 487nn313–317, 319–321; 488nn323–326

Doṇa-sutta, 485nn268–273, 275–278

Esukārī-sutta, 478nn160–161, 163; 479nn164–171

Gaṇakamoggallāna-sutta, 476nn117–121, 123–124

Gomaya-sutta, 474n92

Gopakamoggallāna-sutta, 476nn125–126, 128, 130; 477nn131–133, 135, 137–139, 142

Jīvika-sutta, 474nn94–96

Khattiya-sutta, 478nn157–159

Loka-sutta, 474nn85–86, 89

Lomasakaṅgiyabhaddekaratta-sutta, 490nn354–357, 359–360

Māgandiya-sutta, 481nn210–211; 482nn212–218, 220–221, 223–229

Mahācattārīsaka-sutta, 495n433

Mahādharmasamādāna-sutta, 493nn407–411

Mahākaccānabhaddekaratta-sutta, 489nn346–347, 349–350; 490nn352–353

Mahākammavibhaṅga-sutta, 491n382, 492nn383–390

Mahāparinibbāna-sutta, 475n98

Mahāsīhanāda-sutta, 488n336

Mahāsudassana-sutta, 474n92

Nivāpa-sutta, 494nn415, 417–422

Pacalāyamāna-sutta, 474nn90–93

Pinḍolyaṃ-sutta, 474nn94–95

Raṭṭhapāla-sutta, 469nn1–14; 470nn16–20

Sakkapañña-sutta, 471nn43–44, 46–47; 472nn51–57, 59–63, 65

Salāyatanavibhaṅga-sutta, 488nn327–336; 489nn337–338

Sāmagāma-sutta, 475n109

Samaṇamuḍḍikā-sutta, 494nn424–429; 495nn431–434

Saṅgārava-sutta, 475nn111–113; 476nn114–116

Saṅkhārupapatti-sutta, 490–491n366

Sigālaka-sutta/Siṅgalovāda-sutta, 472–473n66, 473nn68–70, 72–76, 79

Subha-sutta, 480nn193, 195–197; 481nn198–201, 203–209

Sumanā-sutta, 478n156

Upāli-sutta, 470nn21, 23–32;

471nn33–34, 36–39, 41–42

Valahassa-jātaka, 473nn80–81; 474nn83–84

Vassakāra-sutta, 475nn98–102

Uddesavibhaṅga-sutta, 489nn339–340, 342–345

Ummagga-sutta, 492nn391–395

Velāma-sutta, 483nn246–248; 484nn249–254

Verañjā-sutta, 484nn261–267

Pañcakaṅga, 446–447, 453
 Pañcasikha, 46–52, 73–75
 Parrot, 368–373, 380
See also Suka; Todeyya, son of Pasenadi, King, 234–235, 483n238
 Pāvā, 46
 Pāvārika, 25, 28
 Pilotika, 151–154, 162, 477n145
 Pokkarasāti, 206–209
 Potaliputta, 380–383, 492nn383–384, 386
 power(s), 24, 33, 37, 46, 52–53, 72, 107,
 115–116, 123, 186–187, 199,
 300–301, 373, 375–376, 379
 supernormal, 14, 33, 53, 107–108, 129, 131–132, 166, 210, 297–298
 precept(s), 9, 12, 16, 89–90, 111, 121,
 140, 145, 156, 171, 209, 250, 464
 Pukkusāti, 305–306, 314–315, 487n314,
 488nn325, 326
 Punnikā, 207

R

Rājagaha, 46–47, 75–76, 115, 137–139, 141, 147, 174, 200–201, 305,
 334–336, 345, 347, 380, 396–397,
 438, 472–473n66, 489n346
 Raṭṭhapāla, 3–25, 469nn2–3, 7–8, 11;
 470n20
 rebirth, 36, 54–55, 221, 260–261, 301,
 354–358, 465, 473n69, 481n207,
 486n290, 487n312, 491n379,
 493nn405–406, 410
See also birth and death
 renunciant(s), 3, 10–11, 33, 35, 43–44,
 47, 49–50, 66–70, 76–77, 81, 87–89,
 91, 103, 111–112, 125, 127, 129–131,
 153, 155, 174–175, 181, 200,
 202–203, 206–207, 209, 216–217,
 230, 232, 244–245, 257–258,
 282–283, 294–295, 360, 377–378,
 385–389, 397–407, 441–445,

447–448, 453, 465, 472n58, 478n159,
 483n245, 494n419
 non-Buddhist, 464–465
 path/way of, 25, 111, 140
See also disciple(s); monk(s) restraint(s), 26–27, 107, 135–136,
 158–159, 245, 365, 384–391, 459,
 470nn22, 25; 472n54, 476n120,
 479n180
 three, 26–27
 bodily, 26–27, 29, 31, 34
 mental, 26, 29, 31, 34
 verbal, 26, 29, 31, 34
See also actions/conduct, bodily, verbal, and mental river(s)/spring(s), 81, 113, 138–139, 277,
 303, 335–336, 486n288
 Ganges River, 12
 Nerañjarā River, 50
 robe(s), 8, 9, 17–24, 72, 76, 119, 121, 126,
 128, 136, 141, 146, 155, 158–159,
 163–164, 196, 201, 216, 218–220, 222,
 227, 230–231, 234, 244, 274, 282–286,
 290, 293, 298, 302–303, 306, 335–336,
 346, 360, 368, 370, 396–397, 404, 408,
 446, 453–456, 488n326, 495n436
See also cloth/clothes/clothing

S

Sakka, 46–47, 49–53, 56–75, 105, 107,
 471nn46, 50; 472nn55, 57–63, 65
 Sakya(n) clan/lineage, 3, 44, 48, 53–54,
 56, 201, 216, 234–235, 282–283,
 294–295, 306, 344, 346, 453
 Samaṇamundikāputta, 446–448
 Samiddhi, 335–337, 380–384,
 489nn347–349; 492nn383–385
 sandalwood, 113, 140, 183, 191, 474–
 475n97, 476n124
 Saṅgārava, 126–129, 131–133, 476n115
 Sārandada shrine, 116

- Sāvatthī, 8, 52, 91, 102, 104, 108, 110,
112, 126, 133, 151, 162, 167, 173, 185,
230, 247, 251, 262, 268, 271, 303, 315,
324, 344, 346, 348, 350, 353, 368–370,
372, 380, 393, 404, 415, 446–447, 459,
478nn146, 160; 480n193, 491n367,
493n407, 494n415
- self, 227, 250, 308–310, 489n344,
490nn360, 365
- self-conceit/self-elevation, 45, 314
- self-discipline/self-guarding/self-restrained, 81, 107, 252
- self-mortification, 359, 408
- sense(s)/sense faculties/sense sphere(s),
135, 158–159, 201, 217, 297, 315,
461–463, 472n54, 476n120,
488nn332, 329; 490n352
- sense objects, 482n214,
- sense organ, 487n317
- sensual/sensuality, 17, 105, 107,
112–113, 135, 156, 239, 247–248,
252, 451, 472n57
- desire(s)/passion, 17, 25, 36, 53–56,
109–110, 136–137, 148–150, 156,
159, 161, 165, 168, 208–210,
218–225, 245–246, 259, 261, 273,
279, 299, 301, 313, 328, 330, 354,
364, 404–409, 415, 418, 425, 428–
430, 445, 449–451, 453, 456–457,
461–462, 485n280
- pleasure(s), 6–7, 9, 12, 16, 210, 220–
225, 254–256, 359–361, 365, 425,
429, 482nn217–218; 485n275
- five, 55, 69, 209, 220–224, 247–248,
252, 364, 441
- seven treasures, 108, 273, 282–284, 286, 289–290, 298
- Si(n)gāḷaka, 473nn67–68
- Sikha, 50
- six element(s), 305–307, 461
- skillful means, 4, 14, 36, 151, 199,
292–293, 295, 301, 381, 398
- sphere(s), four, 311–312, 317–318, 415–418, 422–425
- of infinite consciousness, 311–312,
320, 324, 329, 331, 356–357,
417–418, 420–423, 427, 435–438
- of infinite space, 311–312, 320, 324,
329, 331, 356, 417, 420–421, 423,
426–427, 434–437
- of neither-perception-nor-nonpercep-tion, 311–312, 320, 324, 329, 331,
357–358, 418, 421–422, 428, 438,
445–446
- of nothingness, 311–312, 320, 324,
329, 331, 357, 417–418, 421–422,
427–428, 436–438
- spirit(s), 56, 255, 405–406, 408
- stream-enterer(s)/stream-entry, 72, 165,
249–250, 456–457, 472nn60–61, 63;
482n228, 488n325, 496n453
- Subha. See Suka
- Sudatta, 247, 251
- Sudhamma Hall, 69, 105–106
- Sujāta, 75–77, 91
- Suka, 200–215, 480n194
See also Parrot
- T
- taint(s), 56, 127–128, 130–133, 137, 140,
147, 161, 166, 245–246, 259,
261–262, 313, 324, 358, 430–431,
433–434, 436–438, 446, 453, 463,
477n131, 496n450
- tathāgata(s)/Tathāgata(s), 3, 19, 24, 43,
46, 50, 53, 68–70, 72, 74, 102–104,
114, 134–137, 142–145, 147, 150,
152–155, 160–161, 171, 215, 217,
225, 227, 234, 249, 251, 257–258,
280, 282–286, 290–291, 293–295,
298, 306, 314, 321–322, 384,
387–392, 394–396, 456–457, 464,
474n86, 475n112, 478n153, 494n419
See also buddha(s); Buddha teaching(s), types of, 394, 492n394 three classes, 232–234, 244–246

See also brahmin(s); four castes; merchant(s); warrior(s)
 Three Jewels, 454–455
See also Triple Gem
 Thullakoṭṭhita, 3–4, 8–11, 14–15, 18
 Timbaru, 48, 50, 73
 Todeyya, 208, 370–371, 380 son of, 200, 368–370, 372, 380
 tree(s), 47, 69, 92–95, 113, 136, 138–140,
   152, 154, 159, 216, 258, 281, 296,
   326, 339, 406, 484n261
   of awakening, 258
   banyan, 50, 288
   sāla, 140, 183, 191, 405, 476n123
   spirit, 405–406 terminalia, 15
   tinduka, 446
See also forest(s)/grove(s)/park(s)
 Triple Gem, 250
See also Three Jewels

U

Udāyin, 492n387
 Upāli, 25, 29–46, 471nn33, 36, 38
 Upamaññā clan, 206–209
 Upananda, 148, 477nn133, 136
 Uposatha (elephant), 105, 107
 Uruvela, 50
 Uttara, 282–286, 293–294, 486nn295,
   298, 301

V

Vacchāyana, 151–153
 Vajji clan/people, 115–120, 141,
   476n126
 Valahassa (horse), 97, 105–106
 Vāmadeva, 204–205, 263
 Vāmaka, 204–205, 263
 Vāsava, 57, 74–75, 471n50

Vāseṭṭha, 204–205, 230–239, 243–246,
   263, 483n232
 Vassakāra, 115–120, 141–151, 475n99,
   477nn133, 135, 137, 142
 Vedas, 186–187, 204–205, 208, 263, 273,
   282, 300, 479n174, 485n270,
   486n292
 Vejayanta (chariot) 105–106
 Velāma, 247–250, 484n250
 Verañjā, 257, 262, 484n261
 Vesālī, 477n137
 Vessāmitta, 204–205, 263
 Vessavaṇa, 52
 Videha, 281–283, 294–295

W

warrior(s), 71, 106, 152, 174–183,
   188–195, 197, 210, 217, 232–234,
   242–246, 256, 265–267, 478n158
See also four castes; three classes
 wheel-turning king/monarch, 113, 273,
   282–284, 286, 289, 298, 464, 474n92,
   474–475n97
 worker(s), 174–183, 188–195, 197, 211,
   479n166, 483n245
See also four castes
 world(s), 3, 19–24, 43, 50, 53, 67, 70, 81, 89, 102–105, 107–108, 114, 141, 147,
   153, 155–156, 165, 172, 175, 181,
   213, 235–241, 243–245, 250–251, 254,
   256, 260, 262, 264, 273, 277–278, 280,
   282–284, 286, 289, 293–295, 298,
   300, 303–304, 306, 378–379, 393,
   396, 398, 404, 409, 414–415, 428,
   441–446, 455, 464, 470n16, 478n161,
   479n167, 494n419
 World-honored One, 4–10, 12, 19–24, 26–
   28, 31–37, 39–40, 46–47, 49–53, 56–
   78, 80, 82–85, 89, 91, 99, 102–104,
   107–112, 114–120, 122–124, 126–127,
   129, 132–133, 137, 139, 141–145,

Index

World-honored One (continued):

147–154, 160–163, 166–178, 180–185,
188–195, 198–199, 201–212, 214–228,
230–235, 247, 251–252, 256–258,
262–264, 268–272, 285–286, 294–299,
301–306, 314–315, 322–327, 333–340,
343–348, 350–354, 359, 368–373,
380–384, 393–398, 404, 409, 415, 428,
438, 446–447, 454–455, 459–461,
463–464, 467

See also Buddha; Gotama;
tathāgata(s)/Tathāgata(s)

worldliness/worldly, 45, 114, 313, 363–367

worldling(s), 249–250, 318–319,
359–361, 363–366, 464–465,
484n251, 489n344

Y

yakkha(s), 51, 57, 94, 96, 100–102, 296, 474n83

Yamataggi, 204–205, 263

Yona, 188, 479n176

BDK English Tripiṭaka (First Series)

Abbreviations

Ch. :	Chinese
Skt. :	Sanskrit
Jp. :	Japanese
Eng. :	Published title

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Chang ahan jing (長阿含經)	1
Skt. Dīrghāgama
Eng. The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume I, 2015) The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume II, 2016) The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume III, 2018)
Ch. Zhong ahan jing (中阿含經)	26
Skt. Madhyamāgama
Eng. The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume I, 2013) The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume II, 2020) The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume III, 2022)
Ch. Dasheng bensheng xindi guan jing (大乘本生心地觀經)	159
Eng. The Mahayana Sutra of Previous Lives and Contemplation of the Mind-Ground (2021)
Ch. Fo suoxing zan (佛所行讚)	192
Skt. Buddhacarita
Eng. Buddhacarita: In Praise of Buddha's Acts (2009)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Zabao zang jing (雜寶藏經)	203
Eng. The Storehouse of Sundry Valuables (1994)
Ch. Faju piyu jing (法句譬喻經)	211
Eng. The Scriptural Text: Verses of the Doctrine, with Parables (1999)
Ch. Xiaopin banruo boluomi jing (小品般若波羅蜜經)	227
Skt. Aṣṭasāhasrikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Ch. Jingang banruo boluomi jing (金剛般若波羅蜜經)	235
Skt. Vajracchedikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Ch. Daluo jingang bukong zhenshi sanmoye jing (大樂金剛不空真實三摩耶經)	243
Skt. Adhyardhaśatikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Eng. The Sutra of the Vow of Fulfilling the Great Perpetual Enjoyment and Benefiting All Sentient Beings Without Exception (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)
Ch. Renwang banruo boluomi jing (仁王般若波羅蜜經)	245
Skt. *Kāraṇīkārajā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Ch. Banruo boluomiduo xin jing (般若波羅蜜多心經)	251
Skt. Prajñāpāramitāhṛdaya-sutra
Ch. Miaofa lianhua jing (妙法蓮華經)	262
Skt. Saddharmapuṇḍarīka-sutra
Eng. The Lotus Sutra (Revised Second Edition, 2007)
Ch. Wuliangyi jing (無量義經)	276
Eng. The Infinite Meanings Sutra (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Guan Puxian pusa xingfa jing (觀普賢菩薩行法經)	277
Eng. The Sutra Expounded by the Buddha on Practice of the Way through Contemplation of the Bodhisattva All-embracing Goodness (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Dafangguang fo huayan jing (大方廣佛華嚴經)	279
Skt. Avataṃsaka-sutra
Ch. Shengman shizihou yisheng defang bianfang guang jing (勝鬘師子吼一乘大方便廣經)	353
Skt. Śrīmālādevīsīmhanāda-sutra
Eng. The Sutra of Queen Śrīmālā of the Lion's Roar (2004)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Wuliangshou jing (無量壽經)	360
Skt. Sukhāvativyūha
Eng. The Larger Sutra on Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Guan wuliangshou fo jing (觀無量壽佛經)	365
Skt. *Amitāyurdhyāna-sutra
Eng. The Sutra on Contemplation of Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Amituo jing (阿彌陀經)	366
Skt. Sukhāvativyūha
Eng. The Smaller Sutra on Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Da banniepan jing (大般涅槃經)	374
Skt. Mahāparinirvana-sutra
Eng. The Nirvana Sutra (Volume I, 2013)
Ch. Fochuibo niepan lüeshuo jiaojie jing (佛垂般涅槃略說教誡經)	389
Eng. The Bequeathed Teaching Sutra (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Ch. Dizang pusa benyuan jing (地藏菩薩本願經)	412
Skt. *Kṣitigarbhapraṇidhāna-sutra
Ch. Banzhou sanmei jing (般舟三昧經)	418
Skt. Pratyutpanna-buddhasammukhāvasthita-samādhi-sutra
Eng. The Pratyutpanna Samādhi Sutra (1998)
Ch. Yaoshi liuli guang rulai benyuan gongde jing (藥師琉璃光如來本願功德經)	450
Skt. Bhaiṣajyaguru-vaidūrya-prabhāsa-pūrvapraṇidhāna-viśeṣavistara
Eng. The Scripture of Master of Medicine, Beryl Radiance Tathāgata (2018)
Ch. Mile xiasheng chengfo jing (彌勒下生成佛經)	454
Skt. *Maitreyavyākaraṇa
Eng. The Sutra that Expounds the Descent of Maitreya Buddha and His Enlightenment (2016)
Ch. Wenshushili wen jing (文殊師利問經)	468
Skt. *Mañjuśrīparipṛcchā
Eng. The Sutra of Mañjuśrī's Questions (2016)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Weimojie suoshuo jing (維摩詰所說經) Skt. Vimalakīrtinirdeśa-sutra Eng. The Vimalakīrti Sutra (2004)	475
Ch. Yueshangnü jing (月上女經) Skt. Candrottarādārikā-paripṛcchā Eng. The Sutra of the Girl Candrottarā (2018)	480
Ch. Zuochan sanmei jing (坐禪三昧經) Eng. The Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation (2009)	614
Ch. Damoduoluo chan jing (達磨多羅禪經)	618
Ch. Yuedeng sanmei jing (月燈三昧經) Skt. Samādhirāja-candrapradīpa-sutra	639
Ch. Shoulengyan sanmei jing (首楞嚴三昧經) Skt. Śūraṅgamasamādhi-sutra Eng. The Śūraṅgama Samādhi Sutra (1998)	642
Ch. Jinguang ming zuishengwang jing (金光明最勝王經) Skt. Suvarṇaprabhāsa-sutra	665
Ch. Dasheng rulengqie jing (大乘入楞伽經) Skt. Laṅkāvatāra-sutra	672
Ch. Jie shenmi jing (解深密經) Skt. Saṃdhinirmocana-sutra Eng. The Scripture on the Explication of Underlying Meaning (2000)	676
Ch. Yulanpen jing (盂蘭盆經) Skt. *Ullambana-sutra Eng. The Ullambana Sutra (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)	685
Ch. Sishierzhang jing (四十二章經) Eng. The Sutra of Forty-two Sections (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)	784
Ch. Dafanguang yuanjue xiuduoluo liaoyi jing (大方廣圓覺修多羅了義經) Eng. The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)	842
Ch. Da Biluzhena chengfo shenbian jiachi jing (大毘盧遮那成佛神變加持經)	848

Title	Taishō No.
Skt. Mahāvairocanābhisambodhi-vikurvītādhiṣṭhāna-vaipulyasūtrendra-rājanāma-dharmaparyāya Eng. The Vairocanābhisambodhi Sutra (2005)
Ch. Jinggangding yiqie rulai zhenshi she dasheng xianzheng dajiao wang jing (金剛頂一切如來真實攝大乘現證大教王經)	865
Skt. Sarvatathāgata-tattvasaṃgraha-mahāyānā-bhisamaya-mahākālparāja Eng. The Adamantine Pinnacle Sutra (in Two Esoteric Sutras , 2001)
Ch. Suxidi jieluo jing (蘇悉地羯囉經)	893
Skt. Susiddhikara-mahātantra-sāadhanopāyika-pāṭala Eng. The Susiddhikara Sutra (in Two Esoteric Sutras , 2001)
Ch. Modengqie jing (摩登伽經)	1300
Skt. *Mātāṅgī-sutra Eng. The Mātāṅga Sutra (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)
Ch. Mohe sengqi lü (摩訶僧祇律)	1425
Skt. *Mahāsāṃghika-vinaya
Ch. Sifen lü (四分律)	1428
Skt. *Dharmaguptaka-vinaya
Ch. Shanjianlü piposha (善見律毘婆沙)	1462
Pāli Samantapāsādikā
Ch. Fanwang jing (梵網經)	1484
Skt. *Brahmajāla-sutra Eng. The Brahmā's Net Sutra (2017)
Ch. Youposaijie jing (優婆塞戒經)	1488
Skt. Upāsakaśīla-sutra Eng. The Sutra on Upāsaka Precepts (1994)
Ch. Miaofa lianhua jing youbotishe (妙法蓮華經憂波提舍)	1519
Skt. Saddharmapuṇḍarīka-upadeśa Eng. The Commentary on the Lotus Sutra (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Shizha piposha lun (十住毘婆沙論)	1521
Skt. *Daśabhūmika-vibhāṣā
Ch. Fodijing lun (佛地經論)	1530
Skt. *Buddhabhūmisutra-śāstra Eng. The Interpretation of the Buddha Land (2002)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Apidamojushe lun (阿毘達磨俱舍論) Skt. Abhidharmakośa-bhāṣya	1558
Ch. Zhonglun (中論) Skt. Madhyamaka-śāstra	1564
Ch. Yūqie shidilun (瑜伽師地論) Skt. Yogācārabhūmi-śāstra	1579
Ch. Cheng weishi lun (成唯識論) Eng. Demonstration of Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1585
Ch. Weishi sanshilun song (唯識三十論頌) Skt. Triṃśikā Eng. The Thirty Verses on Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1586
Ch. Weishi ershi lun (唯識二十論) Skt. Viṃśatikā Eng. The Treatise in Twenty Verses on Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1590
Ch. She dasheng lun (攝大乘論) Skt. Mahāyānasamgraha Eng. The Summary of the Great Vehicle (Revised Second Edition, 2003)	1593
Ch. Bian zhongbian lun (辯中邊論) Skt. Madhyāntavibhāga Eng. Analysis of the Middle and Extremes (2021)	1600
Ch. Dasheng zhuangyanjing lun (大乘莊嚴經論) Skt. Mahāyānasūtrālamkāra	1604
Ch. Dasheng chengye lun (大乘成業論) Skt. Karmasiddhiprakaraṇa Eng. A Mahayana Demonstration on the Theme of Action (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1609
Ch. Jiuqing yisheng baoxing lun (究竟一乘寶性論) Skt. Ratnagotravibhāga-mahāyānottaratantra-śāstra	1611
Ch. Yinming ruzheng li lun (因明入正理論) Skt. Nyāyapraveśa	1630

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Dasheng ji pusa xue lun (大乘集菩薩學論) Skt. Śikṣāsamuccaya	1636
Ch. Jingangzhen lun (金剛針論) Skt. Vajrasūcī	1642
Ch. Zhang suozhi lun (彰所知論) Eng. The Treatise on the Elucidation of the Knowable (2004)	1645
Ch. Putixing jing (菩提行經) Skt. Bodhicaryāvatāra	1662
Ch. Jingangding yuqie zhongfa anouduoluo sanmiao sanputi xin lun (金剛頂瑜伽中發阿耨多羅三藐三菩提心論) Eng. The Bodhicitta Śāstra (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)	1665
Ch. Dasheng qixin lun (大乘起信論) Skt. *Mahāyānaśraddhotpāda-śāstra Eng. The Awakening of Faith (2005)	1666
Ch. Shimoheyan lun (釋摩訶衍論)	1668
Ch. Naxian biqu jing (那先比丘經) Pāli Milindapañhā Eng. The Scripture on the Monk Nagasena (2021)	1670
Ch. Banruo boluomiduo xin jing yuzan (般若波羅蜜多心經幽贊) Eng. A Comprehensive Commentary on the Heart Sutra ( Prajñāpāramitā-hṛdaya-sutra ) (2001)	1710
Ch. Miaofalianhua jing xuanyi (妙法蓮華經玄義)	1716
Ch. Guan wuliangshou fo jing shu (觀無量壽佛經疏)	1753
Ch. Sanlun xuanyi (三論玄義)	1852
Ch. Dasheng xuan lun (大乘玄論)	1853
Ch. Zhao lun (肇論) Eng. Essays of Sengzhao (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1858
Ch. Huayan yisheng jiaoyi fenqi zhang (華嚴一乘教義分齊章)	1866
Ch. Yuanren lun (原人論) Eng. Treatise on the Origin of Humanity (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1886

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Mohe zhiguan (摩訶止觀)	1911
Ch. Xiuxi zhiguan zuochan fayao (修習止觀坐禪法要)	1915
Ch. Tiantai sijiao yi (天台四教儀)	1931
Eng. A Guide to the Tiantai Fourfold Teachings (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Guoqing bai lu (國清百錄)	1934
Eng. The Hundred Records of the Temple of National Purity (2022)
Ch. Zhenzhou Linji Huizhao chanshi wulu (鎮州臨濟慧照禪師語錄)	1985
Eng. The Recorded Sayings of Linji (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)
Ch. Foguo Yuanwu chanshi biyan lu (佛果圓悟禪師碧巖錄)	2003
Eng. The Blue Cliff Record (1998)
Ch. Wumen guan (無門關)	2005
Eng. Wumen's Gate (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)
Ch. Liuzu dashi fabao tan jing (六祖大師法寶壇經)	2008
Eng. The Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch (2000)
Ch. Xinxin ming (信心銘)	2010
Eng. The Faith-Mind Maxim (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)
Ch. Huangboshan Duanji chanshi chuanxin fayao (黃檗山斷際禪師傳心法要)	2012A
Eng. Essentials of the Transmission of Mind (in Zen Texts , 2005)
Ch. Yongjia Zhengdao ge (永嘉證道歌)	2014
Eng. Yongjia's Song of Actualizing the Way (2022)
Ch. Chixiu Baizhang qinggui (勅修百丈清規)	2025
Eng. The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations (2007)
Ch. Yibuzonglun lun (異部宗輪論)	2031
Skt. Samayabhedoparacanacakra
Eng. The Cycle of the Formation of the Schismatic Doctrines (2004)
Ch. Ayuwang jing (阿育王經)	2043
Skt. Aśokāvadāna
Eng. The Biographical Scripture of King Aśoka (1993)
Ch. Maming pusa zhuan (馬鳴菩薩傳)	2046
Eng. The Life of Aśvaghoṣa Bodhisattva (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Longshu pusa zhuan (龍樹菩薩傳)	2047
Eng. The Life of Nāgārjuna Bodhisattva (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)
Ch. Posoupandou fashi zhuan (婆藪槃豆法師傳)	2049
Eng. Biography of Dharma Master Vasubandhu (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)
Ch. Datang Daciensi Zanzang fashi zhuan (大唐大慈恩寺三藏法師傳)	2053
Eng. A Biography of the Tripiṭaka Master of the Great Ci'en Monastery of the Great Tang Dynasty (1995)
Ch. Gaoseng zhuan (高僧傳)	2059
Ch. Biqiuni zhuan (比丘尼傳)	2063
Eng. Biographies of Buddhist Nuns (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)
Ch. Gaoseng Faxian zhuan (高僧法顯傳)	2085
Eng. The Journey of the Eminent Monk Faxian (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)
Ch. Datang xiyu ji (大唐西域記)	2087
Eng. The Great Tang Dynasty Record of the Western Regions (1996)
Ch. Youfangjichao: Tangdaheshangdongzheng zhuan (遊方記抄: 唐大和上東征傳)	2089-(7)
Ch. Hongming ji (弘明集)	2102
Eng. The Collection for the Propagation and Clarification of Buddhism (Volume I, 2015) The Collection for the Propagation and Clarification of Buddhism (Volume II, 2017)
Ch. Fayuan zhulin (法苑珠林)	2122
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume I, 2019)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume II, 2019)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume III, 2020)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume IV, 2020)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume V, 2022)
Ch. Nanhai jigui neifa zhuan (南海寄歸內法傳)	2125
Eng. Buddhist Monastic Traditions of Southern Asia (2000)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Fanyu zaming (梵語雜名)	2135
Jp. Shōmangyō gisho (勝鬘經義疏)	2185
Eng. Prince Shōtoku's Commentary on the Śrīmālā Sutra (2011)
Jp. Yuimakyō gisho (維摩經義疏)	2186
Eng. The Expository Commentary on the Vimalakīrti Sutra (2012)
Jp. Hokke gisho (法華義疏)	2187
Jp. Hannya shingyō hiken (般若心經秘鍵)	2203A
Jp. Daijō hossō kenjin shō (大乘法相研神章)	2309
Jp. Kanjin kakumu shō (觀心覺夢鈔)	2312
Eng. Observing the Mind, Awakening from a Dream (2022)
Jp. Risshū kōyō (律宗綱要)	2348
Eng. The Essentials of the Vinaya Tradition (1995)
Jp. Tendai hokke shūgi shū (天台法華宗義集)	2366
Eng. The Collected Teachings of the Tendai Lotus School (1995)
Jp. Kenkairon (顯戒論)	2376
Jp. Sange gakushō shiki (山家學生式)	2377
Jp. Hizōhōyaku (秘藏寶鑰)	2426
Eng. The Precious Key to the Secret Treasury (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Benkenmitsu nikyō ron (辨顯密二教論)	2427
Eng. On the Differences between the Exoteric and Esoteric Teachings (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Sokushin jōbutsu gi (即身成佛義)	2428
Eng. The Meaning of Becoming a Buddha in This Very Body (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Shōji jissōgi (聲字實相義)	2429
Eng. The Meanings of Sound, Sign, and Reality (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Unjigi (吽字義)	2430
Eng. The Meanings of the Word Hūṃ (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Gorin kuji myōhimitsu shaku (五輪九字明秘密釋)	2514
Eng. The Illuminating Secret Commentary on the Five Cakras and the Nine Syllables (in Shingon Texts , 2004)

Title	Taishō No.
Jp. Mitsugonin hotsuro sange mon (密嚴院發露懺悔文) Eng. The Mitsugonin Confession (in Shingon Texts , 2004)	2527
Jp. Kōzen gokoku ron (興禪護國論) Eng. A Treatise on Letting Zen Flourish to Protect the State (in Zen Texts , 2005)	2543
Jp. Fukan zazengi (普勸坐禪儀) Eng. A Universal Recommendation for True Zazen (in Zen Texts , 2005)	2580
Jp. Shōbōgenzō (正法眼藏) Eng. Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume I, 2007) Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume II, 2008) Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume III, 2008) Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume IV, 2008)	2582
Jp. Zazen yōjin ki (坐禪用心記) Eng. Advice on the Practice of Zazen (in Zen Texts , 2005)	2586
Jp. Senchaku hongan nenbutsu shū (選擇本願念佛集) Eng. Senchaku Hongan Nembutsu Shū: A Collection of Passages on the Nembutsu Chosen in the Original Vow (1997)	2608
Jp. Kenjōdo shinjitsu kyōgyō shōmon rui (顯淨土真實教行証文類) Eng. Kyōgyōshinshō: On Teaching, Practice, Faith, and Enlightenment (2003)	2646
Jp. Tannishō (歎異抄) Eng. Tannishō: Passages Deploring Deviations of Faith (1996)	2661
Jp. Rennyō shōnin ofumi (蓮如上人御文) Eng. Rennyō Shōnin Ofumi: The Letters of Rennyō (1996)	2668
Jp. Ōjōyōshū (往生要集)	2682
Jp. Risshō ankoku ron (立正安國論) Eng. Risshōankokuron or The Treatise on the Establishment of the Orthodox Teaching and the Peace of the Nation (in Two Nichiren Texts , 2003)	2688
Jp. Kaimokushō (開目抄) Eng. Kaimokushō or Liberation from Blindness (2000)	2689

Jp.	Kanjin honzon shō (觀心本尊抄)	2692
Eng.	Kanjinhonzonshō or The Most Venerable One Revealed by Introspecting Our Minds for the First Time at the Beginning of the Fifth of the Five Five Hundred-year Ages (in Two Nichiren Texts , 2003)
Ch.	Fumu enzhong jing (父母恩重經)	2887
Eng.	The Sutra on the Profundity of Filial Love (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Jp.	Hasshūkōyō (八宗綱要)	extracanonial
Eng.	The Essentials of the Eight Traditions (1994)
Jp.	Sangō shīki (三教指帰)	extracanonial
Jp.	Mappō tōmyō ki (末法燈明記)	extracanonial
Eng.	The Candle of the Latter Dharma (1994)
Jp.	Jūshichijō kenpō (十七條憲法)	extracanonial

THE MADHYAMA ĀGAMA
(MIDDLE-LENGTH DISCOURSES)
VOLUME IV

dBET PDF Version

© 2023

All Rights Reserved

BDK English Tripiṭaka Series

THE MADHYAMA ĀGAMA
(MIDDLE-LENGTH DISCOURSES)
VOLUME IV

(Taishō Volume 1, Number 26)

Edited by

Bhikkhu Anālayo and Roderick S. Bucknell

BDK America, Inc.
2023

As an act of Dhammadāna, Bhikkhu Anālayo has waived
payment for the translation of The Madhyama Āgama
(Middle-length Discourses), Volumes II–IV.

Copyright © 2023 by Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai and
BDK America, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transcribed in any form or by any means —electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise—without the prior written permission of the publisher.

First Printing, 2023
ISBN: 978-1-886439-89-4
Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 2013943512

Published by
BDK America, Inc.
1675 School Street
Moraga, California 94556

Printed in the United States of America

A Message on the Publication of the English Tripiṭaka

The Buddhist canon is said to contain eighty-four thousand different teachings. I believe that this is because the Buddha's basic approach was to prescribe a different treatment for every spiritual ailment, much as a doctor prescribes a different medicine for every medical ailment. Thus his teachings were always appropriate for the particular suffering individual and for the time at which the teaching was given, and over the ages not one of his prescriptions has failed to relieve the suffering to which it was addressed.

Ever since the Buddha's Great Demise over twenty-five hundred years ago, his message of wisdom and compassion has spread throughout the world. Yet no one has ever attempted to translate the entire Buddhist canon into English throughout the history of Japan. It is my greatest wish to see this done and to make the translations available to the many English-speaking people who have never had the opportunity to learn about the Buddha's teachings.

Of course, it would be impossible to translate all of the Buddha's eighty-four thousand teachings in a few years. I have, therefore, had one hundred thirty-nine of the scriptural texts in the prodigious Taishō edition of the Chinese Buddhist canon selected for inclusion in the First Series of this translation project.

It is in the nature of this undertaking that the results are bound to be criticized. Nonetheless, I am convinced that unless someone takes it upon himself or herself to initiate this project, it will never be done. At the same time, I hope that an improved, revised edition will appear in the future.

It is most gratifying that, thanks to the efforts of more than a hundred Buddhist scholars from the East and the West, this monumental project has finally gotten off the ground. May the rays of the Wisdom of the Compassionate One reach each and every person in the world.

NUMATA Yehan
Founder of the English
Tripiṭaka Project

August 7, 1991

Editorial Foreword

In the long history of Buddhist transmission throughout East Asia, translations of Buddhist texts were often carried out as national projects supported and funded by emperors and political leaders. The BDK English Tripiṭaka project, on the other hand, began as a result of the dream and commitment of one man. In January 1982 Dr. NUMATA Yehan, founder of Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai (Society for the Promotion of Buddhism), initiated the monumental task of translating the complete Taishō shinshū daizōkyō edition of the Chinese Tripiṭaka (Buddhist canon) into the English language. Under his leadership, a special preparatory committee was organized in April 1982. By July of the same year the Translation Committee of the English Tripiṭaka was officially convened.

The initial Committee included the following members: (late) HANAYAMA Shōyū (Chairperson), (late) BANDŌ Shōjun, (late) ISHIGAMI Zennō, (late) KAMATA Shigeo, (late) KANAOKA Shūyū, MAYEDA Sengaku, (late) NARA Yasuaki, (late) SAYEKI Shinkō, (late) SHIOIRI Ryōtatsu, (late) TAMARU Noriyoshi, (late) TAMURA Kwansei, (late) URYŪZU Ryūshin, and (late) YUYAMA Akira. Assistant members of the Committee were as follows: KANAZAWA Atsushi, WATANABE Shōgo, Rolf Giebel of New Zealand, and Rudy Smet of Belgium.

After holding planning meetings on a monthly basis, the Committee selected one hundred and thirty-nine texts for the First Series of the project, estimated to be one hundred printed volumes in all. The texts selected were not limited to those originally written in India but also included works composed in China and Japan. While the publication of the First Series proceeds, the texts for the Second Series will be selected from among the remaining works; this process will continue until all the texts, in Japanese as well as in Chinese, have been published. Given the huge scope of this project, accomplishing the English translations of all the Chinese and Japanese texts in the Taishō canon may take as long as one hundred years or more. Nevertheless, as Dr. NUMATA wished, it is the sincere hope of the Committee that this project will continue until completion, even after all the present members have passed away.

Dr. NUMATA passed away on May 5, 1994, at the age of ninety-seven. He entrusted his son, Mr. NUMATA Toshihide with the continuation and completion of the English Tripiṭaka project. Mr. Numata served for twenty-three years, leading the project forward with enormous progress before his sudden passing on February 16, 2017, at the age of eighty-four. The Committee previously lost its able and devoted first Chairperson, Professor HANAYAMA Shōyū, on June 16, 1995, at the age of sixty-three. In October 1995 the Committee elected Professor MAYEDA Sengaku (then Vice President of Musashino Women's College) as Chairperson, and upon the retirement of Professor Mayeda in July 2016, the torch was passed to me to serve as the third Chairperson. Despite these losses and changes we, the Editorial Committee members, have renewed our determination to carry out the noble ideals set by Dr. NUMATA. Present members of the Committee are Kenneth K. Tanaka (Chairperson), MAYEDA Sengaku, ICHISHIMA Shōshin, KATSURA Shōryū, MINOWA Kenryō, SAITŌ Akira, SHIMODA Masahiro, WATANABE Shōgo, and YONEZAWA Yoshiyasu.

The Numata Center for Buddhist Translation and Research was established in November 1984, in Berkeley, California, U.S.A., to assist in the publication of the translated texts. The Publication Committee was organized at the Numata Center in December 1991. In 2010, the Numata Center's operations were merged with Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai America, Inc. (BDK America), and BDK America continues to oversee the publication side of the English Tripiṭaka project in close cooperation with the Editorial Committee in Tokyo.

At the time of this writing, in July 2017, the project has completed about sixty-five percent of the seven thousand one hundred and eighty-five Taishō pages of texts selected for the First Series. Much work still lies ahead of us but we are committed to the completion of the remaining texts in order to realize the grand vision of Dr. Numata, shared by Mr. Numata and Professor Hanayama, to make the Buddhist canon more readily accessible to the English-speaking world.

Kenneth K. Tanaka
Chairperson
Editorial Committee of
the BDK English Tripiṭaka

Publisher's Foreword

On behalf of the members of the Publication Committee, I am happy to present this volume as the latest contribution to the BDK English Tripiṭaka Series. The Publication Committee members have worked to ensure that this volume, as all other volumes in the series, has gone through a rigorous process of editorial efforts.

The initial translation and editing of the Buddhist scriptures found in this and other BDK English Tripiṭaka volumes are performed under the direction of the Editorial Committee in Tokyo, Japan. Both the Editorial Committee in Tokyo and the Publication Committee, headquartered in Moraga, California, are dedicated to the production of accurate and readable English translations of the Buddhist canon. In doing so, the members of both committees and associated staff work to honor the deep faith, spirit, and concern of the late Reverend Dr. Yehan Numata, who founded the BDK English Tripiṭaka Series in order to disseminate the Buddhist teachings throughout the world.

The long-term goal of our project is the translation and publication of the texts in the one hundred-volume Taishō edition of the Chinese Buddhist canon, along with a number of influential extracanonical Japanese Buddhist texts. The list of texts selected for the First Series of this translation project may be found at the end of each volume in the series.

As Chair of the Publication Committee, I am deeply honored to serve as the fifth person in a post previously held by leading figures in the field of Buddhist studies, most recently by my predecessor, John R. McRae.

In conclusion, I wish to thank the members of the Publication Committee for their dedicated and expert work undertaken in the course of preparing this volume for publication: Managing Editor Marianne Dresser, Dr. Hudaya Kandahjaya, Dr. Carl Bielefeldt, Dr. Robert Sharf, and Rev. Brian Kensho Nagata, Director of the BDK English Tripiṭaka Project.

A. Charles Muller
Chairperson
Publication Committee

Contents

A Message on the Publication of the English Tripiṭaka
	NUMATA Yehan	v
Editorial Foreword	Kenneth K. Tanaka	vii
Publisher's Foreword	A. Charles Muller	ix
Translation Editors' Introduction	Bhikkhu Anālayo and Roderick S. Bucknell	xiii
The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses), Volume IV
Division 15. On Pairs
182. The Discourse at Assapura (1)		3
183. The Discourse at Assapura (2)		8
184. The Discourse in the Gosiṅga Sāla Forest (1)		13
185. The Discourse in the Gosiṅga Sāla Forest (2)		24
186. The Discourse on Investigating		32
187. The Discourse on Declaring the Knowledge [of Awakening]		36
188. The Discourse to Ajita		46
189. The Discourse on the Noble Path		52
190. The Shorter Discourse on Emptiness		58
191. The Greater Discourse on Emptiness		63
Division 16. The Second [Great] Division
192. The Discourse on Kāḷudāyin		77
193. The Discourse on Moliya Phaggaṇa		91
194. The Discourse to Bhaddāli		101
195. The Discourse to Assaji		116
196. The Discourse to Cuṇḍa		129
197. The Discourse to Upāli		143
198. The Discourse on the Stages of Taming		149
199. The Discourse on the Stages of the Fool and the Wise		159

Contents

200. The Discourse on [the Monk] Aritṭha	177
201. The Discourse on [the Monk] Sāti	191
Division 17. On Potaliya
202. The Discourse on the Uposatha	211
203. The Discourse to Potaliya	222
204. The Discourse at Rammaka's [Hermitage]	235
205. The Discourse on the Five Lower Fetters	249
206. The Discourse on Mental Defilements	257
207. The Discourse to Sakuludāyī (1)	262
208. The Discourse to Sakuludāyī (2)	270
209. The Discourse to Vekhanassa	284
210. The Discourse by the Nun Dhammanandā	291
211. The Discourse by Mahākoṭṭhita	302
Division 18. Ordered Expositions
212. The Discourse on Omniscience	315
213. The Discourse on Adornments of the Dharma	328
214. The Discourse on the Bāhitika Cloth	337
215. The Discourse on Attaining the Best	345
216. The Discourse on What Arises from Affection	350
217. The Discourse at Aṭṭhakanāgara	355
218. The [First] Discourse by Anuruddha	359
219. The [Second] Discourse by Anuruddha	361
220. The Discourse on Views	363
221. The Discourse with the Simile of the Arrow	365
222. The Discourse on Ordered Expositions	371
Appendix: Tables of Parallels	391
Notes	425
Bibliography	449
Index	453
A List of the Volumes of the BDK English Tripiṭaka (First Series)	469

Introduction to Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) Volume IV

This volume represents the fourth and final installment of The Madhyama-āgama (Middle-Length Discourses), completing the four-volume set of translations for the BDK English Tripiṭaka (First Series). Volume I appeared in 2013, Volume II in 2018, and Volume III in 2022. This volume includes the discourses numbered 182 to 222 in Divisions 15 to 18.

Discourse Parallels

Comparing the Madhyama-āgama version of a discourse with its parallel(s) in the Pāli canon and elsewhere reveals varying degrees of closeness, as regards both their essential message and the details of their wording. Such closeness is the main criterion by which researchers identify discourse parallels; and because there are varying degrees of closeness, researchers sometimes disagree in their identifications. Further complicating the notion of parallels is the occasional existence of “partial parallels,” cases where, for example, a certain Chinese discourse is matched by just one part of a Pāli discourse—or the converse of this situation. In the endnotes to each volume and in the tables of parallels that appear in this volume such cases are marked with an asterisk (*).

What the phenomenon of discourse parallels signifies in terms of the historical development of the texts remains a controversial question. A common interpretation is that a given discourse and its parallel(s) are divergent descendants of what was originally a single ancestral discourse; that is, that they are variously remembered records of a teaching delivered on a certain occasion by the Buddha or one of his immediate disciples. Wide geographical separation of monastic communities, perhaps combined with translation into different dialects, could have eventually led to the development of regional variants of imperfectly memorized oral texts. In such ways the vicissitudes of oral transmission could have resulted in the splitting of a formerly unitary discourse into two or more related but distinct parallel versions. This is probably an oversimplification; but despite such uncertainties, there is no denying that comparison of discourse parallels is both a valuable aid in translating difficult texts and a powerful tool in researching early Buddhism.

A good example is the last discourse in the previous volume, the “Discourse on Many Elements” (MĀ 181). It differs from its Pāli parallel, the Bahudhātuka-sutta (MN 115), which stipulates that a woman cannot be a buddha. Closer inspection of the context makes it fair to conclude that the Madhyama-āgama discourse has preserved an earlier version of this exposition, when the notion of what is impossible for a woman had not yet impacted this discourse; see Bhikkhu Anālayo, Madhyama-āgama Studies (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2012), pp. 249–288. Several other discourses in the Madhyama-āgama offer similarly significant indications (a survey can be found in Bhikkhu Anālayo, “Selected Madhyama-āgama Discourse Passages and Their Pāli Parallels,” Dharma Drum Journal of Buddhist Studies 19 [2016]: 1–61). This makes it fruitful to consult the translations provided in this and the other volumes alongside their Pāli counterparts.

For the convenience of researchers, relevant information on known discourse parallels to the Madhyama-āgama is summarized in two tables (Tables 1 and 2, compiled by Roderick S. Bucknell), found in the Appendix at the back of this volume. These tables bring together the principal data on parallels contained in the endnotes to the translations. Table 1 is designed for finding the Pāli parallel(s) to a given Chinese Madhyama-āgama discourse; Table 2 is for finding the Chinese Madhyama-āgama parallel(s) to a given Pāli discourse.

THE MADHYAMA ĀGAMA
(MIDDLE-LENGTH DISCOURSES)
VOLUME IV

Division 15

On Pairs

182. The Discourse at Assapura<sup>1</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha, who was dwelling in the country of Aṅga together with a large sangha of monks, approached Assapura and stayed with that sangha of monks in a forest retreat at Assa[pura].

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks, “People regard you renunciants as renunciants. When people ask if you are renunciants, do you claim to be renunciants?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The Buddha said further:

This being the case, because of this, you need to be [true] renunciants. You should train according to the Dharma of the renunciant, according to the Dharma of the brahmin. Training according to the Dharma of the renunciant, according to the Dharma of the brahmin, you will be true renunciants, not fake renunciants. Then if you receive robes and blankets, food and drink, beds and bedding, medicine, or the various other requisites of life, those who provide them will gain great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and ample reward. This is how you should train.

How [does one train] according to the Dharma of the renunciant, according to the Dharma of the brahmin? You should purify your bodily conduct, openly and overtly, being well restrained and without deficiency.<sup>2</sup> You should not, on account of this purity, exalt yourselves or disparage others. Be without contamination, without pollution, worthy of praise by your wise companions in the holy life. 725a

You may think this: “My bodily conduct is pure, I have done what had to be done; there is no more need to train. I have already accomplished the essence of virtue; there is nothing further to do.”

Monks, I tell you: In seeking the essence of renunciantship do not fall short of the essence of renunciants'hip! If you wish to seek and train further, then monks, if you have bodily purity, what should you do next?

You should train in purifying your verbal conduct, openly and overtly, being well restrained and without deficiency. You should not, on account of this purity of verbal conduct, exalt yourselves or disparage others. Be without contamination, without pollution, worthy of praise by your wise companions in the holy life.

You may think this: "My bodily and verbal conduct are pure, I have done what had to be done; there is no more need to train. I have already accomplished the essence of virtue; there is nothing further to do."

Monks, I tell you: In seeking the essence of renunciants'hip do not fall short of the essence of renunciants'hip! If you wish to seek and train further, then monks, if you have bodily and verbal purity, what should you do next?

You should train in purifying your mental conduct, openly and overtly, being well restrained and without deficiency. You should not, on account of this purity of mental conduct, exalt yourselves or disparage others. Be without contamination, without pollution, worthy of praise by your wise companions in the holy life.

You may think this: "My conduct, bodily, verbal, and mental, is pure; I have done what had to be done; there is no more need to train. I have already accomplished the essence of virtue; there is nothing further to do."

Monks, I tell you: In seeking the essence of renunciants'hip do not fall short of the essence of renunciants'hip! If you wish to seek and train further, then monks, if you have bodily, verbal, and mental purity, what should you do next?

You should train in purifying your livelihood, openly and overtly, being well restrained and without deficiency. You should not, on account of this purity of livelihood, exalt yourselves or disparage others. Be without contamination, without pollution, worthy of praise by your wise companions in the holy life.

You may think this: "My bodily, verbal, and mental conduct and my livelihood are pure, I have done what had to be done; there is no more need to train. I have already accomplished the essence of virtue; there is nothing further to do."

Monks, I tell you: In seeking the essence of renunciantship do not fall short of the essence of renunciantship! If you wish to seek and train further, then monks, if you have bodily, verbal, and mental purity and purity of livelihood, what should you do next?

Monks, you should train in guarding the sense faculties, always mindful of shutting out thoughts of desire, successfully guarding the mind with clear understanding and attaining perfection [therein], constantly striving to arouse the mind:

On seeing a form with the eye, do not grasp at its features or savor the form. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, guard the eye faculty so that no covetousness, sadness, worry, [or any other] evil and unwholesome state arises in the mind—for this purpose guard the eye faculty. In the same way, [on hearing a sound with] the ear . . . [on smelling an odor with] the nose . . . [on tasting a flavor with] the tongue . . . [on experiencing a tangible with] the body . . . On cognizing a mind-object with the mind do not grasp at its features or savor the mind-object. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, guard the mind faculty so that no covetousness, sadness, worry, [or any other] evil and unwholesome state arises in the mind—for this purpose guard the mind faculty.

725b

You may think this: “My bodily, verbal, and mental conduct and my livelihood are pure, and I am guarding the sense faculties. I have done what had to be done; there is no more need to train. I have already accomplished the essence of virtue; there is nothing further to do.”

Monks, I tell you: In seeking the essence of renunciantship do not fall short of the essence of renunciantship! If you wish to seek and train further, then monks, if you have bodily, verbal, and mental purity and purity of livelihood, and you are guarding the sense faculties, what should you do next?<sup>3</sup>

Monks, you should train in right comprehension when going out or coming in, contemplating and distinguishing well [when] bending or stretching [a limb], [or when] looking up or looking down; with orderly manners and appearance, properly wearing the outer robe, the other robes, and holding the bowl; [when] walking, standing, sitting, or reclining, [when] sleeping or awake, [when] speaking or keeping silent, do all of these with right comprehension.<sup>4</sup>

You may think this: “My bodily, verbal, and mental conduct and my livelihood are pure, I am guarding the sense faculties, and I have right comprehension when going out or coming in [and so on]. I have done what had to be done; there is no more need to train. I have already accomplished the essence of virtue; there is nothing further to do.”

Monks, I tell you: In seeking the essence of renunciantship do not fall short of the essence of renunciantship! If you wish to seek and train further then, monks, if you have bodily, verbal, and mental purity and purity of livelihood, if you are guarding the sense faculties and have right comprehension when going out or coming in [and so on], what should you do next?

A monk should train in dwelling alone in a secluded place in a forest, or in an empty and peaceful place at the base of a tree, or in a mountain cave, or on a heap of straw in the open, whether in a forest or in a cemetery.

Having gone to a forest, or to an empty and peaceful place at the base of a tree, they spread their sitting mat and sit down cross-legged with upright body and upright aspiration, and establish unwavering mindfulness. They abandon and remove covetousness. With their mind free of agitation, on seeing others’ wealth and all their requisites of life, they do not give rise to covetousness with the wish, “May I get it!” They purify their mind of covetousness. In the same way, they abandon ill will . . . sloth-and-torpor . . . restlessness-and-worry. . . . They abandon doubt and overcome uncertainty. Freeing themselves of vacillation in regard to wholesome states, they purify their mind of doubt.

Having abandoned these five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . they dwell having attained the fourth absorption.

When they have thus attained concentration, with a mind that is purified, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having attained imperturbability, they direct their mind toward knowledge and realization of the destruction of the taints.<sup>5</sup>

They come to know: “This is dukkha,” as it really is; they come to know: “This is the arising of dukkha” . . . they come to know: “This is the cessation of dukkha” . . . they come to know: “This is the path leading to the cessation of dukkha,” as it really is.

They come to know: “These are the taints” as it really is; they come to know: “This is the arising of the taints” . . . they come to know: “This is the cessation of the taints” . . . they come to know: “This is the path leading to the cessation of the taints,” as it really is.

When they have come to know and see like this, their mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire, from the taint of becoming, and liberated from the taint of ignorance. Being liberated, they know they are liberated, understanding as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence.” This is called being a [true] renunciant, this is called being a [true] brahmin, this is called being a noble one, this is called being one who is purified [through having] “bathed.”<sup>6</sup> 725c

What is a [true] renunciant? It is one who has allayed all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants that are the root of future becoming, that have suffering and vexation as their result, that are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death—this is what is meant by a [true] renunciant.

What is a [true] brahmin? It is one who is far removed from all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants that are the root of future becoming, that have suffering and vexation as their result, that are the cause of birth, old age, disease and death—this is what is meant by a [true] brahmin.

What is a noble one? It is one who is far removed from all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants that are the root of future becoming, that have suffering and vexation as their result, that are the cause of birth, old age, disease and death—this is what is meant by a noble one.

What is one who is purified [through having] “bathed”? It is one who [through an inner] “bathing” has purified themselves of all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants that are the root of future becoming, that have suffering and vexation as their result, that are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death—this is what is meant by one who is purified [through having] “bathed.”

This is what is meant by a [true] renunciant, this is what is meant by a [true] brahmin, this is what is meant by a noble one, this is what is meant by one who is purified.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

183. The Discourse at Assapura (2)<sup>7</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha, who was dwelling in the country of Anga together with a large sangha of monks, approached Assapura and stayed with that sangha of monks in a forest retreat at Assa[pura].

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks, “People regard you renunciants as renunciants. When people ask you if you are renunciants, do you claim to be renunciants?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The Buddha said further:

This being the case, because of this, you need to be [true] renunciants. You should train in the path of the renunciant. Do not be nonrenunciants. Training in the path of the renunciant, you will be true renunciants, not fake renunciants. Then if you receive robes and blankets, food and drink, beds and bedding, medicine, or the various other requisites of life, those who provide them will gain great merit, great fruit, great virtue, great and ample reward. This is how you should train.

726a

What is the path of the nonrenunciant? What is a nonrenunciant? If one who is covetous does not allay their covetousness, if one who has ill will does not allay their ill will, if one who has anger does not allay their anger, if one who is uncommunicative does not allay their uncommunicativeness, if one who has fetters does not allay their fetters, if one who is avaricious does not allay their avarice, if one who is envious does not allay their envy, if one who is flattering does not allay their flattery, if one who is deceitful does not allay their deceit, if one who is shameless does not allay their shamelessness, if one who lacks scruples does not allay their lack of scruples, if one who has evil desires does not allay their evil desires, if one who has wrong view does not allay their wrong view—if one does not eradicate a renunciant’s defilement, a renunciant’s flattery, a renunciant’s deception, a renunciant’s deviousness, which lead toward a bad destiny, then they are training in the path of the nonrenunciant; they are a nonrenunciant.

Such a one is like a battle ax, with cutting edge and blade, newly made and extremely sharp, which is wrapped up in a monk's robe. Just like this, I say, is that foolish one training in the path of the renunciant.

That is to say, if one who is covetous does not allay their covetousness, if one who has ill will does not allay their ill will, if one who has anger does not allay their anger, if one who is uncommunicative does not allay their uncommunicativeness, if one who has fetters does not allay their fetters, if one who is avaricious does not allay their avarice, if one who is envious does not allay their envy, if one who is flattering does not allay their flattery, if one who is deceitful does not allay their deceit, if one who is shameless does not allay their shamelessness, if one who lacks scruples does not allay their lack of scruples, if one who has evil desires does not allay their evil desires, if one who has wrong view does not allay their wrong view—then [even though] they are wearing the monk's robes, I do not call such a one a renunciant.

If it were the case that anyone who donned the monk's robes, being covetous allayed their covetousness, having ill will allayed their ill will, having anger allayed their anger, being uncommunicative allayed their uncommunicativeness, having fetters allayed their fetters, being avaricious allayed their avarice, being envious allayed their envy, being flattering allayed their flattery, being deceitful allayed their deceit, being shameless allayed their shamelessness, lacking scruples allayed their lack of scruples, having evil desires allayed the evil desires, having wrong view allayed their wrong view—[if this were the case], then all their dear friends would approach them and say, “Venerable one, you should train in wearing the monk's robes. Venerable one, if you train in wearing the monk's robes, that will allay any covetousness that you may have, allay any ill will that you may have, allay any anger that you may have, allay any uncommunicativeness that you may have, allay any fetters that you may have, allay any avarice that you may have, allay any envy that you may have, allay any flattery that you may have, [allay any deceit that you may have], allay any shamelessness that you may have, allay any lack of scruples that you may have, allay any evil desires that you may have, allay any wrong view that you may have.”<sup>8</sup>

However, because I see those who wear the monk's robes being covetous, having ill will, having anger, being uncommunicative, having fetters, being avaricious, being envious, being flattering, [being deceitful], being shameless, lacking scruples, having evil desires, or having wrong view—therefore I declare that [just] wearing the monk's robes does not make one a renunciant.

In the same way for practicing nudity . . . wearing matted locks . . . practicing never sitting down . . . eating only once [a day] . . . constantly practicing purification with water, upholding [purification with] water. I declare that [just] upholding [purification with] water does not make one a renunciant.

726b

If it were the case that upholding [purification with] water allayed any covetousness that one might have, allayed any ill will that one might have, allayed any anger that one might have, allayed any uncommunicativeness that one might have, allayed any fetters that one might have, allayed any avarice that one might have, allayed any envy that one might have, allayed any flattery that one might have, [allayed any deceit that one might have], allayed any shamelessness that one might have, allayed any lack of scruples that one might have, allayed any evil desires that one might have, allayed any wrong view that one might have—if this were the case, then one's dear friends would come and say, "Venerable one, you should train in upholding [purification with] water. If you train in upholding [purification with] water, that will allay any covetousness that you may have, allay any ill will that you may have, allay any anger that you may have, allay any uncommunicativeness that you may have, allay any fetters that you may have, allay any avarice that you may have, allay any envy that you may have, allay any flattery that you may have, [allay any deceit that you may have], allay any shamelessness that you may have, allay any lack of scruples that you may have, allay any evil desires that you may have, allay any wrong view that you may have."

However, because I see those who uphold [purification with] water being covetous, having ill will, having anger, being uncommunicative, having fetters, being avaricious, being envious, being flattering, [being deceitful], being shameless, lacking scruples, having evil desires, or having wrong view—therefore I declare that [just] upholding [purification with] water does not make one a renunciant. This is what is meant by the path of the nonrenunciant, by being a nonrenunciant.

What is the path of the renunciant? What is not being a nonrenunciant? If one allays any covetousness that one may have, allays any ill will that one may have, allays any anger that one may have, allays any uncommunicativeness that one may have, allays any fetters that one may have, allays any avarice that one may have, allays any envy that one may have, allays any flattery that one may have, [allays any deceit that one may have], allays any shamelessness that one may have, allays any lack of scruples that one may have, allays any evil desires that one may have, allays any wrong view that one may have—then, having eradicated a renunciant’s envy,<sup>9</sup> a renunciant’s flattery, a renunciant’s deception, a renunciant’s deviousness, which lead toward a bad destiny, one is training in the path of the renunciant, one is not a nonrenunciant. This is what is meant by the path of the renunciant, by not being a nonrenunciant.

Having in this way accomplished morality and bodily, verbal, and mental purity, one [cultivates] a mind that is free of covetousness, free of ill will, free of sloth-and-torpor, free of restlessness-and-worry, and eradicating doubt and going beyond perplexity, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, without bewilderment.<sup>10</sup>

With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, one dwells [mentally] pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth directions, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, one dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. In the same way with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, one dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well cultivated.

Then one thinks, “There is becoming,<sup>11</sup> there is the gross, there is the subtle, there is perception and what goes beyond it, what is an escape from it,” knowing this at it really is. When one has come to know and see like this, the mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire, from the taint of becoming, and from the taint of ignorance. Being liberated, one 726c knows that one is liberated, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

It is just as there might be, not far from a village, a delightful pond fed from a clear spring, with its banks covered in verdant grass, and with flowering trees all around; and there might come, from the eastern direction, a man who is extremely hungry, thirsty, and weary. He takes off his clothes, leaves them on the bank, and enters the pond to take a pleasant bath; he removes the grime, gets relief from the heat, and quenches his thirst.

In the same way, there might come a man from the southern . . . the western . . . the northern direction, who is extremely hungry, thirsty, and weary; and he takes off his clothes, leaves them on the bank, and enters the pond to take a pleasant bath; he removes the grime, gets relief from the heat, and quenches his thirst.

In the same way, a warrior clansman shaves off his hair and beard, dons the yellow robes and, out of faith, gives up the household life and becomes a homeless one to train in the path. He practices inner stillness, attains inner stillness. Of one who has inner stillness I declare that he is a renunciant, I declare that he is a brahmin, I declare that he is a noble one, I declare that he is purified [through having] “bathed.”<sup>12</sup>

In the same way, a brahmin clansman . . . a householder clansman . . . a worker clansman shaves off his hair and beard, dons the yellow robes and, out of faith, gives up the household life and becomes a homeless one to train in the path. He practices inner stillness, attains inner stillness. Of one who has inner stillness I declare that he is a renunciant, I declare that he is a brahmin, I declare that he is a noble one, I declare that he is purified [through having] “bathed.”<sup>13</sup>

What is a renunciant? It is one who has allayed all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants, which are the root of future becoming, have vexation and suffering as their result, and are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death. This is what is meant by a renunciant.

What is a brahmin? It is one who is far removed from all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants, which are the root of future becoming, have vexation and suffering as their result, and are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death. This is what is meant by a brahmin.

What is a noble one? It is one who is far removed from all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants, which are the root of future becoming, have vexation and suffering as their result, and are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death. This is what is meant by a noble one.

What is one who is purified [through having] “bathed”? It is one who [through an inner] “bathing” has purified himself of all evil and unwholesome states, all taints and pollutants, which are the root of future becoming, have vexation and suffering as their result, and are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death. This is what is meant by one who is purified [through having] “bathed.”

This is what is meant by a renunciant; this is what is meant by a brahmin; this is what is meant by a noble one; this is what is meant by one who is purified [through having] “bathed.”

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

184. The Discourse in the Gosiṅga Sāla Forest (1)<sup>14</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha, who was dwelling among the Vajjians, was staying in the Gosiṅga sāla forest together with many knowledgeable elder monks, senior disciples such as the venerable Sāriputta, the venerable Mahāmoggallāna, the venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable Mahākaccāna, the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Revata, and the venerable Ānanda.<sup>15</sup> Monks such as these knowledgeable elder monks, these senior disciples, were also dwelling among the Vajjians, staying in the Gosiṅga sāla forest, dwelling together in the vicinity of the Buddha’s thatched hut.

727a

Then, when the night was [nearly] over, toward dawn, the venerable Mahāmoggallāna, the venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable Mahākaccāna and the venerable Anuruddha went towards where the venerable Sāriputta was. The venerable Ānanda saw from afar those venerable ones going there. He said:

Venerable Revata, you should know that, the night being [nearly] over and dawn approaching, the venerable Mahāmoggallāna, the venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable Mahākaccāna, and the venerable Anuruddha are going toward where the venerable Sāriputta is. Venerable Revata, let us go with those venerable ones and together approach the venerable Sāriputta. Perhaps we might, on account of them, get to hear a little Dharma from the venerable Sāriputta.

Then, the night being [nearly] over, toward dawn, the venerable Mahā-moggallāna, the venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable Mahākaccāna, the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Revata, and the venerable Ānanda approached the venerable Sāriputta.

The venerable Sāriputta saw from afar that those venerable ones had come. On account of those venerable ones, the venerable Sāriputta said:

Welcome, venerable friends! Welcome, Ānanda! Welcome, Ānanda, attendant of the World-honored One, who understands the intentions of the World-honored One and is constantly praised by the World-honored One and by his companions in the holy life.

Let me now ask the venerable Ānanda, “This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Ānanda, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?”

The venerable Ānanda replied:

Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk is widely trained in learning much, has retained it without forgetting [anything], having accumulated extensive learning of that which is called the Dharma, which is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and its phrasing, endowed with purity, revealing the holy life.

Being thus widely trained in learning much of all the teachings, having studied and reviewed them by the thousand, reflected on them, and contemplated them with bright vision and penetrative realization, he teaches the Dharma concisely, aptly, and skillfully, in accordance with what is correct, wishing to cut through the fetters [of his hearers]. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.

The venerable Sāriputta asked further:

Venerable Revata, the venerable monk Ānanda has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Revata: This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Revata, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest? 727b

The venerable Revata replied:

Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk delights in sitting in meditation, practices inner stillness and, while not neglecting the practice of [concentrative] meditation, accomplishes insight, and always prefers to live in seclusion and enjoys peaceful places. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest.

The venerable Sāriputta asked further:

Venerable Anuruddha, the venerable monk Revata has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Anuruddha, “This Gosīṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Anuruddha, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest?”

The venerable Anuruddha replied:

Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk attains the divine eye, accomplishes the divine eye [so that] with little effort he completely surveys in an instant a thousand worlds. Venerable Sāriputta, it is just as a man with [good] eyesight could, from the top of a lofty building, with little effort completely survey in an instant a thousand clay bricks on the ground below.<sup>16</sup> In the same way, Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk attains the divine eye, accomplishes the divine eye [so that] with little effort he completely surveys in an instant a thousand worlds. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest.

The venerable Sāriputta asked further:

Venerable Kaccāna, the venerable monk Anuruddha has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Kaccāna, “This Gosīṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers.

Venerable Kaccāna, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?”

The venerable Mahākaccāna replied:

Venerable Sāriputta, suppose two monks, who are Dharma teachers, discuss together the profound aspects of the higher Dharma, such that whatever matter they ask [each other] about, they understand it well and know it completely, replying without hesitation and eloquently expounding the Dharma. Venerable Sāriputta, such monks would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.<sup>17</sup>

The venerable Sāriputta asked further:

727c Venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable monk Kaccāna has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Mahākassapa, “This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Mahākassapa, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?”

The venerable Mahākassapa replied:

Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk is himself a forest-dweller and praises forest-dwelling, is himself of few wishes and praises being of few wishes, is himself contented and praises contentment, himself stays alone and in seclusion and praises staying alone and in seclusion, himself practices energetically and praises practicing energetically, himself establishes right mindfulness and right comprehension and praises establishing right mindfulness and right comprehension, has himself attained concentration and praises the attainment of concentration, himself has wisdom and praises having wisdom, has himself eradicated the taints and praises the eradication of the taints, himself exhorts and inspires [others], fully delighting them, and praises exhorting and inspiring [others], fully delighting them.<sup>18</sup> Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.

The venerable Sāriputta asked further:

Venerable Moggallāna, the venerable monk Mahākassapa has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Moggallāna, “This Gosīṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Moggallāna, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest?”

The venerable Mahāmoggallāna replied:

Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk has great supernormal power, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power, possessing at will immeasurable supernormal power. Practicing immeasurable supernormal powers, being one he transforms himself into many; being many, he becomes one. Being one he remains as one, possessing knowledge and vision. He passes unhindered through stone walls as if passing through space. He dives into the earth as if it were water; he walks on water without sinking as if it were earth. Seated cross-legged, he ascends into space like a bird. With his hands he touches and strokes the sun and the moon, which are of such great supernormal power, of such great and mighty virtue, of such great merit, of such great and mighty power. With his [mental] body he can reach the Brahmā world.<sup>19</sup> Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest.

The venerable Mahāmoggallāna said:

Venerable Sāriputta, I and these venerable ones have spoken, each according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Sāriputta, “This Gosīṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Sāriputta, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest?”

The venerable Sāriputta said:

Venerable Moggallāna, suppose a monk has, at will, mastery over his mind and is not mastered by his mind. Whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain in the forenoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding in the forenoon; whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain at noon or in the afternoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding at noon or in the afternoon.

728a

Venerable Moggallāna, it is just like a king or a king's minister who has many garments, different clothes of various beautiful colors, so that whatever he desires to wear in the forenoon, he takes it and puts it on, and whatever he desires to wear at noon or in the afternoon, he takes it and puts it on.

In the same way, Venerable Moggallāna, suppose a monk has, at will, mastery over his mind and is not mastered by his mind. Whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain in the forenoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding in the forenoon; whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain at noon or in the afternoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding at noon or in the afternoon. Venerable Moggallāna, such a monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest.

The venerable Sāriputta said:

Venerable Moggallāna, we and these venerable ones have spoken, each according to our understanding. Venerable Moggallāna, let us, together with these venerable ones, approach the Buddha and discuss this matter with him. He will know who among us has spoken the best.

Then the venerable Sāriputta, the venerable Mahāmoggallāna, the venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable Mahākaccāna, the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Revata, and the venerable Ānanda approached the Buddha. The other venerable ones paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat down to one side, while the venerable Ānanda paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and stood to one side.

The venerable Sāriputta said:

World-honored One, today, the night being [nearly] over, toward dawn, the venerable Mahāmoggallāna, the venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable Kaccāna, the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Revata, and the venerable Ānanda came and approached me. Having seen from afar that those venerable ones had come, I said, on account of those venerable ones, "Welcome, venerable friends! Welcome, Ānanda! Welcome, Ānanda, attendant of the World-honored One, who understands the intentions of the World-honored One and is constantly praised by the World-honored One and by his companions in the holy life.

“Now let me ask the venerable Ānanda, ‘This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Ānanda, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?’

“The venerable Ānanda answered me, saying, ‘Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk is widely trained in learning much, has retained it without forgetting [anything], accumulated extensive learning of that which is called the Dharma, which is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and also sublime in the end, with its meaning and its phrasing, endowed with purity, revealing the holy life.

728b

‘Being thus widely trained in learning much of all the teachings, having studied and reviewed them by the thousand, reflected on them, and contemplated them with bright vision and penetrative realization, he teaches the Dharma concisely, aptly, and skillfully, in accordance with what is correct, wishing to cut through the fetters [of his hearers]. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.’”

The World-honored One praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, Sāriputta, it is indeed as the monk Ānanda said. Why is that? The monk Ānanda has accomplished much learning.”

The venerable Sāriputta said:

World-honored One, when the venerable Ānanda had spoken thus, I asked further, “Venerable Revata, the venerable monk Ānanda has spoken according to his understanding. I now ask the venerable Revata, ‘This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Revata, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?’

“The venerable Revata answered me, saying, ‘Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk delights in sitting in meditation, practices inner stillness and, while not neglecting the practice of [concentrative] meditation, accomplishes insight, and always prefers to live in seclusion and enjoys peaceful places. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.’”

The World-honored One praised him, saying:

It is well, it is well, Sāriputta, it is indeed as the monk Revata said. Why is that? The monk Revata always delights in the practice of [concentrative] meditation.

The venerable Sāriputta said:

World-honored One, when the venerable Revata had spoken thus, I asked further, “Venerable Anuruddha, the venerable monk Revata has spoken according to his understanding. I now ask the venerable Anuruddha, ‘This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Revata, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?’

“The venerable Anuruddha answered me, saying, ‘Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk attains the divine eye, accomplishes the divine eye [so that] with little effort he completely surveys in an instant a thousand worlds. Venerable Sāriputta, just as a man with [good] eyesight could, from the top of a lofty building, with little effort completely survey in an instant a thousand clay bricks on the ground below, in the same way, venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk attains the divine eye, accomplishes the divine eye [so that] with little effort he completely surveys in an instant a thousand worlds. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.’”

728c

The World-honored One praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, Sāriputta, it is indeed as the monk Anuruddha said. Why is that? The monk Anuruddha has attained the divine eye.”

The venerable Sāriputta said:

World-honored One, when the venerable Anuruddha had spoken thus, I asked further, “Venerable Kaccāna, the venerable monk Anuruddha has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Kaccāna, ‘This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Kaccāna, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?’

“The venerable Kaccāna answered me, saying, ‘Venerable Sāriputta, suppose two monks, who are Dharma teachers, discuss together the profound aspects of the higher Dharma, such that whatever matter they ask [each other] about, they understand it well and know it completely, replying without hesitation and eloquently expounding the Dharma. Venerable Sāriputta, such monks would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest.’”

The World-honored One praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, Sāriputta, it is indeed as the monk Kaccāna said. Why is that? The monk Kaccāna is a teacher of the Dharma by way of analysis.”

The venerable Sāriputta said:

World-honored One, when the venerable Kaccāna had spoken thus, I asked further, “Venerable Mahākassapa, the venerable monk Kaccāna has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Mahākassapa, ‘This Gosīṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Mahākassapa, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest?’”

“The venerable Mahākassapa answered me, saying, ‘Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk is himself a forest-dweller and praises forest-dwelling, is himself of few wishes and praises being of few wishes, is himself contented and praises contentment, himself stays alone and in seclusion and praises staying alone and in seclusion, himself practices energetically and praises practicing energetically, himself establishes right mindfulness and right comprehension and praises establishing right mindfulness and right comprehension, has himself attained concentration and praises attainment of concentration, himself has wisdom and praises having wisdom, has himself eradicated the taints and praises eradication of the taints, himself exhorts and inspires [others], fully delighting them, and praises exhorting and inspiring [others], fully delighting them. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosīṅga sāla forest.’”

The World-honored One praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, Sāriputta, it is indeed as the monk Kassapa said. Why is that? The monk Kassapa always practices forest-dwelling.”

729a The venerable Sāriputta said:

World-honored One, when the venerable Mahākassapa had spoken like this, I asked further, “Venerable Moggallāna, the venerable monk Mahākassapa has spoken according to his understanding. Let me now ask the venerable Moggallāna, ‘This Gosiṅga sāla forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Moggallāna, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest?’

“The venerable Mahāmoggallāna answered me, saying, ‘Venerable Sāriputta, suppose a monk has great supernormal power, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power, possessing at will immeasurable supernormal power. Being one he transforms himself into many; being many, he becomes one. Being one he remains as one, possessing knowledge and vision. He passes unhindered through stone walls as if passing through space. He dives into the earth as if it were water; he walks on water without sinking as if it were earth. Seated cross-legged, he ascends into space like a bird. With his hands he touches and strokes the sun and the moon, which are of such great supernormal power, of such great and mighty virtue, of such great merit, of such great and mighty power. With his [mental] body he can reach as far as the Brahmā world. Venerable Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.’”

The World-honored One praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, Sāriputta, it is indeed as the monk Moggallāna said. Why is that? The monk Moggallāna has great supernormal power.”

Then the venerable Mahāmoggallāna rose from his seat, arranged his robes so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, when I and these venerable ones had spoken, each according to his understanding, I in turn asked the venerable Sāriputta, “Let me now ask the venerable Sāriputta, ‘This Gosiṅga sāla-forest is truly delightful, the night is brightly moonlit, and the sāla trees are spreading a delicate fragrance, as if from divine flowers. Venerable Sāriputta, what kind of monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla-forest?’

“The venerable Sāriputta answered me, saying, ‘Venerable Moggallāna, suppose a monk has, at will, mastery over his mind and is not mastered by his mind. Whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain in the forenoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding in the forenoon; whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain at noon or in the afternoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding at noon or in the afternoon.

“‘Venerable Moggallāna, it is just like a king or a king’s minister who has many garments, different clothes of various beautiful colors, so that whatever he desires to wear in the forenoon, he takes it and puts it on, and whatever he desires to wear at noon or in the afternoon, he takes it and puts it on.

729b

“‘In the same way, Venerable Moggallāna, suppose a monk has, at will, mastery over his mind and is not mastered by his mind. Whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain in the forenoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding in the forenoon; whichever tranquil abiding he wishes to attain at noon or in the afternoon, he dwells in that tranquil abiding at noon or in the afternoon. Venerable Moggallāna, such a monk would further enhance this Gosiṅga sāla forest.’”

The World-honored One praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, Moggallāna, it is indeed as the monk Sāriputta said. Why is that? The monk Sāriputta has, at will, mastery over his mind.”

Then the venerable Sāriputta rose from his seat, arranged his robes so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, when I and these venerable ones had spoken thus according to our understanding, I said, “Venerable Moggallāna, we and these venerable ones have spoken, each according to his understanding. Venerable Moggallāna, let us together with these other venerable ones approach the Buddha and ask him about this matter. He will know who among us has spoken the best.” World-honored One, who among us has spoken well?

The World-honored One replied:

Sāriputta, you have all [spoken] well. Why is that? All these [modes of] the Dharma are entirely as spoken by me. Sāriputta, listen as I declare what kind of monk would further enhance the Gosiṅga sāla forest.

Sāriputta, suppose a monk dwells in dependence on a town or village. When the night is over, toward dawn, he puts on his [outer] robe and takes his bowl and enters the village to beg for almsfood, guarding his body well, restraining his faculties well, with mindfulness well established. Having begged for almsfood and after having partaken of the midday meal, he puts away his [outer] robe and bowl, washes his hands and feet and, with a sitting mat over his shoulder, goes into the forest, or to the base of a tree, or to an empty quiet place.

He spreads his sitting mat and sits down cross-legged [with this intention]: “I shall not rise from this cross-legged sitting posture until the taints have been eradicated.” And he indeed does not rise from his cross-legged sitting posture until the taints have been eradicated. Sāriputta, such a monk would further enhance the Gosiṅga sāla forest.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, those monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

185. The Discourse in the Gosiṅga Sāla Forest (2)<sup>20</sup>

729c Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Nādikā, staying in the Brick House.

At that time, when the night was over, toward dawn, the World-honored One put on his [outer] robe and took his bowl and entered Nādikā to beg for almsfood. Having completed his meal, after noon, he went to the Gosiṅga sāla forest.

At that time in the Gosiṅga sāla forest there were three clansmen staying together: the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Nandiya, and the venerable Kimbila. Those venerable ones were practicing in the following way.<sup>21</sup>

Whichever one of them came back first from begging for almsfood, he would set out the seats, draw water, put out the utensils for washing feet, place the foot mat and the cloth for wiping feet, the water containers, and the jar for bathing. If he was able to finish the food he had collected, he would finish it. If there were leftovers, he would place them in containers, cover them, and put them aside. Having completed his meal, he would store away his bowl, wash his hands and feet and, with a sitting mat over his shoulder, enter a hut to sit in meditation.

Whichever one of them came back last from begging for almsfood would finish the food if he was able to. If it was not enough, he would take enough from the previously leftover food and eat it. If there were leftovers [after he had finished], he would pour them out on to a clear piece of ground or into water that contained no living beings.

He would take the eating utensils and, having washed them clean and wiped them, would put them away to one side. He would gather and roll up the sitting mats, collect the foot mat and gather the cloth for wiping feet, put away the utensils for washing feet, the water containers, and the jar for bathing. He would sweep the dining hall with a broom and take out the sweepings so that all was clean. He would store away his [outer] robe and bowl, wash his hands and feet, and with a sitting mat over his shoulder, enter a hut to sit in meditation.<sup>22</sup>

In the afternoon, whichever one of those venerable ones was the first to rise from sitting in meditation, he would check to see whether the water containers or the jar for bathing were empty, and if they were, he would take them and go and fill them. If he was able to carry them [after filling them], he would carry them back and set them up to one side. If he was not able to carry one of them, then he would beckon to another monk with his hand, and both of them would lift it together, carry it back, and set it up to one side, all without speaking to each other or asking each other anything.

Once in every five days those venerable ones would assemble and either discuss the Dharma together or maintain noble silence.

As the World-honored One approached [the Gosīṅga sāla forest], the forest warden, seeing him coming in the distance, sought to stop him by calling out:

Renuciant, renuciant, do not enter this forest! Why is that? In this forest there are three clansmen, the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Nandiya, and the venerable Kimbila. If they see you, they may disapprove.

The World-honored One said, “Forest warden, if they see me, they will certainly approve. They will not disapprove.”

Then, the venerable Anuruddha, seeing from afar that the World-honored One was coming, rebuked the forest warden:

Do not admonish the World-honored One, forest warden! Do not admonish the Well-gone One! Why is that? This is our venerable [teacher] who is coming. It is our Well-gone One who is coming.

730a The venerable Anuruddha came out to receive the World-honored One. He took the Buddha's [outer] robe and bowl. The venerable Nandiya set out a seat for the Buddha, and the venerable Kimbila brought water for the Buddha.

Then the Buddha, having washed his hands and feet, sat down on the seat set out by the venerable [Nandiya]. Having sat down, he asked, "Anuruddha, are you always at ease, lacking nothing?"

The venerable Anuruddha replied, "World-honored One, I am always at ease, lacking nothing."

The World-honored One asked further, "Anuruddha, how is it that you are at ease, lacking nothing?"

The venerable Anuruddha replied:

World-honored One, I think to myself: "It is a great gain for me, a great blessing, to have such companions practicing the holy life with me." World-honored One, I constantly practice physical deeds of loving-kindness, whether seen or unseen, toward these companions in the holy life, equally and without discrimination. I practice verbal deeds of loving-kindness . . . I practice mental deeds of loving-kindness, whether seen or unseen, [toward them], equally and without discrimination.

World-honored One, I think to myself: "Let me now set aside my own wishes and follow the wishes of those venerable friends." Then I set aside my own wishes and follow the wishes of those venerable friends. I never have a single disapproving mental state. World-honored One, it is in this way that I am always at ease, lacking nothing.

The venerable Nandiya, on being asked [the same questions], replied in the same way.

Then [the Buddha] also asked the venerable Kimbila, "Are you always at ease, lacking nothing?"

The venerable Kimbila said, “World-honored One, I am always at ease, lacking nothing.”

[The Buddha] asked, “Kimbila, how is it that you are at ease, lacking nothing?”

The venerable Kimbila replied:

World-honored One, I think to myself, “It is a great gain for me, a great blessing, to have such companions practicing the holy life with me.” World-honored One, I constantly practice physical deeds of loving-kindness, whether seen or unseen, toward these companions in the holy life, equally and without discrimination. I practice verbal deeds of loving-kindness . . . I practice mental deeds of loving-kindness, whether seen or unseen, [toward them], equally and without discrimination.

World-honored One, I think to myself: “Let me now set aside my own wishes and follow the wishes of those venerable friends.” Then I set aside my own wishes and follow the wishes of those venerable friends. I never have a single disapproving mental state. World-honored One, it is in this way that I am always at ease, lacking nothing.

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, Anuruddha, in this way you are constantly together in harmony, at ease and without dissention, of a single mind, of a single teacher, blending like water and milk. Have you [also] attained any superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding?

The venerable Anuruddha replied:

World-honored One, in this way we are [indeed] constantly together in harmony, at ease without dissention, of a single mind, of a single teacher, blending like water and milk, and we have attained a superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding.

World-honored One, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . we dwell having attained the fourth absorption. World-honored One, in this way we are [indeed] constantly together in harmony, at ease without dissention, of a single mind, of a single teacher, blending like water and milk, and we have attained this superhuman state, this distinction in peaceful happiness, this tranquil abiding.

730b

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, Anuruddha, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, do you attain any other superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding?

The venerable Anuruddha replied:

World-honored One, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, we do attain another superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding.

World-honored One, we dwell pervading one direction with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth directions, and also the four intermediate directions, above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, we dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind] that is boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. In the same way . . . compassion . . . empathic joy . . . equanimity, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, we dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind] that is boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated.<sup>23</sup>

World-honored One, on leaving the [afore-mentioned] tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, we do attain this other superhuman state, this distinction in peaceful happiness, this tranquil abiding.

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, Anuruddha, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, do you attain any other superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding?

The venerable Anuruddha replied:

World-honored One, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, we do attain another superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding.

World-honored One, transcending all perceptions of form . . . up to . . . we dwell having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. World-honored One, on leaving the [aforementioned] tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, we attain this other superhuman state, this distinction in peaceful happiness, this tranquil abiding.

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, Anuruddha, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, do you attain any other superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding?

The venerable Anuruddha replied:

World-honored One, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, we do attain another superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding.

World-honored One, we attain the supernormal powers . . . the knowledge of the divine ear . . . the knowledge of the minds of others . . . the knowledge of former lives . . . the knowledge of the passing away and arising [of beings] . . . and, eradicating the taints, we attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom, in this very life personally understanding and awakening to it; and we dwell having personally realized it, understanding as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”<sup>24</sup> World-honored One, on leaving the [aforementioned] tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, we attain this other superhuman state, this distinction in peaceful happiness, this tranquil abiding.

730c

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, Anuruddha, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, do you attain any other superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding?

The venerable Anuruddha replied:

World-honored One, on leaving this tranquil abiding, going beyond it, transcending it, we do not attain another superhuman state, a distinction in peaceful happiness, a tranquil abiding.

Then, the World-honored One thought, “These clansmen dwell happily and at ease. Let me now teach them the Dharma.” Having had this thought, the World-honored One taught the Dharma to the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Nandiya, and the venerable Kimbila, exhorting and inspiring them, fully delighting them, teaching them the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted, and inspired them, fully delighting them, he rose from his seat and left.

Then the venerable Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbila accompanied the World-honored One a little way to see him off and then returned to their dwelling.

The venerable Nandiya and the venerable Kimbila praised the venerable Anuruddha, saying:

It is well! It is well, venerable Anuruddha! We have never before heard the venerable Anuruddha say such things, [namely] that we have such great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power. Yet the venerable Anuruddha praised us extremely highly to the World-honored One.

The venerable Anuruddha praised the venerable Nandiya and Kimbila, saying:

It is well! It is well, venerable ones! I had never before heard the venerable ones say that they are endowed with great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power. However, through knowing the venerable ones’ minds with my own mind, I have for a long time known that the venerable ones are endowed with great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power.<sup>25</sup> It is for this reason that I said it just like this to the World-honored One.

Then, when the night was over, toward dawn, the celestial Dīgha, of fine physique and lofty brilliance, approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, he stepped back, stood to one side, and said to the World-honored One:

Great Seer, it is of great profit to the Vajjians that the World-honored One is here now and also the three clansmen: the venerable Anuruddha, the venerable Nandiya, and the venerable Kimbila.

731a

The earth spirits, hearing what the celestial Dīgha had said, loudly exclaimed:

Great Seer, it is of great profit to the Vajjians that the World-honored One is present here, and also the three clansmen: the venerable Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbila.

On hearing this from the earth spirits, the sky devas, [namely] the Four Heavenly Kings . . . the devas of the Thirty-three . . . the Yāma devas . . . the Tusita devas . . . the devas who delight in creating . . . and the devas who wield power over others' creations instantly relayed this exclamation right up to the Brahmā devas:

Great Seer, it is of great profit to the Vajjians that the World-honored One is present here, and also the three clansmen: the venerable Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbila.

The World-honored One replied:

It is like this, celestial Dīgha, it is like this. It is of great profit to the Vajjians that the World-honored One is present here, and also the three clansmen: the venerable Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbila.

Celestial Dīgha, the earth spirits, hearing what you said, loudly exclaimed, "Great Seer, it is of great profit to the Vajjians that the World-honored One is present here, and also the three clansmen: the venerable Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbila."

On hearing this from the earth spirits, the sky devas, [namely] the Four Heavenly Kings . . . the devas of the Thirty-three . . . the Yāma devas . . . the Tusita devas . . . the devas who delight in creating . . . and the devas who wield power over others' creations, instantly relayed this exclamation right up to the Brahmā devas, "Great Seer, it is of great profit to the Vajjians that the World-honored One is present here, and also the three clansmen: the venerable Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbila."

Celestial Dīgha, as for the three households which these three clansmen gave up out of faith, shaving off hair and beard, donning the yellow robes, and becoming homeless to train in the path, if the [members of those] three households recollect these three clansmen's motivation and practice, then they will for a long time attain great profit, ease, and happiness.

If [anyone] in that village or town, as well as [any] deva, māra, Brahṃā, renunciant, or brahmin, [anyone] from human beings to devas, recollects these three clansmen's motivation and practice, then they will for a long time attain great profit, ease, and happiness. Celestial Dīgha, these three clansmen are endowed with great supernormal powers, great and mighty virtue, great merit, great and mighty power.

731b Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, those three clansmen and the celestial Dīgha were delighted and received it respectfully.

186. The Discourse on Investigating<sup>26</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling in the Kuru country, in Kammāsadhamma, a town of the Kurus.

At that time the World-honored One said to the monks:

If someone, relying on his own mind, does not [have the ability to] know the mind of another as it really is, then he cannot know whether the World-honored One is rightly and completely awakened. How [then] could he investigate the Tathāgata?

Then the monks said to the World-honored One:

The World-honored One is the root of the Dharma, the World-honored One is the master of the Dharma, the Dharma comes from the World-honored One. May he explain it! Having heard it, we will fully understand its meaning.

The Buddha said, “Monks, listen closely and pay proper attention. I will explain it to you in detail.” The monks listened to receive the instruction.

The World-honored One said:

If someone, relying on his own mind, does not [have the ability to] know the mind of another as it really is, then he should investigate the Tathāgata in two ways: first through visible forms known by the eye, and second through sounds heard by the ear, [as follows]:

“Do defiling mental states knowable through the eye or the ear exist in that venerable one or not?” If, on investigating, one comes to know that defiling mental states knowable through the eye or the ear do not exist in that venerable one, if they are absent, then one should investigate further:

“Do mixed mental states knowable through the eye or the ear exist in that venerable one or not?” If, on investigating, one comes to know that mixed mental states knowable through the eye or the ear do not exist in that venerable one, if they are absent, then one should investigate further:

“Do pure mental states knowable through the eye or the ear exist in that venerable one or not?” If, on investigating, one comes to know that pure mental states knowable through the eye or the ear do exist in that venerable one, if they are present, then one should investigate further:

“Has that venerable one been practicing this Dharma for a long time, or has he been practicing it for just a short time?” If, on investigating, one comes to know that that venerable one has been practicing this Dharma for a long time, not practicing it for just a short time, and if he has been practicing it constantly, then one should investigate further:

“Does that venerable one enter meditation for the sake of fame or gain, or does he enter meditation not for the sake of fame or gain?”<sup>27</sup> If, on investigating, one comes to know that that venerable one enters meditation without any evil motive, [then one should investigate further].<sup>28</sup>

Suppose someone makes this declaration: “That venerable one delights in the practice. He is without fear. Free from desire, he does not engage in sensuality. [In him] sensual desire has been eradicated.”

Then one should ask that [person], “Venerable friend, what is the practice, what is the power, what is the knowledge that enables you, venerable friend, to observe this rightly for yourself and make this declaration: ‘That venerable one delights in the practice. He is without fear. Free from desire, he does not engage in sensuality. [In him] sensual desire has been eradicated’?”

Suppose he gives this answer, “Venerable friend, I do not know his mind, nor do I know other things [about him]. Yet, that venerable one—whether he is in seclusion, or among the sangha, or in an assembly—as regards material things, I am able to see that venerable one, [to see] whether he is progressing well, and whether through progressing well he has become a master.

731c

“Although I have not come to know it [directly] myself, I have, by asking him face to face, heard that venerable one say this: ‘I delight in the practice. I am without fear. Free from desire, I do not engage in sensuality. I have eradicated sensual desire.’

“Venerable friend, this is the practice, this is the power, this is the knowledge that enables me to see this rightly for myself and make this declaration: ‘That venerable one delights in the practice. He is without fear. Free from desire, he does not engage in sensuality. In him sensual desire has been eradicated.’”

Herein one should further ask the Tathāgata concerning his mental states, whether he has defiling states knowable through the eye or the ear, [or whether] he has realized the attainment in which these states cease completely without remainder; whether he has mixed mental states knowable through the eye or the ear, [or whether] he has realized the attainment in which these states cease completely without remainder; whether he has pure mental states knowable through the eye or the ear, [or whether] he has realized the attainment in which these states cease completely without remainder.

The Tathāgata will reply by telling whether he has defiling states knowable through the eye or the ear, [or whether] he has realized the attainment in which these states cease completely without remainder; whether he has mixed states knowable through the eye or the ear, [or whether] he has realized the attainment in which these states cease completely without remainder.

As to defiling states knowable through the eye or the ear, the Tathāgata has completely eliminated and uprooted them, so that they will never arise again. As to mixed states knowable through the eye or the ear, the Tathāgata has completely eradicated and uprooted them, so that they will never arise again. As to pure states, just so is my purity, just so is my domain, just so is the [true] renunciant, just so am I accomplished in this true Dharma and discipline.

A disciple who has confidence in the Tathāgata goes to visit him. He behaves respectfully toward the Tathāgata and hears the Dharma from the Tathāgata. The Tathāgata teaches him the Dharma, leading him ever higher, to ever more sublime levels, skillfully discarding black and white.

As the Tathāgata teaches him the Dharma, leading him ever higher, to ever more sublime levels, skillfully discarding black and white, [the disciple] hearing it just like this comes to know thoroughly one [particular aspect of the] Dharma. He attains the highest of all [aspects of] the Dharma, gaining pure confidence in the World-honored One [thus]: “The World-honored One is rightly and completely awakened!”

Again, one should ask [the disciple], “Venerable friend, what is the practice, what is the power, what is the knowledge, through which you, venerable one, came to know thoroughly one [particular aspect of the] Dharma, attained the highest of all [aspects of the] Dharma, and gained pure confidence in the World-honored One [thus]: ‘The World-honored One is rightly and completely awakened?’”

He may answer thus, “Venerable friend, I do not know the mind of the World-honored One, nor do I know other things [about him]. Yet, because of the World-honored One I have such pure confidence. The World-honored One taught me the Dharma, leading me ever higher, to ever more sublime levels, skillfully discarding black and white.

“Venerable friend, in whichever way the World-honored One taught me the Dharma, just like this I heard it. Teaching me the Dharma, the Tathāgata led me ever higher, to ever more sublime levels, skillfully discarding black and white. Hearing it just like this, I came to know thoroughly one [particular aspect of the] Dharma, attained the highest [aspect of the] Dharma, and gained pure confidence in the World-honored One [thus]: ‘The World-honored One is rightly and completely awakened!’

732a

“Venerable friend, this is the practice, this is the power, this is the knowledge, through which I came to know thoroughly one [particular aspect of the] Dharma, attained the highest [aspect of the] Dharma, and gained pure confidence in the World-honored One [thus]: ‘The World-honored One is fully and completely awakened!’”

If one has such practice and such power, and one’s confidence is deeply settled in the Tathāgata, its roots having been established, then this is called confidence that is rooted in seeing, indestructible, and united with knowledge. It cannot be taken away by any renunciant or brahmin, god, māra, or Brahmagā, or anyone else in the world. This is how one investigates the Tathāgata, and this is how one comes to fully know the Tathāgata.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks delighted in it and remembered it well.

187. The Discourse on Declaring the Knowledge [of Awakening]<sup>29</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

Suppose a monk approaches you and declares that he has attained the knowledge [of awakening]: "I know, as it really is: 'Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.'"

Hearing this, you should approve of it as good and acceptable, rejoice in it, and receive it respectfully.<sup>30</sup> Having approved of it as good and acceptable, having rejoiced in it and received it respectfully, you should further ask that monk this: "Venerable friend, the World-honored One has spoken of the five aggregates affected by clinging, the bodily form aggregate affected by clinging . . . feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . the consciousness aggregate affected by clinging.<sup>31</sup> Venerable friend, knowing what, seeing what in regard to these five aggregates affected by clinging have you attained knowledge such that, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints?"

732b A monk whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this: "Venerable friends, the bodily form aggregate affected by clinging is without result, empty and void, it is undesirable, it has no permanent existence, it cannot be relied on, and it is of a changing nature. I know it to be like this.

"[Whatever] I had of desire, defilement, attachment, bondage, and underlying tendency to bondage and attachment in regard to the bodily form aggregate affected by clinging, that has ceased, faded away, been extinguished, stopped. Having attained this knowledge, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.

"In the same way for feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . the consciousness aggregate affected by clinging is without result, empty and void, it is undesirable, it has no permanent existence, it cannot be relied on, and it is of a changing nature. I know it to be like this.

“Whatever I had of desire, defilement, attachment, bondage, and underlying tendency to bondage and attachment in regard to the consciousness aggregate affected by clinging, that has ceased, faded away, been extinguished, stopped. Having attained this knowledge, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.

“Venerable friends, knowing like this and seeing like this in regard to these five aggregates affected by clinging, I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.”

A monk whose taints are destroyed, who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this.

Hearing this, you should approve of it as good and acceptable, rejoice in it, and receive it respectfully. Having approved of it as good and acceptable, having rejoiced in it and received it respectfully, you should further ask that monk this: “Venerable friend, the World-honored One has taught four nutriments due to which living beings are able to exist and continue growing. What are the four? The first is edible food, coarse and fine; the second is contact; the third is volition; and the fourth is consciousness.<sup>32</sup> Venerable friend, knowing what, seeing what in regard to these four nutriments have you attained knowledge such that, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints?”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this: “Venerable friends, being neither elated nor depressed in regard to edible food, not dependent on it, not bound by it, not defiled by it, and not attached to it, I have attained release, attained emancipation, attained total liberation, freed the mind from the perversions. I know as it really is: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’

“In the same way for contact . . . volition . . . being neither mentally elated nor depressed in regard to the nutriment that is consciousness, not dependent on it, not bound by it, not defiled by it, and not attached to it, I have attained release, attained emancipation, attained total liberation, freed the mind from the perversions. I know as it really is: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’

“Venerable friends, knowing like this and seeing like this in regard to these four nutriments, I attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this.

732c Hearing this you should approve of it as good and acceptable, rejoice in it, and receive it respectfully. Having approved of it as good and acceptable, having rejoiced in it and received it respectfully, you should further ask that monk this: “Venerable friend, the World-honored One has taught four [ways of] declaring. What are the four? The first is declaring to have seen [what one has] seen; the second is declaring to have heard [what one has] heard; the third is declaring to have experienced [what one has] experienced; the fourth is declaring to have come to know [what one has] come to know. Venerable friend, knowing what, seeing what in regard to these four [ways of] declaring have you attained knowledge such that through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints?”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life will properly answer like this: “Venerable friends, being neither elated nor depressed in regard to declaring to have seen [what I have] seen, not depending on it, not bound by it, not defiled by it, not attached to it, I have attained release, attained emancipation, attained total liberation, freed the mind from the perversions. I know as it really is: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’

“In the same way for [declaring] to have heard [what I have] heard . . . [declaring] to have experienced [what I have] experienced . . . being neither elated nor depressed in regard to [declaring] to have come to know [what I have] come to know, not dependent on it, not bound by it, not defiled by it, not attached to it, I have attained release, attained emancipation, attained total liberation, freed the mind from the perversions. I know as it really is: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’

“Venerable friends, knowing like this and seeing like this in regard to these four [ways of] declaring, I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this.

Hearing this, you should approve of it as good and acceptable, rejoice in it, and receive it respectfully. Having approved of it as good and acceptable, having rejoiced in it and received it respectfully, you should further ask that monk this: “Venerable friend, the World-honored One has taught six internal sense spheres: the sense sphere of the eye, of the ear, of the nose, of the tongue, of the body, and of the mind. Venerable friend, knowing what, seeing what in regard to these six internal sense spheres have you attained knowledge such that, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints?”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this, “Venerable friends, in regard to the eye, as well as eye consciousness and objects to be experienced by eye consciousness, I have complete knowledge. Having come to know these two aspects [of experience], venerable friends, delight [in regard to] the eye, as well as eye consciousness and objects to be experienced by eye consciousness, has ceased. [Through] that cessation, fading, extinction, and stopping I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.

“In the same way for the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . in regard to the mind as well as mind consciousness and objects to be experienced by mind consciousness, I have complete knowledge. These two aspects [of experience] being known, venerable friends, delight [in regard to] the mind, as well as mind consciousness and objects to be experienced by mind consciousness, has ceased. [Through] that cessation, fading, extinction, and stopping I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.

“Venerable friends, knowing like this and seeing like this in regard to these six internal sense spheres, I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this.

733a Hearing this, you should approve of it as good and acceptable, rejoice in it, and receive it respectfully. Having approved of it as good and acceptable, having rejoiced in it and received it respectfully, you should further ask that monk this: “Venerable friend, the World-honored One has taught six elements: the earth element, the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element. Venerable friend, knowing what, seeing what in regard to these six elements have you attained knowledge such that, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints?”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this: “Venerable friends, I do not see the earth element as mine, nor [do I see] myself as belonging to the earth element, nor [do I see] the earth element as a self. That is to say, [in regard to] these three [types of] clinging that come into existence in dependence on the earth element, [through] the cessation, fading away, extinction, and stopping of any underlying tendency to attachment,<sup>33</sup> I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.

“In the same way for water . . . fire . . . wind . . . space . . . I do not see the consciousness element as mine, nor [do I see] myself as belonging to the consciousness element, nor [do I see] the consciousness element as a self. That is to say, [in regard to] the three [types of] clinging that come into existence in dependence on the consciousness element, [through] the cessation, fading away, extinction, and stopping of any underlying tendency to attachment, I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.

“Venerable friends, knowing like this and seeing like this in regard to these six elements, I have attained knowledge and, through not clinging, the mind has been liberated by the destruction of the taints.”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this.

Hearing this, you should approve of it as good and acceptable, rejoice in it, and receive it respectfully. Having approved of it as good and acceptable, having rejoiced in it and received it respectfully, you should further ask that monk this: “Venerable friend, knowing what, seeing what in regard to this internal body with consciousness and all external signs, are ‘I,’ ‘I’-making, and the underling tendency to conceit known to have been totally cut off, uprooted, never to arise again?”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this: “Venerable friends, formerly when I had not yet gone forth to train in the path, I felt weary of birth, old age, disease, and death, of sorrow, lamentation, and distress, of worry, mourning, dejection, and grief, and wished to abandon this great mass of dukkha.

“Venerable friends, feeling weary of this misery, I had this reflection: ‘Life in the home is extremely confined, a dusty place; going forth to train in the path is [like] emerging into a great open space. For me now, at home, chained by such chains, it is not possible to manifest completely for my [whole] life the practice of the holy life in purity. Let me rather forsake my wealth, little or much, forsake my relatives, few or many, shave off beard and hair, don the yellow robes, and out of faith leave the home life, become homeless, to train in the path.’

“Venerable friends, at a later time I forsook my wealth, little or much, forsook my relatives, few or many, shaved off beard and hair, donned yellow robes, and out of faith left the home life, became homeless, to train in the path.

“Venerable friends, having gone forth to train in the path, having forsaken the signs of being a family [man] and received the essentials of monkhood, I practiced the precepts, guarded [against breaking] the code of rules, and I also adopted proper conduct and manners, always fearing the slightest fault, upholding the essentials of the training.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from killing, had abandoned killing, having discarded sword and club. I had a sense of shame and fear of blame, a mind of loving-kindness and compassion, [wishing to] benefit all [beings], including insects. I purified my mind with regard to killing living beings.

733b

“I abstained from taking what was not given, had abandoned taking what was not given. I took [only] what was given, delighting in taking [only] what was given. I was always fond of giving with generosity, rejoicing in it, without stinginess, not expecting a reward. I purified my mind with regard to taking what was not given.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from sexual activity, had abandoned sexual activity. I diligently cultivated the practice of celibacy, was energetic in this immaculate conduct, with unsoiled purity, free of sensual desires, having given up sexual desires. I purified my mind with regard to sexual activity.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from false speech, had abandoned false speech. I spoke the truth, delighted in the truth, was unshakably established in speaking the truth, was completely trustworthy, not deceiving [anyone in] the world. I purified my mind with regard to false speech.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from divisive speech, had abandoned divisive speech. I engaged in speech that was not divisive, that would not harm others. I did not tell those what I had heard here, out of a wish to harm these; nor did I tell these what I had heard there, out of a wish to harm those. I had the wish to unite those that were divided, delighting in their unity. I did not create factions, did not delight in or praise the [forming of] factions. I purified my mind with regard to divisive speech.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from harsh speech, had abandoned harsh speech. Whatever speech there is that is rough and rude in tone, offensive words that grate on the ear, that people neither enjoy nor desire, that cause others suffering and vexation and that do not lead to calmness, such speech I had given up.

“Whatever speech there is that is clear, peaceful, gentle, and beneficial, that is pleasant to the ear and [easily] enters the mind, that is enjoyable and desirable, that gives others happiness, words endowed with meaning, that do not make others afraid and that lead to calmness in others, such speech I spoke. I purified my mind with regard to harsh speech.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from frivolous speech, had abandoned frivolous speech. I spoke at the [proper] time, speaking what is true, what is Dharma, what is meaningful, what is peaceful, delighting in speech that is peaceful in all matters at the proper time and in a proper way,<sup>34</sup> I would teach well and admonish well. I purified my mind with regard to frivolous speech.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from earning profits, had abandoned earning profits. I had discarded weights and measures and did not accept goods [on commission], I did not bind people [with debts], I did not try to cheat with measures, nor did I deceive others for the sake of some small profit. I purified my mind with regard to earning profits.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from accepting widows or girls, had abandoned accepting widows or girls. I purified my mind with regard to accepting widows or girls.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from accepting servants, had abandoned accepting servants. I purified my mind with regard to accepting servants.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from accepting elephants, horses, cattle, or sheep, had abandoned accepting elephants, horses, cattle, or sheep. I purified my mind with regard to accepting elephants, horses, cattle, or sheep.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from accepting chickens or swine, had abandoned accepting chickens or swine. I purified my mind with regard to accepting chickens or swine.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from accepting farmlands or marketplaces, had abandoned accepting farmlands or marketplaces. I purified my mind with regard to accepting farmlands or marketplaces. 733c “Venerable friends, I abstained from accepting uncooked rice, wheat, or legumes, had abandoned accepting uncooked rice, wheat, or legumes. I purified my mind with regard to accepting uncooked rice, wheat, or legumes.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from alcoholic beverages, had abandoned alcoholic beverages. I purified my mind with regard to alcoholic beverages.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from [using] high and wide beds, had abandoned [using] high and wide beds. I purified my mind with regard to high and wide beds.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics, had abandoned [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics. I purified my mind with regard to flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from singing, dancing, and acting, and from going to see or hear them; I had abandoned singing, dancing, and acting, and going to see or hear them. I purified my mind with regard to singing, dancing, and acting, and with regard to going to see or hear them.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from accepting gold and silver, had abandoned accepting gold or silver. I purified my mind with regard to accepting gold or silver.

“Venerable friends, I abstained from eating after noon, had abandoned eating after noon. I always took a single meal [per day], not eating at night, training in eating at the [proper] time. I purified my mind with regard to eating after noon.

“Venerable friends, having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue I also practiced contentment, taking robes [just] to cover the body, taking food [just] to sustain the physical body. Wherever I went, I took my robes and bowl with me, without concerns or longings. I was like a wild goose that flies through the air with [just] its two wings.

“Venerable friends, having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue and supreme contentment, I also guarded the sense faculties, always mindful of blocking thoughts of desire, with clear understanding protecting the mind through mindfulness and attaining perfection [therein], constantly striving to arouse the mind. On seeing a form with the eye I did not grasp at its appearance nor did I savor the form. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, I guarded the eye faculty so that no covetousness, sadness, and worry, evil and unwholesome states would arise in the mind. For that purpose I guarded the eye faculty.

“In the same way, on [hearing a sound] with the ear . . . [smelling an odor] with the nose . . . [tasting a flavor] with the tongue . . . [experiencing a tangible] with the body . . . cognizing a mind-object with the mind I did not grasp at its appearance nor did I savor the mind-object. That is to say, for the sake of restraint, I guarded the mind faculty so that no covetousness, sadness, and worry, evil and unwholesome states would arise in the mind. For that purpose I guarded the mind faculty.

“Venerable friends, having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue and supreme contentment, and this noble guarding of the sense faculties, I practiced right comprehension when going out or coming in, contemplating and distinguishing well when bending or stretching [a limb] or looking down or up; with orderly manners and appearance, I properly wore the outer robe, the other robes, and the bowl; when walking, standing, sitting, and reclining, when sleeping or awake, when talking or keeping silent, I always practiced right comprehension.

“Venerable friends, having accomplished this noble aggregate of virtue and supreme contentment, this noble guarding of the senses, and having attained right comprehension when going out or coming in, I stayed alone in secluded forests, going to an empty peaceful place at the base of a tree, [or to] a mountain cave, [or to] a heap of straw in an open place, or to a forest, or in a cemetery. Venerable friends, dwelling alone and in seclusion in a forest, or having gone to an empty peaceful place at the base of a tree, I would spread the sitting mat and sit down cross-legged with upright body and upright aspiration, and with mindfulness that was not scattered.

734a

“I abandoned and removed covetousness. My mind was free of agitation. Seeing others’ wealth and requisites of life, I did not give rise to covetousness with the wish ‘May I get it!’ I purified my mind of covetousness. In the same way I abandoned ill will . . . sloth-and-torpor . . . restlessness-and-worry . . . doubt and overcame uncertainty. Freeing myself of vacillation in regard to wholesome things, I purified my mind of doubt.

“Venerable friends, when I had abandoned these five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . I dwelled having attained the fourth absorption. Venerable friends, when I had thus attained concentration, with a mind that was purified and without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having attained imperturbability, I directed the mind toward knowledge and realization of the destruction of the taints.

“Venerable friends, I knew: ‘This is dukkha’ as it really is; I knew: ‘This is the arising of dukkha’; I knew: ‘This is the cessation of dukkha’; I knew: ‘This is the path leading to the cessation of dukkha,’ as it really is.

“I knew: ‘These are the taints’; I knew: ‘This is the arising of the taints’; I knew: ‘This is the cessation of the taints’; I knew: ‘This is the path leading to the cessation of the taints,’ as it really is.

“Knowing like this and seeing like this, the mind was liberated from the taint of sensual desire, from the taint of becoming, and from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, I knew it was liberated, knowing as it really is: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’

“Venerable friends, knowing like this and seeing like this in regard to this internal body together with consciousness and all external signs. ‘I,’

‘I’-making, I totally abandoned the underlying tendency to conceit. They are known to have been uprooted, never to arise again.”

A monk, whose taints are destroyed and who has attained the knowledge of having established the holy life, will properly answer like this.

Hearing this, you should approve of it as good and acceptable, rejoice in it, and receive it respectfully. Having approved of it as good and acceptable, having rejoiced in it and received it respectfully, you should further tell that monk this: “Venerable friend, at your first declaration we already approved and rejoiced in it. However, we wished to follow as the venerable one [went] higher and higher, to seek out his wisdom and eloquence in replying. It is for this reason that we pursued the venerable one, asking him again and again.”<sup>35</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

188. The Discourse to Ajita<sup>36</sup>

734b Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in the Eastern Park, in the Hall of Migāra’s Mother.

At that time, in the afternoon, the World-honored One had risen from sitting in meditation and had come down from the hall to do walking meditation in the open, in the shade of the hall, while giving the monks a detailed exposition of the deep and sublime Dharma.

At that time the heterodox practitioner Ajita, a disciple of the renunciant Paṇḍita, saw from afar that the World-honored One had risen from sitting in meditation and had come down from the hall to do walking meditation in the open, in the shade of the hall, while giving the monks a detailed exposition of the deep and sublime Dharma.

The heterodox practitioner Ajita, a disciple of the renunciant Paṇḍita, approached the Buddha, exchanged friendly greetings, and followed the Buddha as he walked.<sup>37</sup> The World-honored One turned to him and said:

Ajita, is it true that the renunciant Paṇḍita has thought out five hundred thoughts, [so that] when other renunciants and brahmins, who [supposedly] know all and see all, claim to be without remainder and to know [that they are] without remainder, they will see that they are wrong and that their claims about themselves are wrong?

The heterodox practitioner Ajita, a disciple of the renunciant Paṇḍita, replied:

Gotama, it is true that the renunciant Paṇḍita has thought out five hundred thoughts, [so that] when other renunciants and brahmins, who [supposedly] know all and see all, claim to be without remainder and to know [that they are] without remainder, they will see that they are wrong and that their claims about themselves are wrong.

The World-honored One asked further:

Ajita, how has the renunciant Paṇḍita thought out five hundred thoughts, [so that] when other renunciants and brahmins, who [supposedly] know all and see all, claim to be without remainder and to know [that they are] without remainder, they will see that they are wrong and that their claims about themselves are wrong?

The heterodox practitioner Ajita, a disciple of the renunciant Paṇḍita, replied:

Gotama, the renunciant Paṇḍita declares this: “[Suppose someone claims], ‘Whether I am walking, or standing, or sitting, or lying down, whether I am going to sleep or waking up, whether by day or by night, I know and see constantly and without obstruction.’”<sup>38</sup>

“It may happen that at some time I encounter a charging elephant, a runaway horse, a speeding chariot, rebelling soldiers, a running man, or a running woman. It may be that I am walking along a path like this and encounter a vicious elephant, a vicious horse, a vicious ox, or a vicious dog. It may be that I come upon a cluster of snakes, or have clods thrown at me, or get beaten up with sticks, or fall into a ditch, or fall into a cesspit, or tread on a sleeping cow, or fall into a deep trench, or wander into a thornbush. It may be that, on seeing a village or town, I ask its name or ask the way to it; or on seeing a man or woman, I ask their name. It may be that I see an empty house or enter a family [home] and, having entered, am asked, ‘Venerable sir, where are you going?’ I answer them, saying, ‘Friends, I am on the wrong path.’”

Gotama, the renunciant Paṇḍita has thought out five hundred thoughts like this, [so that] when other renunciants and brahmins who [supposedly] know all and see all claim to be without remainder and to know [that they are] without remainder, they will see that they are wrong.

734c Then the World-honored One left off his walking meditation, went to the end of the walking meditation [path], spread out his sitting mat, and sat down cross-legged. He asked the monks, “Do you recall what I have taught on the subject of wisdom?” The monks remained silent and did not reply.

Three times the World-honored One asked the monks, “Do you recall what I have taught on the subject of wisdom?” and three times the monks remained silent and did not reply.

At that time one monk rose from his seat, arranged his robes so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, now is the right time. Well-gone One, now is the right time. If the World-honored One teaches the monks on the subject of wisdom, having heard it from the World-honored One the monks will remember it well.

The World-honored One said, “Monks, listen closely and pay proper attention. I shall explain it to you in detail.”

Then the monks replied, “Yes, indeed. We shall listen to receive the teaching.”

The Buddha said:

In general there are two [kinds of] assemblies. The first is called a Dharma assembly and the second is called a non-Dharma assembly. What is a non-Dharma assembly?

Suppose there is someone who practices non-Dharma and speaks non-Dharma, and that his assembly also practices non-Dharma and speaks non-Dharma. That non-Dharma person stands before the non-Dharma assembly and speaks of what he himself knows, with false words and untruths. Presenting an analysis and propounding his practice, he conveys his teaching in an orderly manner. He seeks to cut down others' opinions as corrupt by closely questioning them with an improper manner of speaking.

In the true Dharma and discipline, this way of setting out what one knows oneself is not praiseworthy. That non-Dharma person standing before his non-Dharma assembly praises himself saying: "I have wisdom. I have wide knowledge." This situation, where claims regarding wisdom are made in this way, is what is called a non-Dharma assembly.

What is a Dharma assembly? Suppose that someone practices Dharma and speaks Dharma, and his assembly also practices Dharma and speaks Dharma. That Dharma person stands before the Dharma assembly and speaks of what he himself knows with words that are true, correct, not false. Presenting an analysis and propounding his practice, he conveys his teaching in an orderly manner. He seeks to cut down others' opinions as corrupt by closely questioning them with a proper manner of speaking.

In the true Dharma this way of setting out what one knows oneself is praiseworthy. That Dharma person standing before a Dharma assembly praises himself, saying: "I have wisdom. I have wide knowledge." This situation, where claims regarding wisdom are made in this way, is what is called a Dharma assembly.

For this reason, you should know what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial. Having known what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial, you should train according to Dharma, according to what is beneficial.

Having spoken thus, the Buddha got up from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation.<sup>39</sup> At this the monks thought, "Venerable friends, you should know that the World-honored One has got up from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having expressed the meaning of this in brief, without explaining it in detail, [namely], 'For this reason, you should know what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial. Having known what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial, you should train according to Dharma, according to what is beneficial.'"

735a

They further thought this: "Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?"

They further thought this: “The venerable Ānanda is the attendant of the Buddha and knows the Buddha’s intentions, and he is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Ānanda will be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief. Venerable friends, let us together approach the venerable Ānanda and request him to explain its meaning. As the venerable Ānanda explains it, we shall receive and remember it well.”

Thereupon the monks approached the venerable Ānanda, exchanged greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side. They said:

The venerable Ānanda should know that the World-honored One got up from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, having expressed the meaning of this in brief, without explaining it in detail, [namely], “For this reason, you should know what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial. Having known what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial, you should train according to Dharma, according to what is beneficial.”

Then we thought this: “Venerable friends, who would be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief?” We further thought: “The venerable Ānanda is the attendant of the Buddha and knows the Buddha’s intentions and he is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Ānanda will be able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One has just said in brief.” May the venerable Ānanda, out of compassion, explain it in detail!

The venerable Ānanda said:

Venerable friends, listen while I tell you a simile. On hearing a simile, wise people understand its meaning. Venerable friends, it is just like a man who wants to find heartwood. In order to find heartwood, he enters the forest, carrying an ax. He sees a great tree possessed of roots, branches, joints, twigs, leaves, flowers, and heartwood. That man does not seize the roots, branches, joints, and heartwood, but seizes only the twigs and leaves.

Venerable friends, what you have said is just like that. [Although] the World-honored One was present you left him and have come to ask me the meaning. Why is that? Venerable friends, please know that the World-honored One is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. He teaches the true meaning. The revelation of all meanings comes from that World-honored One.

Venerable friends, you should have approached the World-honored One to ask about the meaning, [saying], “World-honored One, how is this? What is the meaning of this?” As the World-honored One would have explained it, so you, venerable friends, should have received and remembered it well.

Then the monks said:

Yes, venerable Ānanda, the World-honored One indeed is the eye, is knowledge, is meaning, is the Dharma, is the master of the Dharma, is the general of the Dharma. He teaches the true meaning. The revelation of all meanings comes from the World-honored One. Yet the venerable Ānanda is the attendant of the Buddha and knows the Buddha’s intentions. He is often praised by the World-honored One and by his wise companions in the holy life. The venerable Ānanda is able to explain in detail the meaning of what the World-honored One said in brief. May the venerable Ānanda, out of compassion, explain it in detail!

735b

The venerable Ānanda said to the monks:

Venerable friends, listen together to what I shall say. Venerable friends, wrong view is non-Dharma, right view is Dharma. Whatever innumerable evil and unwholesome states arise in dependence on wrong view, these are not beneficial. Whatever innumerable wholesome states arise in dependence on right view, these are beneficial.

Venerable friends . . . up to . . . wrong knowledge is non-Dharma, right knowledge is Dharma. Whatever innumerable evil and unwholesome states arise in dependence on wrong knowledge, these are not beneficial. Whatever innumerable wholesome states arise in dependence on right knowledge, these are beneficial.

Venerable friends, regarding the instruction that the World-honored One gave in brief and, without explaining it in detail, got up from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation, [namely], “For this reason, you should know what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial. Having known what is Dharma and what is non-Dharma, what is beneficial and what is not beneficial, you should train according to the Dharma, according to what is beneficial”—this instruction, which the World-honored One gave in brief, without explaining its meaning in detail, I have explained in detail in this way, employing these phrases and words. Venerable friends, approach the Buddha and set out [my explanation] in full [to him]. As the World-honored One explains its meaning, [you], venerable friends, can receive and remember it.

Then the monks, having heard the venerable Ānanda’s explanation, having received and remembered it well for recitation, rose from their seats, circumambulated the venerable Ānanda three times, and left. They approached the Buddha, paid homage with their heads, stepped back, and sat to one side. They said:

World-honored One, regarding the instruction that the World-honored One gave us in brief without explaining its meaning in detail, but got up from his seat and entered his dwelling to sit in meditation—the venerable Ānanda has explained it in detail, employing these phrases and words.

Having heard it, the World-honored One praised it, saying:

It is well, it is well, [Ānanda] is one among my disciples who is endowed with the eye, with knowledge, with Dharma, with meaning. Why is that? Because in regard to what the teacher said to [you] disciples in brief without explaining its meaning in detail, that disciple has explained it in detail employing these phrases and words. As Ānanda has explained it, so you should remember it. Why is that? Contemplating the meaning [of the discourse] according to this explanation is how it should be done.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

189. The Discourse on the Noble Path<sup>40</sup>

735c Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling among the Kurus, in the Kuru town of Kammāsadhamma.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

There is one path whereby beings can achieve purification, free themselves from worry, sadness, and tears, eradicate dejection, suffering, remorse, and anxiety, and then attain the [right] method, namely noble right concentration with its arising, its supports, and also with its accompaniment of seven factors.<sup>41</sup> Regarding noble right concentration I shall explain its arising, its supports, and also its accompaniments.

What are the seven [accompanying factors]? [They are] right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, and right mindfulness. If, through the arising of these seven factors, supported [by them], and accompanied [by them], the mind progresses well and attains unification—this is what is meant by noble right concentration with its arising, with its supports, and with its accompaniment. Why is that?

From right view arises right intention, from right intention arises right speech, from right speech arises right action, from right action arises right livelihood, from right livelihood arises right effort, from right effort arises right mindfulness, and from right mindfulness arises right concentration.<sup>42</sup>

A noble disciple who has in this way rightly concentrated the mind will swiftly eradicate sexual desire, ill will, and delusion. A noble disciple who has in this way rightly liberated the mind swiftly comes to know: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.” He comes to know this as it really is.

Herein right view comes first. If one sees that wrong view is wrong view, then this is right view. If one sees that right view is right view, then this too is right view. What is wrong view?

It is this view, “There is no [efficacy in] giving, there is no [efficacy in] offerings, there is no [efficacy in] reciting hymns, there are no wholesome or evil deeds, there are no results of wholesome or evil deeds, there is neither this world nor that world, there is no [obligation toward one’s] father or mother, in the world there are no arahants who have arrived at a wholesome attainment, who are well gone and have progressed well, and who dwell having by their own knowledge and experience realized for themselves this world and the other world”—this is wrong view.

What is right view? It is this view:<sup>43</sup> “There is [efficacy in] giving, there is [efficacy in] offerings, there is [efficacy in] reciting hymns, there are wholesome and evil deeds, there are results of wholesome and evil deeds, there are this world and that world, there is [obligation toward one’s] father and mother, in the world there are arahants who have arrived at a wholesome attainment, who are well gone and have progressed well, and who dwell having by their own knowledge and experience realized for themselves this world and the other world”—this is right view.

To see that wrong view is wrong view—this is right view; and to see that right view is right view—this too is right view. Having understood it like this, one then strives in the training, wishing to abandon wrong view and to accomplish right view—this is right effort. Through mindfulness a monk abandons wrong view and accomplishes right view—this is right mindfulness. These three factors go together with right view, from view to effort. For this reason, right view comes first.

If one sees that wrong intention is wrong intention—this is right <view>.<sup>44</sup> If one sees that right intention is right intention—this too is right <view>.

736a What is wrong intention? Thoughts of sensuality, thoughts of ill will, thoughts of harming—this is wrong intention. What is right intention? Thoughts without sensuality, thoughts without ill will, thoughts of non-harming—this is right intention.

To see that wrong intention is wrong intention—this is right <view>; and to see that right intention is right intention—this too is right <view>. Having understood it like this, one then strives in the training, wishing to abandon wrong intention and to accomplish right intention—this is right effort. With mindfulness a monk abandons wrong intention and accomplishes right intention—this is right mindfulness. These three factors go together with right intention, from view to effort. For this reason, right view comes first.

If one sees that wrong speech is wrong speech—this is right <view>. If one sees that right speech is right speech—this too is right <view>.

What is wrong speech? False speech, divisive speech, harsh speech, and gossip—this is wrong speech. What is right speech? Abstention from false speech, from divisive speech, from harsh speech, and from gossip—this is right speech.

To see that wrong speech is wrong speech—this is right <view>; and to see that right speech is right speech—this too is right <view>. Having understood it like this, one then strives in the training, wishing to abandon wrong speech and to accomplish right speech—this is right effort. With mindfulness a monk abandons wrong speech and accomplishes right speech—this is right mindfulness. These three factors go together with right speech, from view to effort. For this reason, right view comes first.

If one sees that wrong action is wrong action—this is right <view>. If one sees that right action is right action—this too is right <view>.

What is wrong action? Killing living beings, taking what is not given, sexual misconduct—this is wrong action. What is right action? Abstention from killing, from taking what is not given, from sexual misconduct—this is right action.

To see that wrong action is wrong action—this is right <view>; and to see that right action is right action—this too is right <view>. Having understood it like this, one then strives in the training, wishing to abandon wrong action and to accomplish right action—this is right effort. With mindfulness a monk abandons wrong action and accomplishes right action—this is right mindfulness. These three factors go together with right action, from view to effort. For this reason, right view comes first.

If one sees that wrong livelihood is wrong livelihood—this is right <view>. If one sees that right livelihood is right livelihood—this too is right <view>.

What is wrong livelihood? If someone seeks [requisites] with a dissatisfied mind, has recourse to various inappropriate types of spells, makes a living by wrong forms of livelihood; if he seeks robes by means not in accordance with the Dharma, contrary to the Dharma, seeks food and drink, beds and couches, and medicine, the requisites of life by means contrary to the Dharma—this is wrong livelihood.

What is right livelihood? If someone does not seek [requisites] with a dissatisfied mind, does not have recourse to various inappropriate types of spells, does not make a living by wrong forms of livelihood; if he seeks robes by means in accordance with the Dharma, in conformity with the Dharma; seeks food and drink, beds and couches, and medicine, the requisites of life in conformity with the Dharma—this is right livelihood.

736b

To see that wrong livelihood is wrong livelihood—this is right <view>; and to see that right livelihood is right livelihood—this too is right <view>. Having understood it like this, one strives in the training, wishing to abandon wrong livelihood and to accomplish right livelihood—this is right effort. With mindfulness a monk abandons wrong livelihood and accomplishes right livelihood—this is right mindfulness. These three factors go together with right livelihood, from view to effort. For this reason, right view comes first.

What is right effort?<sup>45</sup> For the abandoning of already arisen unwholesome states a monk cultivates ardor, puts forth energy, and is diligent in arousing the mind toward cessation. For the nonarising of not yet arisen unwholesome states he cultivates ardor, puts forth energy, and is diligent in arousing the mind toward cessation. For the arising of not yet arisen wholesome states he cultivates ardor, puts forth energy, and is diligent in arousing the mind toward cessation. For the stabilizing of already arisen wholesome states without loss or regress, for their increase and expansion, for their development and full implementation, he cultivates ardor, puts forth energy, and is diligent in arousing the mind toward cessation. This is right effort.

What is right mindfulness? A monk contemplates the body as a body internally, contemplates . . . up to . . . feelings . . . states of mind . . . dharmas as dharmas. This is right mindfulness.

What is right concentration? A monk, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is right concentration.

What is right liberation? A monk liberates the mind from sensuality . . . ill will . . . liberates the mind from delusion. This is right liberation.

What is right knowledge? A monk knows that the mind has been liberated from sensuality . . . from ill will, knows that the mind has been liberated from delusion. This is right knowledge.

The one in training is endowed with eight factors. The arahant, who has destroyed the taints, is endowed with ten factors.

What are the eight factors with which the one in training is endowed? [They are] the right view of one in training . . . up to . . . the right concentration of one in training. These are the eight factors with which the one in training is endowed.

What are the ten factors with which the arahant, who has destroyed the taints, is endowed? [They are] the right view of one beyond training . . . up to . . . the right knowledge of one beyond training. These are the ten factors with which the arahant, who has destroyed the taints, is endowed. Why is this?

One who has right view abandons wrong view, [and thereby] the countless evil and unwholesome states that arise because of wrong view are abandoned and the countless wholesome states that arise because of right view are developed and brought to perfection . . . up to . . . one who has right knowledge abandons wrong knowledge, [and thereby] the countless evil and unwholesome states that arise because of wrong knowledge are abandoned, and the countless wholesome states that arise because of right knowledge are developed and brought to perfection.<sup>46</sup>

736c

These are twenty wholesome types and twenty unwholesome types. Hence this is spoken of as the teaching on the great forty types, which has set rolling the Brahmā wheel that cannot be stopped or contradicted by any renunciant or brahmin, deva, māra, Brahmā, or anyone else in the world.

If some renunciant or brahmin [attempts to stop or contradict] the teaching on the great forty types proclaimed by me, which has set rolling the Brahmā wheel that cannot be stopped or contradicted by any renunciant or brahmin, deva, māra, Brahmā, or anyone else in the world, then they will incur ten kinds of censure in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the ten? If [the renunciant or brahmin] condemns right view and commends wrong view, if they [in this way] support and commend renunciants and brahmins who have wrong view, and if they [in this way] contradict the teaching on the great forty types proclaimed by me, which has set rolling the Brahmā wheel that cannot be stopped by any renunciant or brahmin, deva, māra, Brahmā, or by anyone else in the world—then they incur the first kind of censure in accordance with the Dharma.

If some renunciant or brahmin condemns . . . up to . . . right knowledge and commends wrong knowledge, if they [in this way] support and commend renunciants and brahmins who have wrong knowledge, and if they [in this way] contradict the teaching on the great forty types proclaimed by me, which has set rolling the Brahmā wheel that cannot be stopped by any renunciant or brahmin, deva, māra, Brahmā, or by anyone else in the world—then they incur the tenth kind of censure in accordance with the Dharma.

If some renunciant or brahmin [attempts to stop or contradict] the teaching on the great forty types proclaimed by me, which has set rolling the Brahmā wheel that cannot be stopped or contradicted by any renunciant or brahmin, deva, māra, Brahmā, or by anyone else in the world, then [they will incur] these ten kinds of censure in accordance with the Dharma.

Still other renunciants and brahmins, who [practice] squatting and proclaim [the practice of] squatting, who are nihilists and proclaim nihilism, who deny causality, deny action, deny karma, maintaining that whatever good or evil is done is cut off and destroyed then and there—if they contradict the teaching on the great forty types proclaimed by me, which has set rolling the Brahmā wheel that cannot be stopped by any renunciant or brahmin, deva, māra, Brahmā, or by anyone else in the world, then they will be worried and fearful of also incurring censure.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

190. The Shorter Discourse on Emptiness<sup>47</sup>

737a Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī in the Eastern Park, in the Hall of Migāra’s Mother.

At that time, in the afternoon, the venerable Ānanda rose from sitting in meditation and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, he stepped back, stood to one side, and said:

Once the World-honored One was dwelling among the Sakyans, in a town of the Sakyans called Nagaraka. At that time I heard the World-honored One say this: “Ānanda, I dwell much in emptiness.” Have I understood well, received well, and remembered well that statement by the World-honored One?

Then the World-honored One replied:

Ānanda, you truly have understood well, received well, and remembered well that statement by me. Why is that? From then until now I dwell much in emptiness.

Ānanda, it is just as this Hall of Migāra's Mother is empty of elephants, of horses, of oxen, of sheep, of goods, of grain, and of servants. What it is not empty of, however, is just a sangha of monks. Thus, Ānanda, whatever is not present here, I therefore view as empty; and whatever remains present here, I see as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion.

Ānanda, if a monk wishes to dwell much in emptiness, then that monk should not give attention to the perception of a village and not give attention to the perception of people, but should frequently give attention to the unitary perception of [this] forest. In this way he knows that this is empty of the perception of a village and empty of the perception of people. Yet there is nonemptiness, which is just the unitary perception of a forest. [He knows:] "Whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of a village, for me that is not present; and whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of people, for me that too is not present. There is just the disturbance caused by the unitary perception of a forest."

Whatever is not present here, he therefore sees as empty; whatever else is present here, he sees as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion.

Again, Ānanda, if a monk wishes to dwell much in emptiness, that monk should not give attention to the perception of people and not give attention to the perception of a forest, but should frequently give attention to the unitary perception of earth.

If that monk sees this earth as having hills and hollows, with groups of snakes, with clumps of thornbushes, with sand and rocks, steep mountain slopes and deep rivers, then he should not attend to it in that way. If [instead] he sees this earth as level and flat like the palm of his hand, then his manner of looking at it is beneficial and should be attended to frequently.

Ānanda, it is just as a cow hide, when stretched and fastened with a hundred pegs, fully stretched, has no wrinkles and no creases. [Similarly], if he sees this earth as having hills and hollows, with groups of snakes, with clumps of thornbushes, with sand and rocks, steep mountains and deep rivers, then he should not attend to it in that way. If [instead] he sees this earth as level and flat like the palm of his hand, then his manner of looking at it is beneficial and should be attended to frequently.

737b

In this way he knows that this is empty of the perception of people and empty of the perception of a forest. Yet there is nonemptiness, which is just the unitary perception of earth. [He knows:] “Whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of people, for me that is not present; whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of a forest, for me that too is not present. There exists only the disturbance caused by the unitary perception of earth.”

Whatever is not present here, he therefore sees as empty; whatever else is present there, he sees as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion.

Again, Ānanda, if a monk wishes to dwell much in emptiness, that monk should not give attention to the perception of a forest and not give attention to the perception of earth, but should frequently give attention to the unitary perception of the sphere of infinite space.

In this way he knows that this is empty of the perception of a forest and empty of the perception of earth. Yet there is nonemptiness, which is just the unitary perception of the sphere of infinite space. [He knows:] “Whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of a forest, for me that is not present; whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of earth, for me that too is not present. There exists only the disturbance caused by the unitary perception of the sphere of infinite space.”

Whatever is not present there, he therefore sees as empty; whatever else is there, he sees as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion.

Again, Ānanda, if a monk wishes to dwell much in emptiness, that monk should not give attention to the perception of earth and not give attention to the perception of the sphere of infinite space, but should frequently give attention to the unitary perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness.

In this way he knows that this is empty of the perception of earth and empty of the perception of the sphere of infinite space. Yet there is non-emptiness, which is just the unitary perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness. [He knows:] “Whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of earth, for me that is not present; whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of the sphere of infinite space, for me that too is not present. There exists only the disturbance caused by the unitary perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness.”

Whatever is not present there, he therefore sees as empty; whatever else is present there, he sees as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion.

Again, Ānanda, if a monk wishes to dwell much in emptiness, that monk should not give attention to the perception of the sphere of infinite space and not give attention to the perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness, but should frequently give attention to the unitary perception of the sphere of nothingness.

In this way he knows that this is empty of the perception of the sphere of infinite space and empty of the perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness. Yet there is nonemptiness, which is just the unitary perception of the sphere of nothingness. [He knows:] “Whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of the sphere of infinite space, for me that is not present; whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness, for me that too is not present. There exists only the disturbance caused by the unitary perception of the sphere of nothingness.”

Whatever is not present there, he therefore sees as empty; whatever else is there, he sees as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion.<sup>48</sup>

737c

Again, Ānanda, if a monk wishes to dwell much in emptiness, that monk should not give attention to the perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness and not give attention to the perception of the sphere of nothingness, but should frequently give attention to the unitary <signless> concentration of mind.<sup>49</sup>

In this way he knows that this is empty of the perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness and empty of the perception of the sphere of nothingness. Yet there is nonemptiness, which is just the unitary <signless> concentration of mind. [He knows:] “Whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of the sphere of infinite consciousness, for me that is not present; whatever disturbance there might be, caused by perception of the sphere of nothingness, for me that too is not present. There exists only the disturbance caused by the <signless> concentration of mind.”

Whatever is not present there, he therefore sees as empty; whatever else is present there, he sees as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion.

He thinks: “My [experience] of <signless> concentration of mind is rooted, it is rooted in formations, it is rooted in intentions. What is rooted in formations, rooted in intentions, I do not delight in that, I do not seek that, I should not dwell in that.”<sup>50</sup> Knowing like this and seeing like this, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire, from the taint of existence, and from the taint of ignorance. Being liberated, he knows he is liberated. He knows as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

In this way he knows that this is empty of the taint of sensual desire, empty of the taint of existence, and empty of the taint of ignorance. Yet there is nonemptiness, which is just this body with the six sense spheres and the life faculty. [He knows:] “Whatever disturbance there might be, caused by the taint of sensual desire, for me that is not present; whatever disturbance there might be, caused by the taint of existence . . . caused by the taint of ignorance, for me that too is not present. There exists only the disturbance caused by this body of mine with the six sense spheres and the life faculty.”

Whatever is not present there, he therefore sees as empty; whatever else is present there, he sees as truly present. Ānanda, this is called dwelling in true emptiness, without distortion, namely eradication of the taints, the taintless and unconditioned liberation of the mind.<sup>51</sup>

Ānanda, whatever tathāgatas, free from attachment and fully awakened, there have been in the past, they all dwelled in this true emptiness, without distortion, namely the eradication of the taints, the taintless and unconditioned liberation of the mind.<sup>52</sup>

Ānanda, whatever tathāgatas, free from attachment and fully awakened, there will be in the future, they will all dwell in this true emptiness, without distortion, namely the eradication of the taints, the taintless and unconditioned liberation of the mind.

Ānanda, I, who am the Tathāgata now, free from attachment and fully awakened, I too dwell in this true emptiness, without distortion, namely the eradication of the taints, the taintless and unconditioned liberation of the mind.

Ānanda, you should train like this: “I too shall dwell in this true emptiness, without distortion, namely the eradication of the taints, the taintless and unconditioned liberation of the mind.” Ānanda, you should train like this.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully. 738a

191. The Greater Discourse on Emptiness<sup>53</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu, in the Nigrodha Park.

At that time, when the night was over, toward dawn, the World-honored One put on his [outer] robe, took his bowl, and entered Kapilavatthu to beg for almsfood. After having partaken of the midday meal, he went to the dwelling of Kālākhemaka the Sakyan.

At that time in the dwelling of Kālākhemaka the Sakyan numerous beds and seats had been set out, [indicating that] many monks were staying there. Then, the World-honored One came out of the dwelling of Kālākhemaka the Sakyan and went to the dwelling of Ghāṭa the Sakyan.

At that time the venerable Ānanda and many monks had congregated in the dwelling of Ghāṭa the Sakyan to make robes. The venerable Ānanda saw from afar that the Buddha was coming. Having seen this, he came out to receive the Buddha, took his [outer] robe and bowl, and returned to prepare a seat and draw water for washing his feet.<sup>54</sup> When the Buddha had washed his feet and sat down on the seat prepared by the venerable Ānanda in the dwelling of Ghāṭa the Sakyan, he said, “Ānanda, in the dwelling of Kālākhemaka the Sakyan numerous beds and seats have been set out, [indicating that] many monks are staying there.”

The venerable Ānanda said:

Yes, indeed, World-honored One, in the dwelling of Kālākhemaka the Sakyan numerous beds and seats have been set out, [indicating that] many monks are staying there. Why is that? We are now making robes.

Then, the World-honored One told Ānanda:

A monk should not desire clamorous talk, delight in clamorous talk, associate with clamorous talk, desire company, delight in company, associate with company, not desiring to be separated from company, not delighting in dwelling alone in remote places.

If a monk desires clamorous talk, delights in clamorous talk, associates with clamorous talk, desires company, delights in company, associates with company, not desiring to be separated from company, not delighting in dwelling alone in remote places, then it is impossible for him to attain, easily and without difficulty, that which is called happiness: noble happiness, the happiness of dispassion, the happiness of separation, the happiness of stillness, the happiness [that leads to] full awakening, the non-worldly happiness, the happiness [that is not affected by] birth and death.

Ānanda, if a monk does not desire clamorous talk, does not delight in clamorous talk, does not associate with clamorous talk, does not desire company, does not delight in company, does not associate with company, desiring to be separated from company, constantly delighting in dwelling alone in remote places, then it is certainly possible for him to attain, easily and without difficulty, that which is called happiness: noble happiness, the happiness of dispassion, the happiness of separation, the happiness of stillness, the happiness [that leads to] full awakening, the nonworldly happiness, the happiness [that is not affected by] birth and death.

738b

Ānanda, a monk should not desire clamorous talk, delight in clamorous talk, associate with clamorous talk, desire company, delight in company, and associate with company, not desiring to be separated from company, not delighting in dwelling alone in remote places. If a monk desires clamorous talk, delights in clamorous talk, associates with clamorous talk, desires company, delights in company, and associates with company, not desiring to be separated from company, not delighting in dwelling alone in remote places, then it is impossible for him to attain either the temporary liberation of the mind that is delightful or the permanent liberation of the mind that is unshakeable.

Ānanda, if a monk does not desire clamorous talk, does not delight in clamorous talk, does not associate with clamorous talk, does not desire company, does not delight in company, and does not associate with company, desiring to be separated from company, constantly delighting in dwelling alone in remote places, then it is certainly possible for him to attain either the temporary liberation of the mind that is delightful or the permanent liberation of the mind that is unshakeable. Why is that?

I do not see a single form that I might desire or delight in, since with the decay and change of that form there would at some time arise sorrow and lamentation, sadness, suffering, and vexation. For this reason, I fully and completely awoke to this other abiding, namely dwelling in emptiness externally by transcending all perception of form.<sup>55</sup>

Ānanda, when I dwell in this abiding, there arises joy. I experience this joy throughout the whole body with right mindfulness and right comprehension. There arises rapture . . . there arises tranquility . . . there arises happiness . . . there arises concentration. I experience this concentration throughout the whole body with right mindfulness and right comprehension.

Ānanda, there may be monks, nuns, male lay disciples, or female lay disciples who together come to see me. Then, behaving in such a way toward them, being in such a mental state, secluded and delighting in dispassion, I teach them the Dharma to encourage and help them.

Ānanda, if a monk wishes to dwell much in emptiness, then that monk should keep the mind established in inner tranquility so that it becomes unified and concentrated. Having kept the mind established in inner tranquility so that it becomes unified and concentrated, he should attend to internal emptiness.

Ānanda, if a monk speaks like this, “Without keeping the mind established in inner tranquility so that it becomes unified and concentrated, I attend to internal emptiness,” you should know that that monk is making great trouble for himself.<sup>56</sup>

Ānanda, how does a monk keep the mind established in inner tranquility so that it becomes unified and concentrated? A monk completely drenches and pervades this body with rapture and pleasure born of seclusion [experienced in the first absorption], so that no part [of his body] is not pervaded by rapture and pleasure born of seclusion.<sup>57</sup>

Ānanda, it is just as a person taking a bath, having placed bath powder in a vessel, might sprinkle it with water and knead it into a ball, so that every bit of it, inside and out, is completely drenched and pervaded with the water, with none seeping out.

738c

In the same way, Ānanda, a monk completely drenches and pervades his body with rapture and pleasure born of seclusion, so that there is no part [of his body] that is not pervaded by rapture and pleasure born of seclusion.

Ānanda, in this way a monk should keep the mind established in inner tranquility so that it becomes unified and concentrated. Keeping the mind established in inner tranquility so that it becomes unified and concentrated, he should attend to internal emptiness. [It may happen that], having attended to internal emptiness, his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and is not released by internal emptiness.

Ānanda, if while contemplating, a monk comes to know that on attending to internal emptiness his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and is not released by internal emptiness, then that monk should attend to external emptiness. [It may happen that], having attended to external emptiness, his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and is not released by external emptiness.

Ānanda, if while contemplating, a monk comes to know that on attending to external emptiness his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and is not released by external emptiness, then that monk should attend to internal and external emptiness. [It may happen that], having attended to internal and external emptiness, his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and is not released by internal and external emptiness.

Ānanda, if while contemplating a monk comes to know that, on attending to internal and external emptiness, his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and not released by internal and external emptiness, then that monk should attend to imperturbability. [It may happen that], having attended to imperturbability, his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and is not released by imperturbability.

Ānanda, if while contemplating, a monk comes to know that on attending to imperturbability his mind is perturbed, does not advance and progress, does not attain purity, is not established, and is not released by imperturbability, then that monk should repeatedly direct his mind to this or that concentration,<sup>58</sup> repeatedly practice it, repeatedly soften [the mind] so that it becomes joyful and tender, absorbed in the pleasure of seclusion.

Repeatedly directing his mind to this or that concentration, repeatedly practicing it, repeatedly softening [the mind], so that it becomes joyful and tender, absorbed in the pleasure of seclusion, he should accomplish dwelling in internal emptiness. Having accomplished dwelling in internal emptiness, the mind becomes imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by internal emptiness.

Ānanda, if while contemplating a monk comes to know that he has accomplished dwelling in internal emptiness, that the mind has become imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by internal emptiness—then this is right comprehension.

Ānanda, the monk should then accomplish dwelling in external emptiness. Having accomplished dwelling in external emptiness, the mind becomes imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by external emptiness.

739a

Ānanda, if while contemplating a monk comes to know that he has accomplished dwelling in external emptiness, that the mind has become imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by external emptiness—then this is right comprehension.

Ānanda, the monk should then accomplish dwelling in internal and external emptiness. Having accomplished dwelling in internal and external emptiness, the mind becomes imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by internal and external emptiness.

Ānanda, if while contemplating a monk comes to know that he has accomplished dwelling in internal and external emptiness, that the mind has become imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by internal and external emptiness—then this is right comprehension.

Ānanda, he should then accomplish dwelling in imperturbability. Having accomplished dwelling in imperturbability, the mind becomes imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by imperturbability.

Ānanda, if while contemplating, a monk comes to know that he has accomplished dwelling in imperturbability, that the mind has become imperturbable, advances and progresses, attains purity, is established, and is released by imperturbability—then this is right comprehension.

Ānanda, if a monk who is dwelling in this tranquil mental abiding wishes to practice walking meditation, then that monk goes out of his meditation hut and practices walking meditation in the open in the shade of the hut, with his faculties established within, the mind not directed outward or backward but perceiving [only] what is in front. After practicing walking meditation like this, his mind does not give rise to covetousness, sadness, or any [other] evil or unwholesome state. This is right comprehension.

Ānanda, if a monk who is dwelling in this tranquil mental abiding wishes to sit in concentration, then that monk leaves off the walking meditation, goes to the end of the walking meditation path, spreads his sitting mat, and sits down cross-legged. After having sat in concentration like this, the mind does not give rise to covetousness, sadness, or any [other] evil or unwholesome state. This is right comprehension.<sup>59</sup>

Ānanda, if a monk who is dwelling in this tranquil mental abiding wishes to think thoughts, then that monk should not think any of the three evil and unwholesome [types of] thought: thoughts of sensual desire, thoughts of ill will, and thoughts of harming, these three evil and unwholesome [types of] thought. [Instead] he should think any of the three wholesome [types of] thought: thoughts of desirelessness, thoughts of non-ill will, and thoughts of nonharming, these three wholesome [types of] thought. After he has been thinking like this, his mind does not give rise to covetousness, sadness, or any [other] evil or unwholesome state. This is right comprehension.<sup>60</sup>

Ānanda, if a monk who is dwelling in this tranquil abiding wishes to speak, then that monk does not talk ignoble talk related to what is not beneficial, such as talk about kings, talk about thieves, talk about battles and quarrels, talk about food and drink, talk about robes, talk about married women, talk about girls, talk about adulterous women, talk about the world, talk about wrong practices, talk about what is in the ocean—he does not talk such types of irrelevant talk.

[Instead] he talks noble talk that is related to what is beneficial, that makes the mind malleable, free of darkness and hindrances, such as talk about giving, talk about morality, talk about concentration, talk about wisdom, talk about liberation, talk about knowledge and vision of liberation, talk about self-effacement, talk about not socializing, talk about fewness of desires, talk about contentment, talk about dispassion, talk about abandoning, talk about extinction, talk about sitting in meditation, talk about dependent arising—such talk of renunciants. After he has been talking like this, his mind does not give rise to covetousness, sadness, or any [other] evil or unwholesome state. This is right comprehension. 739b

Again, Ānanda, there are the five strands of sensual pleasure, which are pleasurable, thought about by the mind, of desirable appearance, and connected with sensual desire, [namely]: visible forms known by the eye, sounds known by the ear, odors known by the nose, flavors known by the tongue, and tangibles known by the body. If a monk's mind turns to contemplate these five strands of sensual pleasure, if he comes under the influence of these strands of sensual pleasure, then his mind may dwell on them. Why is that? Sooner or later, in regard to these five strands of sensual pleasure, one comes under the influence of these strands of sensual pleasure, and the mind dwells on them.

Ānanda, if a monk, while contemplating these five strands of sensual pleasure, comes to know that he has come under the influence of these strands of sensual pleasure and that his mind is dwelling on them, then that monk should contemplate these various strands of sensual pleasure as impermanent, contemplate their decay, contemplate their fading away, contemplate their cutting off, contemplate their cessation, contemplate abandoning them, giving them up, and separating from them. Then, whatever he has of desire and defilement regarding these five strands of sensual pleasure will cease.

Ānanda, if while contemplating like this, a monk knows that whatever he had of desire and defilement in regard to these five strands of sensual pleasure has been made to cease, this is right comprehension.

Again, Ānanda, there are the five aggregates affected by clinging. The material form aggregate affected by clinging . . . feeling . . . perception . . . formations and the consciousness aggregate affected by clinging.

The monk should contemplate their rise and fall thus: “This is material form, this is the arising of material form, this is the cessation of material form, this is feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . this is consciousness, this is the arising of consciousness, this is the cessation of consciousness.” Then, whatever conceit of an “I” he has in regard to these five aggregates affected by clinging, that will cease.

Ānanda, if while contemplating thus the monk comes to know that whatever conceit of an “I” he had in regard to these five aggregates affected by clinging has ceased—this is right comprehension.

Ānanda, this Dharma is entirely desirable, entirely delightful, entirely [worth] thinking about.<sup>61</sup> It is without taints, without clinging, beyond the reach of Māra, beyond the reach of the Evil One, beyond the reach of all evil and unwholesome states that defile and are the root of future becoming, that result in vexation and suffering, and that are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death. This is accomplishment in diligence. Why is that?

It is through diligence that all tathāgatas, free from attachment, fully awakened, attained awakening. Through the faculty of diligence there arise the innumerable wholesome states that are in accordance with the factors of the path. Ānanda, for this reason you should train thus: “I will accomplish diligence”—thus you should train.

Ānanda, for what reason do faithful disciples follow the World-honored One and respect him until the end of their lives?

The venerable Ānanda said to the World-honored One:

739c     The World-honored One is the root of the Dharma, the World-honored One is the master of the Dharma, the Dharma comes from the World-honored One. May he explain it! Having heard it, we will fully understand its meaning.

The Buddha said, “Ānanda, listen closely and pay proper attention. I will explain it to you in detail.” The venerable Ānanda listened to receive the teaching.

The Buddha said:

Ānanda, a faithful disciple does not follow the World-honored One and respect him until the end of his life for the sake of discourses, stanzas, or expositions, even though, Ānanda, it may be that he has heard those teachings repeatedly over a long period, recited and reviewed them up to a thousand [times], contemplating them in the mind with knowledge, vision, and profound penetration.

Consider talk that is noble talk, related to what is beneficial, which makes the mind malleable, free from all darkness and the hindrances—namely talk about giving, talk about morality, talk about concentration, talk about wisdom, talk about liberation, talk about knowledge and vision of liberation, talk about self-effacement, talk about not socializing, talk about fewness of desires, talk about contentment, talk about dispassion, talk about abandoning, talk about extinction, talk about sitting in meditation, talk about dependent arising—on account of getting, easily and without difficulty, such talk of renunciants, for this a faithful disciple follows the World-honored One and respects him until the end of their life.

Ānanda, in the following ways there is trouble for a teacher, trouble for a disciple, and trouble for [a practitioner of] the holy life.

Ānanda, what is trouble for a teacher? Suppose there appears in the world a teacher whose approach is by way of thinking and reflection. Established in the approach by way of thinking, he reflects and contemplates separation, being a worldling [but] possessing discernment.

He stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or he dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation. It may be that, staying in that place and training energetically in seclusion, he attains a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present.

Having trained energetically in seclusion, having attained peace and happiness, he later gets a following of disciples—brahmins, householders, people from villages, towns, and countries. Having later got a following of disciples—brahmins, householders, people from villages, towns, and countries—he becomes conceited and [in the end] returns to the household life. Such is trouble for a teacher. Evil and unwholesome states, which defile and are the root of future becoming, which result in vexation and suffering, which are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death—by these he is troubled. This is what is meant by trouble for a teacher.

Ānanda, what is trouble for a disciple? A disciple of that teacher trains in seclusion. He stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or he dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation. It may be that, staying in that place and training energetically in seclusion, he attains a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present.

740a Having trained energetically in seclusion, having attained peace and happiness, he later gets a following of disciples—brahmins, householders, people from villages, towns, and countries. Having later got a following of disciples—brahmins, householders, people from villages, towns, and countries—he becomes conceited and [in the end] returns to the household life. Such is trouble for a disciple. Evil and unwholesome states, which defile and are the root of future becoming, which result in vexation and suffering, which are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death—by these he is troubled. This is what is meant by trouble for a disciple.

Ānanda, what is trouble for [a practitioner of] the holy life? Suppose that a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, a buddha, an exalted one. He stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or he dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation.

Ānanda, for what reason would a tathāgata stay in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or dwell on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation?<sup>62</sup>

The venerable Ānanda said to the World-honored One:

The World-honored One is the root of the Dharma, the World-honored One is the master of the Dharma, the Dharma comes from the World-honored One. May he explain it! Having heard it, we will fully understand its meaning.

The Buddha said, “Ānanda, listen closely and pay proper attention. I will now explain it to you in detail.” The venerable Ānanda listened to receive the teaching.

The Buddha said:

Ānanda, it is not because the Tathāgata wishes to attain what he has not yet attained, wishes to gain what he has not yet gained, wishes to realize what he has not yet realized, that he stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation.

Ānanda, for two reasons the Tathāgata stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation. The first is because it is a happy abiding for himself in the present; the second is because he has compassion for people of later generations, [thinking], “Perhaps people of later generations will follow the example of the Tathāgata and stay in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or dwell on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation.”

Ānanda, for these reasons the Tathāgata stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation.

It may be that, staying in that place and training energetically in seclusion, [a person of a later generation] will attain a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present. Having trained energetically in seclusion, having attained peace and happiness, he later gets a following of [practitioners of] the holy life—monks, nuns, male lay disciples, and female lay disciples. Having afterward gotten a following of [practitioners of] the holy life—monks, nuns, male lay disciples, and female lay disciples—he does not become conceited and does not return to the household life.

Ānanda, if he has realized imperturbable liberation of the mind, I do not say that there is any obstacle for him. [But] if, despite having formerly practiced energetically and with diligence, he had attained [only] the four higher states of mind, happy abidings in the present, then it is possible that he loses this [attainment] because of much association with disciples.<sup>63</sup>

740b

Again, Ānanda, a disciple of that teacher follows his example by staying in a forest, under a tree in a mountain grove, or dwelling on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation. It may be that, staying in that place and training energetically in seclusion, he attains a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present.

Having trained energetically in seclusion, having attained peace and happiness, he later gets a following of [practitioners of] the holy life—monks, nuns, male lay disciples, and female lay disciples. Having later got a following of [practitioners of] the holy life—monks, nuns, male lay disciples, and female lay disciples—he becomes conceited and [in the end] returns to the household life. Such is trouble for [a practitioner of] the holy life. Evil and unwholesome states, which defile and are the root of future becoming, which result in vexation and suffering, which are the cause of birth, old age, disease, and death—by these he is troubled. This is what is meant by trouble for [a practitioner of] the holy life.

Ānanda, compared with trouble for a teacher and trouble for a disciple, this trouble for [a practitioner of] the holy life is the most disagreeable, displeasing, and undesirable, it is most unthinkable. Ānanda, for this reason you should all behave toward me with loving-kindness. Do not behave with resentment.

Ānanda, how do disciples behave toward their teacher with resentment and not with loving-kindness? Suppose that the venerable teacher speaks to his disciples on the Dharma out of sympathy and concern, seeking their benefit, welfare, peace, and happiness, with a mind of kindness and compassion, [telling them], “This is for your welfare, this is for your happiness, this is for your welfare and happiness.” And suppose that those disciples do not behave respectfully and do not practice accordingly; they do not become established in knowledge, and their minds do not progress in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma; they are unreceptive to the true Dharma, go against the teacher’s instruction, and are unable to attain concentration. This is how disciples behave toward the teacher with resentment and not with loving-kindness.

Ānanda, how do disciples behave toward the teacher with loving-kindness and not with resentment? Suppose that the venerable teacher speaks to his disciples on the Dharma out of sympathy and concern, seeking their benefit, welfare, peace, and happiness, with a mind of kindness and compassion, [telling them], “This is for your welfare, this is for your happiness, this is for your welfare and happiness.” And suppose that those disciples behave respectfully and practice accordingly; they become established in knowledge and their minds progress in the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma; they are receptive to the true Dharma, do not go against the teacher’s instruction, and are able to attain concentration. This is how disciples behave toward the teacher with loving-kindness and not with resentment.

Ānanda, for this reason you should all behave toward me with loving-kindness and not with resentment. Why is that? I do not speak [to you] in the way a potter makes pots. Ānanda, I speak [to you at times] sternly and with urgency, which [may] lead to suffering. Those [of you] who are genuine will certainly be able to stand [the test].<sup>64</sup>

740c

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Division 16

The [Second] Great Divison

192. The Discourse on Kāḷudāyin<sup>65</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha, who was traveling in the Aṅga country with a large sangha of monks, arrived at [the town of] Āpaṇa and stayed at Qiánruò Monastery.

Then, toward dawn when the night was over, the World-honored One put on his robes, took his bowl, and entered Āpaṇa to beg for almsfood. After having partaken of the midday meal, he stowed away his robe and bowl, washed his hands and feet and, with a sitting mat over his shoulder, went to a forest wishing to spend the day's abiding there.

The venerable Udāyin too, toward dawn when the night was over, put on his robes, took his bowl, and entered Āpaṇa to beg for almsfood. After having partaken of the midday meal, he stowed away his robe and bowl, washed his hands and feet and, with a sitting mat over his shoulder, followed after the Buddha thinking, "Where the World-honored One now spends the day's abiding, there I too will go for the day's abiding."<sup>66</sup>

Then the World-honored One entered the forest and went to a tree. He spread his sitting mat under it and sat down cross-legged. The venerable Udāyin too entered that forest and went to a tree not far from the Buddha. He spread his sitting mat under it and sat down cross-legged.

At that time, while sitting alone in meditation in that peaceful place and reflecting, the venerable Udāyin had this thought in his mind, "The World-honored One has brought us much benefit; the Well-gone One has brought us much peace. The World-honored One has caused us to abandon a multitude of painful states and increase pleasant states. The World-honored One has caused us to abandon countless evil and unwholesome states and increase countless wholesome and sublime states."

741a

In the afternoon the venerable Udāyin rose from sitting in meditation, approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. The World-honored One said, “Udāyin, do you lack nothing? Are you happy and at ease? Is your vigor as usual?”<sup>67</sup>

The venerable Udāyin said, “Yes, World-honored One. I lack nothing, I am happy and at ease, and my vigor is as usual.”

The World-honored One asked further, “Udāyin, how is it that you lack nothing, that you are happy and at ease, and that your vigor is as usual?”

The venerable Udāyin replied:

World-honored One, while sitting alone in meditation in a peaceful place and reflecting, I had this thought in my mind, “The World-honored One has brought us much benefit; the Well-gone One has brought us much peace. The World-honored One has caused us to abandon a multitude of painful states and to increase pleasant states. The World-honored One has caused us to abandon countless evil and unwholesome states and to increase countless wholesome and sublime states.”

Long ago the World-honored One told us monks, “Abandon eating after noon!” World-honored One, having heard this we could not bear it, we could not tolerate it. We did not want it, we did not like it. If some faithful brahmin or householder came to the monastery [after noon] to donate a sumptuous offering and make merit, we would receive it with our own hands and eat it. But now the World-honored One was instructing us to abandon this; the Well-gone One was instructing us to put an end to it. We even said, “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!” Yet, out of our extreme respect for the World-honored One’s authority and sublime virtues, for this reason, we abandoned eating after midday.

Again, long ago the World-honored One told us monks, “Abandon the evening meal!” World-honored One, having heard this, we could not bear it, we could not tolerate it. We did not want it, we did not like it. Of our two [daily] meals this was the superior one, the more excellent one, the better one, the finer one. But now the World-honored One was instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One was instructing us to put an end to it. We even said, “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

World-honored One, long ago a householder would often return home carrying many types of delicious food and beverages. He would instruct his family, “Take these and put them away somewhere. We will all eat them together in the evening, not in the morning.” World-honored One, in every family the best, the most excellent meal was eaten only in the evening, [and] we [were to eat only] in the morning.

Yet the World-honored One was now instructing us to abandon this; the Well-gone One was instructing us to put an end to it. We even said this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!” Yet, out of our extreme respect for the World-honored One’s authority and sublime virtues, for this reason, we abandoned the evening meal.

741b

World-honored One, I further thought, “If a monk enters a village to beg for almsfood at an improper time, he might come across thieves whether at work or not at work; or he might come across a tiger or come across a deer; or he might come across [both] a tiger and a deer; or he might come across a leopard or come across a bear; or he might come across [both] a leopard and a bear; or he might go to a place such that he would come across a fierce elephant, a fierce horse, a fierce bull, or a fierce dog; or he might encounter a nest of snakes; or he might have clods thrown at him; or he might be beaten with sticks; or he might fall into a ditch; or he might fall into a cesspool; or he might tread on a sleeping ox; or he might fall into a deep pit; or he might walk into a thornbush; or he might see an [apparently] empty house and enter it, and having entered it and met a woman, he might be shouted at and accused of having engaged in evil and impure conduct with her.”

World-honored One, long ago, on a dark rainy night, when lightning was flashing repeatedly, a monk went to someone’s house begging for food at an improper time.<sup>68</sup> At that time the housewife was outside the house cleaning a cooking pot. By the light of a lightning flash she saw the monk in the distance and took him to be a ghost. On seeing this, she was so terrified that her body hairs all stood on end. She let out a great shout and then had a miscarriage. She said, “You are a ghost! You are a ghost!”

Then that monk said to the housewife, “Sister, I am no ghost. I am a renunciant and right now I have come begging for food.” Then the housewife angrily cursed the monk with what is most painful and most evil, saying, “May this renunciant’s life faculty soon be cut off! May this renunciant’s parents soon die! May this renunciant’s lineage become extinct! May this renunciant’s belly burst open and be destroyed! Bald-headed renunciant, trapped in your own swarthythiness, without descendants and with your lineage cut off, you would do better to take a sharp knife and cut open your own belly! You should not go begging for almsfood at an improper time of the night. May this renunciant who made me miscarry be punished!”

World-honored One, when I recall that, there arises happiness [that such things can no longer happen]. World-honored One, because of this, happiness completely pervades and fills my body, together with right mindfulness and right comprehension, and there arise joy, tranquility, happiness, and concentration. World-honored One, because this happiness completely pervades and fills my body, together with right mindfulness and right comprehension, therefore, World-honored One, I lack nothing, I am happy and at ease, and my vigor is as usual.

The World-honored One expressed his approval:

It is well, it is well, Udāyin, you are now not like those foolish people. When I tell those silly foolish people, “Abandon this [evening meal]!”, they say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? Yet the World-honored One is now instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They even say this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

741c Yet, by not abandoning it, they become disapproving and intolerant of me and they also become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. Udāyin, those foolish people are bound extremely securely and firmly. They become increasingly agitated, as they are unable to break away, unable to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, they are just like a fly that is caught in a drop of saliva and will suffer or die in it.<sup>69</sup> Udāyin, if someone were to say that that fly is not caught securely and firmly, that it does not become increasingly agitated, being able to break away, able to liberate itself—would that person be speaking correctly?

The venerable Udāyin said:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? The fly that is caught in a drop of saliva will suffer or die in it. Therefore, World-honored One, that fly is caught extremely securely and firmly. It becomes increasingly agitated, as it is unable to break away, unable to liberate itself.

[The Buddha said:]

[In the same way], Udāyin, when I tell those silly foolish people, “Abandon this [evening meal]!”, they say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They even say this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Yet by not abandoning it they become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. Udāyin, those foolish people are bound extremely securely and firmly. They become increasingly agitated, as they are unable to break away, unable to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, if I tell clansmen, “Abandon this [evening meal],” they do not say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They also do not speak like this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Then they abandon it. They do not become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also do not become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules.

Udāyin, those clansmen are not bound securely or firmly. They do not become increasingly agitated, as they are able to break away, able to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, they are just like a royal elephant, up to sixty years old, a great proud elephant with body, legs, and tusks complete, full of physical strength, which is securely bound. If in a rage he forcefully twists his body, he will break away from those strong bonds and return to his former place. Udāyin, if someone were to say of this big royal elephant, up to sixty years old, this great proud elephant with body, legs, and tusks complete, full of physical strength, that he is bound extremely securely and firmly, and that he becomes increasingly agitated, as he is unable to break away, unable to liberate himself—would that person be speaking correctly?

The venerable Udāyin said:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? That great royal elephant which is up to sixty years old, that great proud elephant with body, legs, and tusks 742a complete, full of physical strength, is securely bound. Yet, if in a rage he forcefully twists his body, he will break away from those strong bonds and return to his former place.

World-honored One, for this reason that great royal elephant which is up to sixty years old, that great proud elephant with body, legs, and tusks complete, full of physical strength, is not bound securely and firmly; he does not become increasingly agitated, as he is able to break away, able to liberate himself.

[The Buddha said:]

In the same way, Udāyin, if I say to clansmen. “Abandon this [evening meal],” they do not say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They also do not speak like this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Then they abandon it. They do not become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also do not become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. For this reason, Udāyin, those clansmen are not bound securely or firmly. They do not become increasingly agitated, as they are able to break away, able to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, if I say to foolish people, “Abandon this [evening meal]!”, they say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They even say this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Yet, by not abandoning it they become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. Udāyin, those foolish people are bound extremely securely and firmly. They become increasingly agitated, as they are unable to break away, unable to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, they are just like a poor man who has no wealth and also no influence. He has a wife who is blind, ugly, and unlovable. He has only a single hut, which is dilapidated and leaking, in which crows perch, so bad that it is not fit to live in. He has one bed which is also falling apart, so bad it is not fit to lie down on. He has just one pitcher,<sup>70</sup> which is damaged and unusable.

He sees a monk who, after having partaken of the midday meal, has washed his hands and feet, spread his sitting mat, and is sitting under a tree, pleasantly cool and in harmony, cultivating the higher mind. Seeing this, he thinks, “Renunciants are happy. Renunciants are as if [they have already attained] nirvana. I am bad and without virtue. Why is that? I have a wife who is blind, ugly, and unlovable, [yet] I am unable to leave her. I have only a single hut which is dilapidated and leaking, in which crows perch, so bad that it is not fit to live in, [yet] I am unable to leave it. I have one bed which is also falling apart, so bad it is not fit to lie down on, [yet] I am unable to leave it. I have just one pitcher, which is damaged and unusable, [yet] I am unable to leave it. I would love to be a monk, shaving off hair and beard, donning the yellow robes and, out of faith, giving up the household life and becoming a homeless one to train in the path.”

742b

Udāyin, if someone were to say, “This poor man, who has no wealth and also no influence, is not bound securely or firmly, he does not become increasingly agitated, as he is able to break away, able to liberate himself”—would that person be speaking correctly?

The venerable Udāyin said:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? That poor man has a wife who is blind, ugly, and unlovable, [yet] he is unable to leave her. He has only a single hut which is dilapidated and leaking, in which crows perch, so bad that it is not fit to live in, [yet] he is unable to leave it. He has one bed which is also falling apart, so bad it is not fit to lie down on, [yet] he is unable to leave it. He has just one pitcher, which is damaged and unusable, [yet] he is unable to leave it. He would love to be a monk, shaving off hair and beard, donning the yellow robes and, out of faith, giving up the household life and becoming a homeless one to train in the path.

World-honored One, for this reason that poor man who has no wealth and also no influence is bound extremely securely and firmly. He becomes increasingly agitated, as he is unable to break away, unable to liberate himself.

[The Buddha said:]

In the same way, Udāyin, when I tell foolish people: “Abandon this [evening meal]!” they say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They even say this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Yet, by not abandoning it they become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. For this reason, Udāyin, those foolish people are bound extremely securely and firmly. They become increasingly agitated, as they are unable to break away, unable to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, if I say to clansmen, “Abandon this [evening meal]!”, they do not say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They also do not speak like this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Then they abandon it. They do not become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also do not become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. For this reason, Udāyin, those clansmen are not bound securely or firmly. They do not become increasingly agitated, as they are able to break away, able to liberate themselves.

742c Udāyin, it is just as a householder or the son of a householder who is very prosperous, has much wealth, livestock, and property beyond imagination, feudatories, manors, and abundant granaries, being endowed with many kinds of requisites of life, with countless male and female slaves, elephants, and horses.

He sees a monk who, after having partaken of the midday meal, has washed his hands and feet, spread his sitting mat, and is sitting under a tree, pleasantly cool and in harmony, cultivating the higher mind. Seeing this, he thinks, “Renunciants are happy. Renunciants are as if [they have already attained] nirvana. Let me leave my great wealth: my gold and treasure, my wealth in grains, elephants, horses, and male and female slaves. I would love to be a monk, shaving off hair and beard, donning the yellow robes and, out of faith, giving up the household life, and becoming a homeless one to train in the path.”

Udāyin, if someone were to say, “This householder or son of a householder is bound securely and firmly. He becomes increasingly agitated, as he is unable to break away, unable to liberate himself”—would he be speaking correctly?

The venerable Udāyin said:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? That householder or son of a householder is capable of being separated from his great wealth, his gold and treasure, his wealth in grains, elephants, horses, and male and female slaves. He would love to be a monk, shaving off hair and beard, donning the yellow robes and, out of faith, giving up the household life and becoming a homeless one to train in the path.

World-honored One, for this reason that householder or son of a householder is not bound securely and firmly. He does not become increasingly agitated, as he is able to break away, able to liberate himself.

[The Buddha said:]

In the same way, Udāyin, if I say to clansmen, “Abandon this [evening meal],” they do not say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They also do not speak like this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Then they abandon it. They do not become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also do not become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. For this reason, Udāyin, those clansmen are not bound securely or firmly. They do not become increasingly agitated, as they are able to break away, able to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, a monk practices giving up. After he has practiced giving up, thoughts related to sensual pleasure arise in him and he is bound by craving and delight. He delights in them. He does not abandon them, does not settle them, does not vomit them out. Udāyin, I say that he is in bondage;

I do not say that he is liberated. Why is that? All fetters are unwholesome, Udāyin; and because fetters are unwholesome, I say he is in bondage; I do not say he is liberated.<sup>71</sup>

Udāyin, a monk practices giving up. After he has practiced giving up, thoughts related to sensual pleasure arise in him and he is bound by craving and delight. He does not delight in them. He abandons them, settles them, vomits them out. Udāyin, I say that he too is in bondage; I do not say that he is liberated. Why is that? All fetters are unwholesome, Udāyin; and because fetters are unwholesome, I say he is in bondage; I do not say he is liberated.

743a

Udāyin, a monk practices giving up. After he has practiced giving up, at times his mind is forgetful. He has thoughts related to sensual pleasure and he is bound by craving and delight. He is slow in observing them, but quick in eradicating them. Udāyin, it is like an iron ball or an iron plowshare that has been heated in a fire for a whole day. If a person releases two or three drops of water on to it, the drops are slow and discontinuous [in forming], but the water then quickly disappears.

Udāyin, in the same way, a monk practices giving up. After he has practiced abandoning, at times his mind is forgetful. He has thoughts related to sensual pleasure and he is bound by craving and delight. He is slow in observing them but quick in eradicating them. Udāyin, I say that he too is in bondage; I do not say that he is liberated. Why is that? All fetters are unwholesome, Udāyin, and because fetters are unwholesome, I say he is in bondage; I do not say he is liberated.

Udāyin, right at the root of dukkha, [a monk] dwells in the practice for that which is without birth and death, and with the unsurpassable eradication of craving his mind is well liberated. Udāyin, I say this is liberation; I do not say it is bondage. Why is that? All fetters have been eradicated. Udāyin, because all fetters are eradicated, I say this is liberation; I do not say it is bondage.

Udāyin, there is a pleasure that is an ignoble pleasure, a worldly pleasure that is essentially a disease, essentially a carbuncle, essentially a dart and a thorn, that is worldly, that [pertains to] birth and death, which should not be cultivated, should not be practiced, should not be made much of, which I say should definitely not be cultivated.

Udāyin, there is a pleasure that is a noble pleasure, a pleasure without sensuality, the pleasure of seclusion, the pleasure of calm, the pleasure [leading to] full awakening, which is not worldly and does not [pertain] to birth and death, which should be cultivated, should be practiced, should be made much of, which I say should definitely be cultivated.

Udāyin, what is the pleasure that is an ignoble pleasure, a worldly pleasure that is essentially a disease, essentially a carbuncle, essentially a dart and a thorn, that is worldly, that [pertains] to birth and death, which should not be cultivated, should not be practiced, should not be made much of, which I say should definitely not be cultivated?

If pleasure and <joy> arise in dependence on the five senses,<sup>72</sup> then this is an ignoble pleasure, a worldly pleasure that is essentially a disease, essentially a carbuncle, essentially a dart and a thorn, that it is worldly, that [pertains to] birth and death, which should not be cultivated, should not be practiced, should not be made much of, which I say should definitely not be cultivated.

Udāyin, what is the pleasure that is a noble pleasure, a pleasure without sensuality, the pleasure of seclusion, the pleasure of calm, the pleasure [leading to] full awakening, which is not worldly and does not [pertain] to birth and death, which should be cultivated, should be practiced, should be made much of, which I say should definitely be cultivated?

Udāyin, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is the pleasure that is a noble pleasure, a pleasure without sensuality, the pleasure of seclusion, the pleasure of calm, the pleasure [leading to] full awakening, which is not worldly and which does not [pertain] to birth and death, which should be cultivated, should be practiced, should be made much of, which I say should definitely be cultivated.

Udāyin, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, a monk dwells having attained the first absorption. Noble ones call this perturbable. Herein what is it that noble ones call perturbable? It is the [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation that noble ones call perturbable. Herein what [else] do noble ones call perturbable?

743b

Udāyin, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, a monk dwells having attained the second absorption. Noble ones call this perturbable. Herein what is it that noble ones call perturbable? It is the gaining of joy that noble ones call perturbable. Herein what [else] do noble ones call perturbable?

Udāyin, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, a monk dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.<sup>73</sup> Noble ones call this perturbable. Herein what is it that noble ones call perturbable? It is the perturbation of mental happiness that the noble ones call perturbable. Herein what do noble ones call imperturbable?

Udāyin, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. Noble ones call this imperturbable.

Udāyin, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, a monk dwells having attained the first absorption. Udāyin, I say he has not attained separation,<sup>74</sup> has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond. What is “going beyond” in respect to this?

Udāyin, with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, a monk dwells having attained the second absorption. This is what is meant by “going beyond” in respect to this. Udāyin I say he still has not attained separation, has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond. What is “going beyond” in respect to this?

Udāyin, secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, a monk dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode. This is what is meant by “going beyond” in respect to this. Udāyin, I say he still has not attained separation, has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond. What is “going beyond” in respect to this?

Udāyin, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of joy and displeasure, with neither pain nor pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is what is meant by “going beyond” in respect to this. Udāyin, I say he still has not attained separation, has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond. What is “going beyond” in respect to this?

Udāyin, by completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, unaware of perceptions of diversity, [being instead aware of] infinite space, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space. This is what is meant by “going beyond” in respect to this. Udāyin, I say he still has not attained separation, has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond. What is “going beyond” in respect to this? 743c Udāyin, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness. This is what is meant by “going beyond” in respect to this. Udāyin, I say he still has not attained separation, has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond. What is “going beyond” in respect to this?

Udāyin, by completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware] that “there is nothing,” a monk dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness. This is what is meant by “going beyond” in respect to this. Udāyin, I say he still has not attained separation, has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond. What is “going beyond” in respect to this?

Udāyin, by completely transcending the sphere of nothingness, [aware] of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, a monk dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. This is what is meant by “going beyond” in respect to this. Udāyin, I say that, [even] on reaching the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception he still has not attained separation, has not attained abandoning, has not attained going beyond.<sup>75</sup>

Udāyin, is there a single fetter, which has remained for much or little time for those of whom I have said that they have not achieved separation, have not achieved abandoning, have not achieved going beyond; [a fetter] of which I say that it should not be abandoned?

The venerable Udāyin said: “There is not, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised him, saying:<sup>76</sup>

It is well, it is well, Udāyin! You are not like those foolish people. When I say to those silly foolish people, “Abandon this [evening meal],” they say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They even say this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Yet by not abandoning it they become disapproving and intolerant of me and they also become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. Udāyin, those foolish people are bound extremely securely and firmly. They become increasingly agitated, as they are unable to break away, unable to liberate themselves.

Udāyin, if I say to clansmen: “Abandon this [evening meal],” they do not say, “This is a small matter. Why would it be worth abandoning? But now the World-honored One is instructing us to abandon it; the Well-gone One is making us put an end to it.” They also do not speak like this: “This great renunciant cannot do away with [our] food!”

Then they abandon it. They do not become disapproving and intolerant of me, and they also do not become disapproving and intolerant of other monks who are well-disciplined and uphold the rules. For this reason, Udāyin, those clansmen are not bound securely or firmly. They do not become increasingly agitated, as they are able to break away, able to liberate themselves.

744a

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Udāyin was delighted and received it respectfully.

193. The Discourse on Moliya Phagguṇa<sup>77</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time Moliya Phagguṇa was frequently associating with the nuns. If people said something about the nuns in the presence of the monk Moliya Phagguṇa, then on hearing it he would become angry and displeased, even going so far as to quarrel with them. If people said something about the monk Moliya Phagguṇa in the presence of the nuns, then on hearing it the nuns would become angry and displeased, even going so far as to quarrel with them.

Many monks heard of this and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, they stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, Moliya Phagguṇa frequently associates with the nuns. If people say something about the nuns in the presence of the monk Moliya Phagguṇa, then on hearing it, he becomes angry and displeased, even going so far as to quarrel with them. If people say something about the monk Moliya Phagguṇa in the presence of the nuns, then on hearing it, the nuns become angry and displeased, even going so far as to quarrel with them.

On hearing this, the World-honored One said to one monk, "Approach the monk Moliya Phagguṇa and tell him, 'The World-honored One summons you.'"

On hearing this, the monk [said], "Yes, World-honored One," rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached the monk Moliya Phagguṇa and told him, "The World-honored One summons you." On hearing this, the monk Moliya Phagguṇa approached the Buddha, paid homage to the Buddha, stepped back, and sat to one side.

The World-honored One said:

Phagguṇa, is it true that you frequently associate with the nuns; that if people say something about the nuns in your presence, then on hearing it you become angry and displeased, even going so far as to quarrel with them; and that if people say something about you in the presence of the nuns, then on hearing it the nuns become angry and displeased, even going so far as to quarrel with them? Phagguṇa, is it true that it is like this with you?”

[Moliya] Phagguṇa replied, “It is true, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked further, “Phagguṇa, have you not, out of faith, given up the household life and become homeless to train in the path?”

744b Phagguṇa replied, “I have, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said:

Phagguṇa, since you have, out of faith, given up the household life and become homeless to train in the path, you should train [as follows]. If you have desires and thoughts based on the household life, abandon them! If you have desires and thoughts based on dispassion, practice them, cultivate them, make much of them! Phagguṇa, you should train in this way.<sup>78</sup>

Then the World-honored One asked the monks, “Have you not, out of faith, given up the household life and become homeless to train in the path?”

The monks replied, “We have, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said further to the monks:

Since you have, out of faith, given up the household life and become homeless to train in the path, you should train [as follows]. If you have desires and thoughts based on the household life, abandon them! If you have desires and thoughts based on dispassion, practice them, cultivate them, make much of them! You should train in this way.

A long time ago I told the monks, “Whether a monk is of much renown or of little renown, he [should] always and without exception train in eating just one meal [each day].<sup>79</sup> Having trained in eating just one meal [a day], he will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. His body will be light, strong, and healthy. He will be happy and at ease.”

Those monks, both those of much renown and those of little renown, all without exception trained in eating just one meal [a day]. Having trained in eating just one meal [a day], they were without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Their bodies were light, strong, and healthy. They were happy and at ease. Those monks pleased my mind and I did not often [need to] reprimand them. Based on this, the monks developed mindfulness and practiced the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma.

It is just like a horse-drawn chariot. The charioteer mounts it and, holding the bridle in his left hand and the whip in his right hand, proceeds at will along roads in any of the eight directions. In the same way the monks pleased my mind and I did not often [need to] reprimand them. Based on this, the monks developed mindfulness and practiced the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma.

It is just like a grove of sāla trees on good ground, with a forester who is intelligent, wise, and not neglectful. At appropriate times he attends to the roots of the sāla trees, repeatedly applying manure with a hoe, irrigating it with water, leveling the high parts, and filling in the hollows.

If weeds grow up alongside [a tree], he pulls them out and discards them. If [saplings] grow that are twisted and crooked, not straight, he uproots them and puts them aside. If branches grow crosswise or crookedly, he removes them.

If new [saplings] that are straight and attractive grow up close by, he attends to them at appropriate times, repeatedly applying manure with a hoe and irrigating it with water. In this way that sāla tree grove on good ground comes to flourish. In the same way the monks pleased my mind and I did not often [need to] reprimand them.<sup>80</sup>

I do not say that [a monk] is well-spoken and respectful if he behaves thus just for the sake of robes, bowl, food and drink, bed, and medicines, the various requisites of life.<sup>81</sup> Why is that? If a monk does not receive these [requisites], he may not be well-spoken and respectful; he might qualify as being by nature not well-spoken and respectful.

744c

If [however] there is a monk who for the sake of seclusion, being based in seclusion and established in seclusion, is well-spoken and respectful and qualifies as being by nature well-spoken and respectful, then I say that he is well-spoken and respectful. Why is that?

Suppose there is a [monk] who is well-disciplined and well-behaved, namely because others do not utter bad speech. If others do not utter bad speech, he does not become angry or displeased. He does not become stuck in a tangle of worry, nor become filled with hatred and dislike. He does not display any bad quality. Seeing this, the [other] monks think,

“This venerable one is patient, humble, and tolerant. He is well-disciplined, well-settled, and at peace.”

If [however], others utter bad speech, then he becomes angry and displeased. He becomes stuck in a tangle of worry and filled with hatred and dislike. He displays bad qualities. Seeing this, the [other] monks think, “This venerable one is bad-natured, impatient, corrupt, and coarse. He is not settled, not disciplined, and not at peace.” Why is that?

Monks, long ago there was a housewife named Vedehikā who was very rich. She had much wealth, livestock, and property beyond measure, feudatories, manors, and abundant granaries, as well as possessing many kinds of requisites of life. At that time the housewife Vedehikā’s reputation had spread widely in all directions to this effect: “The housewife Vedehikā is patient, tolerant, and gentle. She is well-disciplined, well-settled, and at peace.”

At that time the housewife Vedehikā had as her principal attendant a maidservant named Kālī, who was nimble, well-spoken, and good at her work, whether small or great. That maidservant Kālī thought, “The reputation of my mistress, the housewife Vedehikā, has spread widely in all directions to this effect: ‘The housewife Vedehikā is patient, tolerant, and gentle. She is well-disciplined, well-settled, and at peace.’ Let me now test my mistress, the housewife Vedehikā: does she actually become angry or does she actually not become angry?”

Then the maidservant Kālī remained lying [in bed] rather than getting up early. The lady shouted at her, “Kālī! Why did you not get up early?” Hearing this, the maidservant Kālī thought, “My mistress, the housewife Vedehikā, actually does become angry. It is not true that she does not become angry. It is only because I am good at doing the housework, good at managing [the house], and good at maintaining it that the reputation of my mistress, the housewife Vedehikā, has spread widely in all directions to this effect: ‘The housewife Vedehikā is patient, tolerant, and gentle. She is well-disciplined, well-settled, and at peace.’ Let me now further test my mistress, the housewife Vedehikā: does she actually become angry or does she actually not become angry?”

745a Then the maidservant Kālī [again] remained lying [in bed], not getting up until extremely late. The lady shouted at her, “Kālī, why didn’t you get up until extremely late?” Hearing this, the maidservant Kālī thought,

“My mistress, the housewife Vedehikā, actually does become angry. It is not true that she does not become angry. It is only because I am good at doing the housework, good at managing [the house], and good at maintaining it that the reputation of my mistress, the housewife Vedehikā, has spread widely in all directions to this effect: ‘The housewife Vedehikā is patient, tolerant, and gentle. She is well-disciplined, well-settled, and at peace.’ Let me now further test my mistress, the housewife Vedehikā: does she actually become angry or does she actually not become angry?”

Then the maidservant Kālī remained lying [in bed], not getting up until the afternoon. The lady shouted at her: “Kālī, why did you get up only in the afternoon? I do not do that myself and I have not told you to do it. This maidservant Kālī does not follow my instructions. This maidservant Kālī is disrespectful toward me.”

Then she became very angry and filled with hatred. Three veins stood out on her forehead and her face became contorted. She personally went and shut the doors, took a big cane in her hand, and hit [Kālī] on the head. The head was injured and began bleeding.

Then the maidservant Kālī, with her head injured and bleeding, went out and told the neighbors, accusing her [mistress] in various ways and telling many people about it, “Sirs! Do you see in this the behavior of a practitioner of patience, tolerance, and gentleness, of one who is well-disciplined, well-settled, and at peace? She has scolded me, saying, ‘Kālī, why did you get up only in the afternoon? I do not do that myself and I have not told you to do it. This maidservant Kālī does not follow my instructions. This maidservant Kālī is disrespectful toward me.’ Then she became very angry and filled with hatred. Three veins stood out on her forehead and her face became contorted. She personally came and shut the doors, took a big cane in her hand, and hit me on the head. My head was injured and began bleeding.”

Then a very bad report about the housewife Vedehikā spread in all directions to this effect: “The housewife Vedehikā is evil by nature. She is impatient, corrupt, and coarse. She is not settled, not disciplined, and not at peace.”

In the same way, suppose there is a [monk] who is well-disciplined and well-behaved. He is reckoned as such because no other person is there uttering bad speech. If no other person is uttering bad speech, he does not become angry or displeased. He does not become stuck in a tangle of worry, nor become filled with hatred and dislike. He does not display any bad quality. Seeing this, the [other] monks think, “This venerable one is patient, humble, mild, and tolerant. He is well-disciplined, well-settled, and at peace.”

If [however] another person does utter bad speech, then [that monk] becomes angry and displeased. He becomes stuck in a tangle of worry and filled with hatred and dislike. He displays bad qualities. Seeing this, the [other] monks think, “This venerable one is bad-natured, impatient, corrupt, and coarse. He is not settled, not disciplined, and not at peace.”

745b Again, there are five ways of speaking<sup>82</sup> Another person’s speech may be timely or untimely, truthful or untruthful, gentle or harsh, kindly or angry, meaningful or trivial.

When someone speaks in any of these five ways, if your mind changes or your mouth says something bad, then I say that because of that you are definitely in decline. You should train so that when someone speaks in any of these five ways, your mind will not change, your mouth will be free of bad speech, and based on that you generate a mental attitude of loving-kindness and compassion toward people who are hostile.

With your mind imbued with loving-kindness, dwell pervading one direction [with it], likewise the second, the third, and the fourth directions, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With your mind imbued with loving-kindness, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. In the same way, with your mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. You should train in this way.<sup>83</sup>

It is just as if a person were to come along holding a big shovel and were to say, “I am able to make this great earth become non-earth.” Then he digs and digs [the earth] in various places, pollutes it by spitting and urinating on it, and curses it, saying, “Let this great earth become non-earth!” What do you think? Would that person be able, by these means, to make this great earth become non-earth?

The monks replied:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? This great earth is very deep and extremely wide, beyond measure. Therefore that person is not able, by these means, to make this great earth become non-earth. World-honored One, that man will just tire himself in vain.

[The Buddha said:]

In the same way, there are these five ways of speaking. Another person's speech may be timely or untimely, truthful or untruthful, gentle or harsh, kindly or angry, meaningful or trivial. When someone speaks in any of these five ways, if your mind changes or your mouth utters bad speech, then I say that because of that you are definitely in decline.

You should train so that, when someone speaks in any of these five ways, your mind will not change, your mouth will be free of bad speech, and based on that you generate a mental attitude of loving-kindness and compassion toward people who speak [in that way]. Practice with a mental attitude resembling the earth, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention. Dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. You should train in this way.

It is just as if a person holding a large grass torch were to say, "With this grass torch I will heat the water of the Ganges [River] and make it boil." What do you think, will that person be able, by this means, to heat the water of the Ganges and make it boil?<sup>84</sup>

The monks replied:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? World-honored One, the water of the Ganges is very deep and extremely wide, beyond measuring. Therefore, that person would not be able, by this means, to heat the water of the Ganges and make it boil. World-honored One, that man will just tire himself in vain. 745c

[The Buddha said:]

In the same way, there are these five ways of speaking. Another person's speech may be timely or untimely, truthful or untruthful, gentle or harsh, kindly or angry, meaningful or trivial. When someone speaks in any of these five ways, if your mind changes or your mouth utters bad speech, then I say that because of that you are definitely in decline.

You should train so that, when someone speaks in any of these five ways, your mind will not change, your mouth will be free of bad speech, and based on that you generate a mental attitude of loving-kindness and compassion toward people who speak [in that way]. Practice with a mental attitude resembling the water of the Ganges, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention. Dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. You should train in this way.

It is just as if a painter or a painter's apprentice were to come along carrying various colors and say, "I will trace forms and images in empty space and adorn them with these colored paints." What do you think? Will that painter or that painter's apprentice be able, by this means, to trace forms and images in empty space and adorn them with colored paints?

The monks replied:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? World-honored One, empty space is nonmaterial, invisible, and without resistance. Therefore that painter or that painter's apprentice is not able, by this means, to trace forms and images in empty space and adorn them with colored paints. World-honored One, that painter or that painter's apprentice will just tire himself in vain.

[The Buddha said:]

In the same way, there are these five ways of speaking. Another person's speech may be timely or untimely, truthful or untruthful, gentle or harsh, kindly or angry, meaningful or trivial. When someone speaks in any of these five ways, if your mind changes or your mouth utters bad speech, then I say that because of that you are definitely in decline.

You should train so that, when someone speaks in any of these five ways, your mind will not change, your mouth will be free of bad speech, and based on that you generate a mental attitude of loving-kindness and compassion toward people who speak [in this way]. Practice with a mental attitude resembling empty space, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention. Dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. You should train in this way.

It is just like a cat-skin bag that is pliant and has been cured so as to become very soft and to make no crackling sound, to be devoid of any crackling sound. Suppose there is a person who punches it with his fists, throws stones at it, beats it with a stick, cuts it with a knife, or flings it on to the ground. What do you think? That cat-skin bag which is pliant and has been cured so as to become very soft and to make no crackling sound, to be devoid of any crackling sound—will it again make a crackling sound?

746a

The monks replied:

No, World-honored One. Why is that? World-honored One, that cat-skin bag is pliant and has been cured so as to become very soft and to make no crackling sound, to be devoid of any crackling sound. Therefore, it will no longer make a crackling sound.

[The Buddha said:]

In the same way, monks, if other people punch you, stone you, beat you with sticks, or cut you with knives; and if, while you are being punched, stoned, beaten with sticks, or cut with knives, your mind changes or your mouth utters bad speech, then I say that because of that you are definitely in decline.<sup>85</sup>

You should train so that if others punch you, stone you, beat you with sticks, or cut you with knives, your mind does not change, you will not utter bad speech, and based on that you should arouse a mental attitude of loving-kindness and compassion toward the people who beat you. Practice with a mental attitude resembling a cat-skin bag, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention. Dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. You should train in this way.

If thieves were to come along and cut you apart, section by section, with a sharp saw; and if while being cut apart, section by section, by those thieves with a sharp saw, your mind were to change or you were to utter bad speech, then I say you would, for that reason, certainly be in decline.

You should train so that if thieves were to come by and cut you apart, section by section, with a sharp saw, your mind would not change, you would not utter bad speech to those who were cutting you up and, based on that, you should generate a mental attitude of loving-kindness and compassion.

With your mind imbued with loving-kindness, you should dwell [mentally] pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth directions, and also the four intermediate directions and above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, you should dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. In the same way with a mind imbued with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free from fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, you should dwell pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. You should train in this way.<sup>86</sup>

Then the World-honored One praised the monks, saying:

It is well, it is well, you should repeatedly recollect the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants. Having repeatedly recollected the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants, would you ever encounter [the situation of] being unable to endure hearing others directing unpleasant and bad speech at you?

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One again praised the monks, saying:

It is well, it is well, you should repeatedly recollect the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants. Having repeatedly recollected the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants, if you wander in the eastern region, you will certainly be at ease, free of affliction by the multitude of sufferings. If you wander in the southern region . . . the western region . . . the northern region, you will certainly be at ease, free of affliction by the multitude of sufferings.<sup>87</sup>

746b

It is well, it is well, you should repeatedly recollect the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants. If you repeatedly recollect the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants, then I do not say merely that you are established in wholesome states, let alone that you will regress. Rather [I say] that by day and by night you will increase in wholesome states and will not regress.

It is well, it is well, you should repeatedly recollect the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants. Having repeatedly recollected the simile of being cut up with a sharp saw as a teaching for renunciants, you will certainly attain either of two fruits: you will attain final knowledge here and now or, if there is a remainder [of clinging], you will attain nonreturning.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

194. The Discourse to Bhaddāli<sup>88</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying in Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park, spending the rains retreat together with a large sangha of monks.

At that time the World-honored One said to the monks:

I eat [just] one meal [a day]. Eating [just] one meal [a day], I am without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. My body is light, strong, and healthy. I am happy and at ease. You too should train in eating [just] one meal [a day]. Having [trained in] eating [just] one meal [a day], you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy. You will be happy and at ease.

At that time the venerable Bhaddāli was among the assembly. Then the venerable Bhaddāli rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hand with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, I cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day]. Why is that? If I eat [just] one meal [a day], that is equivalent to not having finished. I feel upset and regretful. World-honored One, for this reason I cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day].

The World-honored One said:

746c Bhaddāli, if I accept an invitation [to a meal], you can accompany me. I permit you to take [a part of] it away and then eat it [later in the day, reckoning this as just] one meal. Bhaddāli, in this way you will be happy and be able to sustain yourself.

The venerable Bhaddāli said further:

World-honored One, in this way I still cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day]. Why is that? If I eat [just] one meal [a day], that is equivalent to not having finished. I feel upset and regretful. World-honored One, for this reason I cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day].

Three times the World-honored One said to the monks:<sup>89</sup>

I eat [just] one meal [a day]. Eating [just] one meal [a day], I am without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. My body is light, strong, and healthy. I am happy and at ease. You too should train in eating [just] one meal [a day]. Having [trained in] eating [just] one meal [a day], you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy. You will be happy and at ease.

Up to three times the venerable Bhaddāli rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, I cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day]. Why is that? If I eat [just] one meal [a day], that is equivalent to not having finished. I feel upset and regretful. World-honored One, for this reason I cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day].

Up to three times the World-honored One said:

Bhaddāli, if I accept an invitation [to a meal], you can accompany me. I permit you to take [part of] it away and then eat it [later in the day, reckoning this as just] one meal. Bhaddāli, in this way you will be happy and be able to sustain yourself.

Up to three times the venerable Bhaddāli said:

World-honored One, in this way I still cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day]. Why is that? If I eat [just] one meal [a day], that is equivalent to not having finished. I feel upset and regretful. World-honored One, for this reason I cannot endure eating [just] one meal [a day].

At that time the World-honored One promulgated the rule for the sangha of monks that they should eat [just] one meal [a day]. All of the monks in the sangha respectfully trained in that rule, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. Only the venerable Bhaddāli said that he could not endure it. He rose from his seat and left. Why was that? It was because he would not fully train in the rules, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One.<sup>90</sup>

Thereafter the venerable Bhaddāli kept to himself, and for the whole rains retreat he did not present himself to the World-honored One. Why was that? It was because he would not fully train in the rules, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One.

At that time the monks were making a robe for the Buddha, [thinking,] “Having completed the rains retreat at Sāvattḥī, the three months being over, his robes being mended, the World-honored One will take his robes and bowl and wander among the people.”

The venerable Bhaddāli heard that the monks were making a robe for the Buddha, [thinking,] “Having completed the rains retreat at Sāvattḥī, the three months being over, his robes being mended, the World-honored One will take his robes and bowl and wander among the people.”

747a

Hearing this, the venerable Bhaddāli approached the monks. On seeing from afar the venerable Bhaddāli coming, the monks said [to him]:

Venerable Bhaddāli, you should know that we are making this robe for the Buddha, [thinking,] “Having completed the rains retreat at Sāvattḥī, the three months being over, his robes being mended, the World-honored One will take his robes and bowl and wander among the people.” Bhaddāli, you should discipline yourself well in this matter, lest it later bring you much trouble.

Having heard these words, the venerable Bhaddāli approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, and said:

World-honored One, I have truly committed a transgression. I have truly committed a transgression. I was like a fool, like an ignorant person, like one who does not understand, like one who is unskilled. Why is that?

The World-honored One promulgated the rule on eating [just] one meal [a day] for the sangha of monks. All of the monks in the sangha respectfully trained in that rule, and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. I alone said that I could not tolerate it, rose from my seat, and left. Why is that? Because I did not fully train in the rules and in the Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One.

The World-honored One said:

Bhaddāli, at that time you did not recognize this: "Many monks and nuns are spending the rains retreat at Sāvathī. They know me and see me [and they think], 'There is the monk called Bhaddāli, a disciple of the World-honored One. He does not fully train in the rules and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One.'" Bhaddāli, at that time did you not recognize this?<sup>91</sup>

Bhaddāli, at that time did you not know this: "Many male and female lay disciples live in Sāvathī. They know me and see me [and they think]: 'There is the monk called Bhaddāli, a disciple of the World-honored One, who does not fully train in the rules and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One'" Bhaddāli, at that time did you not recognize this?

Bhaddāli, at that time did you not know this: "Many heterodox practitioners, renunciants and brahmins, are spending the rains retreat at Sāvathī. They know me and see me [and they think]: 'There is the monk called Bhaddāli, a disciple of the renunciant Gotama, who is reputed for his virtue, and [this disciple] does not fully train in the rules, and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One.'" Bhaddāli, at that time did you not recognize this?

Bhaddāli, suppose there is a monk who is liberated in both ways and I tell him: "Come, [lie down] in the mud!"<sup>92</sup> Bhaddāli, what do you think, [regarding] that monk who has been instructed by me; would that monk stand still or move away?

The venerable Bhaddāli replied, “No, [he would not stand still or move away, but would lie down in the mud].” 747b

The World-honored One said:

Bhaddāli, suppose there is a monk who is not liberated both ways but is liberated by wisdom . . . is not liberated by wisdom but is a body witness . . . is not a body witness but is one who has arrived at view . . . not one who has arrived at view but is liberated by faith . . . is not liberated by faith but is a Dharma follower . . . is not a Dharma follower but is a faith follower, and I tell him, “Come, [lie down] in the mud!” Bhaddāli, what do you think [regarding] that monk who has been instructed by me; would that monk stand still or move away?

The venerable Bhaddāli replied, “No, [he would not stand still or move away, but would lie down in the mud].”

The World-honored One said:

Bhaddāli, what do you think? At that time were you a faith follower . . . a Dharma follower . . . one liberated by faith . . . one who has arrived at view . . . a body witness . . . one who is liberated by wisdom . . . or one liberated in both ways?

The venerable Bhaddāli replied, “No, [I was none of those].”

The World-honored One said, “Bhaddāli, at that time were you not like a vacant room?”

Then the venerable Bhaddāli, having been rebuked to his face by the World-honored One, was sad and distressed within. He hung his head in silence, unable to reply, as if immersed in thought.<sup>93</sup>

Then, having rebuked the venerable Bhaddāli to his face, and wishing to cheer him up again, the World-honored One said:

At that time, Bhaddāli, you lacked the peacefulness with regard to me that comes from faith in the Dharma; you lacked the peacefulness that comes from love for the Dharma; you lacked the peacefulness that comes from being at peace in the Dharma. Why was that?

For the sangha of monks I had promulgated the rule on eating [just] one meal [a day]. All [other] monks in the sangha respectfully trained in that rule, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. You alone said that you could not endure it, rose from your seat, and left. Why was that? It was because you would not fully train in the rules, and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One.

The venerable Bhaddāli said:

It is true. Why is that? The World-honored One had, for the sangha of monks, promulgated the rule on eating [just] one meal [a day]. All [other] monks in the sangha respectfully trained in that rule, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. I alone said that I could not endure it, rose from my seat, and left. Why was that? It was because I would not fully train in the rules, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. May the World-honored One forgive my fault! Having seen my fault, I of myself regret my transgression. From now on I will be disciplined and will not do it again.

The World-honored One said:

747c It is like this, Bhaddāli. You were truly like a fool, like an ignorant person, like one who does not understand, like one who is unskilled. Why is that? For the sangha of monks I had promulgated the rule on eating [just] one meal [a day]. All [other] monks in the sangha respectfully trained in that rule, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. You alone said that you could not endure it, rose from your seat, and left. Why was that? It was because you would not fully train in the rules, and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One.

Bhaddāli, having committed a transgression, and having seen it, you regret it of yourself, and from now on you will discipline yourself and not do it again. Bhaddāli, in this way within this noble Dharma and discipline there is benefit, not decline if, having thus committed a transgression, you see it and regret it of yourself, and from now on you discipline yourself and do not do it again.

Bhaddāli, what do you think? Suppose that a monk does not fully train in the rules. He stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain forest, or he dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to sitting in meditation. Staying in that secluded place, he practices energetically to attain a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present.

Having stayed in that secluded place and practiced energetically to attain peace and happiness,<sup>94</sup> he is censured by the World-honored One for his morality, he is censured by devas and his wise companions in the holy life, and he is censured by himself for his morality. Being censured by the World-honored One for his morality, being censured by devas and his wise companions in the holy life, and being censured by himself for his morality, he does not [experience] the arising of delight.

Delight not having arisen, joy does not arise. Joy not having arisen, bodily tranquility does not arise. Bodily tranquility not having arisen, he does not experience happiness. Not having experienced happiness, his mind does not become concentrated. Bhaddāli, a noble disciple whose mind has not become concentrated will not see as it really is and know it as it really is.<sup>95</sup>

Bhaddāli, what do you think? Suppose that a monk trains fully in the rules. He stays in a forest, under a tree in a mountain forest, or he dwells on a lofty crag, in a tranquil place without noise, in seclusion, where there is no evil, where there are no people, a place conducive to seated meditation. Staying in that secluded place, he practices energetically to attain a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present.

Having stayed in that secluded place and practiced energetically to attain peace and happiness, he is not censured by the World-honored One for his morality, he is not censured by devas and his wise companions in the holy life, and he is not censured by himself for his morality. Not being censured by the World-honored One for his morality, not being censured by devas and his wise companions in the holy life, and not being censured by himself for his morality, he [experiences] the arising of delight. Delight having arisen, joy arises. Joy having arisen, bodily tranquility arises. Bodily tranquility having arisen, he experiences happiness. Having experienced happiness, his mind becomes concentrated.

Bhaddāli, a noble disciple whose mind has become concentrated will see as it really is and know as it really is. Having seen as it really is and known as it really is, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, he dwells having attained the first absorption.

748a

Bhaddāli, at that time he is reckoned to have attained the first higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present, which he attains easily, without difficulty. He dwells happily, without fear, at peace and at ease, which makes for his advance toward nirvana.<sup>96</sup>

With the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, he dwells having attained the second absorption.

Bhaddāli, at that time he is reckoned to have attained the second higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present, which he attains easily, without difficulty. He dwells happily, without fear, at peace and at ease, which makes for his advance toward nirvana.

Secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, he dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

Bhaddāli, at that time he is reckoned to have attained the third higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present, which he attains easily, without difficulty. He dwells happily, without fear, at peace and at ease, which makes for his advance toward nirvana.

With the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, he dwells having attained the fourth absorption.

Bhaddāli, at that time he is reckoned to have attained the fourth higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present, which he attains easily, without difficulty. He dwells happily, without fear, at peace and at ease, which makes for his advance toward nirvana.

With his mind concentrated and purified in this way, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having gained mental imperiturbability, he trains in the realization of the higher knowledge of recollection of past lives. He recalls countless former lives traversed by him in the past, together with his activities and appearance [in those lives]: one birth, two births, a hundred births, a thousand births, eons of [world] expansion, eons of [world] contraction, countless eons of [world] expansion and contraction, [recalling], “[I was] that living being named So-and-so; I went through these past experiences, I was born there, with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of food and drink; I experienced this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this. Dying here I was reborn there; dying there I was reborn here. I was reborn here with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of food and drink; I experienced this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this.”

Bhaddāli, at that time he is reckoned to have attained this first higher knowledge on the basis of having earlier been without negligence. He delighted in staying in seclusion, and practiced energetically; lack of knowledge was eradicated and knowledge arose, darkness was destroyed and understanding accomplished, ignorance was eradicated and understanding arose, namely by realizing the higher knowledge of recollecting past lives.

With his mind concentrated and purified in this way, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having gained mental imperiturbability, he trains in the realization of the higher knowledge of the birth and death [of beings]. With the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses [the vision of normal] men, he sees beings as they die and are reborn, handsome or ugly, superior or inferior, as they come and go between good and bad realms of existence, in accordance with the [previous] deeds of these living beings.

748b

He sees as it really is that, if these living beings practiced evil bodily conduct, evil verbal and mental conduct, if they reviled noble ones, held wrong views, and acted in fulfillment of wrong views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking up of the body, after death, they certainly go to a bad realm of existence, being reborn in hell.

If these living beings practiced excellent bodily conduct, excellent verbal and mental conduct, if they did not revile noble ones, held right views, and acted in fulfillment of right views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking up of the body, after death, they certainly go to a good realm of existence, being reborn in heavenly realms.

Bhaddāli, at that time he is reckoned to have attained the second higher knowledge on the basis of having earlier been without negligence. He delighted in staying in seclusion, and practiced energetically; lack of knowledge was eradicated and knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed and understanding accomplished; ignorance was eradicated and understanding arose, namely by realizing the higher knowledge of the birth and death [of beings].

With his mind concentrated and purified in this way, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having gained mental imperiturbability, he trains in realizing the higher knowledge of the eradication of the taints.

He knows as it really is: “This is dukkha.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the arising of dukkha.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the cessation of dukkha.” He knows as it really is: “This is the path to the cessation of dukkha.”

He knows as it really is: “These are the taints.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the arising of the taints.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the cessation of the taints.” He knows as it really is: “This is the path to the cessation of the taints.”

Knowing in this way and seeing in this way, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire . . . from the taint of existence . . . and his mind is liberated from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, he knows it is liberated, knowing as it really is: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

Bhaddāli, at that time he is reckoned to have attained this third higher knowledge on the basis of having earlier been without negligence. He delighted in staying in seclusion, and practicing energetically; lack of knowledge was eradicated and knowledge arose; darkness was destroyed and understanding accomplished; ignorance was eradicated and understanding arose, namely by realizing the higher knowledge of the eradication of the taints.

At this the venerable Bhaddāli rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, what is the cause, what is the reason that monks who have equally violated the rules are in some cases punished and in some cases not punished?

The World-honored One replied:

Bhaddāli, suppose that a monk has repeatedly violated the rules. Because he has repeatedly violated the rules, he is scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what is suspected from that. Being scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what is suspected from that, he speaks evasively about other unrelated matters; or he becomes angry and full of hate, venting fury and wide-ranging hatred; or he harasses the sangha, is disdainful toward the sangha, speaking like this: “I will now [not] do what pleases and satisfies the sangha and is agreeable to it,”<sup>97</sup> expressing this kind of mental attitude. 748c

Bhaddāli, the monks then think, “This venerable one has repeatedly violated the rules. Because he has repeatedly violated the rules, he has been scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what is suspected from that. Being scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what has been suspected from that, he speaks evasively about other unrelated matters; or he becomes angry and full of hate, venting fury and wide-ranging hatred; or he harasses the sangha, is disdainful toward the sangha, speaking like this: ‘I will now [not] do what pleases and satisfies the sangha and is agreeable to it.’” Having seen this, Bhaddāli, the monks say, “Venerable ones, we should see to it that [this investigation] continues for a long time.” Bhaddāli, in this way the monks see to it that [that investigation] continues for a long time.

Suppose that a monk has repeatedly violated the rules. Because he has repeatedly violated the rules, he is scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what is suspected from that. Being scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what is suspected from that, he does not speak evasively about other unrelated matters; nor does he become angry and full of hate, venting fury and wide-ranging evil; nor does he harass the sangha, nor is he disdainful toward the sangha. He does not speak like this: “I will now [not] do what pleases and satisfies the sangha and is agreeable to it.” He does not express this kind of mental attitude.

Bhaddāli, the monks then think, “This venerable one has repeatedly violated the rules. Because he has repeatedly violated the rules, he has been scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what is suspected from that. Being scolded by his companions in the holy life regarding what has been seen or heard and what is suspected from that, he does not speak evasively about other unrelated matters; nor does he become angry and full of hate, venting fury and wide-ranging evil; nor does he harass the sangha, nor is he disdainful toward the sangha. He does not speak like this: ‘I will now [not] do what pleases and satisfies the sangha and is agreeable to it.’” Having seen this, they say, “Venerable ones, we should see to it that [this investigation] is soon finalized.” Bhaddāli, in this way the monks see to it that [that investigation] is soon finalized. In the case of a light violation of the precepts it is also like this.

Bhaddāli, suppose that a monk has [a little] faith and [a little] love [for the Dharma] and is [a little] at peace [in the Dharma].<sup>98</sup> [The examining monks think,] “At present this monk has [a little] faith and [a little] love [for the Dharma] and is [a little] at peace [in the Dharma]. If we punish this venerable one, then because of that the [little] faith and [little] love [for the Dharma] and the state of being [a little] at peace [in the Dharma] of this venerable one will certainly be cut off. Let us now together carefully protect this venerable one.” So the monks together carefully protect him.

Bhaddāli, he is just like a person who has <only> one eye.<sup>99</sup> All of his relatives, out of sympathy and concern, seeking his benefit, welfare, peace, and happiness, together carefully protect him, so that this person is not [afflicted] by cold and heat, [afflicted] by hunger and thirst, [afflicted] by disease, [afflicted] by worry, [afflicted] by disease and worry, so that he is not [afflicted] by dust, not [afflicted] by smoke, not [afflicted] by dust and smoke. Why is that? His relatives carefully protect him because they fear that he might lose that one eye. 749a

Bhaddāli, in the same way, when a monk has a little faith and a little love [for the Dharma] and is a little at peace [in the Dharma], [the monks think], “Now this monk has a little faith and a little love [for the Dharma] and is a little at peace [in the Dharma]. If we punish this venerable one, then because of that the little faith and little love [for the Dharma] and the being a little at peace [in the Dharma] of this venerable one will certainly be cut off. Let us now together carefully protect this venerable one.” For this reason the monks together carefully protect him, just as the relatives protect the man with one eye.

Then the venerable Bhaddāli rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, what is the cause, what is the reason that in former times, when few rules had been promulgated, many monks observed and upheld them? What is the cause, what is the reason that now, when the World-honored One has promulgated many rules, few monks observe and uphold them?<sup>100</sup>

The World-honored One replied:

Bhaddāli, when the sangha of monks had not acquired [worldly] gains, the sangha did not delight in fine things.<sup>101</sup> When the sangha of monks had acquired [worldly] gains, the sangha then found delight in fine things. Delight in fine things having arisen, the World-honored One, wishing to cut off this delight in fine things, established rules for his disciples. In the same way for becoming very famous . . . elders becoming known to the king . . . being of great merit . . . having much learning.<sup>102</sup>

Bhaddāli, when the sangha did not yet have much learning, the sangha did not delight in fine things. When the sangha came to be of much learning, the sangha came to delight in fine things. Delight in fine things having arisen, the World-honored One, wishing to cut off this delight in fine things, promulgated rules for his disciples.

Bhaddāli, I establish rules for disciples not [just] for the sake of cutting off taints in the present. I establish rules for disciples [also] for the sake of cutting off taints in the future. Therefore, Bhaddāli, I establish rules for disciples for the sake of cutting off taints, leading them to accept my instruction.

Bhaddāli, long ago I gave the monks a teaching with the simile of a thoroughbred horse. What is the reason herein that you do not remember?<sup>103</sup>

The venerable Bhaddāli said:

World-honored One, there was a reason here. What was it? The World-honored One had promulgated the rule on eating [just] one meal [a day] for the monks. All of the monks in the sangha respectfully trained in that rule, and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. I alone said that I could not endure it, rose from my seat and left. That was because I did not fully train in the rules and in the entire sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. Herein, World-honored One, this was the reason.

749b

The World-honored One said further:

Bhaddāli, this was not the only reason here. Bhaddāli, when I gave the monks the teaching with the simile of the thoroughbred horse, you certainly did not attend to it single-mindedly, you did not respect it well, you did not listen with attention. Bhaddāli, there was another reason here.

Then the venerable Bhaddāli rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said:

World-honored One, now is the right time. Well-gone One, now is the right time for the World-honored One to give the monks the teaching with the simile of the thoroughbred horse. Having heard it from the World-honored One, the monks will receive it and remember it well.<sup>104</sup>

The World-honored One said:

Bhaddāli, it is just as a knowledgeable horse trainer gets a fine thoroughbred horse [and subdues it]. That knowledgeable [horse] trainer first subdues its mouth [with the bit]. Having had its mouth subdued, the horse is not happy about moving around. At times it wants [to move]; at times it does not want to. Why is that? Because it has not yet been [fully] subdued.

Bhaddāli, once the fine thoroughbred horse has been subdued by the trainer [by means of the bit], the first [stage of] subduing has been accomplished. The horse trainer then subdues it to wearing the harness and keeping in step. Once trained in wearing the harness and keeping in step, it is made to gallop. [Finally] it is made to attack.<sup>105</sup> It is then fit for a king to ride, being of the highest rank.

[Before] it had been perfectly pacified and subdued in all respects, and made thoroughly familiar with the trainer's commands, [the horse] was not happy about moving around, at times wanting [to move], at times not wanting to. Why is that? It is because it was being subdued by stages.

Bhaddāli, once the horse trainer has accomplished the process of subduing it by stages, at that time the fine thoroughbred horse is tamed, well-tamed. It has attained the highest taming, the foremost and highest taming, the highest rank. Having attained the foremost rank, it is then suitable to be ridden by a king, to be fed with royal fodder, and to be called a royal horse.

Bhaddāli, in the same way, when a noble, fine, and knowledgeable person has accomplished the ten stages of one beyond training—the right view of one beyond training . . . up to . . . the right knowledge of one beyond training—at that time he is tamed, well-tamed. He has attained the highest taming, attained the foremost and highest taming, the highest tranquility. He has attained the foremost tranquility. He has discarded all crookedness, discarded all impurity, discarded all fear, discarded all delusion, discarded all flattery, settled all dust, washed away all filth, and he is without attachment. He is worthy of reverence, worthy of esteem, worthy of respect, worthy of offerings, an excellent field of merit for all devas and human beings.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Bhaddāli and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

749c

195. The Discourse to Assaji<sup>106</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling in the Kāsi country together with a large sangha of monks.

While dwelling at a certain place, he addressed the monks:

I eat only during the day.<sup>107</sup> Eating only during the day, I am without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness or pain. My body is light, strong, and healthy, and I am happy and at ease. You too should train in eating only during the day. Eating only during the day, you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy, and you will be happy and at ease.

At that time the World-honored One promulgated the rule on eating only during the day for the sangha of monks. The monks in the sangha all respectfully trained in this rule and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. Then the World-honored One proceeded in stages to Kīṭāgiri and stayed in a grove of śimsapā trees north of the village of Kīṭāgiri.

At that time in Kīṭāgiri there were two monks, one called Assaji and a second called Punabbasuka, who had formerly been landlords, heads of temples, and clan leaders.<sup>108</sup> They ate in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon. Eating in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon, they were without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Their bodies were light, strong, and healthy, and they were happy and at ease.

Having heard this, a group of many monks approached the monks Assaji and Punabbasuka and said to them:

Assaji and Punabbasuka, the World-honored One has been dwelling in the Kāsi country together with a large sangha of monks. While dwelling in a certain place, he said to the monks, “I eat only during the day. Eating only during the day, I am without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. My body is light, strong, and healthy, and I am happy and at ease. You too should train in eating only during the day. Eating only during the day, you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy, and you will be happy and at ease.”

At that time the World-honored One promulgated the rule on eating only during the day for the sangha of monks. The monks in the sangha all respectfully train in this rule and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. Assaji and Punabbasuka, you too should train in eating only during the day. Eating only during the day, you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy, and you will be happy and at ease. Do not disobey the World-honored One and the sangha of monks.<sup>109</sup>

Hearing this, Assaji and Punabbasuka replied:

Venerable Ones, we eat in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon. Eating in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon, we are without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Our bodies are light, strong, and healthy, and we are happy and at ease. Why should we give up something in the present in expectation of something in the future? 750a

In the same way [it went] a second and a third time.<sup>110</sup> The group of many monks was unable to get Assaji and Punabbasuka to give up that evil wrong view. They rose from their seats, took leave of them, and left. They approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with their heads at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and stood to one side, they said:

World-honored One, in this Kīṭāgiri there are two monks, one called Assaji and the second called Punabbasuka, who were formerly landlords, heads of temples, and clan leaders. They eat in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon. Eating in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon, they are without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Their bodies are light, strong, and healthy, and they are happy and at ease.

World-honored One, having heard this, we approached the monks Assaji and Punabbasuka and said to them, “Assaji and Punabbasuka, the World-honored One has been dwelling in the Kāsi country together with a large sangha of monks. While dwelling in a certain place, he said to the monks, ‘I eat only during the day. Eating only during the day, I am without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. My body is light, strong, and healthy, and I am happy and at ease. You too should train in eating only during the day. Eating only during the day, you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy, and you will be happy and at ease.’

“At that time the World-honored One promulgated the rule on eating only during the day for the sangha of monks. The monks of the sangha all respectfully train in this rule and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. Assaji and Punabbasuka, you too should train in eating only during the day. Eating only during the day, you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy, and you will be happy and at ease. Do not disobey the World-honored One and the sangha of monks.”

Hearing this, Assaji and Punabbasuka replied, “Venerable Ones, we eat in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon. Eating in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon, we are without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Our bodies are light, strong, and healthy, and we are happy and at ease. Why should we give up something in the present in expectation of something in the future?”

In the same way [it went] a second and a third time. World-honored One, being unable to get Assaji and Punabbasuka to give up that evil wrong view, we rose from our seats, took leave of them, and left.

Hearing this, the World-honored One said to a certain monk, “Approach the monks Assaji and Punabbasuka and say this: ‘Assaji and Punabbasuka, the World-honored One summons you.’”

750b Hearing this, the monk [said], “Yes, World-honored One,” rose from his seat, paid homage at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached the monks Assaji and Punabbasuka and said this: “Assaji and Punabbasuka, the World-honored One summons you.”

Hearing this, Assaji and Punabbasuka approached the Buddha, paid homage with their heads at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side.

The World-honored One asked them:

Assaji and Punabbasuka, is it true that a group of many monks approached you and said to you, “Monks Assaji and Punabbasuka, the World-honored One has been dwelling in the Kāsi country together with a large sangha of monks. While dwelling in a certain place, he said to the monks, ‘I eat only during the day. Eating only during the day, I am without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. My body is light, strong, and healthy, and I am happy and at ease. You too should train in eating only during the day. Eating only during the day, you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your bodies will be light, strong, and healthy, and you will be happy and at ease.’”

“At that time the World-honored One promulgated the rule on eating only during the day for the sangha of monks. The monks of the sangha all respectfully train in this rule and in the sublime Dharma, which is the domain of the World-honored One. Assaji and Punabbasuka, you too should train in eating only during the day. Eating only during the day, you will be without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Your body will be light, strong, and healthy, and you will be happy and at ease. Do not disobey the World-honored One and the sangha of monks!”

Assaji and Punabbasuka, hearing this, you said to the monks: “Venerable Ones, we eat in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon. Eating in the morning, in the evening, and during the day beyond noon, we are without preoccupation, without pursuit, and without sickness and pain. Our bodies are light, strong, and healthy, and we are happy and at ease. Why should we give up something in the present in expectation of something in the future?”

In the same way [it went] a second and a third time. Assaji and Punabbasuka, being unable to get you to give up that evil wrong view, the monks rose from their seats, took leave of you and left?

Assaji and Punabbasuka replied, “That is true.”

The World-honored One said:

Assaji and Punabbasuka, do you know me to have taught the Dharma in this way: “If someone experiences pleasant feeling, then after they have experienced pleasant feeling, evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease. If someone experiences painful feeling, then after they have experienced painful feeling, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase”?<sup>111</sup>

Assaji and Punabbasuka replied:

750c Yes, we know the World-honored One to have taught the Dharma in this way: “If someone experiences pleasant feeling, then after they have experienced pleasant feeling, [evil and] unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease. If someone experiences painful feeling, then after they have experienced painful feeling, [evil and] unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase.”

The World-honored One scolded the monks Assaji and Punabbasuka:

You foolish men! From where do you know me to have taught the Dharma in this way? You foolish men! From whose mouth have you heard it, that you know me to have taught the Dharma in this way? You foolish men! What I have never stated, you take me to have stated. You foolish men!<sup>112</sup>

When you were being spoken to by the group of many monks, it would have been proper and in accordance with the Dharma for you to reply, “We do not know. We should ask these monks.”

At that time the World-honored One said to the [group of many] monks:

Do you too know me to have taught the Dharma in this way: “If someone experiences pleasant feeling, then after they have experienced pleasant feeling, [evil and] unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease. If someone experiences painful feeling, then after they have experienced painful feeling, [evil and] unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase”?

The group of many monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked them again, “How do you know me to have taught the Dharma?”

The group of many monks replied:

World-honored One, we know the World-honored One to have taught the Dharma in this way: “It may be that for someone experiencing pleasant feeling, evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease; [or] it may be that for someone experiencing pleasant feeling, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase. It may be that for someone experiencing painful feeling, evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease; [or] it may be that for someone experiencing painful feeling, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase.” World-honored One, we know the World-honored One to have taught the Dharma in this way.

Hearing this, the World-honored One praised the monks, saying:

It is well, it is well, as you say, it may be that for someone experiencing pleasant feeling, evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease; [or] it may be that for someone experiencing pleasant feeling, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase. It may be that for someone experiencing painful feeling, evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease; [or] it may be that for someone experiencing painful feeling, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase. Why is that?

I indeed speak in this way: “It may be that for someone experiencing pleasant feeling, evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease; [or] it may be that for someone experiencing pleasant feeling, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase. It may be that for someone experiencing painful feeling, evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease; [or] it may be that for someone experiencing painful feeling, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase.”

If I had not known as it really is, had not seen, had not understood, had not grasped, had not completely and rightly realized that there are pleasant feelings with which [evil and] unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, then it would not be proper for me to recommend the abandoning of these pleasant feelings.

If I had not known as it really is, had not seen, had not understood, had not grasped, had not completely and rightly realized that there are pleasant feelings with which evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, then it would not be proper for me to recommend the cultivation of these pleasant feelings.

751a

If I had not known as it really is, had not seen, had not understood, had not grasped, had not completely and rightly realized that there are painful feelings with which evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, then it would not be proper for me to recommend the abandoning of these painful feelings.

If I had not known as it really is, had not seen, had not understood, had not grasped, had not completely and rightly realized that there are painful feelings with which evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, then it would not be proper for me to recommend the cultivation of these painful feelings.<sup>113</sup>

Because I have known as it really is, have seen, have understood, have grasped, have completely and rightly realized that there are pleasant feelings with which evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, therefore I recommend the abandoning of these pleasant feelings.

Because I have known as it really is, have seen, have understood, have grasped, have completely and rightly realized that there are pleasant feelings with which evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, therefore I recommend the cultivation of these pleasant feelings.

Because I have known as it really is, have seen, have understood, have grasped, have completely and rightly realized that there are painful feelings with which evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, therefore I recommend the abandoning of these painful feelings.

Because I have known as it really is, have seen, have understood, have grasped, have completely and rightly realized that there are painful feelings with which evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, therefore I recommend the cultivation of these painful feelings. Why is that?

I do not recommend cultivating all bodily pleasure and I also do not recommend not cultivating all bodily pleasure. I do not recommend cultivating all bodily pain and I also do not recommend not cultivating all bodily pain. I do not recommend cultivating all mental pleasure and I also do not recommend not cultivating all mental pleasure. I do not recommend cultivating all mental pain and I also do not recommend not cultivating all mental pain.<sup>114</sup>

Of what bodily pleasure do I say that it is not to be cultivated? If a bodily pleasure is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, then I say of such bodily pleasure that it is not to be cultivated.

Of what bodily pleasure do I say that it is to be cultivated? If a bodily pleasure is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, then I say of such bodily pleasure that it is to be cultivated.

Of what bodily pain do I say that it is not to be cultivated? If a bodily pain is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, then I say of such bodily pain that it is not to be cultivated.

Of what bodily pain do I say that it is to be cultivated? If a bodily pain is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, then I say of such bodily pain that it is to be cultivated.

Of what mental pleasure do I say that it is not to be cultivated? If a mental pleasure is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, then I say of such mental pleasure that it is not to be cultivated. 751b

Of what mental pleasure do I say that it is to be cultivated? If a mental pleasure is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, then I say of such mental pleasure that it is to be cultivated.

Of what mental pain do I say that it is not to be cultivated? If a mental pain is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states increase and wholesome states decrease, then I say of such mental pain that it is not to be cultivated.

Of what mental pain do I say that it is to be cultivated? If a mental pain is being cultivated and evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase, then I say of such mental pain that it is to be cultivated.

One knows as it really is things that should be cultivated and one knows as it really is things that should not be cultivated. Having known as it really is things that should be cultivated and having known as it really is things that should not be cultivated, one then does not cultivate things that should not be cultivated and one cultivates things that should be cultivated. When one does not cultivate things that should not be cultivated, and cultivates things that should be cultivated, evil and unwholesome states decrease and wholesome states increase.<sup>115</sup>

I do not say that all monks [need to] practice with diligence and I also do not say that all monks do not [need to] practice with diligence. Of what monks do I say that they do not [need to] practice with diligence?

[I say this:] “If a monk is liberated in both ways. How is a monk liberated in both ways? If a monk dwells having directly experienced the eight liberations and, having seen with wisdom, knows that his taints are destroyed, then such a monk is liberated both ways.”<sup>116</sup>

Of this monk I say that he does not [need to] practice with diligence. Why is that? This venerable one formerly practiced with diligence; it is impossible that this venerable one was formerly negligent. For this reason I say that this monk does not [need to] practice with diligence.

[I also say this:] “If a monk who, not being liberated in both ways, is liberated by wisdom. How is a monk liberated by wisdom? If a monk dwells not having directly experienced the eight liberations, [yet] having seen with wisdom, knows that his taints are destroyed, then such a monk is liberated by wisdom.”

Of this monk I say that he does not [need to] practice with diligence. Why is that? This venerable one has formerly practiced with diligence; it is impossible that this venerable one was formerly negligent. For this reason I say that this monk does not [need to] practice with diligence.

Of these two [types of] monks I say that they do not [need to] practice diligently.

Of what monks do I say that they do [need to] practice with diligence? [I say this] if a monk is not liberated in both ways and not liberated by wisdom, but is a body witness. How is a monk a body witness? If a monk dwells having directly experienced the eight liberations but does not know, through having seen with wisdom, that the taints are destroyed, then such a monk is a body witness.

751c

Of such a monk I say that he does [need to] practice with diligence. What fruit do I see in this monk practicing with diligence, on account of which I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence?

If this monk seeks [to cultivate] the faculties, learns from good friends, and appropriately practices abiding in tranquility, then, by eradicating the taints, he will attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom. In this very life, he will dwell having personally understood, personally awakened, and personally realized, understanding as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.” I see such fruit in this monk practicing with diligence, and therefore I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence.

[I say this also:] “If a monk is not liberated in both ways, not liberated by wisdom, and not a body witness, but has arrived at view. How does a monk arrive at view? If a monk has consistently firm faith in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, in accordance with the Dharma as he has heard it, and through wisdom gains increased insight and increased acceptance of it, then such a monk has arrived at view.”

Of such a monk I say that he does [need to] practice with diligence. What fruit do I see in this monk practicing with diligence, on account of which I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence?

If this monk seeks [to cultivate] the faculties, learns from good friends, and appropriately practices abiding in tranquility, then, by eradicating the taints, he will attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom. In this very life, he will dwell having personally understood, personally awakened, and personally realized, understanding as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.” I see such fruit in this monk practicing with diligence, and therefore I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence.

[I say this also:] “If a monk is not liberated in both ways, not liberated by wisdom, not a body witness, and has not arrived at view, but is liberated by faith. How is a monk liberated by faith? If a monk has consistently firm faith in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, in accordance with the Dharma as he has heard it, and through wisdom gains insight and acceptance of it, which are less than those of one arrived at view, then such a monk is liberated by faith.”

Of such a monk I say that he does [need to] practice with diligence. What fruit do I see in this monk practicing with diligence, on account of which I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence?

752a If this monk seeks [to cultivate] the faculties, learns from good friends, and appropriately practices abiding in tranquility, then, by eradicating the taints, he will attain the taintless liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom. In this very life, he will dwell having personally understood, personally awakened, and personally realized, understanding as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.” I see such fruit in this monk practicing with diligence; therefore I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence.

[I say this also:] “If a monk is not liberated in both ways, not liberated by wisdom, not a body witness, not arrived at view, and not liberated by faith, but is a Dharma follower. How is a monk a Dharma follower? If a monk has consistently firm faith in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, in accordance with the Dharma as he has heard it, and he has [not yet],<sup>117</sup> through wisdom, gained increased insight and increased acceptance of it, then such a monk is a Dharma follower.”<sup>118</sup>

Of such a monk I say that he does [need to] practice with diligence. What fruit do I see in this monk practicing with diligence, on account of which I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence? If this monk seeks [to cultivate] the faculties, learns from good friends, and appropriately practices abiding in tranquility, then he will certainly attain one of two fruits: either final knowledge here and now or, if there is a remainder [of clinging], attainment of nonreturning. I see such fruit in this monk practicing with diligence, and therefore I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence.

[I say this also:] “If a monk is not liberated in both ways, not liberated by wisdom, not a body witness, not arrived at view, not liberated by faith, and not a Dharma follower, but is a faith follower. How is a monk a faith follower? If a monk has consistently firm faith in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, in accordance with the Dharma as he has heard it, and has [not yet] through wisdom gained insight and acceptance of it, which are less than those of a Dharma follower, then such a monk is a faith follower.”

Of such a monk I say that he does [need to] practice with diligence. What fruit do I see in this monk practicing with diligence, on account of which I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence? If this monk seeks [to cultivate] the faculties, learns from good friends, and appropriately practices abiding in tranquility, then he will certainly attain one of two fruits: either final knowledge here and now or, if there is a remainder [of clinging], attainment of nonreturning. I see such fruit in this monk practicing with diligence, and therefore I say that this monk does [need to] practice with diligence.

Of all these monks I say that they do [need to] practice with diligence.

I do not say that all monks attain final knowledge, and I also do not say that all monks attain final knowledge at the outset; rather, gradual practice and training gives rise to the results. By accepting instruction and accepting admonition, monks attain final knowledge. This is how monks attain final knowledge.

How is it that gradual practice and training gives rise to the results, that by accepting instruction and accepting admonition monks attain final knowledge? How is it that monks attain final knowledge?

752b

Suppose that someone who has faith approaches [a teacher]; having approached, he pays respect; having paid respect, he listens to the Dharma with unified mind; having listened to the Dharma with unified mind, he memorizes the Dharma; having memorized the Dharma, he reflects on it; having reflected on it, he weighs it up; having weighed it up, he examines it; having examined it, the noble disciple directly realizes it, with wisdom and superior insight.

He thinks, “[Until now] I had never directly realized this truth, being without wisdom and superior insight. Now I have directly realized this truth with wisdom and superior insight.” In this way gradual practice and training leads to the results. After accepting instruction and accepting admonition, monks attain final knowledge. This is how monks attain final knowledge.

Then the World-honored One said, “Assaji and Punabbasuka, there is a teaching called ‘in four phrases,’ which I wish to teach you. Do you wish to know it?”<sup>119</sup>

Assaji and Punabbasuka said, “World-honored One, who are we? How could we understand the Dharma?”

Then the World-honored One thought, “These foolish men! They have transgressed my true Dharma and discipline and have long been far removed from it.” [He said]:

Even if a teacher of Dharma and discipline is greedily attached to food, not detached from food, his disciples should not quickly become negligent in their practice—how much more so if [the teacher] is myself, who am not greedily attached to food but remote and detached from food.

A faithful disciple should speak like this: “The World-honored One is my teacher; I am the World-honored One’s disciple. The World-honored One teaches me the Dharma; the Well-gone One teaches me the Dharma. May I for a long time derive benefit [from it]! May I attain welfare, peace, and happiness [from it]!”<sup>120</sup>

A faithful disciple who has done much in the domain of the World-honored One, who has found much welfare in the domain of the World-honored One, who has practiced much in the domain of the World-honored One, who has entered the domain of the World-honored One and become stable in the domain of the World-honored One—if he wanders in the eastern region, he will certainly be at ease, without the multitude of sufferings; if he wanders in the southern region . . . the western region . . . the northern region, he will certainly be at ease, without the multitude of sufferings.<sup>121</sup>

If a faithful disciple has done much in the domain of the World-honored One, has found much welfare in the domain of the World-honored One, has practiced much in the domain of the World-honored One, has entered the domain of the World-honored One and become stable in the domain of the World-honored One—of him I do not say merely that he is established in wholesome conditions, let alone that he regresses; rather [I say] that he will increase in wholesome conditions, by day and by night, without regressing.

If a faithful disciple has done much in the domain of the World-honored One, has found much welfare in the domain of the World-honored One, has practiced much in the domain of the World-honored One, has entered the domain of the World-honored One and become stable in the domain of the World-honored One, then he will certainly attain one of two fruits: either final knowledge here and now or, if there is a remainder [of clinging], attainment of nonreturning.

752c

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

196. The Discourse to Cuṇḍa<sup>122</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling among the Vajjians, staying at the village of Sāma.

At that time the novice Cuṇḍa had been spending the rains retreat in Pāvā. In Pāvā there was a Nigaṇṭha called Ñātaputta, who had [just] died. Not long after his death the disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Ñātaputta had broken up into factions and there was a lack of communal harmony. They had all been speaking divisively, no longer conducting their affairs harmoniously. They had been mutually entangling themselves in arguments, disputing acrimoniously with one another, [saying,] “I know this teaching; you do not know it. How could you know any teaching as I know it? I am coherent; you are incoherent. I am consistent; you are inconsistent. What should be stated first, you have stated last; what should be stated last, you have stated first. I am victorious over you; you are no match for me.”<sup>123</sup> When I ask you something, you are unable to reply; I have already defeated you. Let me ask you again; if you make a move, I will entangle you again.”

Ever more mutually arrogant, they had kept trying to outdo one another in discussion, and no one was there to reprove them. The white-clothed lay disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Ñātaputta had all become dissatisfied with these [monastic] disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Ñātaputta. Why was that? It was because of the bad doctrine and discipline that he had taught, which did not provide a way out [of dukkha], did not lead to full awakening. Not taught by a well-gone one, it was falling apart and unstable,<sup>124</sup> lacking anything reliable. The teacher they venerated was not a tathāgata, not free from attachment and fully awakened.

Then, having completed the rains retreat, the three months being over, having mended his robes, the novice Cuṇḍa took his robes and bowl and approached the village of Sāma to stay in a śimsapā grove north of the village of Sāma.<sup>125</sup> The novice Cuṇḍa approached the venerable Ānanda and, having arrived, paid homage at his feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. The venerable Ānanda said, “Venerable friend Cuṇḍa, where have you come from? In what place did you spend the rains retreat?”

753a

The novice Cuṇḍa said:

Venerable Ānanda, I have come from Pāvā. I spent the rains retreat in Pāvā. Venerable Ānanda, in Pāvā there was a Nigaṇṭha called Nātaputta, who had [just] died. Not long after his death the disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta had broken up into factions, and there was a lack of communal harmony. They have all been speaking divisively, no longer conducting their affairs harmoniously. They have been mutually entangling themselves in arguments, disputing acrimoniously with one another, [saying,] “I know this teaching; you do not know it. How could you know any teaching as I know it? I am coherent; you are incoherent. I am consistent; you are inconsistent. What should be stated first, you have stated last; what should be stated last, you have stated first. I am victorious over you; you are no match for me. When I ask you something, you are unable to reply; I have already defeated you. Let me ask you again; if you make a move, I will entangle you again.”

Ever more mutually arrogant, they have kept trying to outdo one another in discussion, and no one has been there to reprove them. The white-clothed lay disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta have all become dissatisfied with these [monastic] disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta. Why is that? It is because of the bad doctrine and discipline that he taught, which does not provide a way out [of dukkha], does not lead to full awakening. Not taught by a well-gone one, it is falling apart and unstable, lacking anything reliable. The teacher they venerated was not a tathāgata, not free from attachment and fully awakened.

On hearing this, the venerable Ānanda said:

Venerable friend Cuṇḍa, given what you have said, we should go and see the Buddha and respectfully present it to the World-honored One. Venerable friend Cuṇḍa, let us now together approach the Buddha and tell the World-honored One about this matter. It may be that because of this we will get to hear a special teaching from the World-honored One.

Then the venerable Ānanda and the novice Cuṇḍa together approached the Buddha and paid homage with their heads at the Buddha’s feet. The venerable Ānanda stepped back and stood to one side, and the novice Cuṇḍa stepped back and sat to one side.<sup>126</sup>

The venerable Ānanda said:

World-honored One, today the novice Cuṇḍa approached me, paid homage with his head at my feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. I said, “Venerable friend Cuṇḍa, where have you come from? In what place did you spend the rains retreat?” The novice Cuṇḍa said, “Venerable Ānanda, I have come from Pāvā, I spent the rains retreat at Pāvā. Venerable Ānanda, in Pāvā there was a Nigaṇṭha called Ñātaputta, who had just died. Not long after his death the disciples of Nigaṇṭha Ñātaputta had broken up into factions, and there was a lack of communal harmony. They have all been speaking divisively, no longer conducting their affairs harmoniously. They have been mutually entangling themselves in arguments, disputing acrimoniously with one another, [saying,] ‘I know this teaching; you do not know it. How could you know any teaching as I know it? I am coherent; you are incoherent. I am consistent; you are inconsistent. What should be stated first, you have stated last; what should be stated last, you have stated first. I am victorious over you; you are no match for me. When I ask you something, you are unable to reply; I have already defeated you. Let me ask you again; if you make a move, I will entangle you again.’

753b

“Ever more mutually arrogant, they have kept trying to outdo one another in discussion, and no one has been there to reprove them. The white-clothed lay disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Ñātaputta have all become dissatisfied with these [monastic] disciples of the Nigaṇṭha Ñātaputta. Why is that? It is because of the bad doctrine and discipline that he taught, which does not provide a way out [of dukkha], does not lead to full awakening. Not taught by a well-gone one, it is falling apart and unstable, lacking anything reliable. The teacher they venerated was not a tathāgata, not free from attachment and fully awakened.”

World-honored One, on hearing this, I became afraid and alarmed, the hairs on my body stood up on end, [and I thought,] “Let not any monk give rise to such a dispute in the sangha after the World-honored One has passed away! Such disputation would be to the detriment of many persons, the suffering of many persons; it would not be to their benefit, not for their welfare, not for their peace and happiness. It might even give rise to extreme suffering and distress among devas and human beings.”

World-honored One, [sometimes] I see a monk seated before the World-honored One, being deeply respectful toward the World-honored One, well restrained in the presence of the Well-gone One.<sup>127</sup> World-honored One, on seeing this I think, “Suppose that, after the World-honored One has passed away, this monk were to cause the arising of disputes within the sangha, disputes such as would be to the detriment of many people, the suffering of many people, not to their benefit, not for their welfare, not for their peace and happiness, such as might even give rise to extreme suffering and distress among devas and human beings.”

At this the World-honored One asked:

Ānanda, in your view, what kind of dispute within the sangha is such that this dispute would be to the detriment of many persons, the suffering of many persons, not to their benefit, not for their welfare, not for their peace and happiness, such as might even give rise to extreme suffering and distress among devas and human beings?<sup>128</sup>

The venerable Ānanda replied:

World-honored One, there could be a dispute that is [not] about the higher morality, the higher mind, or the higher insight which, having once arisen within the sangha, could keep on arising. World-honored One, such a dispute would be to the detriment of many persons, making for the suffering of many persons; it would not be to their benefit, not for their welfare, not for their peace and happiness; it might even give rise to extreme suffering and distress among devas and human beings.

The World-honored One said:

Ānanda, there could be a dispute about some very slight matter, namely one that is [not] about the higher morality, the higher mind, or the higher insight.<sup>129</sup> [However], Ānanda, if there did exist a dispute about the path [or] about the stages of the path which, having once arisen within the sangha, would keep on arising, then, Ānanda, such a dispute would [indeed] be to the detriment of many people, making for the suffering of many people; it would not be to their benefit, not for their welfare, not for their peace and happiness.

753c

Ānanda, do you see here [even] two monks who are of differing opinions, giving rise to a dispute: “This is Dharma; this is not Dharma. This is the discipline; this is not the discipline. This is an offense; this is not an offense. It is a minor [offense]; it is a grave [offense]. It can be atoned for; it cannot be atoned for. It can be restrained; it cannot be restrained. There is a remainder; there is no remainder. It has occurred; it has not occurred”? Ānanda, [is this] what you think of?

There is the collection of my teachings, which I came to understand by myself, awakened to by myself, realized by myself, namely: the four establishments of mindfulness, the four right efforts, the four bases of [supernormal] power, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven awakening factors, and the eight factors of the noble path [which can forestall such dispute].

[However], Ānanda, the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta was not actually omniscient, though he himself claimed to be omniscient.<sup>130</sup> Ānanda, if the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta had been all-knowing and all-seeing, then he would have set forth for his disciples the “six roots of disputation,” so that, on hearing a dispute, a disciple could settle it himself.

Then the venerable Ānanda, extending his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, said:

World-honored One, now is the right time, Well-gone One, now is the right time. If the World-honored One teaches the monks about the six roots of disputation, then having heard it from the World-honored One, the monks will receive it and remember it well.

The World-honored One said, “Ānanda, listen closely and pay proper attention. I will explain it to you in detail.” The venerable Ānanda said, “Certainly. We shall listen to receive the teaching.”

The Buddha said:

Ānanda, suppose a person is entangled in the bondage of anger and resentment [which is the first of the six roots of disputation]. Ānanda, being entangled in the bondage of anger and resentment, that person becomes disrespectful of the teacher, cannot see the Dharma, and does not keep the precepts. Being disrespectful of the teacher, not seeing the Dharma, and not keeping the precepts, he gives rise to a dispute within the sangha, a dispute that is to the detriment of many people, makes for the suffering of many people; it will not be to their benefit, not for their welfare, not for their peace and happiness, even giving rise to extreme suffering and distress among devas and human beings.

Ānanda, in the case of such a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that [the root of it] has not been eliminated, then, in order to cut off this dispute [at its root], you should quickly seek a means, and train [in applying it] with utmost diligence, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, and with unrelenting endurance.

Ānanda, it is just as a person whose head is on fire or whose clothes are on fire will quickly seek a means to save his head or to save his clothes.<sup>131</sup> In the same way, in the case of a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that it has not been eliminated, then, in order to cut off this dispute [at its root] you should quickly seek a means, and train [in applying it] with utmost diligence, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, and with unrelenting endurance.

Ānanda, in the case of such a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that it has been eliminated [at its root], then you should strongly protect that [state of] mind, being constantly diligent, because of wishing to settle this dispute. In this way you will cut off the root of this dispute.

754a Ānanda, just as a person whose head is on fire or whose clothes are on fire will quickly seek a means to save his head or to save his clothes, in the same way, in the case of a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that it has been eliminated [at its root], you should strongly protect that [state of] mind, being constantly diligent, because of wishing to settle this dispute. In this way, with regard to this dispute, you will cut off the root of it.

It is the same with [the other five roots of disputation]: silent sulking . . . avarice and envy . . . flattery and deceit . . . shamelessness and recklessness . . . evil desire and wrong view of a person who is of an evil nature and unable to restrain himself.<sup>132</sup> Ānanda, if a person has evil desire and wrong view, and is of an evil nature and unable to restrain himself, then he is disrespectful to the teacher, does not see the Dharma, and does not keep the precepts. Being disrespectful to the teacher, not seeing the Dharma, and not keeping the precepts, he gives rise in the sangha to a dispute, a dispute such as would be to the detriment of many people, the suffering of many people; it would not be to their benefit, not for their welfare, not for their peace and happiness, even giving rise to extreme suffering and distress among devas and human beings.

Ānanda, in the case of such a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that [the root of it] has not been eliminated, then, in order to cut off [the root of] this dispute you should quickly seek a means, and train [in applying it] with utmost diligence, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, and with unremitting endurance.

Ānanda, just as a person whose head is on fire or whose clothes are on fire will quickly seek a means to save his head or to save his clothes, in the same way, in the case of a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that [the root of it] has not been eliminated, then, in order to cut off [the root of] this dispute you should quickly seek a means, and train [in applying it] with utmost diligence, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, and with unremitting endurance.

Ānanda, in the case of such a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that [the root of it] has been eliminated, then you should strongly protect that [state of] mind, being constantly diligent, because of wishing to settle this dispute. In this way you will cut off the root of this dispute.

Ānanda, just as a person whose head is on fire or whose clothes are on fire will quickly seek a means to save his head or to save his clothes, in the same way, in the case of a dispute, if you see, internally or externally, that [the root of it] has been eliminated, then you should strongly protect that state of mind, being constantly diligent, because of wishing to settle this dispute. In this way, with regard to this dispute, you will cut off the root of it.

Again, Ānanda, there are seven kinds of settlement of litigation.<sup>133</sup> One: settlement of litigation by encounter; two: settlement of litigation by [loss of] memory; three: settlement of litigation by non-insanity; four: settlement of litigation by self-confession; five: settlement of litigation by [pronouncement of] <bad character>;<sup>134</sup> six: settlement of litigation by circulating around; seven: settlement of litigation that is like a broom for sweeping away excrement.

Ānanda, what is settlement of litigation by encounter? How is some litigation decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by encounter?

Ānanda, one person reproves one person, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them.<sup>135</sup> One person [reproves] two persons . . . one person [reproves] many persons . . . one person reproves a sangha, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them.

754b Two persons reprove two persons, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them. Two persons [reprove] many persons . . . two persons [reprove] a sangha . . . two persons reprove one person, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them.

Many persons reprove many persons, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them. Many persons [reprove] a sangha . . . many persons [reprove] one person . . . many persons reprove two persons, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them.

A sangha reproves a sangha, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them. A sangha [reproves] one person . . . a sangha [reproves] two persons . . . a sangha reproves many persons, protected by the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and this encounter delights them.

Ānanda, this is what is called settlement of litigation by encounter. This is how a certain kind of litigation is decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by encounter.

Ānanda, what is settlement of litigation by [loss of] memory? How is some litigation decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by [loss of] memory? Ānanda, suppose that a certain person has violated the precepts but does not remember doing so. Seeing this, the monks say to him, “You have violated the precepts but you do not remember doing so.”<sup>136</sup> You should request from the sangha settlement by [loss of] memory and the sangha will together grant the venerable one settlement by [loss of] memory.”

Ānanda, that monk should approach a place where the sangha is assembled in harmony, arrange his robe so as to bare one shoulder, take off his sandals, join the sangha, and pay homage with his head at the feet of the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them.<sup>137</sup> Kneeling down and extending his hands with joined palms, he should say to the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them, “Venerable sirs, hear this! I have violated the precepts but do not remember doing so. I now request from the sangha settlement by [loss of] memory. May the sangha, assembled in harmony, grant me settlement by [loss of] memory!”

Ānanda, for that monk the sangha, assembled in harmony, grants settlement by [loss of] memory, in accordance with the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and the encounter delights them. Ānanda, this is what is called settlement of litigation by [loss of] memory. This is how a certain kind of litigation is decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by [loss of] memory.

Ānanda, what is settlement of litigation by non-insanity? How is some litigation decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by non-insanity? Ānanda, suppose that insanity has arisen in a person and his mind is deranged. Insanity having arisen in him and his mind being deranged, he performs many impure actions that are contrary to the Dharma of a renunciant, that do not accord with practice of the Dharma; and he is declared to have committed an offense.

At a later time he returns to his original mental condition. Seeing this, the [other] monks say to him,<sup>138</sup> “Formerly insanity had arisen in you and your mind was deranged. Insanity having arisen in you and your mind being deranged, you performed many impure actions that are contrary to the Dharma of a renunciant, that do not accord with practice of the Dharma; and you were declared to have committed an offense. Venerable friend, you later returned to your original mental condition. Venerable friend, request from the sangha settlement by non-insanity. The sangha will together grant the venerable one settlement by non-insanity.”

754c

Ānanda, that monk should approach a place where the sangha is assembled in harmony, arrange his robe so as to bare one shoulder, take off his sandals, join the sangha, and pay homage with his head at the feet of the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them. Kneeling down and extending his hands with palms together, he should say to the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them, “Venerable sirs, hear this! Insanity once arose in me and my mind was deranged. Insanity having arisen in me and my mind being deranged, I performed many impure actions that do not [conform to] the Dharma of a renunciant, that do not accord with the practice of the Dharma, and I was declared to have committed an offense. I have since returned to my original mental condition. I now request from the sangha settlement by non-insanity. May the sangha, assembled in harmony, grant me settlement by non-insanity!”

Ānanda, for that monk the sangha, assembled in harmony, grants settlement by non-insanity, according to the Dharma and the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected teacher, and the encounter delights them. Ānanda, this is what is called settlement of litigation by non-insanity. This is how a certain kind of litigation is decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by non-insanity.

Ānanda, what is settlement of litigation by self-confession? How is some litigation decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by self-confession? Ānanda, suppose that some person has violated the precepts. He may have acknowledged this or he may not have acknowledged it. He may remember it or he may not remember it. Ānanda, that monk should approach a place where the sangha is assembled in harmony, arrange his robe so as to bare one shoulder, take off his sandals, join the sangha, and pay homage with his head at the feet of the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them. Kneeling down and extending his hands with joined palms, he should say to the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them, “Venerable sirs, hear this! I have violated such and such precepts. I have now come before the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of you with the sincere intention of confessing it, of revealing it personally, not daring to hide it. I shall guard myself more skillfully, so as not to do it again later.”

Ānanda, the sangha of monks should ask that monk, “Does the venerable one himself see his violation?” He should answer, “I myself truly see my violation.” The sangha should tell him, “Guard yourself more skillfully so as not to do it again!” Ānanda, this is what is called settlement of litigation by self-confession. This is how a certain kind of litigation is decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by self-confession.

Ānanda, what is settlement of litigation by [pronouncement of] <bad character>? How is some litigation decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by [pronouncement of] <bad character>? Ānanda, suppose that a person does not know shame and does not regret what has been seen or heard [about him], and is therefore suspected by others of having evil desires. Having committed an offense, he on the one hand declares that he [does not] know about it,<sup>139</sup> and on the other hand declares that he [does not] see it [as an offense]. Having on the one hand declared that he does [not] know about it, he on the other hand declares that he [does not] see it [as an offense]; and having on the one hand declared that he [does not] see it [as an offense], he on the other hand declares that he does [not] know about it.

When among the sangha he on the one hand declares that he does [not] know about it, and when among the sangha he on the other hand declares that he [does not] see it [as an offense]. Having on the one hand declared that he [does not] know about it, he on the other hand declares that he [does not] see it [as an offense]; and having on the one hand declared that he [does not] see it [as an offense], he on the other hand declares that he [does not] know about it.<sup>140</sup> Ānanda, for that monk the sangha, assembled in harmony, grants the settlement by [pronouncement of] <bad character>, “Sir, you are being unprincipled and unreasonable. Sir, you are being evil and unskillful. Why is that?

755a

“Sir, having committed an offense, you on the one hand declare that you do [not] know about it and on the other hand declare that you do [not] see it [as an offense]. Having on the one hand declared that you do [not] know about it, you on the other hand declare that you do [not] see it [as an offense]; and having on the one hand declared that you do [not] see it [as an offense], you on the other hand declare that you know [you have done it].

“When among the sangha, you on the one hand declare that you do [not] know about it, and when among the sangha you on the other hand declare that you do [not] see it [as an offense]. Having on the one hand declared that you do [not] know about it, you on the other hand declare that you do [not] see it [as an offense]; and having on the one hand declared that you do [not] see it [as an offense], you on the other hand declare that you do [not] know about it.”

Ānanda, this is what is called settlement of litigation by [pronouncement of] <bad character>. This is how a certain kind of litigation is decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by [pronouncement of] bad character.

Ānanda, what is settlement of litigation by circulating around? How is some litigation decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by circulating around? Ānanda, [suppose that] two monks have various differences of opinion, and that this gives rise to disputation such as, “This is Dharma; this is not Dharma. This is discipline; this is not discipline. This is an offense; this is not an offense. This is a light [offense]; this is a grave [offense]. This can be talked about; this cannot be talked about. This can be restrained; this cannot be restrained. There is a remainder; there is no remainder. This can be atoned for; this cannot be atoned for.”

Ānanda, those monks [can] settle this litigation in various ways. If it is settled in [those] various ways, then this litigation should be declared settled. If it is not settled in [those] various ways, then the sangha should be told about this litigation. If it is settled within the sangha, then this litigation should be declared settled.

If it is not settled within the sangha, then, Ānanda, if there are monks living nearby who have memorized the discourses, memorized the discipline, and memorized the summaries,<sup>141</sup> then these monks should together go to them and inform them about this litigation. If the dispute is settled on the way, then that litigation should be declared settled. If the dispute is not settled on the way, then they should again present this litigation to the sangha. If it is settled within the sangha, then this litigation should be declared settled.

If it is [again] not settled within the sangha, then, Ānanda, if [there are] many companions who [can] help them, ones who have memorized the discourses, memorized the discipline, and memorized the summaries, then, Ānanda, those [learned] monks should settle this litigation; [they should] instruct [the monks] by way of the Dharma and by way of the discipline, in accordance with the instructions of the respected Teacher, so that the encounter delights them. Ānanda, this is what is called settlement of litigation by circulating around. This is how a certain kind of litigation is decided through the so-called settlement of litigation by circulating around.

Ānanda, what is settlement of litigation that is like a broom for sweeping away excrement? How is some litigation decided through the so-called settlement of litigation that is like a broom for sweeping away excrement?

Suppose that there is a dwelling place where the monks of the sangha are arguing bitterly, disputing acrimoniously with one another; and suppose, Ānanda, that those monks have become divided into two factions. Then, Ānanda, after they have divided into two factions, whichever monk in one of the factions is the most senior and most venerated, or the next below him in status, whoever is the leader, or the next below him in status, this monk, Ānanda, should address those [other] monks, saying, “Venerable friends, listen! We are being unprincipled and unreasonable; we are being evil and unskillful. Why is that? Having gone forth out of faith in this well-declared Dharma and discipline, having left home and become homeless to train in the path, here we are, arguing bitterly, disputing acrimoniously with one another. 755b Ānanda, if in this faction there is no monk who disagrees, then, Ānanda, this monk should approach the second faction. Having approached it, he should pay homage with his head at the feet of the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them. Kneeling down and extending his hands with palms together, he should say to the monk who is the most senior and most venerated of them, “Venerable sirs, listen! We are being unprincipled and unreasonable; we are being evil and unskillful. Why is that? Having gone forth out of faith in this well-declared Dharma and discipline, having left home and become homeless to train in the path, here we are arguing bitterly, disputing acrimoniously with one another.

“Venerable friends, given this disputation, [let] those of us who have been violating the precepts get rid of our grave offenses, get rid of our associations with the household life. On behalf of myself and on behalf of those venerable friends [who agree with me], I now address you venerable friends with the sincere intention of confessing this, of personally stating and revealing it, not daring to hide it. Henceforth I shall guard myself more skillfully so as not to do it again later.”

“Venerable friends, given this disputation, [let] those of us who have been violating the precepts get rid of our grave offenses, get rid of our associations with the household life. On behalf of myself and on behalf of those venerable friends [who agree with me], I now address you venerable friends with the sincere intention of confessing it, of personally stating and revealing it, not daring to hide it. Henceforth I shall guard myself more skillfully so as not to do it again later.”

Ānanda, that monk should say to this monk, “Venerable friend, do you yourself see your offense?” He should answer, “I myself truly see my offense.” That one should tell him, “Henceforth guard yourself more skillfully, so as not to do it again!” The same is then to be done by the second faction.

Ānanda, this is the settlement that is like a broom for sweeping away excrement. This is how some litigation is decided through the so-called settlement of litigation that is like a broom for sweeping away excrement.

Ānanda, I will now teach you six principles of cordiality. Listen closely, listen closely and pay proper attention!

The venerable Ānanda replied, “Certainly. [We] shall listen to receive the instruction.”

The Buddha said:

What are the six? [One practices] bodily acts of loving-kindness toward one’s companions in the holy life.

This principle is a principle of cordiality,<sup>142</sup> a principle of affection, a principle of joy, which makes for being liked, makes for being esteemed, makes for being respected, makes for being revered, makes for cultivation, makes for bringing together, for becoming a renunciant, for gaining mental unification, for gaining energy, for attaining nirvana.

[One practices] verbal acts of loving-kindness. . . .

[One practices] mental acts of loving-kindness. . . .

Whatever benefits of the Dharma one has gained in accordance with the Dharma—the food that one has got oneself, even what is in one’s bowl—such benefits one shares with one’s companions in the holy life.

This principle is a principle of cordiality, a principle of affection, a principle of joy, which makes for being liked, makes for being esteemed, makes for being respected, makes for being revered, makes for cultivation, makes for bringing together, for becoming a renunciant, for gaining mental unification, for gaining energy, for attaining nirvana.

755c

Whatever moral conduct is not deficient, not defective, not defiled, not otherwise, [firm] like the earth, not swayed by others, praised by noble ones as adequate and well-maintained—such moral conduct one shares with one’s companions in the holy life.

This principle is a principle of cordiality, a principle of affection, a principle of joy, which makes for being liked, makes for being esteemed, makes for being respected, makes for being revered, makes for cultivation, makes for bringing together, for becoming a renunciant, for gaining mental unification, for gaining energy, for attaining nirvana.

Whatever noble view is emancipating, clear vision that penetrates profoundly, capable of rightly eradicating dukkha—such view one shares with one’s companions in the holy life.

This principle is a principle of cordiality, a principle of affection, a principle of joy, which makes for being liked, makes for being esteemed, makes for being respected, makes for being revered, makes for cultivation, makes for bringing together, for becoming a renunciant, for gaining mental unification, for gaining energy, for attaining nirvana.

Ānanda, when I spoke earlier of six principles of cordiality, it was of these that I was speaking.

Ānanda, if you [monks] settle and completely cut off these six roots of disputation, and use these seven kinds of settlement of litigation—[up to] the settlement of litigation that is like a broom for sweeping away excrement—to settle any dispute that arises in the sangha, and [if you] also practice these six principles of cordiality, then, Ānanda, in this way you will [dwell] together in harmony after I am gone: happy, free of disputation, united and of a single mind, united and with a single teaching, blending like water and milk, dwelling and practicing happily, just as when I was present.<sup>143</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the [other] monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

197. The Discourse to Upāli<sup>144</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Campa, on the bank of the river Ganges.

At that time, in the afternoon, the venerable Upāli rose from sitting in meditation and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks perform a transaction that is different [from what is appropriate to the case] and declare a transaction that is different [from what is appropriate to the case], then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by [the procedure for settlement of litigation called] encounter but instead do it by [loss of] memory, or if they should do it by [loss of] memory but instead do it by encounter, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by [loss of] memory but instead do it by non-insanity, or if they should do it by non-insanity but instead do it by [loss of] memory, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

756a The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by non-insanity but instead do it by self-confession, or if they should do it by self-confession but instead do it by non-insanity, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by self-confession but instead do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character>, or if they should do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character> but instead do it by self-confession, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character> but instead reprove, or if they should reprove but instead do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character>, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should reprove but instead demote, or if they should demote but instead reprove, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should demote but instead promote, or if they should promote but instead demote, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, "It is not, Upāli."

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should promote but instead expel, or if they should expel but instead promote, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, “It is not, Upāli.”

The venerable Upāli asked further: “World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should expel but instead remind, or if they should remind but instead expel, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?”

The World-honored One replied, “It is not, Upāli.”

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should remind but instead correct at the root, or if they should correct at the root but instead remind, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, “It is not, Upāli.”

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should correct at the root but instead send away, or if they should send away but instead correct at the root, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, “It is not, Upāli.”

The venerable Upāli asked further:

756b World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should send away but instead prescribe penance, or if they should prescribe penance but instead send away, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied, “It is not, Upāli.”

The venerable Upāli asked further:

World-honored One, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should prescribe penance but instead correct, or if they should correct but instead prescribe penance, then is this a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline?

The World-honored One replied:

It is not, Upāli. Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks perform a transaction that is different [from what is appropriate to the case] and declare a transaction that is different [from what is appropriate to the case], then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by encounter but instead do it by [loss of] memory, or if they should do it by [loss of] memory but instead do it by encounter, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by [loss of] memory but instead do it by non-insanity, or if they should do it by non-insanity but instead do it by [loss of] memory, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by non-insanity but instead do it by self-confession, or if they should do it by self-confession but instead do it by non-insanity, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by self-confession but instead do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character>, or if they should do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character> but instead do it by self-confession, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character> but instead reprove, or if they should reprove but instead do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character>, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should reprove but instead demote, or if they should demote but instead reprove, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should demote but instead promote, or if they should promote but instead demote, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should promote but instead expel, or if they should expel but instead promote, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

756c Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should expel but instead remind, or if they should remind but instead expel, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should remind but instead correct at the root, or if they should correct at the root but instead remind, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should correct at the root but instead send away, or if they should send away but instead correct at the root, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should send away but instead prescribe penance, or if they should prescribe penance but instead send away, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should prescribe penance but instead correct, or if they should correct but instead prescribe penance, then this is a transaction that is not in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction that is not in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha too is at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks perform a transaction that is appropriate [to the case] and then declare this transaction, then this is a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha is not at fault.

Upāli, if a completely assembled sangha of monks should do it by encounter and then do it by encounter . . . should do it by [loss of] memory and then do it by [loss of] memory . . . should do it by non-insanity and then do it by non-insanity . . . should do it by self-confession and then do it by self-confession . . . should do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character> and then do it by [pronouncement of] <bad character> . . . should reprove and then reprove . . . should demote and then demote . . . should promote and then promote . . . should expel and then expel . . . should remind and then remind . . . should correct at the root and then correct at the root . . . should send away and then send away . . . should prescribe penance and then prescribe penance . . . should correct and then correct, then this is a transaction in accordance with the Dharma, a transaction in accordance with the discipline; and that sangha is not at fault.

Upāli, you should train in doing the transaction that is appropriate to the case and then declare this transaction. Do by encounter what should be done by encounter. Do by [loss of] memory what should be done by [loss of] memory. Do by non-insanity what should be done by non-insanity. Do by self-confession what should be done by self-confession. Do by [pronouncement of] <bad character> what should be done by [pronouncement of] <bad character>. Reprove who should be reproved. Demote who should be demoted. Promote who should be promoted. Expel who should be expelled. Remind who should be reminded. Discipline from the outset who should be disciplined from the outset. Correct at the root who should be corrected at the root. Send away who should be sent away. Prescribe penance for who should be prescribed penance. Discipline who should be disciplined. Upāli, you should train in this way.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Upāli and the [other] monks were delighted and received it respectfully. 757a

198. The Discourse on the Stages of Taming<sup>145</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove at the Squirrels' Sanctuary.

At that time the novice Aciravata was also dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in a meditation hut in the forest. At that time Prince Jīvasena, who was roaming about in the afternoon, came to where the novice Aciravata was staying. Having exchanged greetings with him, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Venerable Aciravata, I would like to ask a question. Am I permitted to ask it?”

The novice Aciravata replied, “Good prince, ask what you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it.”

The prince asked, “Aciravata, is it true that in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently attains unification of mind?”

The novice answered, “Good prince, it is true that in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently attains unification of mind.”

The prince asked further:

Venerable Aciravata, would you tell me in full, according to what you have heard and according to what you have learned through recitation, how in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently attains unification of mind?

The novice answered:

Good prince, I am not able to tell you in full, according to the Dharma as I have heard it and according to what I have learned through recitation, how in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently attains unification of mind. Good prince, if I were to tell the good prince, according to the Dharma as I have heard it and according to what I have learned through recitation, how in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently attains unification of mind, the good prince might not understand; and that would be wearisome for me.

The prince said to the novice:

Venerable Aciravata, you are not being ambushed by anyone. With what reason in mind are you retreating? Venerable Aciravata, tell me, according to the Dharma as you have heard it and according to what you have learned through recitation, how in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently attains unification of mind. If I understand, then that is good. If I do not understand, then I will not ask you any more questions about anything.

Then the novice Aciravata told Prince Jīvasena, according to the Dharma as he had heard it and according to what he had learned through recitation, how in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently attains unification of mind.

757b

Then Prince Jīvasena said:

Venerable Aciravata, it is impossible that in this Dharma and discipline a monk who is not negligent and who practices diligently should attain unification of mind.

Having declared it impossible, he promptly got up from his seat and left without bidding farewell.

Not long after Prince Jīvasena had left, the novice Aciravata approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head [at the Buddha's feet], he stepped back, sat to one side, and told the Buddha the whole conversation with Prince Jīvasena.

Having heard it, the World-honored one said to the novice:

Aciravata, let it be! How could Prince Jīvasena grasp [what you were talking about]? He engages in sensual pleasures, he is attached to sensual pleasures, consumed by craving for sensual pleasures, subject to the fever of sensual pleasures. As to the stage [of meditation attained by] abandoning sensual pleasures, by abandoning the craving for sensual pleasures, by abandoning the fever of sensual pleasures, by knowledge of dispassion, by vision of dispassion, by realization of dispassion, that Prince Jīvasena should [get to] know and see this stage, that is not possible. Why is that? Aciravata, it is [because] Prince Jīvasena constantly engages in sensual pleasures.

Aciravata, it is just as with taming four [kinds of beings]; taming elephants, taming horses, taming oxen, and taming people. In each case two [kinds of beings] to be tamed resist taming and two [kinds of beings] to be tamed accept taming. Aciravata, what do you think? That these two [kinds of beings] to be tamed which resist taming, which have never been tamed and, never having been tamed, are at the stage of being untamed—that they should experience the tamed state, that is not possible. That these two [kinds of beings] to be tamed which accept taming, which have been well-tamed and, having been well-tamed, have [gone beyond] the stage of being untamed<sup>146</sup>—that they should experience the tamed state, that is certainly possible.

So, Aciravata, let it be! How could Prince Jīvasena get [what you were talking about]? He engages in sensual pleasures, he is attached to sensual pleasures, consumed by craving for sensual pleasures, subject to the fever of sensual pleasures. As to the stage [of meditation attained by] abandoning sensual pleasures, by abandoning the craving for sensual pleasures, by abandoning the fever of sensual pleasures, by knowledge of dispassion, by vision of dispassion, by realization of dispassion—that the prince should [get to] know or see this stage, that is not possible. Why is that? Aciravata, it is [because] Prince Jīvasena constantly engages in sensual pleasures.

Aciravata, it is just as if there were a great rocky mountain not far from a village, which is without cavities, without crevices, solid, without hollows, firm and immovable, being altogether a single [mass]. Suppose that two men are wanting to see [the view]. One of the men quickly climbs up the mountain; the second man stays at the bottom of the mountain. The man on top of the rocky mountain sees that on the [other] side of the rocky mountain there is beautiful level ground, with scenic gardens, woodland groves, clear springs, flower ponds, and long flowing rivers. Having seen this, the man on top of the mountain says to the man at the bottom of the mountain, “Did you [ever] see that on the [other] side of the mountain there is beautiful level ground, with scenic gardens, woodland groves, clear springs, flower ponds, and long flowing rivers?” The man standing at the bottom of the mountain replies, “From what I see of the mountain, that on its [other] side there should be beautiful level ground, with scenic gardens, woodland groves, clear springs, flower ponds, and long flowing rivers, that is not possible.”

Then the man on top of the rocky mountain quickly comes down. He takes hold of the man at the bottom of the mountain and quickly leads him up. Having reached the top of the rocky mountain, he asks him, “Do you [now] see that on the [other] side of the mountain there is beautiful level ground, with scenic gardens, woodland groves, clear springs, flower ponds, and long flowing rivers?" The other man replies, "Only now do I see it."

757c

Then [the first man] again asks the other man, "At first you said that to see this was not possible, but now you say you see it. What is the reason for this?" The other man replies, "At first my [view] was obstructed by the mountain, so I could not see it."

So, Aciravata, let it be! How could Prince Jīvasena get [what you were talking about]? He engages in sensual pleasures, he is attached to sensual pleasures, consumed by craving for sensual pleasures, subject to the fever of sensual pleasures. As to the stage [of meditation attained by] abandoning sensual pleasures, by abandoning the craving for sensual pleasures, by abandoning the fever of sensual pleasures, by knowledge of dispassion, by vision of dispassion, by realization of dispassion, that the prince should [get to] know this, to see this, that is not possible.<sup>147</sup>

Aciravata, long ago there was a head-anointed warrior king who had an elephant catcher. The king said to him: "Elephant catcher, catch a forest elephant for me and bring him here. When you have caught him, tell me." Then, having received the king's instructions, the elephant catcher mounted the royal elephant and went into the forest. The elephant catcher saw a large forest elephant in the forest. Having seen him, he caught and bound him, attaching him to the royal elephant's neck. Then the royal elephant led the forest elephant out into the open.

The elephant catcher returned to the head-anointed warrior king and said, "Your Majesty, the forest elephant has been caught; he is bound and out in the open. May Your Majesty do as he pleases!" Hearing this, the head-anointed warrior king said [to his skilled elephant tamer], "Skilled elephant tamer, now quickly tame this forest elephant. Make him submit so that he becomes a well-tamed elephant. When he is well-tamed, come back and tell me."

Having received the king's instructions, the skilled elephant tamer took hold of a large post, placed it on his right shoulder, and went to where the forest elephant was. He planted the post in the ground and bound the forest elephant to it by the neck. He did this to control [the elephant's] intentions of enjoying the forest, to remove its thoughts of desire for the forest, detain him from the forest and weary him of it, so that he would enjoy villages and towns, and develop a liking for human beings. The skilled elephant tamer began by providing [the forest elephant] with fodder and drink.

Aciravata, once that forest elephant had accepted the first fodder and drink from the elephant tamer, the skilled elephant tamer thought, “Now this forest elephant will certainly survive. Why is that? [It is because] this forest elephant has for the first time accepted fodder and drink.”

758a Once that forest elephant had accepted the first fodder and drink from the elephant tamer, the skilled elephant tamer addressed him with soft, agreeable words, “Lie down, get up! Go, come back! Take up, put down! Bend, stretch!” That forest elephant, on being addressed by the elephant tamer with soft, agreeable words, lay down and got up, went and came back, took up and put down, bent and stretched. In this way the forest elephant followed the instructions of the elephant tamer.

Aciravata, once that forest elephant had obeyed the instructions of the elephant tamer, the skilled elephant tamer bound his two front feet, his [two] back feet, his two hind parts, his two flanks, his tail, his forehead, his ears, his tusks, and also his trunk. He got a man holding a goad to mount [the elephant’s] head, and many [other] men to stand in front of it holding swords, shields, spears, lances, halberds, hatchets, and axes. Holding a sharp halberd in his hand, the skilled elephant tamer stood in front of the forest elephant and said, “I will now train you in imperturbability. I will train you not to move.”

While being trained in imperturbability by the elephant tamer, that forest elephant did not lift his front feet and did not move his back feet. His two hind parts, his two flanks, his tail, his forehead, his ears, his tusks, and his trunk all did not move. In this way the forest elephant submitted to the elephant tamer by remaining imperturbable.

Aciravata, when that forest elephant submitted to the elephant tamer by remaining imperturbable, at that time he was putting up with swords, shields, spears, lances, halberds, hatchets, and axes, and with the sound of loud shouting. If there was any yelling, blowing of conchs, beating of drums, or striking of bells, he was capable of enduring it all. Once that forest elephant was capable of enduring that, at that time he was tamed, well-tamed; he had achieved the higher taming, achieved the unsurpassable taming. [Being also endowed with] superior swiftness, unsurpassable swiftness, he was fit to be ridden by a king, to receive fodder from a king's granary, and to be called a royal elephant.

It is the same, Aciravata, at the time when there appears in the world a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one. He has known and realized for himself this world [with its] devas and māras, [with its] Brahmas, [with its] renunciants and brahmins, from human beings to devas, and he dwells having himself achieved realization. He teaches the Dharma, which is sublime in the beginning, sublime in the middle, and sublime in the end, with its meaning and phrasing, endowed with purity, and he reveals the holy life.

That Dharma taught by him is heard by a householder's son. On hearing it, the householder's son gains faith in the Dharma taught by the Tathāgata. Having gained faith, he shaves off his hair and beard, puts on monastic robes and out of faith leaves home and becomes homeless to train in the path.

Aciravata, at that time the noble disciple comes out into the open, just as the king's forest elephant [came out of the forest]. Just as a forest elephant has lust, desire, delight, and attachment, namely for staying in the forest, Aciravata, in the same way devas and human beings have desire, lust, delight, and attachment, namely for the five strands of sensual pleasure, for visible forms, sounds, odors, tastes, and tangibles.

The Tathāgata begins by taming that monk, "You should maintain purity of body and livelihood, maintain purity of speech . . . and of mind and livelihood." When the noble disciple maintains purity of body and livelihood, maintains purity of speech . . . and of mind and livelihood, the Tathāgata tames the monk further,<sup>148</sup> "You should contemplate the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplate feelings, mental states, and dharma as dharma."

758b

When the noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings, mental states, and dharma as dharma, then the four establishments of mindfulness are present in the mind of the noble disciple. They bind his mind, control intentions of delighting in the household [life], and remove thoughts of desire for the household [life], detain him from the household [life] and weary him of it. They cause him to delight in the true Dharma and to develop noble morality.

Aciravata, it is just as the elephant tamer, having received the order from the head-anointed warrior king, took hold of a large post, placed it on his right shoulder, went to where the forest elephant was, planted the post in the ground, and bound the forest elephant to it by the neck. This controlled [the elephant's] intentions of delighting in the forest and removed his thoughts of desire for the forest, detained him from the forest and wearied him of it. It caused him to delight in villages and towns and to develop a liking for human beings.

In the same way, Aciravata, the four establishings of mindfulness are present in the mind of the noble disciple. They bind his mind, control his intentions of delighting in the household [life], and remove thoughts of desire for the household [life], detain him from the household [life] and weary him of it. They cause him to delight in the true Dharma, and to develop noble morality.

When the noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings, mental states, and dharmas as dharmas, then the Tathāgata tames the monk further, “You should contemplate the body as a body internally, without thinking thoughts related to sensual pleasures . . . up to . . . contemplate feelings, mental states, dharmas as dharmas, without thinking thoughts related to what is not Dharma.”

When the noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally without thinking thoughts related to sensual pleasures . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings, mental states, dharmas as dharmas, without thinking thoughts related to what is not Dharma, then in this way the noble disciple is following the instructions of the Tathāgata.

Aciravata, it is just as the forest elephant which, on being addressed by the elephant tamer with soft and agreeable words, lay down and got up, went and came back, took up and put down, bent and stretched, in this way the forest elephant followed the instructions of the elephant tamer.<sup>149</sup>

In the same way, Aciravata, when the noble disciple contemplates the body as a body internally, without thinking thoughts related to sensual pleasures . . . up to . . . contemplates feelings, mental states, dharmas as dharmas, without thinking thoughts related to what is not Dharma, then in this way the noble disciple is following the instructions of the Tathāgata.

When the noble disciple follows the instructions of the Tathāgata, the Tathāgata further tames the monk, “You should dwell secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . attain and dwell having attained the fourth absorption.”<sup>150</sup>

When the noble disciple dwells secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . attains and dwells having attained the fourth absorption, then in this way the noble disciple has followed the Tathāgata and become established in imperturbability.

Aciravata, it is just as when, through being instructed in imperturbability by the elephant tamer, the forest elephant did not lift his front feet, did not move his back feet, his two hind parts, his two flanks, his tail, his forehead, his ears, his tusks, and also his trunk, then in this way the forest elephant was following the elephant tamer’s instructions on imperturbability.<sup>151</sup> 758c

In the same way, Aciravata, when the noble disciple dwells secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . attains and dwells having achieved the fourth absorption, then in this way the noble disciple has followed the Tathāgata and become established in imperturbability.

When, by following the Tathāgata, the noble disciple has become established in imperturbability, at that time he is capable of enduring affliction by hunger and thirst, cold and heat, mosquitoes and gadflies, flies and fleas, wind and sun. He is also capable of enduring abusive words and being beaten with sticks. Any diseases of the body causing the utmost pain, such as to make him wish to end his life, all of these unpleasant afflictions he is able to endure.

Aciravata, it is just as the forest elephant, when he submitted to the elephant tamer and remained imperturbable, put up with swords, shields, spears, lances, halberds, hatchets, and axes, and the sound of loud shouting. He was capable of enduring any yelling, blowing of conchs, beating of drums, and striking of bells. All of that he was able to endure.<sup>152</sup>

In the same way, Aciravata, when by following the Tathāgata, the noble disciple has become established in imperturbability, at that time he is capable of enduring affliction by hunger and thirst, cold and heat, mosquitoes and gadflies, flies and fleas, wind and sun. He is also capable of enduring abusive words and being beaten with sticks. Any diseases of the body causing the utmost pain, such as to make him wish to end his life, all of these unpleasant afflictions he is able to endure.

Aciravata, when the noble disciple, through following the Tathāgata, is able to put up [with all of this], at that time he is tamed, well-tamed, has reached the higher taming, the supreme taming; he has reached the higher peace, the supreme peace; he has discarded all crookedness, fear, stupidity, and deceitfulness; he has become pure, has settled the dust, become free of dirt, free of impurity; he is worthy of praise, worthy of being invited, worthy of reverence, worthy of respect, truly worthy of offerings, an excellent field of merit for all devas and human beings.<sup>153</sup>

Aciravata, it is just as that forest elephant, when he had become capable of enduring all, at that time he was tamed, well-tamed, had achieved the higher taming, had achieved the unsurpassable taming, [was endowed with] superior swiftness, unsurpassable swiftness, was fit to be ridden by a king, to receive fodder from a king's granary, and to be called a royal elephant.

In the same way, Aciravata, when the noble disciple, through following the Tathāgata, is able to put up [with all of this], at that time he is tamed, well-tamed, has achieved the higher taming, the supreme taming; has attained the higher peace, the supreme peace; he has discarded all crookedness, fear, stupidity, and deceitfulness; he has become pure, has settled the dust, become free of dirt, free of impurity; he is worthy of praise, worthy of being invited, worthy of reverence, worthy of respect, truly worthy of offerings, an excellent field of merit for all devas and human beings.

759a Aciravata, a young forest elephant who dies untamed is reckoned to have “died untamed,” a middle-aged elephant . . . an old elephant who dies untamed is reckoned to have “died untamed.” Aciravata, a young noble disciple who dies untamed is reckoned to have “died untamed,” a middle-aged noble disciple . . . an old noble disciple who dies untamed is reckoned to have “died untamed.”<sup>154</sup>

Aciravata, a young forest elephant who dies well-tamed is reckoned to have “died well-tamed,” a middle-aged elephant . . . an old elephant who dies well-tamed is reckoned to have “died well-tamed.” Aciravata, a young noble disciple who dies well-tamed is reckoned to have “died well-tamed,” a middle-aged noble disciple . . . an old noble disciple who dies well-tamed is reckoned to have “died well-tamed.”

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the novice Aciravata and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

199. The Discourse on the Stages of the Fool and the Wise<sup>155</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks, “I will now teach you the nature of being foolish and the nature of being wise. Listen closely, listen closely and pay proper attention!” Then the monks listened to receive the instruction.

The Buddha said:

What is the nature of foolishness? A fool has three characteristics that mark him as foolish, that show him to be foolish, and possessing which he qualifies as a fool and is said to be foolish. What are the three? A fool thinks evil thoughts, speaks evil speech, and does evil deeds. This is why he is a fool and is said to be foolish.

If a fool did not think evil thoughts, did not speak evil speech, and did not do evil deeds, then he would not be reckoned a fool and said to be foolish. It is because a fool thinks evil thoughts, speaks evil speech, and does evil deeds that he is reckoned a fool and said to be foolish.

Right here and now a fool experiences three types of distress in body and mind. What are the three types of distress in body and mind that a fool experiences? Whatever he is doing, be it sitting in an assembly meeting, or being in a street or alley, or in a marketplace, or at a crossroads, there is talk about matters relating to fools: “A fool kills living beings, takes what is not given, engages in sexual misconduct, speaks falsehood . . . up to . . . has wrong view, and possesses countless other evil and unwholesome qualities.”<sup>156</sup> Having seen that someone possesses countless evil and unwholesome qualities, other people speak badly of him. 759b

Hearing this, the fool then thinks, “Having seen that someone possesses countless evil and unwholesome qualities, other people speak badly of him. I too possess these countless evil and unwholesome qualities. If they knew this, they would speak badly of me.” This is the first type of distress in body and mind that a fool experiences right here and now.

Again, a fool sees the king’s men arresting a criminal and subjecting him to various kinds of painful punishment: cutting off his hands, cutting off his feet, cutting off both his hands and his feet, cutting off his ears, cutting off his nose, cutting off both his ears and his nose; or slicing strips off him, or tearing out his beard, or tearing out his hair, or tearing out both his beard and his hair; or putting him in a cage and setting fire to his clothes; or wrapping him in straw and setting fire to it; or placing him in the belly of the “iron donkey,” or in the mouth of the “iron pig,” or in the mouth of the “iron tiger” and then heating it over a fire; or placing him in a copper cauldron or an iron cauldron and stewing him; or cutting him into pieces, or stabbing him with a sharp fork, or hooking him with iron hooks, or laying him down on an iron bed and scalding him with boiling oil, or seating him in an iron mortar and pounding him with an iron pestle, or having him be bitten by poisonous snakes, or whipping him with whips, or beating him with sticks, or hitting him with clubs, or impaling him alive, or cutting off his head.

Seeing this, the fool thinks, “Being known to the king and arrested for possessing countless evil and unwholesome qualities, one will be punished like this.<sup>157</sup> I too possess these countless evil and unwholesome qualities. If the king knew this, he would have me too subjected to painful punishment.” Such is the second type of distress in body and mind that a fool experiences right here and now.

Again the fool engages in evil bodily conduct, engages in evil verbal and mental conduct. Suppose he becomes sick and experiences pain.<sup>158</sup> As he is sitting or lying on a bed, or sitting or lying on a bench, or sitting or lying on the ground, great pain, extreme suffering arises in his body such as to make him wish to end his life. At that time his evil bodily conduct, evil verbal and mental conduct hangs over him.

It is just as, in the late afternoon when the sun is going down behind a tall mountain, the shadow hangs over the ground; in the same way his evil bodily conduct, evil verbal and mental conduct hangs over him at that time. He thinks, “This is my evil bodily conduct, evil verbal and mental conduct hanging over me. In former times I have not done what is meritorious; I have done much evil.

759c

“If there is a place for those who have done evil, who have been fierce and brutal, who have been unprincipled in their affairs, who have not done what is meritorious and not done what is wholesome, who have not made for themselves a lifelong reliable refuge from fear, then I will be going to that bad place.”

From this arises regret; and regret having arisen, [he knows] that he will die unworthy, that his life will end in an unwholesome way. This is the third type of distress in body and mind that the fool experiences right here and now.

Again, the fool engages in evil bodily conduct, engages in evil verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of this condition, with the breaking up of the body at death he will certainly go to a bad destiny and be reborn in hell. On being reborn there he will experience the painful consequences, which are entirely unwanted, displeasing, such as the mind would not like to think about.

If it is said, “It is entirely unwanted, displeasing, such as the mind would not like to think about,” then it is about hell that this is said. Why is that? Hell is entirely unwanted, displeasing, such as the mind would not like to think about.

At that time one monk rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said, “World-honored One, how is the suffering in hell?”

The World-honored One replied, “Monk, hell cannot be completely described—that is, the suffering in hell. Monk, hell is pure suffering.”

The monk asked again, “World-honored One, can the meaning of this be expressed through a simile?”

The World-honored One replied:

The meaning of this can be expressed through a simile. Monk, it is just as if the king’s men, having caught a thief, were to bring him to the head-anointed warrior king and say, “Your Majesty, this thief has committed a crime. May Your Majesty punish him.” The head-anointed warrior king says, “You go in the morning and punish this man’s crime by stabbing him a hundred times with spears.”

On receiving the instruction, the king’s men go in the morning and punish him by stabbing him a hundred times with spears; [yet] that man is still alive. The head-anointed warrior king asks them, “How is that man?” The king’s men reply, “Your Majesty, that man is still alive.” The head-anointed warrior king says again, “You go at midday and again stab him a hundred times with spears.”

On receiving the instruction, the king’s men go at midday and again stab him a hundred times with spears, [yet] that man is still alive. The head-anointed warrior king again asks them, “How is that man?” The king’s men reply, “Your Majesty, that man is still alive.” The head-anointed warrior king again says, “You go at sundown and again stab him a hundred times with spears.”

760a On receiving the instruction the king’s men go at sundown and again stab him a hundred times with spears; [yet] that man is still alive. However, that man’s body is completely perforated, broken up, and destroyed. No part of it, even the size of the hole in a coin, remains intact. The head-anointed warrior king asks them, “How is that man?” The king’s men reply, “Your Majesty, that man is still alive. However, his body is completely perforated, broken up, and destroyed. No part of it, even the size of the hole in a coin, remains intact.”

Monks, what do you think? When that man was stabbed with spears three hundred times in a single day, would he have experienced distress, extreme anguish, and pain in body and mind because of this?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, he would have already experienced extreme pain on being stabbed by one spear, let alone being stabbed three hundred times by spears.<sup>159</sup> How could that person not have experienced distress, extreme anguish, and pain in body and mind?

Then the World-honored One took in his hand a pebble as small as a pea and said, “Monks, do you see this pebble as small as a pea that I have taken in my hand?”

The monks replied, “We see it, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked them further:

Monks, what do you think? If this pebble, small as a pea, that I have taken in my hand, is compared with the Himalaya, king of mountains, which is the larger?

The monks replied:

Compared with the pebble, small as a pea, that the World-honored One has taken in his hand, the Himalaya, king of mountains, is a hundred times larger, a thousand times, ten thousand, a hundred thousand times larger, immeasurably, incalculably, incomparably larger, larger beyond reckoning, since the Himalaya, king of mountains, is extremely large, exceedingly large.

The World-honored One said:

Monks, it is just as, compared with the pebble, small as a pea, that I have taken in my hand, the Himalaya, king of mountains, is a hundred times greater, a thousand times, ten thousand, a hundred thousand times greater, immeasurably, incalculably, incomparably greater, greater beyond reckoning, since the Himalaya, king of mountains, is extremely large, exceedingly large.

In the same way, monks, compared with the distress, extreme anguish, and pain in body and mind experienced by that man because he was stabbed with spears three hundred times in a single day, the suffering in hell is a hundred times greater, a thousand times, ten thousand, a hundred thousand times greater, immeasurably, incalculably, incomparably greater, greater beyond reckoning, since the suffering in hell is extremely painful, exceedingly painful.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands and, with blazing red-hot iron axes, chop and trim their bodies so that they become octagonal or hexagonal,<sup>160</sup> square or round, tall or short, neat or unshapely.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

760b Monks, how is the suffering in hell?<sup>161</sup> When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands and, with blazing red-hot iron hatchets, chop and trim their bodies so that they become octagonal or hexagonal, square or round, tall or short, neat or unshapely.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands and force them to sit on blazing red-hot iron spears. With iron pincers they force their mouths open and then place in their mouths blazing red-hot iron balls, which burn their lips, burn their tongue, burn their palate,<sup>162</sup> burn their throat, burn their heart, burn their stomach, and then come out of the body lower down.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands, and force them to sit on blazing red-hot iron stakes. With iron pincers they force their mouths open and then pour molten copper into their mouths, which burns their lips, burns their tongue, burns their palate, burns their throat, burns their heart, burns their stomach, and then comes out of the body lower down.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands and force them to lie down on their backs on a blazing red-hot iron floor, and punish them with the fivefold fixing: they nail both hands and both feet [to the floor] with iron nails, and nail their belly with another nail.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands, and force them to lie down on the blazing red-hot iron floor. Pulling out their tongue, they stretch it [and fix it] with a hundred nails so that it is without wrinkles and does not shrink.

760c

It is just like using a hundred nails to stretch an ox hide so that it is without wrinkles and does not shrink.

In the same way, [when] living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands and force them to lie down on the blazing red-hot iron floor. Pulling out their tongue, they stretch it [and fix it] with a hundred nails so that it is without wrinkles and does not shrink.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands, and tear off their skin from head to feet or tear off their skin from feet to head. [Then] they bind them to a chariot and drag them back and forth on the blazing red-hot iron floor.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell force them down on the ground and, having taken what is blazing red-hot and burning, they force them to take it in their hands and sprinkle it over their own bodies.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds and thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they are born there, the guardians of hell force them to go up and down a blazing red-hot mountain of fire. When they put one foot down, the flesh, skin, and blood are completely burned up, and when they lift up that foot, the flesh, skin, and blood become again as before.

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? When living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands and, having lifted them up above a big blazing red-hot iron cauldron, they put them upside down into that iron cauldron. They are tossed up and down and in the [eight] directions, and froth comes out of their bodies, surrounding them as they cook.

It is just as when big beans, lentils, pod beans, bitter beans, and mustard seed are placed into a cauldron, with plenty of water and a very hot fire below, the beans in it are tossed up and down and in the [eight] directions, and become surrounded by their own froth as they cook.

In the same way, when living beings are reborn in hell, as soon as they have been born there, the guardians of hell seize them with their hands and, having lifted them up above a big blazing red-hot iron cauldron, they put them upside down into that iron cauldron. They are tossed up and down and in the [eight] directions, and froth comes out of their bodies, surrounding them as they cook. 761a

Being tortured in this way, [those beings] are overwhelmed by pain for very many years, up to hundreds or thousands, experiencing immeasurable pain, extremely severe and acute pain; yet after all they do not die until their evil and unwholesome deeds have been exhausted. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, how is the suffering in hell? Among the hells there is one hell called the Six Sensory Contacts.<sup>163</sup> When living beings are reborn in it, as soon as they have been born there, the forms they see with their eyes are not enjoyable, not likable. [Finding them] truly not enjoyable, not likable, the mind does not desire them; they are truly not desirable. The mind does not delight in them, as they are truly not delightful.

The sounds they hear with the ear . . . the odors they smell with the nose . . . the flavors they taste with the tongue . . . the tangibles they feel with the body . . . the mind-objects they cognize with their minds are not enjoyable, not likable. [Finding them] truly not enjoyable, not likable, the mind does not desire them; they are truly not desirable. The mind does not delight in them, as they are truly not delightful. Such is the suffering in hell.

Monks, I could with countless skillful means describe to you those hells, and describe the situation in those hells; but the suffering in those hells cannot be completely described, since hell is pure suffering.

Monks, the fool may at some time emerge from hell and be reborn as an animal. Life as an animal is also very painful.

Monks, how is the suffering of animals?<sup>164</sup> Some of the living beings that are reborn among animals are born in darkness, grow up in darkness, and die in darkness. Which [animals] are they? They are earth-dwelling worms.

At an earlier time the fool, out of greedy attachment to tasty food, engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of that reason, with the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn among animals that are born in darkness, grow up in darkness, and die in darkness. Such is the suffering of animals.

Monks, how is the suffering of animals? Some of the living beings that are reborn among animals are born in the bodies [of others], grow up in the bodies [of others], and die in the bodies [of others]. Which [animals] are they? They are called ulcer worms.

At an earlier time the fool, out of greedy attachment to tasty food, engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of that reason, with the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn among animals that are born in the bodies [of others], grow up in the bodies [of others], and die in the bodies [of others]. Such is the suffering of animals.

761b Monks, how is the suffering of animals? Some living beings are reborn among animals that are born in water, grow up in water, and die in water. Which [animals] are they? They are fish, sea monsters (makaras), tortoises, alligators, water serpents, timis, timīṅgalas, and timirapīṅgalas.<sup>165</sup>

At an earlier time the fool, out of greedy attachment to tasty food, engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of that reason, with the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn among animals that are born in water, grow up in water, and die in water. Such is the suffering of animals.

Monks, how is the suffering of animals? Some living beings are reborn among animals that eat by chewing on fresh grass, shrubs, and trees. Which [animals] are they? They are elephants, horses, camels, cows, donkeys, deer, water buffalo, and swine.

At an earlier time the fool, out of greedy attachment to tasty food, engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of that reason, with the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn among animals that eat by chewing fresh grass, shrubs, and trees. Such is the suffering of animals.

Monks, how is the suffering of animals? Some living beings are reborn among animals that, on smelling the odor of human feces and urine, run toward it and eat it as food.

It is just as boys and girls, on smelling the odor of food and drink, run toward it [saying,] “That is food, that is food!”<sup>166</sup>

In the same way, monks, some living beings are reborn among animals that, on smelling the odor of human feces and urine, run toward it and eat it as food. Which [animals] are they? They are chickens, pigs, dogs, jackals, crows, and [the animals called] julouluo and julengjia.<sup>167</sup>

At an earlier time the fool, out of greedy attachment to tasty food, engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of that reason, with the breaking up of the body at death he is reborn among animals that feed on excrement and filth. Such is the suffering of animals.

Monks, I could with countless skillful means describe to you those animals and describe the situation of animals; but the suffering of animals cannot be completely described, since the life of animals is pure suffering.

Monks, for the fool to emerge from being an animal and return to be born as a human being is extremely difficult. Why is that? Among animals there is no practice of benevolence and virtue. They do not act according to the principles of proper conduct. They do not act in a refined and wholesome way. Those animals eat one another. The strong eat the weak; the big eat the small.

Monks, it is as if this earth were completely immersed in water and there were a blind turtle with a life span of countless hundreds and thousands of years; and on the surface of the water, being blown about by the wind, there were a small, light wooden plank with just a single hole through it. Monks, what do you think? Would the head of that blind turtle get to go into the single hole in that small, light wooden plank?

The monks replied, “World-honored One, it might get to go into it, but only after a very long time and with great difficulty.”

The World-honored One said:

761c

Monks, perhaps after a hundred years have passed the blind turtle, coming from the east, raises its head once, [but] that small wooden plank with just a single hole has been blown by an easterly wind toward the south.

Perhaps after a hundred years have passed the blind turtle, coming from the south, raises its head once, [but] that plank with a single hole has been blown by a southerly wind toward the west.

Perhaps after a hundred years have passed the blind turtle, coming from the west, raises its head once, [but] that plank with a single hole has been blown by a westerly wind toward the north. Perhaps after a hundred years have passed the blind turtle, coming from the north, raises its head once, [but] that plank with a single hole has been blown by a northerly wind in all directions. Monks, what do you think? Would the head of that blind turtle get to go into the one hole in this plank?

The monks replied, “World-honored One, it might get to go into it, but only after a very long time and with great difficulty.”

[The World-honored One said]:

Monks, in the same way, for the fool to emerge from being an animal and return to be born as a human being is extremely difficult. Why is that? Among animals there is no practice of benevolence and virtue. They do not act according to the principles of proper conduct; they do not act in a refined and wholesome way. Those animals eat one another. The strong eat the weak; the big eat the small.

Monks, if the fool at some time emerges from being an animal and returns to be born as a human being, then he will be in some inferior family of a lowly clan, debased and poor, with meager food and drink, getting food only with great difficulty.

Which are such [families]? They are families of prison guards, workers, artisans, and potters, such relatively lowly families that are debased and poor, with meager food and drink, getting food only with great difficulty.

Born into such a family, at birth he may be blind, or lame, or with a withered arm, or hunchbacked, or left-handed, with a bad complexion, having a face like a sheep, ugly, of short life span, and at the service of others. He engages in evil bodily conduct, engages in evil verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of that reason, with the breaking up of the body at death he will again go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell.

It is like two men gambling. One of them, on making his first draw, acts in such a way that he loses his male and female servants and loses his wife and children. [Then after] drawing again [and losing] he is hung upside down in a smoke-filled room [as punishment for nonpayment]. He thinks, “I have nothing to eat or drink. On my first draw I acted in such a way that I lost my male and female servants and lost my wife and children. [Then after] drawing again, I was hung upside down in a smoke-filled room.”

Monks, this way of acting—[whereby] he lost his male and female servants, lost his wife and children, and [then after] drawing again, was hung upside down in a smoke-filled room—is trifling [compared with] the ways of acting one might engage in, namely engaging in evil bodily conduct, engaging in evil verbal and mental conduct. Monks, having engaged in evil bodily conduct, engaged in evil verbal and mental conduct, because of this, conditioned by this, with the breaking up of the body at death one will go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. 762a

Monks, these ways of acting are most unwished for, truly displeasing, not such as the mind would think about. Monks, have I not taught you completely about the nature of foolishness?

The monks replied, “Yes, the World-honored One has indeed taught us completely about the nature of foolishness.”

The World-honored One said:

What is the nature of wisdom? The wise man has three characteristics that mark him as wise, that show him to be wise, and possessing which he qualifies as a wise man and is said to be wise. What are the three? It is because a wise man thinks wholesome thoughts, speaks wholesome speech, and does wholesome deeds that he is a wise man and is said to be wise.

If a wise man did not think wholesome thoughts, did not speak wholesome speech, and did not do wholesome deeds, then he would not be reckoned a wise man and said to be wise. It is because a wise man thinks wholesome thoughts, speaks wholesome speech, and does wholesome deeds that he is reckoned a wise man and is said to be wise.

Right here and now the wise man experiences three types of delight in body and mind. What are the three types of delight in body and mind that a wise man experiences right here and now?

Whatever the wise man is doing, be it sitting in an assembly meeting, or being in a street or alley, or in a marketplace, or at a crossroads, there is talk about matters relating to wise men: “A wise man has abandoned killing and abstains from killing . . . taking what is not given . . . engaging in sexual misconduct . . . speaking falsehood . . . up to . . . has abandoned wrong view and acquired right view; and he possesses countless other wholesome qualities.”<sup>168</sup> Having seen that someone possesses countless wholesome qualities, other persons praise him.

Hearing this, the wise man then thinks, “Having seen that someone possesses countless wholesome qualities, other people praise him. I too possess these countless wholesome qualities. If they knew, they would praise me.” This is the first type of delight in body and mind that a wise man experiences right here and now.

Again, a wise man sees the king’s men arresting a criminal and subjecting him to various kinds of painful punishment: cutting off his hands, cutting off his feet, cutting off both his hands and his feet, cutting off his ears, cutting off his nose, cutting off both his ears and his nose; or slicing strips off him, or tearing out his beard, or tearing out his hair, or tearing out both his beard and his hair; or putting him in a cage and setting fire to his clothes; or wrapping him in straw and setting fire to it; or placing him in the belly of the “iron donkey,” or in the mouth of the “iron pig,” or in the mouth of the “iron tiger,” and then heating it over a fire; or placing him in a copper cauldron or an iron cauldron and stewing him; or cutting him into pieces, or stabbing him with a sharp fork, or hooking him with iron hooks, or laying him down on an iron bed and scalding him with boiling oil, or seating him in an iron mortar and pounding him with an iron pestle, or having him be bitten by poisonous snakes, or whipping him with whips, or beating him with sticks, or hitting him with clubs, or impaling him alive, or cutting off his head.

762b

Seeing this, the wise man thinks, “Being known to the king and arrested for possessing countless evil and unwholesome qualities, one would be subjected to such punishment. I do not possess these countless evil and unwholesome qualities. If the king came to know this, he would certainly not have me subjected to such punishment.” Such is the second type of delight in body and mind that a wise man experiences right here and now.

Again, the wise man engages in sublime bodily conduct, engages in sublime verbal and mental conduct. Suppose he becomes sick and experiences pain. As he is sitting or lying on a bed, or sitting or lying on a bench, or sitting or lying on the ground, great pain, extreme suffering arises in his body such as to make him wish to end his life. At that time his sublime bodily conduct, sublime verbal and mental conduct hangs over him.

It is just as in the late afternoon when the sun is going down behind a tall mountain, the shadow hangs over the ground. In the same way his sublime bodily conduct, sublime verbal and mental conduct hangs over him at that time. He thinks, “This is my sublime bodily conduct, sublime verbal and mental conduct hanging over me. In former times I have not done what is evil; I have done much that is meritorious. If there is a place for those who have not done evil, who have not been fierce and brutal, who have not been unprincipled in their affairs, who have done what is meritorious, done what is wholesome, who have made for themselves a lifelong reliable refuge from fear, then I will be going to that good place.”

From this arises absence of regret; and absence of regret having arisen, [he knows] he will die worthy, his life will end in a wholesome way. This is the third type of delight in body and mind that a wise man experiences right here and now.

Again, the wise man engages in sublime bodily conduct, engages in sublime verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in sublime bodily conduct, engaged in sublime verbal and mental conduct, because of that reason, with the breaking up of the body at death he will certainly ascend to a good destiny and be reborn up in heaven. On being reborn in heaven he will experience a happy fruition, which is entirely wanted, entirely pleasing, such that the mind likes to think about.

If one thinks, “‘Entirely wanted, entirely pleasing, such that the mind likes to think about,’ then this is said about the good realms of existence. Why is that? The good realms of existence are entirely wanted, entirely pleasing, such as the mind likes to think about.”

At that time one monk rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said, “World-honored One, how is the happiness in the good realms of existence?”

The World-honored One replied:

Monk, the good realms of existence cannot be completely described—that is, the happiness in the good realms of existence. The good realms of existence are pure happiness.

The monk asked again, “World-honored One, can the meaning of this be expressed through a simile?”

The World-honored One replied:

762c The meaning of this can be expressed through a simile. It is just as when a wheel-turning monarch possesses the seven treasures and the four types of human supernormal power.<sup>169</sup> Monk, what do you think? Possessing the seven treasures and the four types of human supernormal power, would the wheel-turning monarch because of that experience supreme delight in body and mind?

The monk replied:

World-honored One, possessing one treasure or one human supernormal power, one would already experience supreme delight. How could the wheel-turning monarch not be supremely delighted at possessing the seven treasures and the four types of human supernormal power?

Then the World-honored One took in his hand a pebble as small as a pea and said, “Monks, do you see the pebble, small as a pea, that I have taken in my hand?”

The monks replied, “We see it, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One asked them further:

Monks, what do you think? If this pebble, small as a pea, that I have taken in my hand is compared with the Himalaya, king of mountains, which is the larger?

The monks replied:

Compared with the pebble, small as a pea, that the World-honored One has taken in his hand, the Himalaya, king of mountains, is a hundred times larger, a thousand times, ten thousand, a hundred thousand times larger, immeasurably, incalculably, incomparably larger, larger beyond reckoning, since the Himalaya, king of mountains, is extremely large, exceedingly large.

The World-honored One said:

Monks, it is just as, compared with the pebble, small as a pea, that I have taken in my hand, the Himalaya, king of mountains, is a hundred times larger, a thousand times larger, ten thousand, a hundred thousand times larger, immeasurably, incalculably, incomparably larger, larger beyond reckoning, since the Himalaya, king of mountains, is extremely large, exceedingly large.

In the same way, monks, compared with the supreme delight in body and mind experienced by the wheel-turning monarch who possesses the seven treasures and the four types of human supernormal power, the divine happiness of the good realms of existence is a hundred times greater, a thousand times, ten thousand, a hundred thousand times greater, immeasurably, incalculably, incomparably greater, since the good realms of existence are pure happiness.

Monks, how is the happiness in the good realms of existence? There is a good destiny called the Six Sensory Contacts.<sup>170</sup> When living beings are reborn in it, as soon as they have been born there, the forms they see with their eyes are enjoyable, likable. [Finding them] truly enjoyable, likable, the mind desires them; they are truly desirable. The mind delights in them, as they are truly delightful.

The sounds they hear with the ear . . . the odors they smell with the nose . . . the flavors they taste with the tongue . . . the tangibles they feel with the body . . . the mind-objects they cognize with their minds are enjoyable, likable. [Finding them] truly enjoyable, likable, the mind desires them; they are truly desirable. The mind delights in them, as they are truly delightful. Such is the happiness of the good realms of existence.

Monks, I could with countless skillful means describe to you those good realms of existence, and describe the situation in those good realms of existence; but the happiness in those good realms of existence cannot be completely described, since the good realms of existence are pure happiness.

Monks, the wise man may at some time come down from the good realms of existence to be reborn among human beings. The family [into which he is born] is one that enjoys extremely great riches, immeasurable wealth, with an abundance of all kinds of livestock, feudal lands, and manors, with plenty of rice and other grains, and with all the various requisites of life.

763a

Which are [these families]? They are families of great warrior householders, families of great brahmin householders, families of great merchant householders, and others that enjoy extremely great riches, immeasurable wealth, with an abundance of all kinds of livestock, feudatories, and manors, with plenty of rice and other grains, and with all the various requisites of life.

Being born into such a family, he is good-looking and lovable, respected by many people, extremely famous, greatly powerful, loved by many people, and thought of by many people. He engages in sublime bodily conduct, engages in sublime verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in sublime bodily conduct, engaged in sublime verbal and mental conduct, because of this, conditioned by this, with the breaking up of the body at death, he will in turn go to a good destiny, being reborn in heaven.

It is like two men gambling. One of them, on making his first draw, acts in such a way that he gains much wealth. He thinks, “I did not work in the fields, yet on making my first draw I acted in such a way that I gained much wealth.”

Monks, this way of acting, [whereby] he gained much wealth, is trivial [compared with] these [other] ways of acting, namely engaging in sublime bodily conduct, engaging in sublime verbal and mental conduct. Having engaged in sublime bodily conduct, engaged in sublime verbal and mental conduct, because of this, conditioned by this, with the breaking up of the body at death one will in turn go to a good destiny, being reborn in heaven.

Monks, these ways of acting are highly wanted, most pleasing, such that the mind would most like to think about. Monks, have I not taught you completely about the nature of being a wise man?

The monks replied, “Yes, the World-honored One has indeed taught us completely about the nature of being a wise man.”

The World-honored One said:

Such is the nature of a fool and the nature of a wise man. You should understand the nature of a fool and the nature of a wise man. Having understood the nature of a fool and the nature of a wise man, give up the nature of a fool and take up the nature of a wise man! You should train yourselves in this way.<sup>171</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

200. The Discourse on [the Monk] Ariṭṭha<sup>172</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park. 763b

At that time the monk Ariṭṭha, a former vulture killer, had given rise to this evil view: "As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality."

On hearing this, the monks approached the monk Ariṭṭha and asked him, "Ariṭṭha, is it true that you say this: 'As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality'?"

Then Ariṭṭha replied, "Venerable ones, it is true that, as I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality."

The monks reprimanded Ariṭṭha, saying:

You, should not say this! Do not misrepresent the World-honored One! It is not good to misrepresent the World-honored One. The World-honored One does not say this. Ariṭṭha, there is obstruction in sensuality. The World-honored One has with countless skillful means spoken of the obstruction in sensuality.<sup>173</sup> Ariṭṭha, you should quickly give up this evil view.

[Despite] being reprimanded by the monks, the monk Ariṭṭha held on strongly to this evil view and one-sidedly stated, "This is true. Anything else is false." [The exchange] went like this three times.

Being unable to get the monk Ariṭṭha to give up this evil view, those many monks rose from their seats and left. They approached the Buddha, paid homage with their heads at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. They said:

World-honored One, the monk Ariṭṭha has given rise to this evil view:

“As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality.”

World-honored One, on hearing this, we approached the monk Ariṭṭha and asked him, “Ariṭṭha, is it true that you say this: ‘As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality’?”

The monk Ariṭṭha answered us, saying, “Venerable ones, it is true that, as I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality.”

World-honored One, we reprimanded him, saying, “Ariṭṭha, you should not say this! Do not misrepresent the World-honored One! It is not good to misrepresent the World-honored One. The World-honored One does not say this. Ariṭṭha, there is obstruction in sensuality. The World-honored One has with countless skillful means spoken of the obstruction in sensuality. Ariṭṭha, you should quickly give up this evil view.”

[Despite] being reprimanded by us, he held on strongly to this evil view and one-sidedly stated, “This is true; anything else is false.” [The exchange] went like this three times. Being unable to get the monk Ariṭṭha to give up this evil view, we rose from our seats and left.

763c On hearing this, the World-honored One told one monk, “Approach the monk Ariṭṭha and say this: ‘The World-honored One summons you.’”

Then [that] one monk, having received the instruction from the World-honored One, rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. Approaching the monk Ariṭṭha, he said to him, “The World-honored One summons you.”

The monk Ariṭṭha approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side.

The World-honored One asked him, “Ariṭṭha, is it true that you say this: ‘As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality’?”

Ariṭṭha replied, “World-honored One, it is true that, as I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, there is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality.”

The World-honored One reprimanded him, saying:

Ariṭṭha, how is it that you understand the Dharma taught by me in this way? From whose mouth have you heard that I teach the Dharma in this way? You foolish man! How is it that you say one-sidedly what I have not said one-sidedly? You foolish man! On hearing the reprimand by all the monks, you should then have answered according to the Dharma. I shall now ask the monks about this.

Then the World-honored One asked the monks, “Do you too similarly understand the Dharma taught by me in this way: ‘There is no obstruction in engaging in sensuality’?”

Then the monks replied, “We do not.”

The World-honored One asked them, “How do you understand the Dharma taught by me?”

The monks replied:

We understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One in this way: “There is obstruction in sensuality.” The World-honored One has taught that sensuality is an obstruction.

Sensuality is like a skeleton; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like a skeleton. Sensuality is like a piece of meat; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like a piece of meat. Sensuality is like a torch; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like a torch.

Sensuality is like a fiery pit; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like a fiery pit. Sensuality is like a poisonous snake; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like a poisonous snake. Sensuality is like a dream; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like a dream. Sensuality is like borrowed goods; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like borrowed goods. Sensuality is like fruit on a tree; the World-honored One has taught that sensuality is like fruit on a tree.<sup>174</sup> In this way we understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One.

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, monks, that you understand me to have taught the Dharma in this way. Why is that?

I do indeed say that there is obstruction in sensuality; I teach that sensuality is an obstruction. Sensuality is like a skeleton; I teach that sensuality is like a skeleton. Sensuality is like a piece of meat; I teach that sensuality is like a piece of meat. Sensuality is like a torch; I teach that sensuality is like a torch.

764a Sensuality is like a fiery pit; I teach that sensuality is like a fiery pit. Sensuality is like a poisonous snake; I teach that sensuality is like a poisonous snake. Sensuality is like a dream; I teach that sensuality is like a dream. Sensuality is like borrowed goods; I teach that sensuality is like borrowed goods. Sensuality is like fruit on a tree; I teach that sensuality is like fruit on a tree.

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, that you understand me to have taught the Dharma in this way.<sup>175</sup> But this fool Ariṭṭha has a confused grasp of both the meaning and the phrasing [of it]. Because he has his own confused grasp of it, he misrepresents me and harms himself. He commits a transgression and an offense. He is doing a disfavor to his wise companions in the holy life, and has committed a serious offense. You foolish man! Do you understand this evil and unwholesome situation?<sup>176</sup>

Then the monk Ariṭṭha, having been rebuked to his face by the World-honored One, felt sad and distressed. He hung his head in silence, unable to reply, as if immersed in thought.

Then the World-honored One, having rebuked the monk Ariṭṭha to his face, said to the monks:

If you completely understand the meaning of the teachings taught by me, then you should remember them in this way. If you do not completely understand the meaning of the teachings taught by me, then you should ask me or your wise companions in the holy life. Why is that?

[It is because] there may be a fool with a confused grasp of the meaning and phrasing [of the teachings] who, because of his own confused grasp, has such and such an understanding of those teachings, that is, of the discourses (sutta), stanzas (geyya), expositions (veyyākaraṇa), verses (gāthā), causes (nidāna), inspired utterances (udāna), heroic tales (apadāna), [what has been] “thus said” (itivuttaka), birth stories (jātaka), answers to questions (vedalla), marvels (abbhutadhamma), and explanations of meaning (upadesa).<sup>177</sup>

He argues, [claiming] that he understands their meaning. Without having grasped them, he says that he has understood their meaning.<sup>178</sup> His professed understanding of these teachings does not get at their meaning. Instead he experiences much suffering and tires himself for nothing. Why is that? It is because of his confused grasp of the teachings.

He is like a man who, wishing to catch a snake, goes in search of a snake. As he searches for a snake while walking in the jungle, he sees a very big snake. Then, [approaching it] from the front, he grasps its middle part with his hands. The snake turns around, raises its head, and bites his hands, feet, and other limbs. That man is unable to get the snake for the sake of which he went searching; he does not get that benefit. Instead he experiences extreme suffering and tires himself for nothing. Why is that? It is because he does not properly understand the method for grasping snakes.

In the same way there may be a fool with a confused grasp of the meaning and phrasing [of the teachings] who, because of his own confused grasp, has such and such an understanding of those teachings, that is, of the discourses, stanzas, expositions, verses, causes, inspired utterances, heroic tales, [what has been] “thus said,” birth stories, answers to questions, marvels, and explanations of meaning.

He argues, [claiming] that he understands their meaning. Without having grasped them, he says that he has understood their meaning. His professed understanding of these teachings does not get at their meaning. Instead he experiences extreme suffering and tires himself for nothing. Why is that? It is because of his confused grasp of the teachings.

There may [however], be a clansman who is not confused and has a good grasp of the meaning and phrasing [of the teachings] who, because he is not confused and has a good grasp of them, has such and such an understanding of the teachings, that is, of discourses, stanzas, expositions, verses, causes, inspired utterances, heroic tales, [what has been] “thus said,” birth stories, answers to questions, marvels, and explanations of meaning.

764b

He does not argue, [not claiming] that he understands their meaning. Only after having grasped them does he say that he has understood their meaning. His professed understanding of these teachings gets at their meaning. He does not experience extreme suffering and also does not tire himself. Why is that? It is because he does not have a confused grasp of the teachings.

He is like a man who, wishing to catch a snake, goes in search of a snake. While he is searching for a snake, holding an iron staff and walking in the jungle, he sees a very big snake. He first holds down the snake's head with the iron staff, then he grasps its head with his hand. Although that snake opposes him and coils its tail around his hands, feet, and other limbs, it cannot bite him. That man is able to catch the snake for the sake of which he went searching. He achieves this purpose, does not experience extreme suffering, and also does not tire himself. Why is that? It is because he properly understands the method for grasping snakes.

In the same way, there may be a clansman who is not confused and has a good grasp of the meaning and the phrasing [of the teachings] who, because he is not confused and has a good grasp of them, has such and such an understanding of the teachings, that is, of the discourses, stanzas, expositions, verses, causes, inspired utterances, heroic tales, [what has been] "thus said," birth stories, answers to questions, marvels, and explanations of meaning.

He does not argue [claiming] that he understands their meaning. Only after having grasped them does he say that he has understood their meaning. His professed understanding of these teachings gets at their meaning. He does not experience extreme suffering and also does not tire himself. Why is that? It is because he does not have a confused grasp of the teachings.

I have long taught you the teachings as resembling a raft, wanting you to give them up, not wanting you to cling to them. Why have I long taught you the teachings as resembling a raft, wanting you to give them up, not wanting you to cling to them?

It is just as if there were a mountain river, very deep and extremely wide, a long stream with a swift current, and with much material floating in it, also with no ferry boat and no bridge. Suppose a man comes along who has a matter to attend to on the other bank and wants to cross over. As he is seeking [a means] to cross over, he thinks, "Now, this mountain river is very deep and extremely wide, a long stream with a swift current, and with much material floating in it, also with no ferry boat and no bridge. I have a matter to attend to on the other bank and want to cross over. By what skillful means can I safely reach the other bank?" He further thinks, "Let me now gather grass and sticks on this bank, bind them together into a raft, and having boarded it, cross over."

So he gathers grass and sticks on the [near] bank, binds them together into a raft and, having boarded it, crosses over. Having safely arrived there, he thinks, “Now, this raft has been of much benefit to me. Boarding this raft has enabled me to cross over safely from that bank to this bank. Let me now, putting it on my right shoulder or on my head, carry it along as I go.” He then puts the raft on his right shoulder or on his head to carry it along as he goes. 764c

What do you think? With such an idea,<sup>179</sup> would he derive benefit from doing this with the raft?

Then the monks replied, “He could not.”

The World-honored One said:

Doing what with the raft could that man derive benefit? The man thinks [again], “Now, I have derived much benefit from this raft. Boarding this raft has enabled me to cross over safely from that bank to this bank. Should I now rather put this raft back in the water or put it on the bank, abandon it there, and go?” So the man puts the raft back in the water or puts it on the bank, abandons it there, and goes. What do you think? Would he derive benefit from doing this with the raft?

Then the monks replied, “He benefits.”

The World-honored One said:

In the same way, I have long taught you the teachings as resembling a raft, wanting you to [be prepared to] let go of them, not wanting you to cling to them. If you understand that I have long taught you the teachings as resembling a raft, then you should [be prepared to] let go of these teachings; how much more so [should you let go of] whatever is contrary to these teachings.

Again, there are six occasions for views.<sup>180</sup> What are the six? Whatever bodily form, past, future, or present, internal or external, subtle or gross, sublime or not sublime, near or far—all of that does not belong to me; I am not that; and it is not my self. Wisely contemplating in this way, a monk knows it as it really is.

Whatever feeling . . . whatever perception . . . [whatever formations]<sup>181</sup> . . . whatever view that “That does not belong to me, I am not that, I shall not exist, I shall not possess [anything]”—all of that does not belong to me, I do not belong to that, and it is not my self.<sup>182</sup> Wisely contemplating in this way, he knows it as it really is.

Whatever view, what is seen, heard, cognized, and known, what is obtained, what is observed, what is reflected on by the mind, what goes from this world to that world and from that world to this world—all of that does not belong to me; I am not that, and it is not my self. Wisely contemplating in this way, he knows it as it really is.

Whatever view that “This is the self, this is the world, this I am; in the next world I shall exist eternally, without change, permanent, not subject to wearing out and extinction”—all of that does not belong to me. I am not that, and it is not my self. Wisely contemplating in this way, he knows it as it really is.

At this, one monk rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said, “World-honored One, can there be fear due to an internal cause?”

765a The World-honored One replied, “There can be.”

The monk asked further, “World-honored One, how can there be fear due to an internal cause?”

The World-honored One replied:

Monk, someone has a view like this and speaks like this, “That which I lacked in former times, suppose I cannot get it [now].” Having a view like this and speaking like this, he becomes worried and vexed. He wails, beats his breast, and is deranged. Monk, in this way there can be fear due to an internal cause.<sup>183</sup>

The monk, having praised the World-honored One, asked further, “World-honored One, can there be absence of fear due to an internal cause?”

The World-honored One replied, “There can be.”

The monk asked again, “World-honored One, how can there be absence of fear due to an internal cause?”

The World-honored One replied:

Monk, someone does not have a view like this and does not speak like this: “That which I lacked in former times, suppose I cannot get it [now].” Not having a view like this and not speaking like this, he is not worried and not vexed. He does not wail, does not beat his breast, and is not deranged. Monk, in this way there can be absence of fear due to an internal cause.

The monk, having praised the World-honored One, asked further, “World-honored One, can there be fear due to an external cause?”

The World-honored One replied, “There can be.”

The monk asked further, “World-honored One, how can there be fear due to an external cause?”

The World-honored One replied:

Monk, someone has a view like this and speaks like this: “This is the self, this is the world, this am I. In the next world I shall exist.”

Having a view like this and speaking like this, he encounters the Tathāgata, or he encounters a disciple of the Tathāgata who is intelligent, wise, eloquent, and accomplished in wisdom. He is taught by the Tathāgata or by a disciple of the Tathāgata a teaching for the eradication of all identity. He is taught a teaching for the abandoning of all taints, of all “I”-[making] and “mine”-making, and for the eradication of the underlying tendency to conceit.

When he is taught by the Tathāgata or by a disciple of the Tathāgata a teaching for the eradication of all identity, a teaching for the abandoning of all taints, of all “I”-[making] and “mine”-making, and for the eradication of the underlying tendency to conceit, he becomes worried and vexed. He wails, beats his breast, and is deranged. He speaks in this way: “I will be destroyed and will no longer exist.” Why is that?

What that monk has said [appears to him] for a long time undesirable, displeasing, and unthinkable. What that monk has practiced much makes him become worried and vexed, makes him wail, beat his breast, and become deranged. In this way, monk, there can be fear due to an external cause.

The monk, having praised the World-honored One, asked further, “World-honored One, can there be absence of fear due to an external cause?”

The World-honored One replied, “There can be.”

The monk asked further, “World-honored One, how can there be absence of fear due to an external cause?”

The World-honored One replied:

765b Monk, someone does not have a view like this and does not speak like this: “This is the self, this is the world, this am I. In the next world I shall exist.”

Not having a view like this and not speaking like this, he encounters the Tathāgata or he encounters a disciple of the Tathāgata who is intelligent, wise, eloquent, and accomplished in wisdom. He is taught by the Tathāgata or by a disciple of the Tathāgata a teaching for the eradication of all identity, for the abandoning of all taints, of all “I”-[making] and “mine”-making, and for the eradication of the underlying tendency to conceit.

When he is taught by the Tathāgata or by a disciple of the Tathāgata a teaching for the eradication of all identity, a teaching for the abandoning of all taints, of all “I”-[making] and “mine”-making, for the eradication of the underlying tendency to conceit, then he is not worried and not vexed, does not wail, does not beat his breast, and is not deranged. He does not speak like this: “I will be destroyed and will no longer exist.” Why is that?

What that monk has said [appears to him] for a long time desirable, pleasing, memorable. What the monk has practiced much makes him not become worried, not vexed, not wailing, not beating his breast, and not deranged. In this way, monk, there can be absence of fear due to an external cause.

Then the monk praised the World-honored One saying, “It is well, it is well.” Having praised [the Buddha, saying] “It is well,” having heard what the Buddha had said, he received and retained it well for reciting, and then fell silent.

At this the World-honored One praised the monks, saying:

It is well, it is well, monks, could one cling to something conducive to clinging in such a way that, having clung to it, one would not become worried, not become vexed, not wail, not beat one’s breast, and not become deranged? Do you see anything conducive to clinging that one could cling to yet not become worried, not become vexed, not wail, not beat one’s breast, and not become deranged?

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised the monks, saying:

It is well, it is well, could one be dependent on a view that is conducive to dependence such that, being dependent on that view, one would not become worried, not become vexed, not wail, not beat one’s breast, and not become deranged? Do you see any view conducive to dependence that one could be dependent on yet not become worried, not become vexed, not wail, not beat one's breast, and not become deranged?

The monks replied, "We do not, World-honored One."

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well. You could cling to a body if it were a body such as remains permanently without change, not of a nature to wear out and cease. [But] do you see a body that you could cling to, a body such as remains permanently without change, not of a nature to wear out and cease?

The monks replied, "No, World-honored One."

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well. It is said [by some] that the "I" exists because of the self, that without a self there is no "I."<sup>184</sup> Yet, this self and what belongs to a self cannot be found, cannot be designated; and the existence in the mind of a [legitimate] occasion for views, for bondage, attachment, and underlying tendencies also cannot be found, cannot be designated. Monks, is this not just like the view proposed and held continuously as his view by the monk Ariṭṭha, the former vulture killer? 765c

The monks replied, "It is like this, World-honored One. It is just like the view proposed and held continuously as his view by the monk Ariṭṭha, the former vulture killer."

[The Buddha said:]

Again, there are six occasions for views.<sup>185</sup> What are the six? Monks, whatever bodily form, past, future, or present, internal or external, subtle or gross, sublime or not sublime, near or far—all of that does not belong to me, I am not that, and it is not my self. Wisely contemplating in this way, one knows it as it really is.

Whatever feeling . . . whatever perception . . . [whatever formation] . . . whatever view that "that does not belong to me,<sup>186</sup> I am not that, I shall not exist, I shall not possess [anything]"—all of "that does not belong to me, I am not that, and it is not my self." Wisely contemplating in this way, one knows it as it really is.

Whatever view, what is seen, heard, cognized, and known, what is received, what is observed, what is reflected on by the mind, what goes from this world to that world, and what goes from that world to this world—all of that does not belong to me, I do not belong to that, and it is not my self. Wisely contemplating in this way, one knows it as it really is.

Whatever view that “this is the self, this is the world, this I am; in the next world I shall exist eternally, without change, permanent, not of a nature to wear out and cease”—all of that does not belong to me, I am not that, and it is not my self. Wisely contemplating in this way, one knows it as it really is.

Whatever monk does not see these six occasions for views as a self and also does not see them as belonging to a self—not seeing them in this way, he does not cling to this world. Not clinging to this world, he is without fear. Through being without fear, he attains final nirvana, knowing as it really is: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

He is said to be a monk who has crossed over the moat, who has gone beyond the moat, who has demolished the wall, who is without a gate, who is a mirror of noble wisdom.

How has the monk crossed over the moat? The moat of ignorance has ceased to exist; it has been understood, cut off at its root, demolished, and will not arise again. This is how the monk has crossed over the moat.

How has the monk gone beyond the moat? Craving for becoming has ceased to exist; it has been understood, cut off at its root, demolished, and will not arise again. This is how the monk has gone beyond the moat.

How has the monk demolished the wall? The limitless [cycle of] birth and death has ceased to exist; it has been understood, cut off at its root, demolished, and will not arise again. This is how the monk has demolished the wall.

766a

How is the monk without a gate? The five lower fetters have ceased to exist; they have been understood, cut off at their root, demolished, and will not arise again. This is how the monk has attained the state of being without a gate.

How is the monk a mirror of noble wisdom? The “I am” conceit has ceased to exist; it has been understood, cut off at its root, demolished, and will not arise again. This is how the monk is a mirror of noble wisdom.

This is what is meant by a monk who has crossed over the moat, has gone beyond the moat, has demolished the wall, is without a gate, and is a mirror of noble wisdom.

In this way he is a rightly liberated tathāgata. Indra with his devas, Īsāna, and Brahmā with his assembly seek a basis on which the consciousness of a tathāgata depends, but are unable to find one. A tathāgata has become Brahmā, a tathāgata has become cool, a tathāgata is without heat, a tathāgata is not otherwise, it is like this, I say.

Renunciants and brahmins misrepresent me, saying what is false and untrue, namely, “The renunciant Gotama proclaims annihilation. He proclaims the cutting off and destruction of a truly existing living being.”

I do not make proclamations about what, in this context, is [in any case] devoid of self. I do, [however], proclaim the Thus-gone One to be without worry right here and now.<sup>187</sup>

If other persons curse the Tathāgata, strike the Tathāgata, and angrily criticize him, then the Tathāgata is not angry because of that. He is without hatred, ultimately having a mental attitude of nonharming.

If [other] persons curse the Tathāgata, strike him, or angrily criticize him, what is the mental attitude of the Tathāgata at that time? The Tathāgata thinks, “What I did in the past, what I created in the past: that is the cause of this.” The Tathāgata has this mental attitude toward those who curse the Tathāgata, strike him, or angrily criticize him.

If other persons revere the Tathāgata, support, respect, and esteem him, the Tathāgata is not joyful because of that, not delighted, not mentally happy because of that. If other persons revere the Tathāgata, support, respect, and esteem him, what is the mental attitude of the Tathāgata? The Tathāgata thinks, “What I have now come to understand and what I have abandoned: that is the cause of this.” The Tathāgata has this mental attitude if persons revere the Tathāgata, support, respect, and esteem him.

Then the World-honored One said to the monks:

Other persons may curse you, strike you, and angrily criticize you; or they may revere you, support, respect, and esteem you. You should not be angry because of that but should be without hatred, not giving rise to a mental attitude of harming; and you should also not be joyful and delighted, not becoming happy. Why is that? [You should think,] “We are without a self or what belongs to a self.”<sup>188</sup>

766b It is just as if right now, outside the gate of this Jeta’s Grove, other persons were to take away the parched grass and dried-up sticks to burn or to use as they wished. What do you think? Would that parched grass and those dried-up sticks think, “Other persons are taking us away to burn or to use as they wish”?<sup>189</sup>

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”
[The Buddha said:]

It is the same if other persons curse you, strike you, or angrily criticize you, or if they revere you, support, respect, and esteem you. You too should not be angry because of that but should be without hatred, not giving rise to a mental attitude of harm; and you should not be joyful and delighted, not becoming happy. Why is that? [You should think,] “We are without a self or what belongs to a self.”

My teaching is well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings. In my teaching, being thus well-spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings, those who are liberated through right wisdom, on passing away will not be designated, they are without limit.

My teaching is well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings. My teaching being thus well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings, those who have eradicated the five lower fetters will, on passing away, be born in between and attain final nirvana there, having attained the condition of nonreturning, not coming back to this world.

My teaching is well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings. My teaching being thus well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings, those who have eradicated three fetters and attenuated desire, anger, and delusion have attained once-returning and, after returning once [to dwell] among devas or human beings, will attain the ending of dukkha.

My teaching is well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings. My teaching being thus well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings, those who have eradicated three fetters, having attained stream-entry, will not fall into evil conditions, and are assured of progress toward full awakening after returning at most seven times to the realms of devas or human beings. Having returned [at most] seven times, they will attain the ending of dukkha.<sup>190</sup>

My teaching is well spoken, revealed and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings. My teaching being thus well spoken, revealed, and disseminated without deficiency, transmitted and propagated to devas and human beings, those who have faith and who delight in me will, on passing away, all be reborn in a good destiny, like those [mentioned] previously that have a remainder.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

766c

201. The Discourse on [the Monk] Sāti<sup>191</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the monk Sāti, the son of a fisherman, had given rise to this evil view: "As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another."

Having heard this, the [other] monks approached the monk Sāti and asked him:

Sāti, is it true that you say this: "As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another"?"

The monk Sāti replied:

Venerable ones, it is true that, as I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another.

Then the monks reprimanded the monk Sāti, saying:

You should not say this! Do not misrepresent the World-honored One! It is not good to misrepresent the World-honored One. The World-honored One does not say this. Monk Sāti, this present consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. The World-honored One has with countless skillful means stated that consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. The conditions being present, consciousness arises; the conditions being absent, it ceases. Monk Sāti, you should quickly give up this evil view.

[Despite] being reprimanded by the monks, the monk Sāti held on strongly to this evil view and one-sidedly stated, “This is true; anything else is false.” [The exchange] went like this three times.

Having been unable to get the monk Sāti to give up this evil view, the group of many monks rose from their seats and left. They approached the Buddha, paid homage with their heads at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. They said:

World-honored One, the monk Sāti has given rise to this evil view: “As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another.”

World-honored One, having heard this, we approached the monk Sāti and asked him, “Sāti, is it true that you say this: ‘As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another’?” The monk Sāti replied to us, “Venerable ones, it is true that, as I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another.”

World-honored One, we reprimanded him, saying, “Monk Sāti, you should not say this! Do not misrepresent the World-honored One! It is not good to misrepresent the World-honored One. The World-honored One does not say this. Monk Sāti, this present consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. The World-honored One has with countless skillful means stated that consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. The conditions being present, consciousness arises; the conditions being absent, it ceases. Monk Sāti, you should quickly give up this evil view.”

[Despite] being reprimanded by us, he strongly held on to this evil view and one-sidedly stated, “This is true; anything else is false.” [The exchange] went like this three times. World-honored One, being unable to get the monk Sāti to give up this evil view, we rose from our seats and left.

767a

Having heard this, the World-honored One told one monk, “You approach the monk Sāti and say this to him: ‘The World-honored One summons you.’”

Then that one monk, having received the instruction from the World-honored One, rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left. He approached the monk Sāti and said to him, “The World-honored One summons you.”

The monk Sāti approached the Buddha, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, stepped back, and sat to one side.

The World-honored One asked him:

Is it true that you say this: “As I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another”?

The monk Sāti replied:

World-honored One, it is true that, as I understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, it is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another.

The World-honored One asked him, “What is this consciousness?”

The monk Sāti replied:

World-honored One, this consciousness is what speaks, feels, acts, instructs, appears, and manifests; that is, it is what does good and evil deeds and experiences their results.

The World-honored One reprimanded him, saying:

Sāti, how is it that you understand the Dharma taught by me in this way? From whose mouth have you heard that I teach the Dharma in this way? You foolish man, how is it that you one-sidedly state what I have not stated one-sidedly? You foolish man, being reprimanded by all the monks who heard it, you should then have answered according to the Dharma. I shall now ask the monks about this.

Then the World-honored One asked the monks, “Do you too understand the Dharma taught by me in this way: ‘It is this present consciousness that will be reborn, not another’?”

Then the monks replied, “No.”

The World-honored One asked them, “How do you understand the Dharma taught by me?”

The monks replied:

As we understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One, consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. The World-honored One has taught that consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. The conditions being present, consciousness arises; the conditions being absent, it ceases. It is in this way that we understand the Dharma taught by the World-honored One.

The World-honored One praised them:

It is well, it is well, monks, that you understand the Dharma taught by me in this way. Why is that? I indeed say that consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. I have taught that consciousness arises subject to causes and conditions. The conditions being present, consciousness arises; the conditions being absent, it ceases. According to what conditions its arising, consciousness is called after that condition. [If] consciousness arises conditioned by the eye and visible forms, then the consciousness arisen in this way is called eye consciousness. In the same way, [if] consciousness arises conditioned by the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind and mind objects, the consciousness arisen in this way is called mind consciousness.<sup>192</sup>

It is just as with fire, according to what conditions its arising, it is called after that condition. A fire that arises conditioned by wood is called a wood fire. A fire conditioned by grass or by a dung heap is called a grass [fire] or a dung heap fire.

In the same way, according to what conditions its arising, consciousness is called after that condition. [If] consciousness arises conditioned by the eye and visible forms, the consciousness arisen in this way is called eye consciousness. In the same way, [if] consciousness arises conditioned by the ear . . . the nose . . . the tongue . . . the body . . . the mind and mind objects, the consciousness arisen in this way is called mind consciousness.

767b

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well that you understand me to have taught the Dharma in this way. But this fool, the monk Sāti, has a confused grasp of both the meaning and the phrasing [of it]. Because of his own confused grasp, he misrepresents me and harms himself. He commits a transgression and an offense. He is doing a disfavor to his wise companions in the holy life, and has committed a major offense. You foolish man, do you understand this evil, unwholesome situation?

Then the monk Sāti, having been rebuked to his face by the World-honored One, was sad and distressed. He hung his head in silence, unable to reply, as if immersed in thought.<sup>193</sup>

Then the World-honored One, having rebuked the monk Sāti to his face, said to the monks:

I shall teach you the ultimate Dharma, which is free from affliction and free from heat, permanent and unchanging, as it is contemplated by the wise. Listen closely, listen closely and pay proper attention.

Then the monks listened to receive the teaching.

The Buddha said, “Do you see that this <comes to be>?”<sup>194</sup>

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Do you see that this <comes to be due to nutriment>?”<sup>195</sup>

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Do you see that, once <nutriment> has ceased, all that <comes to be> is also of a nature to cease?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Do you see that this has <come to be>?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Do you see that this has <come to be due to nutriment>?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Do you see that <once nutriment has ceased>, all that has come to be is also of a nature to cease?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Are you in no doubt that this <comes to be>?”

The monks replied, “We are in no [doubt], World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Are you in no doubt that this <comes to be due to nutriment>?”

The monks replied, “We are in no [doubt], World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Are you in no doubt that once <nutriment> has ceased, all that has <come to be> is also of a nature to cease?”

The monks replied, “We are in no [doubt], World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “On thus wisely seeing as it really is that this <comes to be>, does all doubt cease?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “On thus wisely seeing as it really is that this <comes to be due to nutriment>, does all doubt cease?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “On thus wisely seeing as it really is that once <nutriment> has ceased, all that <come to be> is also of a nature to cease, does all doubt cease?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

767c The World-honored One said, “Are you in no doubt that this has <come to be>?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Are you in no doubt that this has <come to be due to nutriment>?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said, “Are you in no doubt that once <nutriment> has ceased, all that has <come to be> is also of a nature to cease?”

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well that you understand it in this way and see it in this way. If, [however], you were to say “This view of mine is so clear and pure!” and if you were to cling to it, cherish it, guard it, and be unwilling to let go of it, then would you have understood the teaching I have for a long time taught you about the Dharma as resembling a raft, as being for opening up a channel that had been blocked?<sup>196</sup>

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well that you understand it in this way and see it in this way. If you were to say “This view of mine is so clear and pure!” and yet you do not cling to it, do not cherish it, do not guard it, but are willing to let go of it, then would you have understood the teaching that I have for a long time taught you about the Dharma as resembling a raft, as being for opening up a channel that had been blocked?

The monks replied, “Yes, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them:

It is well, it is well, if heterodox practitioners come and ask you, “Venerable friends, as to this view of yours, so clear and pure, what is its meaning, what is its purpose, what is its virtue?”—how will you reply?<sup>197</sup>

The monks replied:

World-honored One, if heterodox practitioners come and ask us, “Venerable friends, as to this view of yours, so clear and pure, what is its meaning, what is its purpose, what is its virtue?”—then we will reply in this way: “Venerable friends, it is for the sake of disenchantment, for the sake of dispassion, for the sake of knowing and seeing as it really is.” World-honored One, if heterodox practitioners come and ask us, then we will reply in this way.

The World-honored One praised them, saying:

It is well, it is well, if heterodox practitioners come and ask you, then you should reply in this way. Why is that? [Because] this is what is to be explained and contemplated.

[Monks, you should contemplate the four nutriments]. The first is edible food, coarse and fine; the second is contact; the third is volition; and the fourth is consciousness.

What is the cause of these four nutriments, how do they arise, from what are they born, based on what do they exit? Those four nutriments are caused by craving, they arise from craving, from craving they are born, and based on craving they exist.

What is the cause of craving, how does it arise, from what is it born, based on what does it exit? Craving is caused by feeling, it arises from feeling, from feeling it is born, and based on feeling it exists.

What is the cause of feeling, how does it arise, from what is it born, based on what does it exit? Feeling is caused by contact, it arises from contact, from contact it is born, and based on contact it exists.

What is the cause of contact, how does it arise, from what is it born, based on what does it exit? Contact is caused by the six sense spheres, it arises from the six sense spheres, from the six sense spheres it is born, and based on the six sense spheres it exists.

768a What is the cause of the six sense spheres, how do they arise, from what are they born, based on what do they exit? The six sense spheres are caused by name-and-form, they arise from name-and-form, from name-and-form they are born, and based on name-and-form they exist.

What is the cause of name-and-form, how does it arise, from what is it born, based on what does it exit? Name-and-form is caused by consciousness, it arises from consciousness, from consciousness it is born, and based on consciousness it exists.

What is the cause of consciousness, how does it arise, from what is it born, based on what does it exit? Consciousness is caused by formations, it arises from formations, from formations it is born, and based on formations it exists.

What is the cause of formations, how do they arise, from what are they born, based on what do they exit? Formations are caused by ignorance, they arise from ignorance, from ignorance they are born, and based on ignorance they exist.

Thus, conditioned by ignorance there are formations; conditioned by formations there is consciousness; conditioned by consciousness there is name-and-form; conditioned by name-and-form there are the six sense spheres; conditioned by the six sense spheres there is contact; conditioned by contact there is feeling; conditioned by feeling there is craving; conditioned by craving there is clinging; conditioned by clinging there is becoming; conditioned by becoming there is birth; conditioned by birth there is old age and death, worry and sadness, crying and weeping, sorrow and pain, dejection and vexation. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha arises.<sup>198</sup>

Conditioned by birth there is old age and death. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by birth there is old age and death?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by birth there is old age and death; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by birth there is indeed old age and death.

[The Buddha said,] “Conditioned by becoming there is birth. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by becoming there is birth?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by becoming there is birth; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by becoming there is indeed birth.<sup>199</sup>

[The Buddha said,] “Conditioned by clinging there is becoming. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by clinging there is becoming?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by clinging there is becoming; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by clinging there is indeed becoming.

[The Buddha said,] “Conditioned by craving there is clinging. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by craving there is clinging?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by craving there is clinging; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by craving there is indeed clinging.

[The Buddha said,] “Conditioned by feeling there is craving. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by feeling there is craving?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by feeling there is craving; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by feeling there is indeed craving.

[The Buddha said,] “Conditioned by contact there is feeling. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by contact there is feeling?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by contact there is feeling; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by contact there is indeed feeling.

[The Buddha said:]

768b Conditioned by the six sense spheres there is contact. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by the six sense spheres there is contact?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by the six sense spheres there is contact; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by the six sense spheres there is indeed contact.

[The Buddha said:]

Conditioned by name-and-form there are the six sense spheres. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by name-and-form there are the six sense spheres?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by name-and-form there are the six sense spheres; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by name-and-form there are indeed the six sense spheres.

[The Buddha said:]

Conditioned by consciousness there is name-and-form. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by consciousness there is name-and-form?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by consciousness there is name-and-form; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by consciousness there is indeed name-and-form.

[The Buddha said,] “Conditioned by formations there is consciousness. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by formations there is consciousness?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by formations there is consciousness; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by formations there is indeed consciousness.

[The Buddha said,] “Conditioned by ignorance there are formations. What do you think regarding this statement that conditioned by ignorance there are formations?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, conditioned by ignorance there are formations; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] conditioned by ignorance there are indeed formations.

Thus, conditioned by ignorance there are formations; conditioned by formations there is consciousness; conditioned by consciousness there is name-and-form; conditioned by name-and-form there are the six sense spheres; conditioned by the six sense spheres there is contact; conditioned by contact there is feeling; conditioned by feeling there is craving; conditioned by craving there is clinging; conditioned by clinging there is becoming; conditioned by becoming there is birth; conditioned by birth there is old age and death, worry and sadness, crying and weeping, sorrow and pain, dejection and vexation. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha arises.

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well, monks, that you say this. Why is that? [Because] I too say this:<sup>200</sup> conditioned by ignorance there are formations; conditioned by formations there is consciousness; conditioned by consciousness there is name-and-form; conditioned by name-and-form there are the six sense spheres; conditioned by the six sense spheres there is contact; conditioned by contact there is feeling; conditioned by feeling there is craving; conditioned by craving there is clinging; conditioned by clinging there is becoming; conditioned by becoming there is birth; conditioned by birth there is old age and death, worry and sadness, crying and weeping, sorrow and pain, dejection and vexation. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha arises.

With the cessation of birth, old age and death cease. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of birth, old age and death cease?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of birth, old age and death cease; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of birth, old age and death do indeed cease.

[The Buddha said,] “With the cessation of becoming, birth ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of becoming, birth ceases?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of becoming, birth ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of becoming, birth does indeed cease.

768c

[The Buddha said,] “With the cessation of clinging, becoming ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of clinging, becoming ceases?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of clinging, becoming ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of clinging, becoming does indeed cease.

[The Buddha said,] “With the cessation of craving, clinging ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of craving, clinging ceases?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of craving, clinging ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of craving, clinging does indeed cease.

[The Buddha said,] “With the cessation of feeling, craving ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of feeling, craving ceases?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of feeling, craving ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of feeling, craving does indeed cease.

[The Buddha said,] “With the cessation of contact, feeling ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of contact, feeling ceases?”

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of contact, feeling ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of contact, feeling does indeed cease.

[The Buddha said:]

With the cessation of the six sense spheres, contact ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of the six sense spheres, contact ceases?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of the six sense spheres, contact ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of the six sense spheres, contact does indeed cease.

[The Buddha said:]

With the cessation of name-and-form, the six sense spheres cease. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of name-and-form, the six sense spheres cease?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of name-and-form, the six sense spheres cease; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of name-and-form, the six sense spheres do indeed cease.

[The Buddha said:]

With the cessation of consciousness, name-and-form ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of consciousness, name-and-form ceases?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of consciousness, name-and-form ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of consciousness, name-and-form does indeed cease.

[The Buddha said:]

With the cessation of formations, consciousness ceases. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of formations, consciousness ceases?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of formations, consciousness ceases; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of formations, consciousness does indeed cease.

[The Buddha said:]

With the cessation of ignorance, formations cease. What do you think regarding this statement that with the cessation of ignorance, formations cease?

The monks replied:

World-honored One, with the cessation of ignorance, formations cease; this is what we [too] think. Why is that? [Because] with the cessation of ignorance, formations do indeed cease.

Thus, with the cessation of ignorance, formations cease; with the cessation of formations, consciousness ceases; with the cessation of consciousness, name-and-form ceases; with the cessation of name-and-form, the six sense spheres cease; with the cessation of the six sense spheres, contact ceases; with the cessation of contact, feeling ceases; with the cessation of feeling, craving ceases; with the cessation of craving, clinging ceases; with the cessation of clinging, becoming ceases; with the cessation of becoming, birth ceases; with the cessation of birth, old age and death cease, worry and sadness, crying and weeping, sorrow and pain, dejection and vexation can come to cease. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha ceases.

769a

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well, monks, that you say this. Why is that? I too say that with the cessation of ignorance, formations cease; with the cessation of formations, consciousness ceases; with the cessation of consciousness, name-and-form ceases; with the cessation of name-and-form, the six sense spheres cease; with the cessation of the six sense spheres, contact ceases; with the cessation of contact, feeling ceases; with the cessation of feeling, craving ceases; with the cessation of craving, clinging ceases; with the cessation of clinging, becoming ceases; with the cessation of becoming, birth ceases; with the cessation of birth, old age and death cease, worry and sadness, crying and weeping, sorrow and pain, dejection and vexation can come to cease. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha ceases.

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you think, in relation to the past, “In past times did I exist? In past times did I not exist? How did I exist in past times? From what cause did I exist in past times?”

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you think, in relation to the future, “In the future will I exist? In the future will I not exist? How will I exist in the future? From what cause will I exist in the future?”

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you have inner doubt, thinking, “What is this? How is this? From where did this living being come? Where will it go? From what cause does it exist? From what cause will it exist?”

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you intentionally kill your parents, harm an arahant disciple of the Buddha,<sup>201</sup> cause a rift in the noble sangha, or with evil intent toward the Buddha [cause] the Tathāgata’s blood to flow?<sup>202</sup>

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you intentionally violate the precepts, give up the precepts, and abandon the path?

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you abandon this [Dharma] and seek outside it for someone else to revere, seek a [different] field of merit?

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you look up to a renunciant or brahmin who says,<sup>203</sup> “Venerable ones, I know what can be known, I see what can be seen”?

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

769b

The World-honored One praised them, [saying,] “It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you consider that auspicious signs bring about purification?”

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, would you consider as true the views of renunciants and brahmins regarding auspicious signs, regarding their various ascetic practices, regarding their various austerities, and regarding their various [forms of self-inflicted] distress?

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them [saying]:

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, if in your body there were to arise a feverish disease, giving rise to very severe pain, such as would lead to the wish to end your life, would you abandon this [Dharma] and seek outside it for some renunciant or brahmin who might have memorized a spell consisting of one verse, or two verses, three verses, four verses, many verses, a hundred verses, [thinking,] “Memorizing this spell will free me from my dukkha”? That is, would you seek [outside the Dharma] for the source of dukkha and for attaining the cessation of dukkha?<sup>204</sup>

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying,] “It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, will you experience an eighth existence [beyond the seven of a stream-enterer]?”

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well. Knowing in this way, seeing in this way, do you perhaps speak [and think] like this: “We respect the renunciant; we esteem the renunciant; the renunciant Gotama is our revered teacher”?

The monks replied, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well, are you replying to my questions according to what you have understood for yourselves, seen for yourselves, and realized for yourselves, having attained the supreme and full awakening?”

The monks replied, “That is so, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One praised them, [saying:]

It is well, it is well, I have trained you rightly in the complete and ultimate Dharma that is free from vexation, free from fever, that is permanent and unchanging, known by right knowledge, seen by right knowledge, and realized by right knowledge.

It was for this reason that I earlier said, “I shall teach you the ultimate Dharma that is free from vexation, free from fever, permanent and unchanging, known by right knowledge, seen by right knowledge, and realized by right knowledge.”

[Listen closely] again. With the coming together of three things there is entry into the mother’s womb: the parents come together in one place, the mother is in season, and the gandhabba has arrived. With the coming together of these three things there is entry into the mother’s womb.<sup>205</sup>

Having been carried in the mother’s womb for nine months or ten months, [the child] is born. Having been born, he is nourished with “blood”; in the noble Dharma “blood” is a term for mother’s milk. At a later time his faculties become mature. With his faculties complete, he is fed coarse cereal foods and his body is smeared with butter oil.<sup>206</sup>

On seeing visible forms with the eye, he delights in and becomes attached to beautiful forms and dislikes ugly forms. Mindfulness of the body is not established in him. With his limited mind, liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom are not understood as they really are. Evil and unwholesome states that arise are not eradicated without remainder, not destroyed without remainder.

It is the same with the ear . . . with the nose . . . with the tongue . . . with the body . . . on cognizing mind-objects with the mind, he delights in and becomes attached to beautiful mind objects and dislikes ugly mind objects. Mindfulness of the body is not established in him. With his limited mind, liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom are not understood as they really are. Evil and unwholesome states that arise are not eradicated without remainder, not destroyed without remainder.

769c

In this way he likes or dislikes the feelings he experiences according to whether they are pleasant, painful, or neutral. He delights in those feelings, seeks, becomes attached to, and clings to those feelings. If they are pleasant feelings, then for him, having delighted in those feelings, having sought, become attached to, and clung to those feelings, this is his clinging.

Conditioned by clinging there is becoming; conditioned by becoming there is birth; conditioned by birth there is old age and death, worry and sadness, crying and weeping, sorrow and pain, dejection and vexation. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha arises.

Monks, is he not completely and continuously bound by craving, just like the monk Sāti, the son of a fisherman?

The monks replied, “That is so, World-honored One. He is completely and continuously bound by craving, just like the monk Sāti, the son of a fisherman.”
[The Buddha spoke further:]

There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one.<sup>207</sup>

[A disciple of the Tathāgata,] on seeing visible forms with the eye, does not delight in or become attached to beautiful forms and does not dislike ugly forms. Mindfulness of the body is established in him. With his limitless mind, liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom are understood as they really are. Evil and unwholesome states that arise are eradicated without remainder, destroyed without remainder.

It is the same with the ear . . . with the nose . . . with the tongue . . . with the body . . . on cognizing mind-objects with the mind, he does not [delight in or] become attached to beautiful mental objects and does not dislike ugly mind-objects. Mindfulness of the body is established in him. With his limitless mind, liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom are understood as they really are. Evil and unwholesome states that arise are destroyed without remainder.

In this way he eradicates like or dislike for the feelings he experiences, whether pleasant, painful, or neutral. He does not delight in those feelings, does not seek, does not become attached to, and does not cling to those feelings. If they are pleasant feelings, then for him, no longer delighting in those feelings, no longer seeking, not becoming attached to or clinging to feelings, clinging has ceased.

With the cessation of clinging, becoming ceases; with the cessation of becoming, birth ceases; with the cessation of birth, old age and death cease, worry and sadness, crying and weeping, sorrow and pain, dejection and vexation can come to cease. In this way this entire great mass of dukkha ceases.

Monks, is he not completely liberated by the eradication of craving?

The monks replied, “That is so, World-honored One. He is completely liberated by the eradication of craving.”

When this teaching had been given, the three-thousandfold great-thousandfold world-system quaked three times. It quaked, quaked totally; it shuddered, shuddered totally; it shook, shook totally.<sup>208</sup> For this reason this discourse is named “Liberation by the Destruction of Craving.”

770a Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Division 17

On Potaliya

202. The Discourse on the Uposatha<sup>209</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattṥī, in the Eastern Park, in the Hall of Migāra's Mother.

At that time Visākhā, Migāra's mother, having bathed in the morning and dressed in clean white clothes, gathered her sons, daughters-in-law, and other family dependents around her, and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with her head, she stepped back and stood to one side. The World-honored One said, "Housewife, have you just taken a bath?"

She replied, "World-honored One, today I am observing the uposatha. Well-gone One, today I am observing the uposatha."

The World-honored One asked her:

Housewife, what uposatha are you observing today? There are three types of uposatha. What three? The first is the uposatha of cowherds; the second is the uposatha of the Nigaṇṭhas; the third is the noble eightfold uposatha.

Housewife, what is the uposatha of cowherds? It may be that in the morning a cowherd sets [his cows] free among the marshes and in the afternoon brings them back to the village. As he brings them back to the village, he thinks, "Today I set the cows free in this place; tomorrow I shall set the cows free in that place. Today I watered the cows in this place; tomorrow I shall water the cows in that place. Now my cows will spend the night in this place; tomorrow they will spend the night in that place."

Housewife, in the same way there are persons who, when observing the uposatha, think, "Today I am eating this kind of food; tomorrow I shall eat that kind of food. Today I am drinking this kind of drink; tomorrow I shall drink that kind of drink. Today I am consuming this kind of foodstuff; tomorrow I shall consume that kind of foodstuff." That person during this day and night is delighted by and attached to the fault of sensuality. This is what is meant by the uposatha of cowherds. Observing the uposatha of cowherds in this way, one does not get great benefit, does not gain great fruit. It is not of great merit, not widely pervasive.

770b

Housewife, what is the uposatha of the Nigaṇṭhas? It may be that someone who has gone forth as a Nigaṇṭha instructs persons, saying, “In the eastern direction beyond a hundred yojanas there are living beings, and in order to protect them you [must] renounce blade and cudgel. Likewise in the southern direction . . . the western direction . . . the northern direction beyond a hundred yojanas there are living beings, in order to protect them you [must] renounce blade and cudgel.” Thus he instructs and directs persons. Either they are aware of living beings and protect them; or they are not aware of living beings and do not protect them.<sup>210</sup>

[He also instructs them,] “On the fifteenth day, the time for reciting the code of rules, take off your clothes, stand naked facing east, and say this: ‘I am without father or mother; I have no father and mother. I am without wife and children; I have no wife and children. I am without male and female servants; I am not master over male and female servants.’”<sup>211</sup>

Housewife, instead of instructing them with truthful talk, he instructs them with empty, false words. Every day that person sees his father and mother and thinks, “These are my father and mother.” Every day his father and mother see their son and think, “This is our son.” He sees his wife and children and thinks, “This is my wife and children.” His wife and children see him and think, “This is my respected senior.” He sees his male and female servants and thinks, “These are my male and female servants.” The male and female servants see him and think, “This is our master.”

As he employs them as he wishes, he is employing something that was not given to him. What he is employing is not something that was given to him. This is what is meant by the uposatha of the Nigaṇṭhas. Observing the uposatha of the Nigaṇṭhas in this way, one does not reap great benefit, does not gain great fruit. It is not of great merit, not widely pervasive.

Housewife, what is it that is called the noble eightfold uposatha? When observing the uposatha a learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from killing, having abandoned killing and renounced blade and cudgel.<sup>212</sup> They have shame and scruple and a mental [attitude] of loving-kindness and compassion, benefiting all [beings, even] including insects. They have purified their minds with regard to killing living beings. I too shall, for my whole life, abstain from killing, abandon killing and renounce blade and cudgel. I shall have shame and scruple and a mental [attitude] of loving-kindness and compassion, benefiting all [beings, even] including insects. I am now purifying my mind with regard to killing living beings. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” For this reason it is called uposatha. 770c

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha, a learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from taking what is not given, having abandoned taking what is not given. They take [something only] after it has been given and delight in taking [only] what has been given. They are always fond of generosity. Their minds rejoice in giving, delighting in it without stinginess, not expecting any reward. They do not harbor an intention to steal. Able to restrain themselves, they have purified their minds with regard to taking what is not given. I too shall, for my whole life, abstain from taking what is not given, and abandon taking what is not given. I shall take [something only] after it has been given and delight in taking [only] what has been given. I shall always be fond of generosity. My mind shall rejoice in giving, delighting in it without stinginess, not expecting any reward. I shall not harbor an intention to steal. Able to restrain myself, I am purifying my mind with regard to taking what is not given. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” For this reason it is called uposatha.

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from sexual activity, having given up sexual activity. They cultivate celibacy with complete mental purity, practicing it without defilement, having abandoned sensuality, having given up sexual desires. They have purified their minds of sexual activity. I too shall, during this day and night, abstain from sexual activity, give up sexual activity. I shall cultivate celibacy with complete mental purity, practicing it without defilement, abandoning sensuality, giving up sexual desires. I am purifying the mind of sexual activity. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” For this reason it is called uposatha.

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from false speech, having given up false speech. They speak the truth, delight in the truth, are established in the truth. They are trusted by persons and would not deceive [anyone in] the world. They have purified their minds with regard to false speech. I too shall, for my whole life, abstain from false speech, giving up false speech. I shall speak the truth, delight in the truth, being established in the truth. I will be trusted by persons and shall not deceive [anyone in] the world. I am purifying my mind with regard to false speech. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” For this reason it is called uposatha.

771a

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from the negligence of alcoholic beverages, having given up the negligence of alcoholic beverages. They have purified their minds with regard to the negligence of alcoholic beverages. I too shall, for my whole life, abstain from the negligence of alcoholic beverages, giving up the negligence of alcoholic beverages. I am purifying the mind with regard to the negligence of alcoholic beverages. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” For this reason it is called uposatha.

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from [using] high or wide beds, having given up [using] high or wide beds. They delight in sitting or reclining low, whether on a bed or on a grass mat. They have purified their minds with regard to high or wide beds. During this day and night I [too] shall abstain from [using] high or wide beds, giving up [using] high or wide beds. I shall delight in sitting or reclining low, whether on a bed or on a grass mat. I am purifying my mind with regard to high or wide beds. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” For this reason it is called uposatha.

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics, as well as from singing, dancing, acting and from going to watch or listen to them, having given up [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics as well as singing, dancing, and acting, and going to watch or listen to them. They have purified their minds with regard to [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics, as well as singing, dancing, and acting and going to watch or listen to them. During this day and night I [too] shall abstain from [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics, as well as from singing, dancing, and acting and from going to watch or listen to them, giving up [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics as well as singing, dancing, and acting and going to watch or listen to them. I am purifying my mind with regard to [using] flower garlands, necklaces, perfumes, and cosmetics, as well as singing, dancing, acting and going to watch or listen to them. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” For this reason it is called uposatha.

Again, housewife, while observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple reflects, “For their whole life ‘true persons’—that is, arahants—abstain from eating at improper times, having given up eating at improper times. They eat [only] once, not eating at night, delighting in eating [only] at the proper time.<sup>213</sup> They have purified their minds with regard to eating at improper times. During this day and night I [too] shall abstain from eating at improper times, giving up eating at improper times. I shall eat [only] once, not eating at night, delighting in eating [only] at the proper time. I am purifying my mind with regard to eating at improper times. In this respect I am [becoming] equal to arahants, not different from them.” It is for this reason that it is called uposatha.

<Established> in this noble eightfold uposatha,<sup>214</sup> one should further cultivate five things.<sup>215</sup> What are the five? Housewife, while observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the Tathāgata [thus]: “That World-honored One, the Tathāgata, is free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, knower of the world, unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one.”

When he recollects the Tathāgata in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the Tathāgata the learned noble disciple’s mind gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

771b

It is just as a person who has dirt on his head may, by washing it with paste, warm water, and human effort, make himself clean. In the same way, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the Tathāgata: “That World-honored One, the Tathāgata, is free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one.”

When he recollects the Tathāgata in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the Tathāgata the learned noble disciple’s mind gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

This is called the learned noble disciple’s observance of a Brahmā uposatha, his communion with Brahmā—[that is, the Buddha].<sup>216</sup> Because of Brahmā, his mind attains serene delight, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the Dharma: “This Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; it is complete, constant, and unchanging, to be known with right knowledge, to be seen with right knowledge, to be realized with right knowledge.”

When he recollects the Dharma in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the Dharma the learned noble disciple’s mind gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

It is just as a person who has dirt and impurity on his body may, by means of bran, bathing powder, warm water, and human effort, wash himself thoroughly, so that his body becomes clean. In the same way, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the Dharma: “This Dharma is well taught by the World-honored One; it is complete, constant, and unchanging, to be known with right knowledge, to be seen with right knowledge, to be realized with right knowledge.”

When he recollects the Dharma in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the Dharma the learned noble disciple's mind gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

Housewife, this is the learned noble disciple's observing of a Dharma uposatha, his communion with the Dharma. Because of the Dharma his mind attains serene delight, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. 771c

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the sangha: "The sangha of the World-honored One's disciples progresses well and uprightly; they practice what is essential and make progress in their practice. Among the sangha of the Tathāgata there truly are those who are progressing toward becoming 'true persons,' that is, arahants, and those who have realized arahantship; those who are progressing toward nonreturn and those who have realized nonreturn; those who are progressing toward once-return and those who have realized once-return; those who are progressing toward stream-entry and those who have realized stream-entry—these being the four pairs of persons, the eight grades of noble beings. This is the sangha of the World-honored One's disciples who are accomplished in virtue, concentration, wisdom, liberation, and knowledge and vision of liberation. They are worthy of being called upon, invited, supported, respected, and revered, being an excellent field of merit for devas and human beings."

When he recollects the sangha in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the sangha the mind of the learned noble disciple gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

It is just as a person who has dirt and impurity on his clothes may, by means of ash and soap, washing powder, warm water, and human effort, wash them clean. In the same way, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the sangha: "The sangha of the World-honored One's disciples progresses well and uprightly; they practice what is essential and they make progress in their practice. Among the sangha of the Tathāgata there truly are those who are progressing toward becoming ‘true persons,’ [that is,] arahants, and those who have realized arahantship; those who are progressing toward nonreturn and those who have realized nonreturn; those who are progressing toward once-return and those who have realized once-return; those who are progressing toward stream-entry and those who have realized stream-entry—these being the four pairs of persons, the eight grades of noble beings. This is the sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples who are accomplished in virtue, concentration, wisdom, liberation, and knowledge and vision of liberation. They are worthy of being called upon, invited, supported, respected, and revered, being an excellent field of merit for devas and human beings.”

When he recollects the sangha in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the Sangha the mind of the learned noble disciple gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

This is the learned noble disciple’s observance of a sangha uposatha, his communion with the sangha. Because of the sangha his mind attains serene delight, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

772a Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects his own precepts: “[My precepts] are not deficient, not defective, not defiled, not corrupted, but are extensive and great, [undertaken] without expectation of reward, and praised by the wise. I am well endowed with them and progressing well in them. I accept them well and uphold them well.”

When he recollects his own precepts in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the precepts the mind of the learned noble disciple gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

It is just as a mirror that has become dirty and no longer bright may, through being burnished with a polishing stone using human effort, become bright and clear. In the same way, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects his own precepts [thus]: “[My precepts] are not deficient, not defective, not defiled, not corrupted, but are extensive and great, [undertaken] without expectation of reward, and praised by the wise. I am well endowed with them and progressing well in them. I accept them well and uphold them well.”

When he recollects his own precepts in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the precepts the mind of the learned noble disciple gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

This is the learned noble disciple’s observance of a precepts uposatha, his communion with the precepts. Because of the precepts his mind attains serene delight, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

Again, housewife, when observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the devas: “There really are the Four Heavenly Kings. Those devas were accomplished in faith, so that with the ending of their life here [in the human realm] they were reborn there. I also have such faith. Those devas were accomplished in virtue . . . learning . . . generosity . . . wisdom, so that with the ending of their life here they were reborn there. I also have such wisdom. There really are the devas of the Thirty-three . . . the Yāma devas . . . the Tusita devas . . . the devas who delight in creating . . . the devas who wield power over others’ creations. Those devas were accomplished in faith, so that with the ending of their life here they were reborn there. I too have such faith. Those devas were accomplished in virtue . . . learning . . . generosity . . . wisdom, so that with the ending of their life here they were reborn there. I too have such wisdom.”

When he recollects the faith, virtue, learning, generosity, and wisdom of the devas in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease. Housewife, because of the devas the mind of the learned noble disciple gains serene delight, so that any evil inclination is made to cease and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

772b

It is just as gold that has become contaminated and impure may, by means of fire, tongs,<sup>217</sup> a hammer, red earth, and human effort, be rubbed and polished, so that it becomes bright and pure. In the same way, while observing the uposatha the learned noble disciple recollects the devas [thus]: “There really are the Four Heavenly Kings. Those devas were accomplished in faith, so that with the ending of their life here they were reborn there. I too have such faith. Those devas were accomplished in virtue . . . learning . . . generosity . . . wisdom, so that with the ending of their life here they were reborn there. I too have such wisdom. There really are the devas of the Thirty-three . . . the Yāma devas . . . the Tusita devas . . . the devas who delight in creating . . . the devas who wield power over others’ creations. Those devas were accomplished in faith, so that with the ending of their life here they were reborn there. I too have such faith. Those devas were accomplished in virtue . . . learning . . . generosity . . . wisdom, so that with the ending of their life here they were reborn there. I also have such wisdom.”

When he recollects the faith, virtue, learning, generosity, and wisdom of the devas in this way, any evil inclination is made to cease, and any defiled, evil, and unwholesome mental state is also made to cease.

Housewife, suppose that one observes in this way this noble eightfold uposatha. Now, there are the sixteen great countries, namely (1) Āṅga, (2) Magadha, (3) Kāśi, (4) Kosala, (5) Kuru, (6) Pañcāla, (7) Assaka, (8) Avantī, (9) Ceti, (10) Vajji, (11) Vamśa, (12) Malla, (13) Soma, (14) Sūrasena, (15) Yona,<sup>218</sup> and (16) Kamboja. In these countries whatever there is of money and treasures—gold, silver, maṇi-jewel, pearl, beryl, rāṅgā,<sup>219</sup> green jade, coral, liúshào, bīngliú, bīnglěi, agate, tortoise shell, ruby, white jade, and pearl shell—a person, on being established there as king, could make use of these as he wished. Yet, monks, all of that is not worth the sixteenth part of keeping the noble eightfold uposatha.<sup>220</sup>

For this reason, housewife, I declare that being a king among human beings cannot compare with the pleasures of the devas. For example, fifty years among human beings are one day and night among the Four Heavenly Kings. Thirty such days and nights are one month, and twelve such months are one year. Five hundred such years is the life span of the Four Heavenly Kings. Housewife, it is entirely possible that a clansman or a clanswoman who has observed the noble eightfold uposatha will, on the breaking up of the body with the ending of life, be reborn among the Four Heavenly Kings.

For this reason, housewife, I declare that being a king among human beings cannot compare with the pleasures of the devas. For example, a hundred years among human beings are one day and night among the devas of the Thirty-three. Thirty such days and nights are one month, and twelve such months are one year. A thousand such years is the life span of the devas of the Thirty-three. Housewife, it is entirely possible that a clansman or a clanswoman who has observed the noble eightfold uposatha will, on the breaking up of the body with the ending of life, be reborn among the devas of the Thirty-three.

772c

For this reason, housewife, I declare that being a king among human beings cannot compare with the pleasures of the devas. For example, two hundred years among human beings are one day and night among the Yāma devas. Thirty such days and nights are one month, and twelve such months are one year. Two thousand such years is the life span of the Yāma devas. Housewife, it is entirely possible that a clansman or a clanswoman who has observed the noble eightfold uposatha will, on the breaking up of the body with the ending of life, be reborn among the Yāma devas.

For this reason, housewife, I declare that being a king among human beings cannot compare with the pleasures of the devas. For example, four hundred years among human beings are one day and night among the Tusita devas. Thirty such days and nights are one month, and twelve such months are one year. Four thousand such years is the life span of the Tusita devas. Housewife, it is entirely possible that a clansman or a clanswoman who has observed the noble eightfold uposatha will, on the breaking up of the body with the ending of life, be reborn among the Tusita devas.

For this reason, housewife, I declare that being a king among human beings cannot compare with the pleasures of the devas. For example, eight hundred years among human beings are one day and night among the devas who delight in creating. Thirty such days and nights are one month, and twelve such months are one year. Eight thousand such years is the life span of the devas who delight in creating. Housewife, it is entirely possible that a clansman or a clanswoman who has observed the noble eightfold uposatha will, on the breaking up of the body with the ending of life, be reborn among the devas who delight in creating.

For this reason, housewife, I declare that being a king among human beings cannot compare with the pleasures of the devas. For example, one thousand six hundred years among human beings are one day and night among the devas who wield power over others' creations. Thirty such day and nights are one month, and twelve such months are one year. Sixteen thousand such years is the life span of the devas who wield power over others' creations. Housewife, it is entirely possible that a clansman or a clanswoman who has observed the noble eightfold uposatha will, on the breaking up of the body with the ending of life, be reborn among the devas who wield power over others' creations.<sup>221</sup>

Then Visākhā, Migāra's mother extended her hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, the noble eightfold uposatha is most wonderful, most remarkable, of great profit, of great fruit, of great virtue, of great scope. World-honored One, from now on for my whole life I will observe the noble eightfold uposatha, according to my strength, giving generously and cultivating merit.

Then Visākhā, Migāra's mother, having heard what the Buddha said, bore it well [in mind], paid homage with her head at the Buddha's feet, circum-ambulated him three times, and left.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, Visākhā, 773a Migāra's mother, and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

203. The Discourse to Potaliya<sup>222</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Nālanda, in Pāvārika's Mango Grove.

At that time the householder Potaliya, wearing clean white clothes and a white headcloth, grasping a staff and holding a parasol, and wearing layman's sandals, was going from park to park, from pleasure garden to pleasure garden, from grove to grove, wandering at his pleasure. Whenever he saw renunciants or brahmins, he would say, "Venerable friends, you should know that I abstain from worldliness. I have abandoned worldliness. I have relinquished all worldly affairs.”

The renunciants and brahmins would reply with soft and gentle words, “Indeed, the venerable friend Potaliya abstains from worldliness. He has abandoned worldliness. He has relinquished all worldly affairs.”<sup>223</sup>

Then, as he was wandering around, the householder Potaliya approached the Buddha. He exchanged polite greetings while standing before the Buddha, grasping his staff. The World-honored One said, “Householder, there are seats. Be seated if you like.”

The householder Potaliya said:

Gotama, this is not right; this is not proper. Why is that? I abstain from worldliness. I have abandoned worldliness. I have relinquished all worldly affairs. How is it that the renunciant Gotama addresses me as “householder”?

The World-honored One replied, “You have the [outer] signs and marks of a householder, therefore I address you, saying, ‘Householder, there are seats. Be seated if you like.’”

Three times the World-honored One said, “Householder, there are seats. Be seated if you like.”

Three times the householder Potaliya said:

Gotama, this is not right; this is not proper. I abstain from worldliness. I have abandoned worldliness. I have relinquished all worldly affairs. How is it that the renunciant Gotama addresses me as “householder”?

[And each time] the World-honored One replied, “You have the [outer] signs and marks of a householder, therefore I address you saying, ‘Householder, there are seats. Be seated if you like.’”

The World-honored One asked him, “How do you abstain from worldliness? How have you abandoned worldliness and relinquished all worldly affairs?”

The householder Potaliya replied:

Gotama, all of the wealth in my house I have given in its entirety to my sons. I wander without occupation and without ambition. I seek only food to sustain my life. This is how I abstain from worldliness. This is how I have abandoned worldliness and relinquished all worldly affairs.

The World-honored One said:

Householder, in this noble Dharma and discipline it is not in this way that one abandons and cuts off worldly affairs. Householder, in this noble Dharma and discipline there are eight aspects to abandoning worldly affairs.

773b At this the householder Potaliya set aside his staff, put away his parasol, and took off his layman's sandals. Extending his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, he said, "Gotama, what are the eight aspects to abandoning worldly affairs in this noble Dharma and discipline?"

The World-honored One replied:

Householder, with the support of abstention from killing, a learned noble disciple abandons killing. With the support of abstention from taking what is not given, he abandons taking what is not given. With the support of abstention from sexual misconduct, he abandons sexual misconduct.<sup>224</sup> With the support of abstention from false speech, he abandons false speech. With the support of absence of desire and attachment, he abandons desire and attachment. With the support of absence of harmfulness and hatred, he abandons harmfulness and hatred. With the support of absence of dislike and irritation, he abandons dislike and irritation. With the support of absence of excessive pride, he abandons excessive pride.

Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of abstention from killing, abandon killing? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: "One who kills will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who kills, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others, by devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life, who would talk about my conduct and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who kills experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. With the support of abstention from killing, should I not better abandon killing?"

So, with the support of abstention from killing, he abandons killing. In this way, with the support of abstention from killing, the learned noble disciple abandons killing.

Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of abstention from taking what is not given, abandon taking what is not given? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: “One who takes what is not given will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who takes what is not given, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others. Devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life would talk about my conduct and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who takes what is not given experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. With the support of abstention from taking what is not given, should I not better abandon taking what is not given?”

So, with the support of abstention from taking what is not given, he abandons taking what is not given. In this way, with the support of abstention from taking what is not given, the learned noble disciple abandons taking what is not given.

Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of abstention from sexual misconduct, abandon sexual misconduct? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: “One who [engages in] sexual misconduct will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who engages in sexual misconduct, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others, by devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life, who would talk about my conduct and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who engages in sexual misconduct experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. With the support of abstention from sexual misconduct, should I not better abandon sexual misconduct?”

So, with the support of abstention from sexual misconduct, he abandons sexual misconduct. In this way, with the support of abstention from sexual misconduct, the learned noble disciple abandons sexual misconduct.

773c

Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of abstention from false speech, abandon false speech? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: “One who engages in false speech will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who engages in false speech, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others, by devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life, who would talk about my conduct, and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who engages in false speech experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. With the support of abstention from false speech, should I not better abandon false speech?”

So, with the support of abstention from false speech, he abandons false speech. In this way, with the support of abstention from false speech, the learned noble disciple abandons false speech.

774a Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of absence of desire and attachment, abandon desire and attachment? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: “One who has desire and attachment will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who has desire and attachment, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others, by devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life, who would talk about my conduct and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who has desire and attachment experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. With the support of absence of desire and attachment, should I not better abandon desire and attachment?”

So, with the support of absence of desire and attachment, he abandons desire and attachment. In this way, with the support of absence of desire and attachment, the learned noble disciple abandons desire and attachment.

Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of absence of harmfulness and hatred, abandon harmfulness and hatred? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: “One who harbors harmfulness and hatred will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who harbors harmfulness and hatred, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others, by devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life, who would talk about my conduct and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who harbors harmfulness and hatred experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. With the support of absence of harmfulness and hatred, should I not better abandon harmfulness and hatred?"

So, with the support of absence of harmfulness and hatred, he abandons harmfulness and hatred. In this way, with the support of absence of harmfulness and hatred, the learned noble disciple abandons harmfulness and hatred.

Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of absence of dislike and irritation, abandon dislike and irritation? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: "One who harbors dislike and irritation will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who harbors dislike and irritation, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others, by devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life, who would talk about my conduct and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who harbors dislike and irritation experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. With the support of absence of dislike and irritation, should I not better abandon dislike and irritation?"

So, with the support of absence of dislike and irritation, he abandons dislike and irritation. In this way, with the support of absence of dislike and irritation, the learned noble disciple abandons dislike and irritation.

Householder, how does a learned noble disciple, with the support of absence of excessive pride, abandon excessive pride? A learned noble disciple reflects thus: "One who has excessive pride will certainly experience bad results in this life and in future lives. If I were to be one who has excessive pride, I would harm myself and be spoken ill of by others, by devas and all wise practitioners of the holy life, who would talk about my conduct and my bad reputation would be heard of in all directions. With the breaking up of the body at the ending of life I would certainly go to a bad destiny, being reborn in hell. In such ways one who has excessive pride experiences these bad results in this life and in future lives. Being with the support of absence of excessive pride, should I not better abandon excessive pride?”

So, with the support of absence of excessive pride, he abandons excessive pride. In this way, with the support of absence of excessive pride, the learned noble disciple abandons excessive pride. These are the eight aspects to the complete abandoning of worldly affairs in this noble Dharma and discipline.

The householder asked, “Gotama, in this noble Dharma and discipline is just this the [complete] abandoning of worldly affairs or is there still more?”

The World-honored One replied:

In this noble Dharma and discipline only this is not the complete abandoning of worldly affairs. There are a further eight aspects to realizing the complete abandoning and cutting off of worldly affairs.<sup>225</sup>

On hearing this, the householder Potaliya took off his white headcloth, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said, “Gotama, what are the further eight aspects to realizing the [complete] abandoning of worldly affairs in this noble Dharma and discipline?”

The World-honored One replied:

Householder, suppose that a dog, being hungry, emaciated from hunger, goes to the place of a cow butcher. The cow butcher or his apprentice throws the dog a bone that has been cut clean of meat. Having got the bone, the dog chews at it all over, even until it harms his lips, damages his teeth, or injures his throat, yet that dog does not get to satisfy his hunger.

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like bare bones; the World-honored One has declared that sensual pleasures are like bare bones, with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.”

If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriment will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

Householder, suppose that a small piece of meat has fallen on open ground not far from a village; and that a crow or an owl carries off this meat, and other crows, owls, and birds pursue it, competing [for the meat]. What do you think, householder, if that crow or owl does not quickly let go of this small piece of meat, will the other crows and owls competing [for the meat continue to] pursue it?<sup>226</sup> 774b

The householder replied, “Yes, indeed, Gotama.”
[The Buddha said:]

Householder, what do you think, if that crow or owl is able to let go quickly of that small piece of meat, will the other crows, owls, and birds competing [for the meat] continue to pursue it?

The householder replied, “No, Gotama.”
[The Buddha said:]

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like a piece of meat; the World-honored One has declared that sensual pleasures are like a piece of meat, with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.”

If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriments will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

Householder, suppose that a man who is holding a burning torch in his hand is walking against the wind. What do you think, householder, if that man does not quickly drop the torch, will his hand or some other part of his body get burned?

The householder replied, “Yes, indeed, Gotama.”
[The Buddha said,] “What do you think, householder, if that man quickly drops the torch, will his hand or some other part of his body get burned?”<sup>227</sup>
The householder replied, “No, Gotama.”
[The Buddha said:]

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like a burning torch; the World-honored One has declared that sensual pleasures are like a burning torch, with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.”

If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriment will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

Householder, suppose that, not far from a village, there is a great burning [charcoal] pit, full of fire but without smoke. A man comes by who is not foolish or stupid, not deranged, who is in his right mind, free and unconstrained; who is fond of pleasure and not fond of pain, who abhors pain; who is fond of living and not fond of death, who abhors death. What do you think, householder, would that man enter that burning [charcoal] pit?<sup>228</sup>

The householder replied:

No, Gotama. Why is that? Seeing the burning [charcoal] pit, he would reflect, “If I fall into this burning [charcoal] pit, I will certainly die, without a doubt; and should I not die, I will surely experience extreme pain.” Seeing the burning [charcoal] pit, he would have the intention of keeping far from it and will wish to get away from it.

[The Buddha said:]

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like a burning [charcoal] pit; the World-honored One has declared sensual pleasures to be like a burning [charcoal] pit, with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.”

If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriment will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

774c Householder, suppose that, not far from a village, there is a great poisonous snake, very vicious and exceedingly poisonous, black in color and terrifying.<sup>229</sup> A man comes by who is not foolish or stupid, not deranged, who is in his right mind, free and unconstrained; who is fond of pleasure and not fond of pain, who abhors pain; who is fond of living and not fond of death, who abhors death. What do you think, householder, will that man reach out his hand or some other part of his body, and speak like this [to the snake]: “Bite me, bite me!”?

The householder replied:

No, Gotama. Why is that? Seeing the poisonous snake, he will reflect, “If my hand or some other part of my body is bitten by this snake, I will certainly die, without a doubt; and should I not die, I will surely experience extreme pain.” Seeing the poisonous snake, he will have the intention of keeping far from it and will wish to get away from it.

[The Buddha said:]

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like a poisonous snake; the World-honored One has declared that sensual pleasures are like a poisonous snake, with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.”

If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriment will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

Householder, suppose that a person has a dream in which he is fully provided with the five strands of sensual pleasure and is amusing himself with them.<sup>230</sup> On waking, he sees none of it.

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like a dream; the World-honored One has declared that sensual pleasures are like a dream, with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.”

If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriment will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

Householder, suppose that a man borrows goods for his pleasure, such as a palace with towers, a pleasure garden with bathing pools, a chariot drawn by an elephant or a horse, silk coverlets, rings, bracelets, perfume, necklaces, golden ornaments, decorative hair-pins, or elegant clothes. On seeing him, many persons exclaim to one another, “How good to be like this! How happy to be like this! Those who have wealth should amuse themselves to the utmost like this!”

[Later, however], the owner of those goods wants to take them back or get someone else to take them back. So he takes them back himself or gets someone else to take them back [for him]. Many persons see this and say to one another, “He is a borrower and actually a deceiver. How bad is this borrower!” Why is that? The owner of those goods wanted to take them back or to get someone else to take them back. So he took them back himself or got someone else to take them back.

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like borrowed [goods]; the World-honored One has declared that sensual pleasures are like borrowed [goods], with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.”

775a If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriment will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

Householder, suppose that, not far from a village, there is a great fruit tree and on this tree there are always many fine and appetizing fruits. A man comes by who, being hungry, emaciated from hunger, wants to get to eat the fruits. He thinks, “On this tree there are always many fine and appetizing fruits. I am emaciated from hunger and want to get the fruits to eat. However, there are no fallen fruits beneath the tree that I could eat my fill of and take home with me. I could climb this tree. Should I go up it now?” Thinking this, he goes up [the tree].

[Just then] another man comes by who, being hungry, emaciated from hunger, wants to get to eat the fruits. He is carrying a very sharp ax, and he thinks, “In this tree there are always many fine and appetizing fruits. However, there are no fallen fruits beneath the tree that I could eat my fill of and take home with me. I cannot climb this tree. Should I now chop it down?” Then he promptly [begins] chopping the tree.

What do you think, householder, if the man who is up in the tree does not come down quickly then when the tree topples to the ground, will he certainly break an arm or some other part of his body?

The householder replied, “Yes, indeed, Gotama.”

[The Buddha said:]

Householder, what do you think, if that man up in the tree comes down quickly, then when the tree topples to the ground, will he break an arm or some other part of his body?<sup>231</sup>

The householder replied, “No, Gotama.”

[The Buddha said:]

Householder, the learned noble disciple similarly reflects, “Sensual pleasures are like fruits on a tree; the World-honored One has declared that sensual pleasures are like fruits on a tree, with little enjoyment and much suffering. There is much danger in them, so one should keep away from them.” If one gives up sensual pleasures and relinquishes evil and unwholesome states, then [concern about] all of these so-called worldly nutriment will [in time] come to permanent cessation without remainder. One should cultivate that.

These are the eight further aspects in this noble Dharma and discipline for realizing the complete abandoning of worldly affairs.

Householder,<sup>232</sup> with the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, he dwells having attained the second absorption, which is without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation and with rapture and pleasure born of concentration. Secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling with equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, he dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode. With the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither pain nor pleasure, and with purity of mindfulness and equanimity, he dwells having attained the fourth absorption.<sup>233</sup>

With his mind concentrated and purified in this way, free of defilements, free of troubles, malleable, well steadied, having gained mental imperturbability, he cultivates realization of the knowledge of the destruction of the taints.<sup>234</sup>

He knows as it really is: “This is dukkha.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the arising of dukkha.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the cessation of dukkha.” He knows as it really is: “This is the path to the cessation of dukkha.”

775b He knows as it really is: “These are the taints.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the arising of the taints.” He knows [as it really is]: “This is the cessation of the taints.” He knows as it really is: “This is the path to the cessation of the taints.”

Knowing like this, seeing like this, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire . . . from the taint of existence, his mind is liberated from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, he knows it is liberated, knowing as it really is: “Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

As this teaching was being taught, there arose in the householder Potaliya the spotless, immaculate Dharma eye in regard to all phenomena.<sup>235</sup> Then the householder Potaliya saw the Dharma, attained the Dharma, realized the bright pure Dharma; he abandoned doubt and went beyond perplexity; he became independent of other teachers; he would never again follow others; and he became free of hesitation. Having been established in the attainment of the fruit, he had attained fearlessness in the Dharma taught by the World-honored One.

He paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet and said:

World-honored One, from now on I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

World-honored One, formerly, wearing clean white clothes and a white headcloth, grasping a staff and holding a parasol, and wearing layman’s sandals, I went from park to park, from pleasure garden to pleasure garden, from grove to grove, wandering at my pleasure. Whenever I saw renunciants or brahmins, I would say, “Venerable friends, I abstain from worldliness. I have abandoned worldliness. I have relinquished all worldly affairs.”

The renunciants and brahmins would tell me with soft and gentle words, “Indeed, the venerable friend Potaliya abstains from worldliness. He has abandoned worldliness. He has relinquished all worldly affairs.”

World-honored One, at that time I was giving those who actually have no knowledge the status of having knowledge. I was revering as knowledgeable wise persons those who actually are not a shrine for knowledge, are not nourished by knowledge, and actually are without knowledge. World-honored One, from now on I give the sangha of monks, disciples of the World-honored One who do actually have knowledge, the status of persons of knowledge and wisdom. They actually are a shrine for knowledge and are nourished by knowledge. They actually do have knowledge and I shall revere them as knowledgeable wise persons.<sup>236</sup>

World-honored One, I now again go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life, until death.

World-honored One, the faith and reverence I earlier had for heterodox renunciants and brahmins, this has now been cut off.

World-honored One, a third time I go for refuge to the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day forth until the end of life, as having personally gone for refuge for my whole life.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the householder Potaliya and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

204. The Discourse at Rammaka’s [Hermitage]<sup>237</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, in the Eastern Park, at the Hall of Migāra’s Mother. 775c

At that time, in the afternoon, the World-honored One emerged from sitting in meditation, came down from the hall and said to the venerable Ānanda, “Accompanied by you I would now go to the Aciravatī River to bathe.”<sup>238</sup> The venerable Ānanda replied, “Yes, certainly.”

The venerable Ānanda took a door opener and went around all of the huts. To all the monks he saw he said this: “Venerable friends, you should all gather at the house of the brahmin Rammaka.” On hearing this, the monks gathered at the house of the brahmin Rammaka.

The World-honored One, followed by the venerable Ānanda, went to the Aciravatī River. He took off his robes, placed them on the bank, and entered the water to bathe. Having bathed, he came out again, wiped his body [dry], and put on his robes.

At that time the venerable Ānanda was standing behind the World-honored One, holding a fan to fan him. Then the venerable Ānanda extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, the house of the brahmin Rammaka is very pleasant and orderly. It is truly delightful. May the World-honored One, out of compassion, go to the house of the brahmin Rammaka.

The World-honored One accepted the venerable Ānanda’s [invitation] by remaining silent.

Then the World-honored One, followed by the venerable Ānanda, went to the house of the brahmin Rammaka. At that time a group of many monks were seated together in the house of the brahmin Rammaka discussing the Dharma. The Buddha stood outside the door, waiting for the monks to finish their discussion of the Dharma. The group of many monks, having completed their investigation and discussion of the Dharma, remained silent. Knowing this, the World-honored One coughed and knocked on the door. Hearing this, the monks came and opened the door.

The World-honored One entered the house of the brahmin Rammaka and sat down on a seat that had been prepared in front of the group of monks. He asked them, “What have you just been discussing, monks? For what matter are you sitting together here?”

Then the monks replied, “World-honored One, we have just been discussing the Dharma. It is for a matter of Dharma that we are sitting together here.”

The Buddha commended them:

It is well, it is well, monks, sitting together you should engage in [either of] two things: the first is discussing the Dharma; the second is remaining silent. Why is that? I too shall teach you the Dharma. Listen closely and pay proper attention! 776a

The monks replied: “Yes, certainly. We shall listen to receive instruction.”
The Buddha said:

There are two types of search: the first is called the noble search; the second is called the ignoble search. What is the ignoble search? Someone, being actually subject to disease, seeks what is [also] subject to disease; being actually subject to old age . . . subject to death . . . subject to worry and sadness . . . being actually subject to defilement, they seek what is [also] subject to defilement.<sup>239</sup>

What is being actually subject to disease yet seeking what is [also] subject to disease? What is subject to disease? Sons and brothers are subject to disease; elephants, horses, cattle, sheep, male and female slaves, wealth, treasures, rice and [other] cereals are subject to disease and destruction. Living beings, stained and touched by greed and attachment, full of pride, take hold of and enter amid these, without seeing the danger and without seeing an escape, clinging to them and engaging with them.

What is subject to old age . . . subject to death . . . subject to worry and sadness . . . subject to defilement? Sons and brothers are subject to defilement; elephants, horses, cattle, sheep, male and female slaves, wealth, treasures, rice and cereals are subject to defilement and destruction.<sup>240</sup> Living beings, stained and touched by greed and attachment, intoxicated with pride, take hold of and enter amid these, without seeing the danger and without seeing an escape, clinging to them and engaging with them.

That such a person, wanting and seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease should attain the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease—that is not possible. [That such a person, wanting and] seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement, should attain the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement—that is not possible. This [kind of seeking] is what is meant by the ignoble search.

What is the noble search? Someone reflects, “I am actually subject to disease myself and I am naively seeking what is [also] subject to disease, I am actually subject to old age . . . subject to death . . . subject to worry and sadness . . . subject to defilement myself and I am naively seeking what is [also] subject to defilement. Let me now rather seek the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease, seek the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement!”

That such a person, seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease, should attain the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease—that is certainly possible. [That such a person], seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement, should attain the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement—that is certainly possible.

Formerly, when I had not yet awakened to the unsurpassable, right, and complete awakening, I thought like this: “I am actually subject to disease myself and I am naively seeking what is [also] subject to disease, I am actually subject to old age . . . subject to death . . . subject to worry and sadness . . . subject to defilement myself and I am naively seeking what is [also] subject to defilement. Let me now rather seek the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease, seek the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement!”

776b

At that time I was a young lad, with clear [complexion] and black hair, in the prime of life, twenty-nine years of age, roaming around well adorned and enjoying myself to the utmost. Then, as my father and mother cried and my relatives lamented, I shaved off my hair and beard, donned yellow robes, and out of faith went forth from the household life to train in the path. I maintained purity of livelihood in body, I maintained purity of livelihood in speech and in mind.<sup>241</sup>

Having accomplished this aggregate of morality, aspiring for and seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease . . . free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from defilement, I approached Āḷāra Kālāma. I asked him, “Āḷāra, I wish to practice the holy life in your Dharma. Will you permit it?”

Āḷāra answered me, saying, “Venerable one, I certainly permit it. Practice as you wish to practice!”

I asked further, “Āḷāra, this Dharma of yours—have you come to know it yourself, to understand it yourself, and to realize it yourself?”<sup>242</sup>

Āḷāra answered me, saying, “Venerable one, completely transcending the sphere of [boundless] consciousness, I attain and dwell in the sphere of nothingness. Therefore, I have come to know this Dharma of mine myself, to understand it myself, and to realize it myself.”

I thought again, “Not only Āḷāra alone has such faith; I too have such faith. Not only Āḷāra alone has such energy; I too have such energy. Not only Āḷāra alone has such wisdom; I too have such wisdom.<sup>243</sup> [With these qualities] Āḷāra has come to know this Dharma himself, to understand it himself, to realize it himself.”

Because I wished to realize this Dharma, I went and dwelled alone and in seclusion in an empty and quiet place. With a mind free from indolence I practiced energetically. Having dwelled alone and in seclusion in an empty and quiet place, with a mind free from indolence, practicing energetically, in no long time I realized that Dharma.

Having realized that Dharma, I again approached Āḷāra Kālāma and asked him, “Āḷāra, is this the Dharma that you have come to know yourself, to understand yourself, to realize yourself, namely: completely transcending the sphere of boundless consciousness to attain and dwell in the sphere of nothingness?”

Āḷāra Kālāma answered me, saying, “Venerable one, this is [indeed] the Dharma that I have come to know myself, to understand myself, to realize myself, namely: completely transcending the sphere of [boundless] consciousness to attain and dwell in the sphere of nothingness.”

Āḷāra Kālāma further said to me, “Venerable one, just as I have realized this Dharma, so too have you; just as you have realized this Dharma, so too have I. Venerable one, come and share the leadership of this group!” Thus Āḷāra Kālāma, being the teacher, placed me on an equal level, [thereby] giving me the highest respect, the highest support, and the highest appreciation.

776c

I thought again, “This Dharma does not lead to knowledge, does not lead to awakening, does not lead to nirvana. Let me rather leave this Dharma now and continue seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease . . . free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from defilement.”

I then abandoned this Dharma and continued seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease . . . free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from defilement. I approached Uddaka Rāmaputta and asked him, “Uddaka, I wish to train in your Dharma, will you permit it?”

Uddaka Rāmaputta answered me saying, “Venerable one, I certainly permit it. Train as you wish to train!”

I asked him further, “Uddaka, your father, Rāma<sup>244</sup>—what Dharma did he come to know himself, to understand himself, to realize himself?”

Uddaka Rāmaputta answered me, saying, “Venerable one, completely transcending the sphere of nothingness, he attained and dwelled in the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. Venerable sir, what my father Rāma knew himself, understood himself, realized himself, was this Dharma.”

I thought again, “Not only Rāma alone had such faith; I too have such faith. Not only Rāma alone had such energy; I too have such energy. Not only Rāma alone had such wisdom; I too have such wisdom. [With these qualities] Rāma came to know this Dharma himself, to understand it himself, to realize it himself. Why should I not get to know this Dharma myself, to understand it myself, to realize it myself?”

Because I wished to realize this Dharma, I went and dwelled alone and in seclusion, in an empty and quiet place. With a mind free from indolence, I practiced energetically. Having dwelled alone and in seclusion, in an empty and quiet place, with a mind free from indolence, practicing energetically, in no long time I realized that Dharma.

Having realized that Dharma, I again approached Uddaka Rāmaputta and asked him, “Uddaka, is this the Dharma that your father Rāma came to know himself, to understand himself, to realize himself, namely: completely transcending the sphere of nothingness to attain and dwell in the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception?”

Uddaka Rāmaputta answered me, saying, “Venerable one, this is [indeed] the Dharma that my father Rāma came to know himself, to understand himself, and to realize himself, namely: completely transcending the sphere of nothingness to attain and dwell in the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.”

Uddaka Rāmaputta further said to me, “Venerable one, just as my father Rāma realized this Dharma, so too have you; just as you have realized this Dharma, so too did my father. Venerable one, come and share the leadership of this group!”<sup>245</sup> Thus Uddaka Rāmaputta, being the teacher, regarded me also as a teacher, thereby giving me the highest respect, the highest support, and the highest appreciation.

I thought again, “This Dharma does not lead to knowledge, does not lead to awakening, does not lead to nirvana. Let me rather leave this Dharma now and continue seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease . . . free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from defilement.” 777a

I then left this Dharma and continued to seek the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease . . . free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from defilement. I went to a brahmin village called Senā near Uruvelā, south of Elephant Peak Mountain. That area was truly delightful. The mountain forest was lush and the Nerañjarā River was clear and running full up to its banks.

On seeing it, I thought, “This place is truly delightful. The mountain forest is lush and the Nerañjarā River is clear and running full up to its banks. If a clansman wished to train, he could train here. I shall be training, [so] let me now train here!”

[After training], I then took some grass and approached the tree of awakening. On reaching it, I spread out [the grass as] a sitting mat and sat down cross-legged with the determination not to break off my sitting until the taints had been eradicated.<sup>246</sup> I [indeed] did not break off my sitting until the taints had been eradicated.

Seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease, I attained the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease.

Seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement, I attained the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement. Knowledge arose, vision arose, as I established the requisites of awakening. I knew as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”<sup>247</sup>

Having just awakened to the unsurpassable, right and complete awakening, I thought, “To whom should I first teach the Dharma?” I further thought, “Should I now first teach the Dharma to Āḷāra Kālāma?”

At that time there was a deva up in the sky, who said to me, “Great Sage, may you know this: Āḷāra Kālāma passed away seven days ago.” I too came to know myself that Āḷāra Kālāma had passed away seven days ago. I thought again, “It is a great loss for Āḷāra Kālāma that he did not get to hear this Dharma. If he had heard it, he would have quickly understood the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma.”

Having just awakened to the unsurpassable, right, and complete awakening, I thought, “To whom should I first teach the Dharma?” I further thought, “Should I now first teach the Dharma to Uddaka Rāmaputta?”

There was again a deva up in the sky, who said to me: “Great Sage, may you know this: Uddaka Rāmaputta passed away fourteen days ago.”<sup>248</sup>

777b

I also came to know myself that Uddaka Rāmaputta had passed away fourteen days ago.<sup>249</sup> I thought again: “It is a great loss for Uddaka Rāmaputta that he did not get to hear this Dharma. If he had heard it, he would have quickly understood the Dharma in accordance with the Dharma.”

Having just awakened to the unsurpassable, right, and complete awakening, I thought, “To whom should I first teach the Dharma?” I further thought, “The five monks of former times, who supported me in my efforts, were of much benefit [to me]. When I was practicing asceticism, those five monks served me. Should I now first teach the Dharma to the five monks?”

I further thought, “The five monks of former times—where are they now?” With the purified divine eye that transcends [the vision] of human beings I saw that the five monks were in the Deer Park at the dwelling place of seers near Benares. After staying under the tree of awakening [as long as I wished], I gathered my robes, took my bowl, and headed toward Benares, the city of Kāsi.

At that time the heterodox practitioner Upaka, on seeing me coming in the distance, said to me, “Venerable Gotama, your faculties are clear and calm, your appearance is sublime, your face shines with a [bright] radiance. Venerable Gotama, who is your teacher? Under whom do you train in the path? In whose Dharma have you [placed] your faith?” Then I answered Upaka in verse:

I am the supreme victor,
Not attached to anything,
Completely liberated from all craving.
Having awakened on my own, whom should I call teacher?

None is my equal, none my superior.
I have awakened on my own to the unsurpassable awakening.
[I am] the Tathāgata, teacher of devas and human beings,
Complete in understanding, accomplished in power.”

Upaka asked me, “Venerable Gotama, do you call yourself a victor?” Again I answered him in verse:

Victors are like this,
That is, they have eradicated all taints.
I have destroyed all evil states;
Therefore, Upaka, I am [indeed] a victor.

Upaka again asked me, “Venerable Gotama, where are you wishing to go?” Then I answered him in verse:

I am going to Benares,
To beat the sublime drum of the deathless,
To set in motion the unsurpassable wheel of the Dharma,
Which has never before been set in motion in the world.<sup>250</sup>

Upaka said to me, “Venerable Gotama, it may be so.” Having spoken like this, he turned around and left by a side path.<sup>251</sup>

I went on by myself to the Deer Park at the dwelling place of seers.

777c At that time the five monks, having seen me coming in the distance, had come to an agreement among themselves, saying, “Venerable friends, [you] should know that this renunciant Gotama is coming. He is of many desires, many longings. He partakes of fine food and drink, being fond of cereals, rice, and cakes with ghee and honey; and he applies sesame oil to his body. Now that he is coming back here, let us just remain seated, taking care not to stand up to greet him and not to pay homage to him. Have one seat ready, but do not invite him to sit down. When he arrives, say, ‘Friend, if you wish to sit down, do as you wish.’”

Then I arrived at where the five monks were. At that time the five were unable to disregard my extremely dignified bearing and promptly got up from their seats. Some took my robe and bowl, some set out a seat, and some brought water, wishing to wash my feet. I thought, “These confused men! Why are they so irresolute? Having themselves set up a rule, they go against their original decision.”<sup>252</sup> Knowing this, I sat on the seat prepared by the five monks.

At that time the five monks were addressing me by my family name and calling me “friend.” I told them, “Five monks, I am a tathāgata, free from attachment, rightly and fully awakened. You should not address me by my former family name and should not call me ‘friend.’ Why is that? Seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease, I have attained the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease. Seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement, I have attained the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement. I know as it really is: ‘Birth is ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’”

They said to me, “Friend Gotama, formerly you had such a mode of training, followed such a path, and undertook such ascetic practices, yet you were unable to attain superhuman states distinguished by noble knowledge and noble vision. How then could you do so now, when you have many desires and many longings, partaking of fine food and drink, being fond of cooked cereals and rice and cakes with ghee and honey, and applying sesame oil to your body?"<sup>253</sup>

I said to them, "Five monks, formerly did you ever see me like this, with my faculties so clear, calm, and shining with a bright radiance?"<sup>254</sup>

Then the five monks answered me, saying, "Formerly, friend, we did not see your faculties so clear, calm, and shining with a bright radiance. [But] now, friend Gotama, your faculties are [indeed] clear and calm, your appearance is sublime, and your face does shine with a bright radiance."

I then addressed them, saying,<sup>255</sup> "Five monks, you should know that there are two extreme practices that those on the path should not cultivate. The first is attachment to sensual pleasures, which is a low activity practiced by worldly persons. The second is self-tormenting, [inflicting] pain on oneself, which is an ignoble state and is not connected with what is beneficial.<sup>256</sup> Five monks, giving up these two extremes, take the middle path that accomplishes vision, accomplishes knowledge, accomplishes certainty, and brings mastery, which leads to knowledge, leads to awakening, and leads to nirvana. It is the eightfold right path: right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight."

778a

Wishing to instruct the five monks by turns, I instructed and guided two of them, while the other three went begging for almsfood. The food brought back by the three was sufficient for the six [of us] to eat. [Then] I instructed and guided [those] three, while the other two went begging for almsfood. The food brought back by the two was sufficient for the six [of us] to eat.

Being taught by me like this and guided like this, seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease, they attained the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease. Seeking the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement, they attained the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement. Knowledge and vision arose in them and they established the requisites of awakening. They knew as it really is: "Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence."

Then the World-honored One instructed them further, “Five monks, there are the five strands of sensual pleasure, which are desirable, agreeable, recalled by the mind, and connected with delight and sensuality. What are the five? Visible forms known by the eye, sounds known by the ear, odors known by the nose, flavors known by the tongue, and tangibles known by the body.

“Five monks, [consider] an unlearned ignorant worldling who does not visit good [Dharma] friends, who has not understood the noble Dharma and is not guided by the noble Dharma. Being touched [by these five strands of sensual pleasure], he is polluted by greed and attachment [for them]. Conceited, he accepts them, not seeing the danger [in them], not seeing an escape [from them], but grasping at them and engaging with them. You should know that he is at the mercy of Māra, the Evil One; he is under the power of Māra, the Evil One; he has fallen into the hands of Māra, the Evil One. Bound by Māra’s net, bound in Māra’s bonds, he is unable to escape from Māra’s bonds.

“Five monks, he is just like a wild deer that is bound by bonds. You should know that it is at the mercy of the hunter, under the power of the hunter. Having fallen into the hands of the hunter, bound by the hunter’s net, it is unable to escape when the hunter comes.

“It is the same, five monks, with an unlearned ignorant worldling who does not visit good [Dharma] friends, who has not understood the noble Dharma, and is not guided by the noble Dharma. Being touched by these five strands of sensual pleasure, he is polluted by greed and attachment [for them]. Conceited, he accepts them, not seeing the danger [in them] and not seeing an escape [from them], but grasping at them and engaging with them. You should know that he is at the mercy of Māra, the Evil One; he is under the power of Māra, the Evil One; he has fallen into the hands of Māra, the Evil One. Bound by Māra’s net, bound by Māra’s bonds, he is unable to escape from Māra’s bonds.

“Five monks, [consider] a learned noble disciple who does visit good [Dharma] friends, who has understood the noble Dharma and moreover is guided by the noble Dharma. Not being touched by the five strands of sensual pleasure, he is not polluted, having no greed and no attachment in regard to them. Not being conceited, he does not grasp at them or engage with them, [instead] seeing the danger [in them] and seeing the escape from them. You should know that he is not at the mercy of Māra, the Evil One; not under the power of Māra, the Evil One; he has not fallen into the hands of Māra, the Evil One. Not bound by Māra's net, not bound in Māra's bonds, he is able to escape from Māra's bonds. 778b “Five monks, he is just like a wild deer that has escaped from its bonds. You should know that it is not at the mercy of the hunter, not under the power of the hunter. Not having fallen into the hands of the hunter, not bound by the hunter's net, it is able to escape when the hunter comes.

“It is the same, five monks, with the learned noble disciple who visits good [Dharma] friends, who has understood the noble Dharma, and moreover is guided by the noble Dharma. Not being touched by the five strands of sensual pleasure, he is not polluted by greed and attachment in regard to them. Not being conceited,<sup>257</sup> he does not grasp at them or engage with them, [instead] seeing the danger [in them] and seeing the escape from them. You should know that he is not at the mercy of Māra, the Evil One; not under the power of Māra, the Evil One; he has not fallen into the hands of Māra, the Evil One. Not bound by Māra's net, not bound in Māra's bonds, he escapes from Māra's bonds.

“Five monks, there is a time when there appears in the world a tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, knower of the world, unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, a buddha, an exalted one.<sup>258</sup>

“[A monk] abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom. Secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . he dwells having attained the fourth absorption.

“With his mind concentrated and purified in this way, without defilement, without affliction, malleable, well steadied, having attained imperturbability, he directs his mind to the realization of the higher knowledge of the destruction of the taints.<sup>259</sup>

He knows as it really is: ‘This is dukkha.’ He knows [as it really is]: ‘This is the arising of dukkha.’ He knows [as it really is]: ‘This is the cessation of dukkha.’ He knows as it really is: ‘This is the path to the cessation of dukkha.’

“He knows as it really is: ‘These are the taints.’ He knows [as it really is]: ‘This is the arising of the taints.’ He knows [as it really is]: ‘This is the cessation of the taints.’ He knows as it really is: ‘This is the path to the cessation of the taints.’

“Knowing like this, seeing like this, his mind is liberated from the taint of sensual desire . . . from the taint of existence, his mind is liberated from the taint of ignorance. It being liberated, he knows it is liberated, knowing as it really is: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’

778c

“At that time he is at ease when walking, at ease when standing, at ease when sitting, and at ease when reclining. Why is that? He sees within himself that the countless evil and unwholesome states have been eradicated. For this reason he is at ease when walking, at ease when standing, at ease when sitting, and at ease when reclining.

“Five monks, it is just as, in a secluded spot, a place without people, there might be a wild deer which is at ease when walking, at ease when standing, at ease when sitting, and at ease when reclining. Why is that? That wild deer is not within the range of a hunter. It is for this reason that it is at ease when walking, at ease when standing, at ease when sitting, and at ease when reclining.<sup>260</sup>

“Five monks, [in the same way] a monk who, through eradication of the taints, dwells having attained the taint-free liberation of the mind and liberation through wisdom knows it himself, understands it himself, and realizes it himself. He knows as it really is: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.’ At that time he is at ease when walking, at ease when standing, at ease when sitting, and at ease when reclining. Why is that? He sees within himself that the countless evil and unwholesome states have been eradicated. It is for this reason that he is at ease when walking, at ease when standing, at ease when sitting, and at ease when reclining.

“Five monks, this is called liberation without remainder, this is called the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from disease, the unsurpassable peace of nirvana that is free from old age . . . free from death . . . free from worry and sadness . . . free from defilement.”

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

205. The Discourse on the Five Lower Fetters<sup>261</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park. At that time the World-honored One said to the monks, "I once taught you about the five lower fetters. Do you remember that?" The monks were silent and did not reply.

A second and a third time the World-honored One said to the monks, "I once taught you about the five lower fetters. Do you remember that?" And a second and a third time the monks were silent and did not reply.<sup>262</sup>

At that time the venerable Mālunkyaputta was among that assembly. Then the venerable Mālunkyaputta rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said, "I remember the World-honored One having once taught about the five lower fetters."

The World-honored One asked, "Mālunkyaputta, [how] do you remember my having once taught about the five lower fetters?"

The venerable Mālunkyaputta replied:

I remember the World-honored One once teaching that the first lower fetter is sensual desire . . . [the second lower fetter is] hatred . . . [the third lower fetter is] identity view . . . [the fourth lower fetter is] clinging to precepts . . . I remember the World-honored One [once] teaching that the fifth lower fetter is doubt.

The World-honored One rebuked him, saying:

Mālunkyaputta, how did you memorize my teaching about the five lower fetters? Mālunkyaputta, from whose mouth did you [hear and then] memorize my teaching about the five lower fetters?

Mālunkyaputta, will not many heterodox practitioners come and censure you, using the simile of the infant boy? Mālunkyaputta, a young tender infant sleeping on their back has no notion of sensual desire; how could their mind be entangled in sensual desire? Yet, because of their disposition to an underlying tendency, one speaks of their underlying tendency to sensual desire.

Mālunkyaputta, a young tender infant sleeping on their back has no notion of a living being; how could their mind be entangled in hatred? Yet, because of their disposition to an underlying tendency, one speaks of their underlying tendency to hatred.

779a Mālunkyaputta, a young tender infant sleeping on their back has no notion of identity; how could their mind be entangled in identity view? Yet, because of their disposition to an underlying tendency, one speaks of their underlying tendency to identity view.

Mālunkyaputta, a young tender infant sleeping on their back has no notion of precepts; how could their mind be entangled in clinging to precepts? Yet, because of their disposition to an underlying tendency, one speaks of their underlying tendency to cling to precepts.

Mālunkyaputta, a young tender infant sleeping on their back has no notion of Dharma; how could their mind be entangled in doubt? Yet, because of their disposition to an underlying tendency, one speaks of their underlying tendency to doubt.

Mālunkyaputta, will not many heterodox practitioners come and censure you, using the simile of the infant?

Then the venerable Mālunkyaputta, having been rebuked to his face by the World-honored One, was sad and distressed. He lowered his head in silence, unable to reply, as if immersed in thought. At that time, having rebuked Mālunkyaputta to his face, the World-honored One remained silent.

At that time the venerable Ānanda was standing behind the World-honored One holding a fan to fan him. Then the venerable Ānanda extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, now is the right time, Well-gone One, now is the right time for the World-honored One to teach the five lower fetters to the monks. Having heard it from the World-honored One, the monks will receive it and remember it well.

The World-honored One said, “Ānanda, listen closely and pay proper attention.”

The venerable Ānanda said, “Certainly, we shall listen and receive the teaching.”

The Buddha said:

Ānanda, suppose that someone is entangled in sensual desires. Sensual desire having arisen in his mind, he does not really know how to abandon it. In him, not really knowing how to abandon it, sensual desire evolves and flourishes out of control and he cannot get rid of it. This is a lower fetter.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is entangled in hatred. Hatred having arisen in his mind, he does not really know how to abandon it. In him, not really knowing how to abandon it, hatred evolves and flourishes out of control and he cannot get rid of it. This is a lower fetter.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is entangled in identity view. Identity view having arisen in his mind, he does not really know how to abandon it. In him, not really knowing how to abandon it, identity view evolves and flourishes out of control and he cannot get rid of it. This is a lower fetter.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is entangled in clinging to precepts. Clinging to precepts having arisen in his mind, he does not really know how to abandon it. In him, not really knowing how to abandon it, clinging to precepts evolves and flourishes out of control and he cannot get rid of it. This is a lower fetter.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is entangled in doubt. Doubt having arisen in his mind, he does not really know how to abandon it. In him, not really knowing how to abandon it, doubt evolves and flourishes out of control and he cannot get rid of it. This is a lower fetter.

Ānanda, it is by relying on a path, relying on a way, that the five lower fetters are eradicated. That someone might, without relying on this path, without relying on this way, eradicate the five lower fetters—that is certainly not possible.

Ānanda, he is just like a man who wishes to get heartwood and is seeking 779b
it. Because he is seeking heartwood, he takes an ax and goes into the forest. This man sees a tree complete with roots, trunk, branches, leaves, and heartwood. That this man might, without cutting the roots and trunk, get heartwood to take home with him—that is certainly not possible.

In the same way, Ānanda, it is by relying on a path, relying on a way, that the five lower fetters are eradicated. That one might, without relying on this path, without relying on this way, eradicate the five lower fetters—that is certainly not possible.

699a      Ānanda, it is by relying on a path, relying on a way, that the five lower fetters are eradicated. That someone might, by relying on this path, relying on this way, eradicate the five lower fetters—that is certainly possible.

Ānanda, he is just like a man who wishes to get heartwood and is seeking it. Because he is seeking heartwood, he takes an ax and goes into the forest. This man sees a tree complete with roots, trunk, branches, leaves, and heartwood. That this man might, by cutting the roots and trunk, get heartwood to take home with him—that is certainly possible.

In the same way, Ānanda, it is by relying on a path, relying on a way, that the five lower fetters are eradicated. That one might, by relying on this path, relying on this way, eradicate the five lower fetters—that is certainly possible.

Ānanda, by relying on what path, by relying on what way, are the five lower fetters eradicated?<sup>263</sup>

Ānanda, suppose that someone is not entangled in sensual desires, and that when the entanglement of sensual desire arises [in his mind], he really knows how to abandon it. Really knowing how to abandon it, he ceases to be entangled in sensual desire.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is not entangled in hatred, and that when the entanglement of hatred arises [in his mind], he really knows how to abandon it. Really knowing how to abandon it, he ceases to be entangled in hatred.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is not entangled in identity view, and that when the entanglement of identity view arises [in his mind], he really knows how to abandon it. Really knowing how to abandon it, he ceases to be entangled in identity view.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is not entangled in clinging to precepts, and that when the entanglement of clinging to precepts arises [in his mind], he really knows how to abandon it. Really knowing how to abandon it, he ceases to be entangled in clinging to precepts.

Ānanda, suppose that someone is not entangled in doubt, and that when the entanglement of doubt arises [in his mind], he really knows how to abandon it. Really knowing how to abandon it, he ceases to be entangled in doubt.

Ānanda, by relying on this path, by relying on this way, the five lower fetters are eradicated.

Ānanda, suppose that the river Ganges is full, with the water right up to its banks, and that a man, wanting to [attend to] some matter on the farther bank, wishes to cross over the river. He thinks, “This river Ganges is full, with the water right up to its banks. I have some matter [to attend to] on the farther bank and wish to cross over; [but] my body lacks the strength that would enable me to swim safely to that farther bank.” Ānanda, one should know that man as lacking strength.

In the same way, Ānanda, if a person’s mind is not directed toward awakening, cessation, and nirvana, not confident about it, not established in it, not committed to it, [then], Ānanda, one should know this person to be like that feeble man, lacking strength.

779c

Ānanda, suppose that the river Ganges is full, with the water right up to its banks and that a man, wanting to [attend to] some matter on the farther bank, wishes to cross over the river. He thinks, “This river Ganges is full, with the water right up to its banks. I have some matter [to attend to] on the farther bank and wish to cross over; and my body now has the strength that would enable me to swim safely to that farther bank.” Ānanda, one should know that man as having strength.

In the same way, Ānanda, if a person’s mind is directed toward awakening, cessation, and nirvana, confident about it, established in it, committed to it, [then], Ānanda, one should know this person to be like that man who has strength.

Ānanda, suppose a mountain stream that is very deep and very broad, with a quick-flowing and powerful current sweeping much flotsam along, and with neither ferry nor bridge; and suppose that a man comes along who has some matter [to attend to] on the farther bank and is seeking a way to cross over.<sup>264</sup> As he is seeking a way to cross over, he thinks, “Now, this mountain stream is very deep and very broad, with a quick-flowing and powerful current sweeping much flotsam along, and with neither ferry nor bridge by which one could cross it. I have some matter [to attend to] on the farther bank and want to cross over. By what means can I safely reach that farther bank?”

He further thinks, “Let me now collect grass and sticks on this bank and bind them together to make a raft, boarding which I can cross over.” So he collects grass and sticks on the bank, binds them together to make a raft, boards it, and crosses over, safely reaching the farther bank.

In the same way, Ānanda, it may be that a monk lays hold of disenchantment, inclines to disenchantment, and becomes established in disenchantment through having appeased bodily evils and through attaining mental separation and concentration. Secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, he dwells having attained the first absorption, in which there is [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion.

780a On the basis of this attainment, he contemplates the rise and fall of feeling.<sup>265</sup> Having, on the basis of this attainment, contemplated the rise and fall of feeling and become established in it, he will certainly attain the destruction of the taints. If, [however], despite being established in it, he does not attain destruction of the taints, then he must progress to a higher level of tranquility.<sup>266</sup>

How does he progress to a higher level of tranquility? With the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, he dwells having attained the second absorption, which is without [directed] awareness and without [sustained] contemplation and with rapture and happiness born of concentration.

On the basis of this attainment, he contemplates the rise and fall of feeling. Having, on the basis of this attainment, contemplated the rise and fall of feeling and become established in it, he will certainly attain the destruction of the taints. If, [however], despite being established in it, he does not attain the destruction of the taints, then he must progress to a higher level of tranquility.

How does he progress to a higher level of tranquility? Secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without longings, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, he dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode.

On the basis of this attainment, he contemplates the rise and fall of feeling. Having, on the basis of this attainment, contemplated the rise and fall of feeling and become established in it, he will certainly attain the destruction of the taints. If, [however], despite being established in it, he does not attain the destruction of the taints, then he must progress to a higher level of tranquility.

How does he progress to a higher level of tranquility? With the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, and with purity of mindfulness and equanimity, he dwells having attained the fourth absorption.

On the basis of this attainment he contemplates the rise and fall of feeling. Having, on the basis of this attainment, contemplated the rise and fall of feeling and become established in it, he will certainly attain the destruction of the taints. If, [however], despite being established in it, he does not attain the destruction of the taints, then he must progress to a higher level of tranquility.

How does he progress to a higher level of tranquility? By completely transcending perceptions of form, with the cessation of perceptions of sensory impact, not aware of perceptions of diversity, [aware] of infinite space,<sup>267</sup> he dwells having attained the sphere of infinite space.

On the basis of this attainment, he contemplates the rise and fall of feeling. Having, on the basis of this attainment, contemplated the rise and fall of feeling and become established in it, he will certainly attain the destruction of the taints. If, [however], despite being established in it, he does not attain the destruction of the taints, then he must progress to a higher level of tranquility.

How does he progress to a higher level of tranquility? By completely transcending the sphere of infinite space, [aware] of infinite consciousness, he dwells having attained the sphere of infinite consciousness.

On the basis of this attainment, he contemplates the rise and fall of feeling. Having, on the basis of this attainment, contemplated the rise and fall of feeling and become established in it, he will certainly attain the destruction of the taints. If, [however], despite being established in it, he does not attain the destruction of the taints, then he must progress to a higher level of tranquility.

How does he progress to a higher level of tranquility? By completely transcending the sphere of infinite consciousness, [aware that] ‘there is nothing,’ he dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness.

Whatever feeling there is, be it pleasant or painful or neutral, he contemplates that feeling as impermanent, contemplates its rise and fall, contemplates its fading away, contemplates its cessation, contemplates its abandonment, and contemplates its relinquishment. Having in this way contemplated this feeling as impermanent, contemplated its rise and fall, contemplated its fading away, contemplated its cessation, contemplated its abandonment, and contemplated its relinquishment, he does not cling to this world. Not clinging to this world, he is without agitation. Being without agitation, he attains final nirvana, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

Suppose that not far from a village there is a large plantain tree, and suppose a man with an ax were to cut down that plantain tree and cut it into pieces, cutting it into ten parts, or a hundred parts. Having cut it into ten parts or a hundred parts, he peels off leaf after leaf but does not see any nodes, let alone heartwood.<sup>268</sup>

780b In the same way, Ānanda, whatever feeling there is, be it pleasant or painful or neutral, the monk contemplates that feeling as impermanent, contemplates its rise and fall, contemplates its fading away, contemplates its cessation, contemplates its abandonment, and contemplates its relinquishment. Having in this way contemplated this feeling as impermanent, contemplated its rise and fall, contemplated its fading away, contemplated its cessation, contemplated its abandonment, and contemplated its relinquishment, he does not cling to this world. Not clinging to this world, he is without agitation. Being without agitation, he attains final nirvana, knowing as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

Then the venerable Ānanda extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, it is most wonderful, it is most remarkable, how the World-honored One has explained to the monks abandonment and separation from the taints, [how he has] explained going beyond and crossing over the taints in reliance on one support after another. Yet the monks do not all quickly attain the highest, that is, complete and total cessation.<sup>269</sup>

The World-honored One said:

It is like this, Ānanda; it is like this, Ānanda. It is most wonderful, it is most remarkable how I have explained to the monks abandonment and separation from the taints, [how I have] explained going beyond and crossing over the taints in reliance on one support after another. Yet the monks do not all quickly attain the highest, that is, complete and total cessation. Why is that? It is because persons possess excellence according as their practice of the path is either refined or gross. And because their practice of the path is refined or gross, persons in turn possess excellence accordingly. Ānanda, for this reason I say, “Persons possess excellence accordingly.”

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

206. The Discourse on Mental Defilements<sup>270</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvathī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One said to the monks:

If a monk or a nun does not uproot five defilements in the mind and does not unfasten five shackles in the mind, then I say that this monk or nun will certainly regress in the Dharma. What are the five defilements that have not been uprooted in the mind?

Suppose that someone is doubtful about the World-honored One, hesitant, [and thus] does not open the mind, does not release the mind, does not allow the mind to become quiet. If someone is doubtful about the World-honored One, hesitant, [and thus] does not open the mind, does not release the mind, does not allow the mind to become quiet, then this is the first mental defilement that has not been uprooted, namely the one relating to the World-honored One.

It is the same for [being doubtful about] the Dharma . . . the precepts<sup>271</sup> . . . the instructions . . . suppose that someone is [doubtful about] companions in the holy life who are praised by the World-honored One. If someone frequently reproves them, devalues them, annoys them, and encroaches on them, [and thus] does not open the mind, does not release the mind, does not allow the mind to become quiet, then this is the fifth mental defilement that has not been uprooted, namely the one relating to companions in the holy life.

780c What are the five shackles in the mind that have not been unfastened?<sup>272</sup> Suppose that someone is not separated from pollution regarding the body, not separated from sensual desire, not separated from craving, not separated from thirst. If he is not separated from pollution regarding the body, not separated from sensual desire, not separated from craving, not separated from thirst, then his mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and if on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the first shackle in the mind that has not been unfastened, namely the one regarding the body.

Again, [suppose that] someone is not separated from pollution regarding sensuality, not separated from sensual desire, not separated from craving, not separated from thirst. If he is not separated from pollution regarding sensuality, not separated from sensual desire, not separated from craving, not separated from thirst, then his mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and if on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the second shackle in the mind that has not been unfastened, namely the one regarding sensuality.

Again, [he heard when] someone [else] engages in talk that is noble and connected with benefit, that is gentle and free from the hindrance of doubt, namely talk about morality, talk about concentration, talk about wisdom, talk about liberation, talk about knowledge and vision of liberation, talk about lessening, talk about not socializing, talk about fewness of wants, talk about contentment, talk about abandoning, talk about dispassion, talk about cessation, talk about meditation practice, talk about dependent arising, such talk [appropriate for] monks and renunciants. [Hearing it] his mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and if on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the third shackle in the mind that has not been unfastened, namely the one regarding [receptiveness to appropriate] talk.

Again, someone frequently talks with the common people and associates with them, is disorderly, haughty, and without learning. If someone frequently talks with the common people and associates with them, is disorderly, haughty, and without learning, then his mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and if on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the fourth shackle in the mind that has not been unfastened, namely the one regarding association.

Again, because of having attained a little, he settles for that and does not seek to progress further. If because of having attained a little, someone settles for that and does not seek to progress further, then his mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind does not progress, does not become quiet, does not become still, does not become released, and if on his own impulse he breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the fifth shackle in the mind that has not been unfastened, namely the one regarding progress.

If a monk or a nun does not uproot these five defilements in the mind and does not unfasten these five shackles in the mind, then I say that monk or nun is certainly of a nature to regress. If [however], a monk or a nun has well uprooted the five defilements in the mind and has well unfastened the five shackles in the mind, then I say that monk or nun is of a nature to [become] pure.

What are the five defilements in the mind that have been well uprooted? Suppose that someone is not doubtful about the World-honored One, not hesitant, [and thus] opens the mind, releases the mind, and allows the mind to become quiet. If someone is not doubtful about the World-honored One, not hesitant, [and thus] opens the mind, releases the mind, and allows the mind to become quiet, then this is the first mental defilement that has been well uprooted, namely the one regarding the World-honored One.

781a

It is the same for [not being doubtful] about the Dharma . . . about the precepts . . . about the instructions . . . suppose that someone is [not doubtful] about companions in the holy life who have been praised by the World-honored One; he does not reprove them repeatedly, does not undervalue them, annoy them, or encroach on them, [and thus] he opens the mind, releases the mind, allows the mind to become quiet. This is the fifth mental defilement that has been well uprooted, namely the one regarding companions in the holy life.

What are the five shackles in the mind that have been unfastened? Suppose that someone is separated from pollution regarding the body, separated from sensual desire, separated from craving, separated from thirst. If he is separated from pollution regarding the body, separated from sensual desire, separated from craving, separated from thirst, then his mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the first shackle in the mind that has been unfastened, namely the one regarding the body.

Again, someone is separated from pollution regarding sensuality, separated from sensual desire, separated from craving, separated from thirst. If someone is separated from pollution regarding sensuality, separated from sensual desire, separated from craving, separated from thirst, then his mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the second shackle in the mind that has been unfastened, namely the one regarding sensuality.

Again, [he heard when] someone [else] engages in talk that is noble and connected with benefit, gentle, and free from the hindrance of doubt, namely: talk about morality, talk about concentration, talk about wisdom, talk about liberation, talk about knowledge and vision of liberation, talk about lessening, talk about not socializing, talk about fewness of wants, talk about contentment, talk about abandoning, talk about dispassion, talk about cessation, talk about meditation practice, talk about dependent arising—such talk [appropriate] for monks and renunciants. [Hearing it] his mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the third shackle in the mind that has been unfastened, namely the one regarding [receptiveness to appropriate] talk.

Again, someone does not frequently talk with the common people and associate with them, is not disorderly, not haughty, and has learning. If someone does not frequently talk with the common people and associate with them, is not disorderly, not haughty, and has learning, then his mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and if he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the fourth shackle in the mind that has been unfastened, namely the one regarding association.

Again, he does not, because of having attained a little, settle for that, but seeks to progress further. If someone does not, because of having attained a little, settle for that but seeks to progress further, then his mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice. If the mind progresses, becomes quiet, becomes still, becomes released, and if he [never] on his own impulse breaks off his meditation practice, then this is the fifth shackle in the mind that has been unfastened, namely the one regarding progress.

781b

If a monk or a nun has well uprooted these five defilements in the mind and has well unfastened these five shackles in the mind, then I say that this monk or nun has become pure by nature. Being established in these ten respects, they [should] cultivate five further states.

What are the five? They should cultivate the basis for supernormal power that has concentration of the mind and effort due to desire, based on separation, based on dispassion, based on cessation, based on abandoning, inclining toward the uncreated. They should cultivate the basis for supernormal power that has concentration of the mind and effort due to energy . . . [purity of] the mind . . . investigation, based on seclusion, based on dispassion, based on cessation, based on abandoning, inclining toward the uncreated. Tenacity is the fifth.

One who has accomplished these fifteen states, including tenacity, has accomplished self-mastery and will certainly know, certainly see, certainly become fully awakened, and has arrived at the door to the deathless. He is close to nirvana. I say he will not fail to attain nirvana.

It is just as a hen with ten or twelve eggs that she has sat on according to time, kept warm according to time, and watched over according to time to see if the chicks are emerging. Among those chicks one may, by itself, break through the shell with its beak and claws and be the first to emerge safely.

In the same way, a monk who has accomplished these fifteen states, including tenacity, has accomplished self-mastery and will certainly know, certainly see, certainly become fully awakened, certainly arrive at the door to the deathless. He is close to nirvana. I say he will not fail to attain nirvana.<sup>273</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

207. The Discourse to Sakuludāyī (1)<sup>274</sup>

781c Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary, accompanied by a great sangha of one thousand two hundred and fifty monks who were observing the rains retreat.<sup>275</sup>

At that time, when the night was over, at dawn, the World-honored One put on his [outer] robe, took his bowl, and entered Rājagaha to beg almsfood. Having begged almsfood [and partaken of it], he put away his [outer] robe and bowl, washed his hands and feet, put his sitting mat over his shoulder, and went into the Peacocks' Grove, a park [frequented by] heterodox practitioners.

At that time there was, in the Peacocks' Grove, a heterodox practitioner named Sakuludāyī, a renowned leader and teacher of a congregation, of great fame and respected by the people, the head of a great congregation of disciples, five hundred heterodox practitioners who honored him.

He was staying with a great congregation that was noisy, agitated and disorderly, creating a great clamor, discussing various kinds of irrelevant talk, namely talk about kings, talk about thieves, talk about battles, talk about food, talk about robes and blankets, talk about married women, talk about girls, talk about adulterous women, talk about the world, talk about wilderness areas, talk about what is in the ocean, talk about the people of the country—they were seated together talking such kinds of irrelevant talk.

Seeing the Buddha coming in the distance, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī admonished his congregation, “Keep quiet, all of you! The renunciant Gotama is coming. His congregation is silent, they always delight in silence and praise silence. If he sees that this congregation [of ours] is silent, perhaps he will come and join us.” Having ordered his congregation to be silent, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī remained silent himself.

The World-honored One approached the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī. The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī promptly rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha, and said,<sup>276</sup> “Welcome, renunciant Gotama! It is a long time since the renunciant Gotama came here. Please be seated on this seat.”

The World-honored One sat on the seat prepared by the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī. Having exchanged greetings with the World-honored One, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī stepped back and sat to one side.

The World-honored One asked, “Udāyī, what were you discussing just now? For what matter have you been seated together here?”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, let be that talk. That talk was not profound. [If] the renunciant Gotama wishes to hear about that talk, it will not be difficult to hear about it on a later occasion.”

Three times the World-honored One asked like this, “Udāyī, what were you discussing just now? For what matter have you been seated together here?”<sup>277</sup> And three times the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, let be that talk. That talk was not profound. [If] the renunciant Gotama wishes to hear about that talk, it will not be difficult to hear about it on a later occasion.”

[Then Sakuludāyī said]:

But since the renunciant Gotama has three times expressed his wish to hear it, I shall now report it.

782a

Gotama, we were seated together with many brahmins from the country of Kosala in the teaching hall of the Kosalans, having the following discussion: “It is of great benefit for the people of Aṅga and Magadha, the people of Aṅga and Magadha are getting great benefit, in that a congregation that is such a great field of merit, namely [the congregation of] Pūraṇa Kassapa, is spending the rains retreat at Rājagaha.” Why is that?

Gotama, Pūraṇa Kassapa is a renowned leader and teacher of a congregation, of great fame and respected by the people, head of a great congregation of disciples, five hundred heterodox practitioners who honor him, and he is spending the rains retreat here in Rājagaha. In the same way Makkhali Gosāla . . . Saṅjaya Belaṭṭhiputta . . . Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta . . . Pakudha Kaccāyana . . . Ajita Kesakambalī . . .

Gotama, Ajita Kesakambalī is a renowned leader and teacher of a congregation, of great fame and respected by the people. He is the head of a great congregation of disciples, five hundred heterodox practitioners who honor him, and he is spending the rains retreat here in Rājagaha.

Continuing like this, we also talked about the renunciant Gotama, [saying]: “This renunciant Gotama is a renowned leader and teacher of a congregation, of great fame and respected by the people. He is leading a great sangha of one thousand two hundred and fifty monks who honor him and are spending the rains retreat [with him] here in Rājagaha.”<sup>278</sup>

Gotama, we then had this thought, “Now, out of these honorable renunciants and brahmins, which one is respected by his disciples, honored, venerated, and treated with respect?<sup>279</sup> [Which one is] not disparaged by his disciples’ disparaging his teaching? [Which one] has no disciples that challenge their teacher, [saying,] ‘This can never be; it does not match up; it does not fit,’ and, so saying, abandon him and leave?”

Gotama, we then thought, “Pūraṇa Kassapa is not respected by his disciples, he is not honored, venerated, and treated with respect by them. He is disparaged by his disciples’ disparaging his teaching. Many of his disciples challenge their teacher, [saying,] ‘This is not possible; it does not match up; it does not fit,’ and, so saying, they abandon him and leave.”

Gotama, once in the past Pūraṇa Kassapa, while with his congregation of disciples, repeatedly raised his hand and called out, “Stop, all of you! These persons have not come to ask you about [this] matter; they are asking me about this matter. You are not capable of resolving this matter; [only] I am capable of resolving this matter.” However, the disciples went on talking among themselves about other matters, not waiting for their teacher to finish his explanation of the matter [in question].<sup>280</sup>

Gotama, we then thought, “In these ways Pūraṇa Kassapa is not respected by his disciples. He is not honored, venerated, and treated with respect by them. He is disparaged by his disciples’ disparaging his teaching. Many of his disciples challenge their teacher, [saying,] ‘This is not possible; it does not match up; it does not fit,’ and, so saying, they abandon him and leave.”

In the same way Makkhalī Gosāla . . . Saṅjaya Belaṭṭhiputta . . . Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta . . . Pakudha Kaccāyana . . . Ajita Kesakambalī . . .

782b

Gotama, we thought, “Ajita Kesakambalī is not respected by his disciples. He is not honored, venerated, and treated with respect by them. He is disparaged by his disciples’ disparaging his teaching. Many of his disciples challenge their teacher, [saying,] ‘This is not possible; it does not match up; it does not fit,’ and, so saying, they abandon him and leave.”

Gotama, once in the past Ajita Kesakambalī, while with his congregation of disciples, repeatedly raised his hand and called out, “Stop, all of you! These persons have not come to ask you about [that] matter; they are asking me about this matter. You are not capable of resolving this matter; [only] I am capable of resolving this matter.” However, the disciples went on talking among themselves about other matters, not waiting for their teacher to finish his explanation of the matter [in question].

Gotama, we then thought, “In these ways Ajita Kesakambalī is not respected by his disciples. He is not honored, venerated and treated with respect by them. He is disparaged by his disciples’ disparaging his teaching. Many of his disciples challenge their teacher, [saying,] ‘This is not possible; it does not match up; it does not fit,’ and, so saying, they abandon him and leave.”

Gotama, we then had this further thought, “The renunciant Gotama is respected by his disciples. He is honored, venerated, and treated with respect by them. He is not disparaged by his disciples’ disparaging his teaching. None of his disciples challenge their teacher, [saying,] ‘This is not possible; it is not proper; it does not fit,’ and, so saying, abandon him and leave.”

Gotama, once in the past the renunciant Gotama was teaching the Dharma surrounded by an immeasurable congregation of hundreds of thousands.<sup>281</sup> Among them was one man who had nodded off and was making a noise by snoring.<sup>282</sup> Another man then addressed this man, saying, “Do not make a noise by snoring after nodding off! Do you not want to hear the sublime teachings taught by the World-honored One, which are like ambrosia?” That other man immediately became silent and made no [more] noise.

Gotama, we then thought, “In these ways the renunciant Gotama is respected by his disciples. He is honored, venerated, and treated with respect by them. He is not disparaged by his disciples’ disparaging his teaching. None of his disciples challenge their teacher, [saying,] ‘This is not possible; this does not match up; this does not fit,’ and, so saying, abandon him and leave.”

Having heard this, the World-honored One asked the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī:

Udāyī, how many qualities do you see in me that cause my disciples to respect, honor, and venerate me, to treat me with respect, always following me and not leaving me?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī said:

Gotama, I see in Gotama five qualities that cause his disciples to respect, honor, and venerate him, to treat him with respect, always following him and not leaving him. What are the five?<sup>283</sup> 782c The renunciant Gotama is contented with coarse robes and praises contentment with coarse robes. That the renunciant Gotama is contented with coarse robes and praises contentment with coarse robes—this is the first quality I see in the renunciant Gotama that causes his disciples to respect, honor, and venerate him, to treat him with respect, always following him and not leaving him.

Again, the renunciant Gotama is contented with coarse food and praises contentment with coarse food. That the renunciant Gotama is contented with coarse food and praises contentment with coarse food—this is the second quality I see in the renunciant Gotama that causes his disciples to respect, honor, and venerate him, to treat him with respect, always following him and not leaving him.

Again, the renunciant Gotama takes little food and praises taking little food. That the renunciant Gotama takes little food and praises taking little food—this is the third quality I see in the renunciant Gotama that causes his disciples to respect, honor, and venerate him, to treat him with respect, always following him and not leaving him.

Again, the renunciant Gotama is contented with coarse dwellings, beds, and seats, and praises contentment with coarse dwellings, beds, and seats. That the renunciant Gotama is contented with coarse dwellings, beds, and seats, and praises contentment with coarse dwellings, beds, and seats—this is the fourth quality I see in the renunciant Gotama that causes his disciples to respect, honor, and venerate him, to treat him with respect, always following him and not leaving him.

Again, the renunciant Gotama dwells in seclusion and praises dwelling in seclusion. That the renunciant Gotama dwells in seclusion and praises dwelling in seclusion—this is the fifth quality I see in the renunciant Gotama that causes his disciples to respect, honor, and venerate him, to treat him with respect, always following him and not leaving him.

These are the five qualities I see in the renunciant Gotama that cause his disciples to respect, honor, and venerate him, to treat him with respect, always following him and not leaving him.

The World-honored One replied:

Udāyī, it is not these five qualities in me that cause my disciples to respect, honor, and venerate me, to treat me with respect, always following me and not leaving me.

Udāyī, the robes I wear have been perfectly cut with a blade and [then] dyed an unattractive color.<sup>284</sup> Thus, they are perfect robes [although] dyed an unattractive color. Udāyī, some of my disciples are lifelong wearers of robes made of discarded rags. Udāyī, if in saying “Our World-honored One is contented with coarse robes and praises contentment with coarse robes” such disciples were praising me for being contented with coarse robes, then according to this reasoning, they would not respect, honor, worship and treat me with respect, nor would they follow me.

783a

Again, Udāyī, [at times] I eat rice and other grains, well cooked, free of husks and with a limitless variety of flavors. Udāyī, some of my disciples are lifelong practitioners of begging for almsfood consisting of discarded leftovers. Udāyī, if in saying “Our World-honored One is contented with coarse food and praises contentment with coarse food” such disciples were praising me for being contented with coarse food, then according to this reasoning, they would not respect, honor, and venerate me and treat me with respect; nor would they follow me.

Again, Udāyī, I [at times] take food amounting to .<sup>285</sup> Udāyī, some of my disciples might [at times] take food amounting to . Udāyī, if in saying “Our World-honored One takes little food and praises taking little food” such disciples were praising me for being contented with taking little food, then according to this reasoning, they would not respect, honor, and venerate me and treat me with respect; nor would they follow me.

Again, Udāyī, [at times] I may stay in a tall building, or in a pavilion. Udāyī, some of my disciples sleep in the open each night for nine or ten months [of the year].<sup>286</sup> Udāyī, if in saying “Our World-honored One is contented with coarse dwellings, beds, and seats, and praises contentment with coarse dwellings, beds, and seats” such disciples were praising me for being contented with coarse dwellings, beds, and seats, then according to this reasoning, they would not respect, honor, and venerate me and treat me with respect; nor would they follow me.

Again, Udāyī, I am constantly crowded in by monks, nuns, male lay disciples, and female lay disciples. Udāyī, some of my disciples come together in sangha gatherings only once a fortnight, for the sake of the Dharma and [to declare their] purity [at the pāṭimokkha recital]. Udāyī, if in saying “Our World-honored One dwells in seclusion and praises dwelling in seclusion” such disciples were praising me for dwelling in seclusion, then according to this reasoning they would not respect, honor, and venerate me and treat me with respect; nor would they follow me.

Udāyī, it is not because of these five qualities in me that my disciples respect, honor, and venerate me and treat me with respect, always following me and not leaving me.

Udāyī, there are five other qualities in me that cause my disciples to respect, honor, and venerate me, to treat me with respect, always following me and not leaving me. What are the five?

Udāyī, there are among my disciples those who praise me for unsurpassable virtue, saying, “The World-honored One practices virtue and is of great virtue; he does what he says and he says what he does.”<sup>287</sup> Udāyī, in this way my disciples praise me for unsurpassable virtue, and it is because of this that they respect, honor, and venerate me and treat me with respect, always following me and not leaving me.

Again, Udāyī, there are among my disciples those who praise me for unsurpassable wisdom, saying, “The World-honored One practices wisdom and is of supremely great wisdom. If a disputant comes with counterarguments, he will certainly be defeated [by the World-honored One], that is to say, he will be unable to give [satisfactory] explanations in terms of the true Dharma and discipline, and will thus be unable to [satisfactorily] explain his own proclamations.”<sup>288</sup> Udāyī, in this way my disciples praise me for unsurpassable wisdom, and it is because of this that they respect, honor, and venerate me, treating me with respect, always following me and not leaving me. 783b

Again, Udāyī, there are among my disciples those who praise me for unsurpassable knowledge and vision, saying, “The World-honored One dwells with knowledge, not without knowledge; he dwells with vision, not without vision. The Dharma he teaches to his disciples is with causes, not without causes; it is with conditions, not without conditions; it is answerable, not unanswerable; it is with distinctions, not without distinctions.” Udāyī, in this way my disciples praise me for unsurpassable knowledge and vision, and it is because of this that they respect, honor, and venerate me, treating me with respect, always following me and not leaving me.

Again, Udāyī, there are among my disciples those who, feeling disenchanting with the arrow of craving, come and ask me about dukkha as dukkha, about its arising as arising, about its cessation as cessation, and about the path [to its cessation] as the path [to its cessation]. I then answer them about dukkha as dukkha, about its arising as arising, about its cessation as cessation, and about the path [to its cessation] as the path [to its cessation].

Udāyī, in this way if my disciples come and ask me, I satisfy their minds with my answers and arouse their delight. It is because of this that they respect, honor, and venerate me, treating me with respect, always following me and not leaving me.

Again, Udāyī, I explain to my disciples how to attain realization of the higher knowledge of recollection of past lives, or how to attain realization of the higher knowledge of the destruction of the taints.<sup>289</sup>

Udāyī, when my disciples gain experience and deliverance in this true Dharma and discipline and are able to reach the other shore, having become free from doubt and confusion, without vacillation in regard to the wholesome teaching, then it is because of this that they respect, honor, and venerate me, treating me with respect, always following me and not leaving me.

Udāyī, these are the other five qualities in me that cause my disciples to respect, honor, and venerate me, treating me with respect, always following me and not leaving me.

At this the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

It is wonderful, Gotama. It is remarkable how well you have explained this profound matter, as if nourishing my body with ambrosia. Gotama, just as a great rain nourishes the earth, high and low, in the same way the renunciant Gotama has explained well a profound matter to me, as if nourishing my body with ambrosia.

World-honored One, I have understood. Well-gone One, I have comprehended. World-honored One, I now take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One accept me as a lay disciple from this day on until the end of life, as having personally taken refuge for my whole life!<sup>290</sup> 783c Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī was delighted and received it respectfully.

208. The Discourse to Sakuludāyī (2)<sup>291</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary.

Then, when the night was over, at dawn, the World-honored One put on his [outer] robe, took his bowl, and entered Rājagaha to beg for almsfood. Having begged almsfood [and partaken of it], he put away his [outer] robe and bowl, washed his hands and feet, put his sitting mat over his shoulder, and went into the Peacocks' Grove, a park [frequented by] heterodox practitioners.<sup>292</sup>

At that time there was, in the Peacocks' Grove, a heterodox practitioner called Sakuludāyī, a renowned leader and teacher of a congregation, of great fame and respected by the people, the head of a great congregation of disciples, five hundred heterodox practitioners who honored him.

He was staying with a great congregation that was noisy, agitated and disorderly, creating a great clamor, discussing various kinds of irrelevant talk, namely talk about kings, talk about thieves, talk about battles, talk about food, talk about robes and blankets, talk about married women, talk about girls, talk about adulterous women, talk about the world, talk about wilderness areas, talk about what is in the ocean, talk about the people of the country—they were seated together talking such kinds of irrelevant talk.

Seeing the Buddha coming in the distance, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī admonished his congregation, “Keep quiet, all of you! The renunciant Gotama is coming. His congregation is silent; they always delight in silence and praise silence. If he sees that this congregation [of ours] is silent, perhaps he will come and join us.” Having ordered his congregation to be silent, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī remained silent himself.

The World-honored One approached the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī. The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī promptly rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said,<sup>293</sup> “Welcome, renunciant Gotama. It is a long time since the renunciant Gotama came here. Please be seated on this seat.”

Then the World-honored One sat on the seat prepared by the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī. Having exchanged greetings with the World-honored One, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī stepped back and sat to one side.

The World-honored One asked, “Udāyī, what were you discussing just now? For what matter have you been seated together here?” The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, let be that talk. That talk was not profound. [If] the renunciant Gotama wishes to hear about that talk, it will not be difficult to hear about it on a later occasion.”

784a The World-honored One asked like this three times, “Udāyī, what were you discussing just now? For what matter have you been seated together here?”<sup>294</sup> The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied up to three times, “Gotama, let be that talk. That talk was not profound. [If] the renunciant Gotama wishes to hear about that talk, it will not be difficult to hear about it on a later occasion.”

[Then Sakuludāyī said:]

But since the renunciant Gotama has three times expressed his wish to hear it, I shall now report it. Gotama, I have reasoned consideration and I have reflection. I am established in the position of reasoned consideration and in the position of reflection. I [also] have knowledge and skill in debating. [At one time] there was someone who claimed to be truly omniscient, to know all, to see all, to have complete knowledge and complete vision. I approached him and asked him about some matter, but he did not know. Gotama, I thought, “How can this be?”<sup>295</sup>

The World-honored One asked:

Udāyī, you have reasoned consideration and you have reflection. You are established in the position of reasoned consideration and in the position of reflection. You have knowledge and skill in debating. Who was it that claimed to be truly omniscient, to know all, to see all, to have complete knowledge and complete vision but, when you approached and asked him about some matter, did not know?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied:

Gotama, it was Pūraṇa Kassapa. Why is that? Gotama, Pūraṇa Kassapa claimed to be truly omniscient, to know all, to see all, to have complete knowledge and complete vision. I, having reasoned consideration and reflection, being established in the position of reasoned consideration and in the position of reflection, having knowledge and skill in debating, approached him and asked about some matter, but he did not know. Gotama, for this reason I thought, “How can this be?”

It was the same with Makkhali Gosāla, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta, the Nigaṇṭha Nāṭaputta, Pakudha Kaccāyana, and Ajita Kesakambali.<sup>296</sup> Gotama, Ajita Kesakambalī claimed to be truly omniscient, to know all, to see all, to have complete knowledge and complete vision. I, having reasoned consideration and reflection, being established in the position of reasoned consideration and in the position of reflection, having knowledge and skill in debating, approached him and asked about some matter, but he did not know. Gotama, for this reason I thought, “How can this be?”

Gotama, I further thought, “If I approach the renunciant Gotama and ask him about some matter of the past, the renunciant Gotama will certainly be able to answer me about that matter of the past. If I approach the renunciant Gotama and ask him about some matter of the future, the renunciant Gotama will certainly be able to answer me about that matter of the future. Again, according to the matter that I ask the renunciant Gotama about, the renunciant Gotama will certainly answer me regarding the matter that I ask about.”

The World-honored One said:

Stop, stop, Udāyī, you have long been of a different view [from me], of a different belief, [seeking] a different type of happiness, a different type of pleasure, a different type of thinking; consequently you do not fully understand the meaning of what I am saying.<sup>297</sup>

Udāyī, I have disciples who have the causes and the conditions for recalling countless former lives from the past, that is to say, one birth, two births, a hundred births, a thousand births, eons of [world] contraction, eons of [world] expansion, innumerable eons of [world] expansion and contraction. [They recall,] “As the living being named So-and-so, I was born there, with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of nutriment; I experienced this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this. Dying here, I was reborn there; dying there, I was reborn here. I was reborn here with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of nutriment; I experienced this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this.”

784b

If they come and ask me about matters of the past, then I answer them about matters of the past. Likewise, if I approach them and ask about matters of the past, then they answer me about matters of the past. According to the matter I ask them about, they answer me regarding the matter that I asked about.

Again, Udāyī, I have disciples who, with the divine eye that is pure and surpasses human [vision], see beings as they die and as they are reborn as handsome or ugly, superior or inferior, going and coming between good and bad realms, in accordance with the deeds of these beings. They see this as it really is [thus], “If these living beings engaged in evil bodily conduct, evil verbal and mental conduct; if they reviled noble ones, held wrong views, and performed deeds [based on] wrong views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking-up of the body after death, [they] certainly go to a bad realm, being reborn in hell. If [however] these living beings engaged in good bodily conduct, good verbal and mental conduct, if they did not revile noble ones, held right views, and performed actions [based on] right views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking-up of the body after death, [they] certainly go to a good realm, being reborn in heaven.”

If those [disciples] come and ask me about matters of the future, then I answer them about matters of the future. Likewise, if I approach them and ask about matters of the future, then they answer me about matters of the future. According to the matter I ask them about, they answer me regarding the matter that I asked about.<sup>298</sup>

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī said:

Gotama, if this is how it is, then I am entangled in not knowing, I am entangled in not seeing, entangled in delusion and sinking into delusion—that is, when the renunciant Gotama speaks like this, “Stop, stop, Udāyī, you have long been of a different view [from me], of a different belief, [seeking] a different type of happiness, a different type of pleasure, a different type of thinking; consequently, you do not fully understand the meaning of what I am saying.

“Udāyī, I have disciples who have the causes and the conditions for recalling countless former lives from the past, that is to say: one birth, two births, a hundred births, a thousand births, eons of [world] contraction, eons of [world] expansion, countless eons of [world] expansion and contraction. [They recall,] ‘As the living being named So-and-so I was born there, with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of nutriment; I experienced this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this. Dying here, I was reborn there; dying there, I was reborn here. I was reborn here with this family name and this given name; I had this type of life and this type of nutriment; I experienced this type of pleasure and pain; my life span was like this, I survived this long, and my life ended like this.’ 784c

“If they come and ask me about matters of the past, then I answer them about matters of the past. Likewise, if I approach them and ask about matters of the past, then they answer me about matters of the past. According to the matter I ask them about, they answer me regarding the matter that I asked about.

“Again, Udāyī, I have disciples who, with the divine eye which is pure and surpasses human [vision], see beings as they die and as they are reborn as handsome or ugly, superior or inferior, going and coming between good and bad realms, in accordance with the deeds of these beings. They see this as it really is [thus], ‘If these living beings engaged in evil bodily conduct, evil verbal and mental conduct; if they reviled noble ones, held wrong views, and performed deeds [based on] wrong views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking-up of the body after death, [they] certainly go to a bad realm, being reborn in hell. If [however] these living beings engaged in good bodily conduct, good verbal and mental conduct; if they did not revile noble ones, held right views, and performed actions [based on] right views, then because of these causes and conditions, at the breaking-up of the body after death, [they] certainly go to a good realm, being reborn in heaven.’

“If those [disciples] come and ask me about matters of the future, then I answer them about matters of the future. Likewise, if I approach them and ask about matters of the future, then they answer me about matters of the future. According to the matter I ask them about, they answer me regarding the matter that I asked about.”

Gotama, I cannot even recall deeds that I formerly did in this life or the consequences that I formerly got from them. How then could I have the causes and conditions for recollecting events that occurred in countless former lives in the distant past?

Gotama, I cannot even see wind-borne sprites. How then could I see, with the divine eye which is pure and surpasses human [vision], beings as they die and are reborn as handsome or ugly, superior or inferior, going and coming between good and bad realms, in accordance with their [previous] deeds, seeing this as it really is?

Gotama, I am thinking, “If the renunciant Gotama were to ask me about the teaching that I have learned from my teacher, then perhaps I could answer him to his satisfaction.”

The World-honored One asked, “Udāyī, what is that teaching that you have learned from your teacher?”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī said, “Gotama, he declares an appearance that surpasses [all other] appearances. That appearance is the most excellent; that appearance is supreme.”

The World-honored One asked, “Udāyī, what is that appearance?”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied:

Gotama, it is an appearance such that no other appearance is superior to it; it is more sublime, more excellent. That appearance is the most excellent. That appearance is supreme!

The World-honored One said:

785a Udāyī, this is just as if some man were to speak like this: “Whichever woman is the most beautiful in the country, I want her!” And another man were to ask him like this: “Sir, regarding this most beautiful woman in the country, do you know her family name, her given name, and her birth status? Is she tall or short, stout or slim? Is she of light [complexion], or dark, or neither light nor dark? Is she a woman of the warrior class, or of the brahmin, or of the merchant, or of the worker class? Is she in the eastern region, the southern, the western, or the northern region?”—and that man were to answer, “I don’t know!”

And it is as if that other man were to ask him further, “Sir, regarding this most beautiful woman in the country whom you have not seen, you do not know her family name, her given name, or her birth status; [nor do you know] if she is tall or short, stout or slim; if she is of light [complexion], or dark, or neither light nor dark; if she is a woman of the warrior class, or of the brahmin, or of the merchant, or of the worker class; if she is in the eastern region, the southern, the western, or the northern region. [How then can] you declare ‘I want that woman!’?”

In the same way, Udāyī, you make this statement [regarding your teacher’s teaching,] “He declares an appearance that transcends [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance.” But when I ask you about [the nature of] that appearance, you do not know.

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī said:

Gotama, it is just as when the most excellent gold, superbly refined, polished, and rendered pure by a goldsmith skilled in refining, is placed on a white cotton cloth in the sunshine, its most sublime appearance glows and shines with a clear light. In the same way, Gotama, we declare an appearance that surpasses [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance.

The World-honored One said:

Udāyī, I will now ask you a question. Answer in accordance with your understanding. Regarding that most excellent gold, which has been superbly refined, polished, and rendered pure by a goldsmith skilled in refining, and is placed on a white cotton cloth in the sunshine so that its most sublime appearance glows and shines with a clear light—Udāyī, how do you think it compares with a glowworm glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night? Of these [two] clear lights which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the glowworm is supreme and more excellent than the clear light of the superbly refined and polished gold.”

The World-honored One asked:

Udāyī, what do you think of a glowworm glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night, compared with a burning oil lamp glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the burning oil lamp is supreme and more excellent than the clear light of the glowworm.”

The World-honored One asked:

Udāyī, what do you think of a burning oil lamp glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night, compared with a great burning wood fire glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the great burning wood fire is supreme and more excellent than the clear light of the burning oil lamp.”

785b The World-honored One asked:

Udāyī, what do you think of a great burning wood fire glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night, compared with the morning star glowing and shining with a clear light toward dawn in a cloudless [sky]? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the morning star is supreme and more excellent than the light of the great burning wood fire.”

The World-honored One asked:

Udāyī, what do you think of the morning star glowing and shining with a clear light toward dawn in a cloudless [sky], compared with the light of the resplendent moon in a cloudless [sky] at midnight, glowing and shining with a clear light? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the resplendent moon is supreme and more excellent than the light of the morning star.”

The World-honored One asked:

Udāyī, what do you think of the light of the resplendent moon in a cloudless [sky] at midnight glowing and shining with a clear light, compared with the light of the resplendent mid-autumn sun, glowing and shining with a clear light in a cloudless [sky]? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the resplendent sun is supreme and more excellent than the light of the resplendent moon.”

The World-honored One said:

Udāyī, there are many devas. Now, even though this sun and moon are of such great supernormal power, such great might, such great merit, such great majesty, yet their clear light cannot compare with the clear light of these devas. In former times I used to meet and converse with those devas, and what I said was agreeable to those devas. Nevertheless, I do not declare this: “That appearance surpasses [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance.”

But you, Udāyī, regarding the most lowly light inferior to a glowworm, declare, “That appearance surpasses [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance.” Yet when asked about it, you do not [even] know it!

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī said, “World-honored One, I regret the error of my declaration. Well-gone One, I regret the error of my declaration.”

The World-honored One asked,

Udāyī, what do you have in mind when you say, “World-honored One, I regret the error of my declaration. Well-gone One, I regret the error of my declaration”?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied:

Gotama, I made this declaration: ‘That appearance surpasses [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance.’ The renunciant Gotama has now examined me well, taught me well, and rebuked me well, so that what I [said] has become empty and false, having nothing to it. Gotama, for this reason I speak like this:

‘World-honored One, I regret the error of my declaration. Well-gone One, I regret the error of my declaration.’”

785c The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī said, “Gotama, [there is] a future world that is entirely pleasant and there is a direct path for fully realizing that world.”

The World-honored One asked, “Udāyī, what is the future world that is entirely pleasant? What is the direct path for fully realizing that world?”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied:

Gotama, suppose someone abstains from killing, having abandoned killing . . . taking what is not given . . . sexual misconduct . . . false speech . . . up to . . . abstains from wrong view, having attained right view.<sup>299</sup> Gotama, this [leads to] the future world that is entirely pleasant. This is the direct path for fully realizing that world.

The World-honored One said:

Udāyī, I will now ask you a question. Answer according to your understanding. Udāyī, what do you think, if someone abstains from killing, having abandoned killing, is that entirely pleasant or is it mixed with pain?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, it is mixed with pain.”

[The Buddha asked again]:

If someone abstains from taking what is not given . . . from sexual misconduct . . . from false speech . . . up to . . . abstains from wrong view, having attained right view, is that entirely pleasant or is it mixed with pain?

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, it is mixed with pain.”

The World-honored One asked, “Udāyī, in this way, does not the path to the realization of that world involve a mixture of pain and pleasure?”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied, “Gotama, in this way the path to the realization of that world involves a mixture of pain and pleasure.”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī said, “World-honored One, I regret the error of my declaration. Well-gone One, I regret the error of my declaration.”

The World-honored One asked, “Udāyī, what do you have in mind when you say: ‘World-honored One, I regret the error of my declaration. Well-gone One, I regret the error of my declaration’?”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī replied:

Gotama, I firmly declared that there is a future world that is entirely pleasant and that there is a direct path for fully realizing that world. The renunciant Gotama has now examined me well, taught me well, and rebuked me well, so that what I [said] has become empty and false, having nothing to it. Gotama, for this reason I speak like this: “World-honored One, I regret the error of my declaration. Well-gone One, I regret the error of my declaration.”

The World-honored One said, “Udāyī, there is a world that is entirely pleasant and there is a direct path for fully realizing that world.”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī asked, “Gotama, what is that world that is entirely pleasant? What is the direct path for fully realizing that world?”

The World-honored One replied:

Udāyī, suppose a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, leader on the path of Dharma, teacher of devas and human beings, called a buddha, an exalted one.<sup>300</sup>

Someone abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom. Secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, he dwells having attained the first absorption; yet he does not have the same virtue, the same state of mind, and the same view as those devas [of the corresponding realm].

With the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, he dwells having attained the second absorption; yet he does not have the same virtue, the same state of mind, and the same view as those devas [of the corresponding realm].

786a

Secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling in equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, he dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode; yet he does not have the same virtue, the same state of mind, and the same view as those devas.

Udāyī, this is a world that is entirely pleasant.<sup>301</sup>

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī asked, “Gotama, that which is an entirely pleasant world, is that alone the utmost?”

The World-honored One replied, “That which is an entirely pleasant world is not yet the utmost. Udāyī, there is another direct path for fully realizing that world.”

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī asked, “Gotama, what is the other direct path for fully realizing that world?”

The World-honored One replied:

Udāyī, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, a monk dwells having attained the first absorption, and he has the same virtue, the same state of mind, and the same view as those devas [of the corresponding realm].

With the calming of [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with inner stillness and mental unification, without [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of concentration, he dwells having attained the second absorption, and he has the same virtue, the same state of mind, and the same view as those devas.

Secluded from rapture and pleasure, dwelling with equanimity and without seeking anything, with right mindfulness and right comprehension, experiencing happiness with the body, he dwells having attained the third absorption, which the noble ones speak of as noble equanimity and mindfulness, a happy abode, and he has the same virtue, the same state of mind and the same view as those devas.<sup>302</sup>

Udāyī, this is the direct path for fully realizing that world.

The heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī asked:

Gotama, do the disciples of the renunciant Gotama practice the holy life under the renunciant Gotama for the sake of this entirely pleasant world, for the sake of this direct path for fully realizing that world?

The World-honored One replied:

Udāyī, my disciples do not practice the holy life under me for the sake of this entirely pleasant world and also not for the sake of this direct path for fully realizing that world. Udāyī, there are other things that are superior, more sublime, more excellent, for the sake of realizing which my disciples practice the holy life under me.

At this the great congregation [of Sakuludāyī] broke into a loud uproar:

There is something superior, more sublime, more excellent than this, for the sake of realizing which the disciples of the renunciant Gotama practice the holy life under the renunciant Gotama!

Then the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī, having admonished and silenced his congregation, said:

Gotama, what is that which is superior, more sublime, more excellent, for the sake of realizing which the disciples of the renunciant Gotama practice the holy life under the renunciant Gotama?

The World-honored One replied:

Udāyī, with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither pain nor pleasure, and with purity of equanimity and mindfulness, a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. Udāyī, this is what is superior, more sublime, more excellent, for the sake of realizing which my disciples practice the holy life under me.<sup>303</sup>

786b

At this the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī rose from his seat, wanting to bow down at the feet of the Buddha.<sup>304</sup> Then the disciples of the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī and his companions in the holy life said to the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī:

Venerable sir, now, when you should be acting as a teacher, are you wanting to become a disciple of the renunciant Gotama? Venerable sir, [if you consider that] you should not be acting as a teacher, then become a disciple of the renunciant Gotama!<sup>305</sup>

In this way the disciples of the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī and his companions in the holy life prevented the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī from practicing the holy life under the World-honored One.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the heterodox practitioner Sakuludāyī was delighted and received it respectfully.

209. The Discourse to Vekhanassa<sup>306</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling in Sāvattthī, staying in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa, while wandering about,<sup>307</sup> came to where the Buddha was and, after exchanging greetings, inquired, "Gotama, the supreme appearance? The supreme appearance, Gotama, the supreme appearance?"

The World-honored One asked, "Kaccāna, what appearance?"

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa replied:

Gotama, if no other appearance is superior, more sublime, more excellent than that appearance, then, Gotama, that appearance is the most excellent, that appearance is supreme!

The World-honored One said:

Kaccāna, this is just as if someone were to speak like this: "Whichever woman is the most beautiful in the country, I want her!" Suppose another man were to ask him, "Sir, regarding this most beautiful woman in the country, do you know her family name, her given name, and her birth status? Is she tall or short, stout or slim? Is she of light [complexion], or dark, or neither light nor dark? Is she a woman of the warrior class, or of the brahmin, or of the merchant, or of the worker class? Is she in the eastern region, the southern, the western, or the northern region?"—and that man were to answer, "I don't know!"

And it is as if that other man were to ask him further, “Sir, regarding this most beautiful woman in the country whom you have not seen, you do not know her family name, her given name, or her birth status. [You do not know] if she is tall or short, stout or slim; if she is of light [complexion], or dark, or neither light nor dark; if she is a woman of the warrior class, or of the brahmin, or of the merchant, or of the worker class; if she is in the eastern region, the southern, the western, or the northern region—and yet you make this statement: ‘I want that woman!’”

In the same way, Kaccāna, you make this statement: “That sublime appearance is the most sublime appearance. That appearance is the most excellent. That appearance is supreme.” But when I ask you about [the nature of] that appearance, you do not know. 786c

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa said:

Gotama, just as when the most excellent gold, superbly refined, polished, and rendered pure by a goldsmith skilled in refining, is placed on a white cotton cloth in the sunshine, its most sublime appearance glows and shines with a clear light. In the same way, Gotama, I declare an appearance that surpasses [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance.

The World-honored One said:

Kaccāna, I will now ask you a question. Answer in accordance with your understanding. Regarding that most excellent gold, which has been superbly refined, polished, and rendered pure by a goldsmith skilled in refining, and is placed on a white cotton cloth in the sunshine so that its most sublime appearance glows and shines with a clear light—Kaccāna, how do you think it compares with a glowworm glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night? Of these [two] clear lights which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the glowworm is supreme and more excellent than the clear light of the superbly refined and polished gold.”

The World-honored One asked:

Kaccāna, what do you think of a glowworm glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night, compared with a burning oil lamp glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the burning oil lamp is supreme, more excellent than the clear light of the glowworm.”

The World-honored One asked:

Kaccāna, what do you think of a burning oil lamp glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night, compared with a great burning wood fire glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa replied: “Gotama, the clear light of the great burning wood fire is supreme, more excellent than the clear light of the burning oil lamp.”

The World-honored One asked:

Kaccāna, what do you think of a great burning wood fire glowing and shining with a clear light in the darkness of the night, compared with the morning star glowing and shining with a clear light toward dawn in a cloudless [sky]? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the morning star is supreme, more excellent than the light of the great burning wood fire.”

The World-honored One asked:

Kaccāna, what do you think of the morning star glowing and shining with a clear light toward dawn in a cloudless [sky], compared with the light of the resplendent moon in a cloudless [sky] at midnight, glowing and shining with a clear light? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the resplendent moon is supreme, more excellent than the light of the morning star.”

787a

The World-honored One asked:

Kaccāna, what do you think of the light of the resplendent moon in a cloudless [sky] at midnight glowing and shining with a clear light, compared with the light of the resplendent mid-autumn sun, glowing and shining with a clear light in a cloudless [sky]? Of these [two] clear lights, which is supreme? Which is the more excellent?”

The heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa replied, “Gotama, the clear light of the resplendent sun is supreme, more excellent than the light of the resplendent moon.”

The World-honored One said:

Kaccāna, there are many devas. Now, even though this sun and moon are of such great supernormal power, such great might, such great merit, such great majesty, yet their clear light cannot compare with the clear light of these devas. In former times I used to meet and converse with those devas, and what I said was agreeable to those devas. Nevertheless, I do not declare this: “That appearance surpasses [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance.”

But you, Kaccāna, regarding the most lowly light inferior to a glow-worm, declare: “That appearance surpasses [all other] appearances. That is the most excellent appearance. That is the supreme appearance!” And when asked about [the nature of] it, you do not know!

Then the heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa, having been criticized to his face by the World-honored One, was upset and worried. He hung his head in silence, unable to reply, as if immersed in thought.

Then, having criticized [Vekhanassa] to his face, the World-honored One sought to cheer him up, saying:

Kaccāna, there are the five strands of sensuality, which are delightful, thought about pleasurably by the mind, and connected with sensuality, [namely]: visible forms known by the eye, sounds known by the ear, odors known by the nose, flavors known by the tongue, and tangibles known by the body.

Kaccāna, visible forms may be desirable or undesirable. If a certain person finds this particular visible form agreeable, commendable, [conducive to] joy, fulfilling, satisfying, then [for that person] this one is supreme, more excellent than other types of form which are not desired, not wanted, not aspired to, not sought after. This is the most excellent, the supreme type of form [for that person]. Kaccāna, it is the same with sounds, odors, flavors, and tangibles. Kaccāna, tangibles may be desirable or undesirable. If a certain person finds this particular tangible to be agreeable, commendable, conducive to joy, fulfilling, satisfying, then [for that person] this one is supreme, more excellent than other types of tangible which are not desired, not wanted, not aspired to, not sought after. This is the most excellent, the supreme type of tangible [for that person].

Then the heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa extended his hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

It is wonderful, Gotama. It is remarkable how the renunciant Gotama has, by countless skillful means, explained to me sensual pleasures and the foremost sensual pleasure. Gotama, just as a grass fire may start a wood fire, or a wood fire may start a grass fire, in the same way the renunciant Gotama has, by various skillful means, explained to me sensual pleasures and the foremost sensual pleasure.<sup>308</sup>

787b

The World-honored One said:

Stop, stop, Kaccāna, you have long been of a different view [from me], of a different belief, [seeking] a different type of happiness, a different type of pleasure, a different way of thinking; consequently, you do not fully understand the meaning of what I am saying.

Kaccāna, there are disciples of mine who do not lie down to sleep during the first and last watches of the night, but with right concentration and right intention cultivate the requisites of the path and come to know as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done, there will not be another experiencing of existence.” Only they would fully understand what I am saying.

At this the heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa became angry with the Buddha. Dislike and disapproval arose [in him]. He wanted to slander the World-honored

One, wanted to slight the World-honored One; in order to slander the World-honored One, in order to slight the World-honored One, he said:

Gotama, there are renunciants and brahmins who do not know the past world, do not know the future world, and do not know countless births and deaths, yet claim to have attained final knowledge [thus]: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence; I know this as it really is.”

Gotama, I think like this, “These renunciants and brahmins who do not know the past world, do not know the future world, and do not know countless births and deaths—how is it that they claim to have attained final knowledge [thus]: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence; I know it as it really is’?”

Then the World-honored One reflected:

This heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa became angry with me. Dislike and disapproval arose [in him]. He wanted to slander me, wanted to slight me. He slandered me and slighted me by saying “Gotama, there are renunciants and brahmins who do not know the past world, do not know the future world, and do not know countless births and deaths, yet claim to have attained final knowledge [thus]: ‘Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence; I know it as it really is.’ Gotama, I think like this, ‘These renunciants and brahmins who do not know the past world, do not know the future world, and do not know countless births and deaths—how is it that they claim to have attained final knowledge [thus]: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence; I know it as it really is”’?”

Knowing this, the World-honored One said:

Kaccāna, if there are renunciants and brahmins who do not know the past world, do not know the future world, and do not know countless births and deaths, yet claim to have attained final knowledge [thus]: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence; I know it as it really is”; then they should say this, “Let be the past world; let be the future world!”<sup>309</sup>

787c

Kaccāna, I [too] speak like this, “Let be the past world; let be the future world!” Even without recalling a single [past] life, if a monk disciple of mine comes to me, one who is not a fraud, not a deceiver, but is of upright character, then I teach him. If he practices in accordance with what I teach him, then he will certainly come to know the true Dharma.

Kaccāna, it is just as with an infant boy, young and tender, lying on his back, whose hands and feet have been bound by his parents. Later when he has grown up and all his faculties are developed, his parents unbind his hands and feet; but he recalls only the time of being liberated,<sup>310</sup> and does not recall the time of being in bondage.

In the same way, Kaccāna, I speak like this, “Let be the past world, let be the future world!” Even without recalling a single [past] life, if a monk disciple of mine comes to me, one who is not a fraud, not a deceiver, but is of upright character, then I teach him. If he practices in accordance with what I teach him, then he will certainly come to know the true Dharma.

Kaccāna, it is just like a lamp that burns in dependence on oil and a wick. If nobody supplies oil and the wick is not adjusted, then when the original oil is exhausted and no more is supplied, [the flame] will soon go out for lack of fuel.<sup>311</sup>

In the same way, Kaccāna, I speak like this, “Let be the past world, let be the future world!” Even without recalling a single [past] life, if a monk disciple of mine comes to me, one who is not a fraud, not a deceiver, but is of upright character, then I teach him. If he practices in accordance with what I teach him, then he will certainly come to know the true Dharma.

Kaccāna, it is just as one might use ten or twenty or thirty or forty or fifty or sixty bundles of wood to keep a fire blazing brightly,<sup>312</sup> and one sees that fire blazing. Later, if no one supplies more grass, wood, chaff, or rags, then when the original firewood is exhausted and no more is supplied, it will soon go out for lack of fuel.<sup>313</sup>

In the same way, Kaccāna, I speak like this, “Let be the past world; let be the future world!” Even without recalling a single [past] life, if a monk disciple of mine comes who is not a fraud, not a deceiver, but is of upright character, then I teach him. If he practices in accordance with what I teach him, then he will certainly come to know the true Dharma.

When this teaching was being given, there arose in the heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa the stainless dustless eye of the Dharma in regard to all phenomena.<sup>314</sup> Then the heterodox practitioner Vekhanassa saw the Dharma, attained the Dharma, realized the totally pure Dharma. There was [now] no other teacher for him; he would no longer rely on others. Having cut off doubt, crossed over confusion, become free from hesitation, he was established in the realization of the fruit. He had attained intrepidity in the Dharma of the World-honored One. He paid homage with his head at the Buddha's feet and said:

World-honored One, I wish to obtain the going forth from the Buddha to train in the path. [May I receive] the full ordination and become a monk to practice the holy life!

The World-honored One said, "Welcome,<sup>315</sup> monk! Practice the holy life!"

788a

The heterodox practitioner obtained from the Buddha the going forth to train in the path. He received the full ordination and became a monk to practice the holy life. The venerable Vekhanassa, having gone forth to train in the path, having received the full ordination, came to know the Dharma and see the Dharma . . . up to . . . attained arahantship.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Vekhanassa and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

210. The Discourse by the Nun Dhammanandā<sup>316</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Sāvattthī, staying in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time the female lay disciple Visākhā approached the nun Dhammanandā,<sup>317</sup> paid homage with her head at her feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. She said to the nun Dhammanandā, "Noble one, I would like to ask a question. Am I permitted to ask it?"

The nun Dhammanandā replied, "Visākhā, ask what you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it."

Then the female lay disciple Visākhā asked, "Noble one, we say 'personality, personality.' What is this 'personality'?"

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

The World-honored One has explained that the five aggregates of clinging are [one's] personality, the bodily form aggregate of clinging, the feeling . . . perception . . . formation . . . consciousness aggregate of clinging—these are the five aggregates of clinging explained by the World-honored One.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is personality view?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

788b

An unlearned ignorant worldling does not visit good spiritual friends, does not know the noble Dharma, and is not disciplined in the noble Dharma. He sees the body as the self, or he sees the self as possessing the body, or he sees the body as contained within the self, or he sees the self as contained within the body. He sees feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . He sees consciousness as the self, or he sees the self as possessing consciousness, or he sees consciousness as contained within the self, or he sees the self as contained within consciousness. This is personality view.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is absence of personality view?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

A learned noble disciple visits good spiritual friends, knows the noble Dharma, and is disciplined in the noble Dharma. He does not see the body as the self, he does not see the self as possessing the body, he does not see the body as contained within the self, he does not see the self as contained within the body. He does not see feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . he does not see consciousness as the self, he does not see the self as possessing consciousness, he does not see consciousness as contained within the self, he does not see the self as contained within consciousness. This is absence of personality view.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the cessation of personality?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

It is the remainderless cutting off of clinging to the body aggregate, its abandonment, disgorging, eradication, nonpollution, cessation, appeasement, disappearance; it is the remainderless cutting off of clinging to the feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . consciousness aggregate, its abandonment, disgorging, eradication, nonpollution, cessation, appeasement, disappearance—this is the cessation of personality.<sup>318</sup>

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

Noble one, the aggregates are spoken of as “the aggregates of clinging” or the aggregates are spoken of as “the clinging aggregates.” [Now], is it that the aggregates are the same as the clinging aggregates, and the clinging aggregates are the same as the aggregates? Or is it that the aggregates and the clinging aggregates are different?

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

It may be that the aggregates are the same as the clinging aggregates, or it may be that the aggregates are not the same as the clinging aggregates. When are the aggregates the same as the clinging aggregates? If with regard to the body there are taints and grasping; if with regard to feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . if with regard to consciousness there are taints and grasping, then this is when the aggregates are the same as the clinging aggregates.

When are the aggregates not the same as the clinging aggregates? If with regard to the body there are no taints and no grasping; if with regard to feeling . . . perception . . . formations . . . if with regard to consciousness there are no taints and no grasping, then this is when the aggregates are not the same as the clinging aggregates.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the noble eightfold path?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “The noble eightfold path is right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight. This is the noble eightfold path.”

788c On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, is the noble eightfold path conditioned?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “It is like this, the noble eightfold path is conditioned.”

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, how many groups are there?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “There are three groups: the group of virtue, the group of concentration, and the group of wisdom.”

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, does the noble eightfold path encompass the three groups, or do the three groups encompass the noble eightfold path?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

The noble eightfold path does not encompass the three groups; the three groups encompass the noble eightfold path. Right speech, right action, and right livelihood—these three path factors are encompassed by the noble group of virtue. Right mindfulness and right concentration—these two path factors are encompassed by the noble group of concentration. Right view, right intention, and right effort—these three path factors are encompassed by the noble group of wisdom.<sup>319</sup> Thus the noble eightfold path does not encompass the three groups; [rather] the three groups encompass the noble eightfold path.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, is there a counterpart to cessation?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “Cessation has no counterpart.”

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, how many factors does the first absorption have?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

The first absorption has five factors: [directed] awareness, [sustained] contemplation, joy, happiness, and unification of the mind. These are the five factors of the first absorption.<sup>320</sup>

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

Noble one, what is concentration? What is the sign of concentration? What is the strength of concentration? What is the achievement of concentration?<sup>321</sup> What is the cultivation of concentration?

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

If the wholesome mind attains unification, this is concentration. The four establishments of mindfulness are the sign of concentration. The four right efforts are the strength of concentration. The four bases of supernormal power are the achievement of concentration. If one cultivates all of these wholesome states,<sup>322</sup> repeatedly and energetically cultivating them, then this is the cultivation of concentration.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

789a

Noble one, how many are the factors of the living body upon whose perishing the body will be discarded in a cemetery, insentient like a piece of wood?

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

There are three factors of the living body upon whose perishing the body will be discarded in a cemetery, insentient like a piece of wood. What are the three? One: vitality, two: heat, and three: consciousness. These are the three factors of the living body on whose perishing the body will be discarded in a cemetery, insentient like a piece of wood.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the difference between one who is dead and one who has attained the concentration of cessation?”<sup>323</sup>

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

The vitality of a dead person has completely ceased, his heat has dissipated, and his faculties have broken down. The vitality of a monk who has entered the concentration of cessation has not completely ceased, his heat has not dissipated, and his faculties have not broken down. This is the difference between a dead person and one who has attained the concentration of cessation.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

Noble one, what is the difference between one who has attained the concentration of cessation and one who has attained the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception?<sup>324</sup>

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

[When] a monk enters the concentration of cessation, perception and knowing cease; [when] he enters the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception, perception and knowing do not cease. This is the difference between one who has attained the concentration of cessation and one who has attained the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-] nonperception.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

Noble one, what is the difference between one who emerges from the concentration of cessation and one who emerges from the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception?<sup>325</sup>

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

When a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, he does not think, “I am emerging from the concentration of cessation.” When a monk emerges from the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception, he thinks, “Do I have perceptions or do I not have perceptions?” This is the difference between one who emerges from the concentration of cessation and one who emerges from the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, when a monk enters the concentration of cessation, does he think: ‘I am entering the concentration of cessation’?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

When a monk enters the concentration of cessation, he does not think, “I am entering the concentration of cessation.” Instead, it is because he has previously cultivated the mind in this way that it proceeds accordingly.

789b

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, when a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, does he think: ‘I am emerging from the concentration of cessation’?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

When a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, he does not think, “I am emerging from the concentration of cessation.” Instead it is because of the body, the six senses, and the life faculty that he emerges from this concentration.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

Noble one, [when] a monk has emerged from the concentration of cessation, in what does his mind delight? Whither does it tend? Whither does it incline?

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

[When] a monk has emerged from the concentration of cessation, his mind delights in seclusion, it tends toward seclusion, it inclines toward seclusion.<sup>326</sup>

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, how many feelings are there?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

There are three feelings: pleasant feeling, painful feeling, and feeling that is neither pleasant nor painful. Because of what do they exist? Because of contact they exist.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is pleasant feeling? What is painful feeling? What is neutral feeling?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

What arises born of being touched by a pleasant contact and is felt as bodily or mental pleasure and wellness, such feeling is pleasant feeling. What arises born of being touched by a painful contact and is felt as bodily or mental pain and unwellness, such feeling is painful feeling. What arises born of being touched by a neutral contact and is felt as bodily or mental neutrality and neither wellness nor unwellness, such feeling is neutral feeling.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

Noble one, as to pleasant feeling, what is pleasant? What is painful? What is its impermanence? What is its danger? What is its underlying tendency? As to painful feeling, what is pleasant? What is painful? What is its impermanence? What is its danger? What is its underlying tendency? As to neutral feeling, what is pleasant? What is painful? What is its impermanence? What is its danger? What is its underlying tendency?<sup>327</sup>

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

789c

As to pleasant feeling, its arising is pleasant and its persistence is pleasant, its change is painful, its impermanence is the danger, its underlying tendency is desire. As to painful feeling, its arising is painful and its persistence is painful, its change is pleasant, its impermanence is the danger, its underlying tendency is aversion. As to neutral feeling, not knowing it is painful, knowing it is pleasant,<sup>328</sup> its impermanence is [the danger of] change, its underlying tendency is ignorance.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further:

Noble one, do all pleasant feelings have the underlying tendency to desire? Do all painful feelings have the underlying tendency to aversion? Do all neutral feelings have the underlying tendency to ignorance?

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

Not all pleasant feelings have the underlying tendency to desire. Not all painful feelings have the underlying tendency to aversion. Not all neutral feelings have the underlying tendency to ignorance.

How do pleasant feelings not have the underlying tendency to desire? When secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, with [directed] awareness and [sustained] contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of seclusion, a monk dwells having attained the first absorption. This is [when] pleasant feelings do not have the underlying tendency to desire. Why is that? Because desire is being abandoned.

How do painful feelings not have the underlying tendency to aversion? When, on seeking the joy of supreme liberation, that seeking and aspiration worries one again and again, giving rise to sadness and affliction. This is [when] painful feelings do not have the underlying tendency to aversion. Why is that? Because aversion is being abandoned.

How do neutral feelings not have the underlying tendency to ignorance? [When] with the cessation of pleasure and the cessation of pain, and with the earlier cessation of rapture and displeasure, with neither-pain-nor-pleasure, and with purity of mindfulness and equanimity, one dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is [when] neutral feelings do not have the underlying tendency to ignorance. Why is that? Because ignorance is being abandoned.

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the counterpart to pleasant feeling?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “The counterpart to pleasant feeling is painful feeling.”

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the counterpart to painful feeling?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “The counterpart to painful feeling is pleasant feeling.”

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the counterpart to pleasant feeling and painful feeling?”<sup>329</sup>

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “The counterpart to pleasant feeling and painful feeling is neutral feeling.” 790a

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the counterpart to neutral feeling?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “The counterpart to neutral feeling is ignorance.”

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the counterpart to ignorance?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “The counterpart to ignorance is knowledge.”

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the counterpart to knowledge?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied, “The counterpart to knowledge is nirvana.”<sup>330</sup>

On hearing this, the female lay disciple Visākhā praised her, saying, “It is well, it is well, noble one!” Having praised her, the female lay disciple Visākhā was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] she asked further, “Noble one, what is the counterpart to nirvana?”

The nun Dhammanandā replied:

You are wanting to ask about a matter without limit. However, for the matter you are asking about you cannot get to the limit on my side. Nirvana is without counterpart. Nirvana, being without bonds, transcends bonds. It is the complete cessation of bonds. It is that for the sake of which one practices the holy life under the World-honored One.

Then, having heard what the nun Dhammanandā said, the female lay disciple Visākhā received it well and retained it well. Having memorized it well, she rose from her seat, paid homage with her head at the feet of the nun Dhammanandā, circumambulated her three times, and left.

Then, not long after the female lay disciple Visākhā had left, the nun Dhammanandā approached the Buddha, paid homage with her head at the Buddha's feet, stepped back, and sat to one side.<sup>331</sup> She told the Buddha the whole conversation with the female lay disciple Visākhā. She extended her hands with joined palms toward the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, speaking like this and answering like this, have I not misrepresented the World-honored One? Have I spoken what is true? Have I spoken what accords with the Dharma, speaking what is Dharma in accordance with the Dharma? In what accords with the Dharma have I created no contradiction? Is there anything to be criticized, anything to be blamed for?

The World-honored One replied:

Nun, speaking like this and answering like this you have not misrepresented me. You have spoken what is true. You have spoken what accords with the Dharma, spoken what is Dharma in accordance with the Dharma. In what accords with the Dharma you have not created any contradiction. There is nothing to be criticized or blamed for.

790b Nun, if the female lay disciple Visākhā had come and asked me in these phrases and these words, I would have replied to the female lay disciple Visākhā using this meaning, these phrases, and these words. Nun, as you have explained this meaning, you should remember it like this. Why is that? Because this explanation is the meaning of it.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the nun Dhammanandā and the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

211. The Discourse by Mahākoṭṭhita<sup>332</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was dwelling at Rājagaha, staying in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary.

At that time, in the late afternoon, the venerable Sāriputta rose from sitting in meditation and approached the venerable Mahākoṭṭhita. He exchanged friendly greetings, stepped back, and sat to one side. The venerable Sāriputta said, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, I would like to ask a question. Am I permitted to ask it?”<sup>333</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita said, “Venerable Sāriputta, ask what you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it.”

The venerable Sāriputta asked:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, with regard to the unwholesome one speaks of “the unwholesome.” And with regard to the roots of unwholesomeness one speaks of “the roots of unwholesomeness.” What is unwholesome? What are the roots of unwholesomeness?<sup>334</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

Bad bodily conduct, [bad] verbal [conduct], bad mental conduct—these are unwholesome. Desire, aversion, and delusion—these are the roots of unwholesomeness. This is what is meant by “the unwholesome.” This is what is meant by “the roots of unwholesomeness.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, with regard to the wholesome one speaks of “the wholesome.” And with regard to the roots of wholesomeness one speaks of “the roots of wholesomeness.” What is wholesome? What are the roots of wholesomeness?

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

Good bodily conduct, [good] verbal [conduct], good mental conduct—these are wholesome. Absence of desire, absence of aversion, and absence of delusion—these are the roots of wholesomeness. This is what is meant by “the wholesome.” This is what is meant by “the roots of wholesomeness.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, with regard to wisdom one speaks of ‘wisdom.’ What is wisdom?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

790c

One knows, one knows;<sup>335</sup> therefore one speaks of wisdom. What does one know? One knows as it really is: “This is dukkha”; one knows [as it really is]: “This is the arising of dukkha”; one knows [as it really is]: “This is the cessation of dukkha”; one knows as it really is: “This is the path to the cessation of dukkha.” One knows, one knows; therefore one speaks of “wisdom.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, with regard to consciousness, one speaks of ‘consciousness.’ What is consciousness?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

One is conscious, one is conscious; therefore one speaks of “consciousness.” Of what is one conscious? One is conscious of visible forms, conscious of sounds . . . odors . . . flavors . . . tangibles . . . mental objects.<sup>336</sup> One is conscious, one is conscious; therefore one speaks of “consciousness.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, wisdom and consciousness—are these two states conjoined or separate? Can these two states be designated as separate?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

These two states are conjoined, not separate. These two states cannot be designated as separate. Why is that? What one knows with wisdom, of that one is conscious by consciousness. Therefore, these two states are conjoined and not separate. These two states cannot be designated as separate.<sup>337</sup>

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, as regards knowing, through what do you know?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “As regards knowing, I know through wisdom.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, what is the purpose of wisdom? What is its excellence? What is its merit?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “Wisdom has the purpose of disenchantment, the purpose of dispassion, the purpose of seeing as it really is.”<sup>338</sup>

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, what is right view?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “Knowing dukkha as it really is, knowing the arising of dukkha . . . its cessation . . . the path as it really is—this is right view.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many causes, how many conditions are there for the arising of right view?”

791a

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

There are two causes, two conditions for the arising of right view. What are the two? One: hearing from another; and two: giving reasoned attention within oneself. These are the two causes, the two conditions for the arising of right view.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, assisted by how many factors does right view lead to the fruit of liberation of the mind and to the fruit of liberation through wisdom, to the achievement of liberation of the mind and to the achievement of liberation through wisdom?

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

Assisted by five factors, right view leads to the fruit of liberation of the mind and to the fruit of liberation through wisdom, to the achievement of liberation of the mind and to the achievement of liberation through wisdom.

What are the five? One: assisted by truth, two: assisted by virtue, three: assisted by wide learning, four: assisted by tranquility, and five: assisted by insight.<sup>339</sup> These are the five factors, assisted by which right view leads to the fruit of liberation of the mind and to the fruit of liberation through wisdom, to the achievement of liberation of the mind and to the achievement of liberation through wisdom.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how does future becoming arise?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

The unlearned ignorant worldling, lacking knowledge, is shrouded in ignorance and fettered by the bondage of craving; he does not visit good spiritual friends, does not know the noble Dharma, and is not disciplined in the noble Dharma. This is how future becoming arises.<sup>340</sup>

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how does future becoming not arise?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “If ignorance has ceased and knowledge has arisen, then there will certainly be the cessation of dukkha. This is how future becoming does not arise.”<sup>341</sup>

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many [types of] feeling are there?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

There are three [types of] feeling: pleasant feeling, painful feeling, and neutral feeling. Because of what do they exist? They exist because of contact.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, feeling, perception, and intention—are these three states conjoined or separate? Can these three states be designated as separate?<sup>342</sup> 791b

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

Feeling, perception, and intention—these three states are conjoined and not separate. These three states cannot be designated as separate. Why is that? What one feels with feeling, that one perceives with perception and intends with intention. Therefore these three states are conjoined and not separate. These three states cannot be designated as separate.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, what is the counterpart to cessation?”<sup>343</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “Cessation does not have a counterpart.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, the five [sense] faculties have their different activities, their different domains, each of them experiencing its own domain: the eye faculty, the ear . . . nose . . . tongue . . . and the body faculty. [As to] these five faculties with their different activities, their different domains, each of them experiencing its own domain—what experiences all of their domains? On what do they [all] depend?

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

The five [sense] faculties have their different activities, their different domains, each of them experiencing its own domain: the eye faculty, the ear . . . nose . . . tongue . . . and body faculty. [As to] these five faculties with their different activities, their different domains, each experiencing its own domain—the mind experiences all of their domains. They [all] depend on the mind.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, depending on what does the mind continue to exist?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “The mind depends on vitality. Depending on vitality it continues to exist.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, depending on what does vitality continue to exist?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “Vitality depends on heat; depending on heat it continues to exist.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, vitality and heat—are these two states conjoined or separate? Can these two states be designated as separate?”<sup>344</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

791c Vitality and heat—these two states are conjoined and not separate. These two states cannot be designated as separate. Why is that? Because of vitality there is heat, and because of heat there is vitality. Without vitality there is no heat, without heat there is no vitality.

It is just as a lamp burns because of oil and because of a wick. In this case, because of the flame there is light, and because of the light there is the flame. Without a flame there is no light, and without light there is no flame.

In the same way, because of vitality there is heat, and because of heat there is vitality. Without vitality there is no heat, and without heat there is no vitality. For this reason these two states are conjoined and not separate. These two states cannot be designated as separate.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many are the factors of the living body upon the perishing of which the body will be discarded in a cemetery, being insentient like [a piece of] wood?

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

There are three factors of the living body upon the perishing of which the body will be discarded in a cemetery, being insentient like [a piece of] wood. What are the three? One: vitality, two: heat, and three: consciousness. These are the three factors of the living body on the perishing of which the body will be discarded in a cemetery, being insentient like a piece of wood.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, what is the difference between a dead person and one who has attained the concentration of cessation?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

The vitality of a dead person has completely ceased, his heat has dissipated, and his faculties have broken down. The vitality of a monk who has entered the concentration of cessation has not completely ceased, his heat has not dissipated, and his faculties have not broken down. This is the difference between a dead person and one who has attained the concentration of cessation.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, what is the difference between a person who has attained the concentration of cessation and one who has attained the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception?<sup>345</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

Perception and knowing cease [when] a monk enters the concentration of cessation. Perception and knowing do not cease [when] a monk enters the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception. This is the difference between one who has attained the concentration of cessation and one who has attained the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-] nonperception.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, what is the difference between one who emerges from the concentration of cessation and one who emerges from the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception?

792a The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

When a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, he does not think, “I am emerging from the concentration of cessation.” When a monk emerges from the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception, he thinks, “Do I have perception or do I not have perception?” This is the difference between one who emerges from the concentration of cessation and one who emerges from the concentration of [neither-perception-nor-]nonperception.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, when a monk attains the concentration of cessation, which factor ceases first: bodily activity, verbal [activity], or mental activity?”<sup>346</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “When a monk attains the concentration of cessation, bodily activity ceases first, next verbal activity ceases, and finally mental activity ceases.”<sup>347</sup>

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, when a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, which factor arises first: bodily activity, verbal [activity], or mental activity?

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “When a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, mental activity arises first, next verbal activity arises, and finally bodily activity arises.”<sup>348</sup>

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, when a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, how many [types of] contact does he contact?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

When a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation he contacts three types of contact. What are the three? One: imperturbability contact, two: nothingness contact, and three: signless contact.<sup>349</sup> When a monk emerges from the concentration of cessation, he contacts these three types of contact.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further:

Venerable Koṭṭhita, emptiness, desirelessness, and signlessness—are these three states different in meaning and different in name? Or are they of one meaning and different [only] in name?

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied, “Emptiness, desirelessness, and signlessness—these three states are different in meaning and [also] different in name.”

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many causes and conditions are there for the arising of the imperturbable concentration?”<sup>350</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

792b

There are four causes, four conditions for the arising of the imperturbable concentration. What are the four? If secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . a monk dwells having attained the fourth absorption. These are the four causes, the four conditions for the arising of the imperturbable concentration.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many causes and conditions are there for the arising of the concentration on nothingness?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

There are three causes, three conditions for the arising of concentration on nothingness. What are the three? If completely transcending perceptions of form . . . up to . . . a monk dwells having attained the sphere of nothingness. These are the three causes, the three conditions for the arising of the concentration on nothingness.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many causes and conditions are there for the arising of the signless concentration?”<sup>351</sup>

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

There are two causes, two conditions for the arising of the signless concentration. What are the two? One: not being aware of any sign, and two: being aware of the signless element. These are the two causes, the two conditions for the arising of the signless concentration.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many causes and conditions are there for remaining in the signless concentration?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

There are two causes, two conditions for remaining in the signless concentration. What are the two? One: not being aware of any sign, and two: being aware of the signless element.<sup>352</sup> These are the two causes, the two conditions for remaining in the signless concentration.

On hearing this, the venerable Sāriputta praised him, saying, “It is well, it is well, venerable Koṭṭhita!” Having praised him, the venerable Sāriputta was delighted and received [that teaching] respectfully. [Then] he asked further, “Venerable Koṭṭhita, how many causes and conditions are there for emerging from the signless concentration?”

The venerable Mahākoṭṭhita replied:

There are three causes, three conditions for emerging from the signless concentration. What are the three? One: being aware of any sign; two: not being aware of the signless element; and three: the life faculty conditioned by this body with the six sense spheres.<sup>353</sup> These are the three causes, the three conditions for emerging from the signless concentration.

In this way those two venerable ones praised each other, saying, “It is well, it is well!” Having discussed with each other, they were delighted and received [those teachings] respectfully. They then rose from their seats and left.

Division 18

Ordered Expositions

212. The Discourse on Omniscience<sup>354</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Ujuññā in the Kaṇṇakatthala Grove. 792c

At that time King Pasenadi of Kosala heard that the renunciant Gotama was staying at Ujuññā in the Kaṇṇakatthala Grove. Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala told a certain man:

Go to the renunciant Gotama and ask on my behalf if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free of ailments, and dwelling at ease with his usual vigor. Speak like this: “King Pasenadi of Kosala inquires if you are healthy and strong, comfortable and free of ailments, and dwelling at ease with your usual vigor.” Also say this: “King Pasenadi of Kosala would like to come and visit you.”

Having received this order, that man approached the Buddha, exchanged greetings, stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

Gotama, King Pasenadi of Kosala inquires if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free of ailments, and dwelling at ease with your usual vigor. King Pasenadi of Kosala would like to come and visit you.

The World-honored One replied:

May King Pasenadi of Kosala now find peace and happiness! May all devas, human beings, asuras, gandhabbas, yakkhas, and all other forms of life find peace and happiness! If King Pasenadi of Kosala wishes to come, let him feel free to do so.<sup>355</sup>

Then, having heard what the Buddha had said, having received and remembered it well, the messenger rose from his seat, circumambulated [the Buddha] three times, and left.

793a At that time the venerable Ānanda was standing behind the World-honored One, holding a flywhisk and attending on the Buddha. After the messenger had left, the World-honored One turned to him and said:

Ānanda, come with me to the Eastern Hall, open the windows and close the door, [we shall] remain in that secluded place. Today King Pasenadi of Kosala has a concentrated mind without distraction, he wishes to listen to the Dharma.

The venerable Ānanda said, “Yes.”

Then the World-honored One led the venerable Ānanda to the Eastern Hall, who opened the windows, closed the door, and in that secluded place arranged the sitting mats. Having spread their sitting cloths, they sat down cross-legged.

By that time the messenger had returned to King Pasenadi of Kosala. He told him, “Your Majesty, I have communicated [the message] to the renunciant Gotama. The renunciant Gotama now awaits Your Majesty. May Your Majesty himself know the proper time.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala told his charioteer, “Prepare the chariot! I desire to go now and see the renunciant Gotama.” The charioteer received the instruction and prepared the chariot.

At that time the sisters Sakulā and Somā, [wives of] King Pasenadi of Kosala, were sitting together with him taking a meal. On hearing that King Pasenadi of Kosala would be going that day to visit the Buddha, they said to him:

Great King, if you are now going to visit the World-honored One, we request that you pay respects to the World-honored One on our behalf and ask if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free of ailments, and dwelling at ease with his usual vigor. Speak like this: “The sisters Sakulā and Somā pay their respects to the World-honored One and inquire if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free of ailments, and dwelling at ease with his usual vigor.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala accepted the request of the sisters Sakulā and Somā by remaining silent.

Then the charioteer, having prepared the chariot, informed him, “Your Majesty, the chariot is ready and at Your Majesty’s disposal.” Having heard it, the king mounted the chariot and drove out of Ujuññā to the Kaṇṇakattala Grove.

At that time, outside the entrance to the Kaṇṇakattala Grove, there were many monks practicing walking meditation in the open. King Pasenadi of Kosala approached these monks and asked, “Venerable ones, where is the renunciant Gotama now? I wish to go and see him.”

The monks answered:

Great King! The World-honored One is in the Eastern Hall, whose windows are open and the door is closed. If Your Majesty wishes to see him, he may go there, stand outside, clear his throat, and knock on the door. Hearing that, the World-honored One will certainly have the door opened.<sup>356</sup>

King Pasenadi of Kosala descended from his chariot and, surrounded by his retainers, walked to the Eastern Hall. Having arrived there he stood outside, cleared his throat, and knocked on the door. Having heard this, the World-honored One had the door opened. King Pasenadi of Kosala entered the hall and went up to the Buddha. He addressed him:

793b

Gotama, the sisters Sakulā and Somā pay their respects to the World-honored One and inquire if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free of ailments, and if he is dwelling at ease with his usual vigor.

The World-honored One asked the king, “Could the sisters Sakulā and Somā find no other messenger?”

King Pasenadi of Kosala said:

Gotama, please know that the sisters Sakulā and Somā were sitting with me today having a meal. They heard that I desired to go and visit the Buddha today, so they said, “Great King, if you are going to see the Buddha, pay respects to the World-honored One on our behalf and ask if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable, and free of ailments, and if he is dwelling at ease with his usual vigor.” Accordingly I addressed the World-honored One like this: “The sisters Sukulā and Somā pay their respects to the World-honored One and inquire if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable, and free of ailments, and if he is dwelling at ease with his usual vigor.” Gotama, Sakulā and Somā pay their respects to the World-honored One and ask if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free of ailments, and if he is dwelling at ease with his usual vigor.

The World-honored One answered:

Great King, may the sisters Sakulā and Somā find peace and happiness! May all devas, human beings, asuras, gandhabbas, yakkhas, and all other forms of life find peace and happiness!

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala, having exchanged greetings with the Buddha, stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Gotama, I would like to ask a question. If permitted, may I will venture to state it?”

The World-honored One told him, “Great King, ask whatever you wish to ask.”

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala asked:

Gotama, I have heard that the renunciant Gotama has spoken like this: “There never was, there never will be, nor is there in the present, some renunciant or brahmin who knows all, who sees all.” Gotama, do you recall having spoken like that?

The World-honored One answered:

Great King, I do not recall having spoken like this: “There never was, there never will be, nor is there in the present some renunciant or brahmin who knows all, who sees all.”

At that time the general Viḍḍabha was standing behind King Pasenadi of Kosala, holding a flywhisk and fanning the king. Then King Pasenadi of Kosala turned around and said to General Viḍḍabha:

Some days ago, when the king was seated together with the great assembly, who was the first to say that the renunciant Gotama makes such a statement, “There never was, there never will be, nor is there in the present some renunciant or brahmin who knows all, who sees all”?

General Viḍḍabha answered, “Your Majesty, it was the young [brahmin] Saṅjaya Ākāśagotta who first said that.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala said to a certain man, “Go to the young [brahmin] Sañjaya Ākāśagotta and speak to him like this: ‘King Pasenadi of Kosala summons you.’” 793c

Having received the order, that man approached the young [brahmin] Sañjaya Ākāśagotta and spoke like this: “Young [brahmin], King Pasenadi of Kosala summons you.”

After that man had left, King Pasenadi of Kosala said to the World-honored One:

Renunciant Gotama, could there have been a different saying [by you] that has been taken differently? What does the renunciant Gotama recall having said?

The World-honored One answered:

Great King, I recall having spoken like this: “There never was, there never will be, nor is there in the present some renunciant or brahmin who knows all at one time, who sees all at one time.” Great King, I recall having spoken like this.

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying:

The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a teacher. The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a skilled teacher. I would like to ask another question. Am I permitted to ask it?

The World-honored One told him, “Great King, ask whatever you wish to ask.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Gotama, there are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. Is there a distinction, a difference among them?”

The World-honored One answered:

There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers; and there is a distinction, a difference among them. People consider the warriors and brahmins to be of superior virtue, and people consider the merchants and workers to be of inferior virtue. There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers; and this is a distinction, a difference [among them].

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying, “The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a teacher. The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a skilled teacher.”<sup>357</sup> King Pasenadi of Kosala said:

Gotama, I was not, however, asking only about their benefits in the present life; I would also like to ask about their benefits in future lives. Am I permitted to ask this?

The World-honored One told him, “Great King, ask whatever you wish to ask.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked:

Gotama, there are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. Is there a distinction, a difference [among them] with regard to future lives?

The World-honored One answered:

There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers; and there is a distinction, a difference [among them] with regard to future lives. There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. If they accomplish the five factors of striving and indeed get as their skilled teacher the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, [then] they will certainly gain inspiration [from him], will not be without inspiration; and they will gain long-lasting benefit, well-being, peace, and happiness.

794a What are these five? The learned noble disciple has faith in the Tathāgata, deeply rooted and firmly established, which cannot be taken away by anyone—whether renunciant, brahmin, deva, māra, Brahmā, or anyone else in the world. This is the first factor of striving.

Again, Great King, the learned noble disciple has little disease, is free of ailments; he has a balanced digestion of food, neither too hot nor too cold, easy and balanced; whether of food or of drink, his digestion is easy and without disturbance. This is the second factor of striving.

Again, Great King, the learned noble disciple neither flatters nor lies, but is honest, showing himself as he really is to the World-honored One and to his companions in the holy life. This is the third factor of striving.

Again, Great King, the learned noble disciple is energetic at all times in discarding what is evil and unwholesome, and in cultivating wholesome states. He takes the initiative constantly and remains wholeheartedly and steadfastly established in the roots of wholesomeness, without giving up the task. This is the fourth factor of striving.

Again, Great King, the learned noble disciple develops understanding and wisdom. By observing the rise and fall of phenomena he gains such understanding, noble penetrative wisdom, and discriminative comprehension as brings about the true cessation of dukkha. This is the fifth factor of striving.

There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. If they accomplish these five factors of striving and indeed get as their skilled teacher a tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened; [then] they will certainly gain inspiration [from him], will not be without inspiration; and they will gain long-lasting benefit, well-being, peace, and happiness. There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. This is a distinction, a difference [among them] with regard to future lives.

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying:

The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a teacher. The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a skilled teacher. I would like to ask another question. Am I permitted to ask it?

The World-honored One told him, “Great King, ask whatever you wish to ask.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked:

Gotama, there are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. Is there a distinction, a difference [among them] with regard to the practice of striving?

The World-honored One answered:

There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers; and there is a distinction, a difference [among them] with regard to their practice of striving.

What do you think, Great King? That the striving of someone with faith might be matched by the striving of someone without faith—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone with few ailments might be matched by the striving of someone with many ailments—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone who abstains from flattering and lying might be matched by the striving of someone who flatters and lies—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone who has energy might be matched by the striving of a lazy person—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone with comprehension and wisdom might be matched by the striving of someone who is unwise—this is not at all possible.

794b

It is just as if there were four [kinds of beings] to be tamed—elephants to be tamed, horses to be tamed, oxen to be tamed, and human beings to be tamed—and among those, two to be tamed cannot be subdued, cannot be disciplined, while two to be tamed can be subdued, can be disciplined.

What do you think, Great King? That the two to be tamed that cannot be subdued, cannot be disciplined, might attain the stages of being subdued, the stages of being disciplined, and accept taming—this is not possible. That the two to be tamed that can be subdued, that can be disciplined, might attain the stages of being subdued, the stages of being disciplined, and accept taming—this is certainly possible.

In the same way, Great King, what do you think? That the striving of someone with faith might be matched by the striving of someone without faith—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone with few ailments might be matched by the striving of someone with many ailments—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone who abstains from flattering and lying might be matched by the striving of someone who flatters and lies—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone who has energy might be matched by the striving of a lazy person—this is not at all possible. That the striving of someone with comprehension and wisdom might be matched by the striving of someone who is unwise—this is not at all possible. There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. This is a distinction, a difference [among them] with regard to their practice of striving.

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying:

The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a teacher. The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a skilled teacher. I would like to ask another question. Am I permitted to ask it?"

The World-honored One answered, "Great King, ask whatever you wish to ask."

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked:

Gotama, there are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. Is there a distinction, a difference [among them] with regard to striving itself?

The World-honored One answered:

There are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. They are equal in regard to striving, there is no distinction, no difference [between them] with regard to striving itself.

Great King, suppose that a warrior youth coming from the east takes a dry piece of sāla wood as the lower firestick and by drilling it with a drill produces fire; a brahmin youth coming from the south, takes a dry piece of sāla wood as the lower firestick and by drilling it with a drill produces fire; a merchant youth coming from the west takes a dry piece of sandalwood as the lower firestick and by drilling it with a drill produces fire; a worker youth coming from the north takes a dry piece of botoumo wood as the lower firestick and by drilling it with a drill produces fire.

What do you think, Great King? Those persons of various castes, using various kinds of wood as the lower firestick, by drilling it with a drill produce fire; and someone [else] brings dry grass and wood and produces smoke, flames, and color. Great King, would you be able to tell any difference between this smoke and that smoke, this flame and that flame, this color and that color?

King Pasenadi of Kosala replied:

Gotama, those persons of various castes, using various kinds of wood as the lower firestick, by drilling it with a drill produce fire; and someone 794c [else] brings dry grass and wood and produces smoke, flames, and color. Gotama, I would not be able to tell any difference between this smoke and that smoke, this flame and that flame, this color and that color.

[The World-honored One said:]

In the same way, Great King, there are these four castes: warriors, brahmins, merchants, and workers. They are completely equal in regard to striving, there is no distinction, no difference [among them] with regard to striving itself.

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying:

The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a teacher. The renunciant Gotama has spoken like a skilled teacher. I would like to ask another question. Am I permitted to ask it?

The World-honored One said, “Great King, ask whatever you wish to ask.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala, asked, “Gotama, are there devas?”

The World-honored One asked, “Great King, why do you ask whether there are devas?”

King Pasenadi of Kosala answered:

Gotama, [I wish to ask] whether devas who are disputatious, fond of disputing, are destined to come [back] to this [human] realm; and whether devas who are not disputatious, not fond of disputing, are destined not to come [back] to this [human] realm.

At that time General Viḍūḍabha was standing behind King Pasenadi of Kosala, holding a fan and fanning the king.<sup>358</sup> General Viḍūḍabha said:

Gotama, if devas are not disputatious, not fond of disputing, they do not come [back] to this [human] realm, but stay in their heaven. If devas are disputatious, fond of disputing, and they come [back] to this [human] realm. The renunciant Gotama will certainly say that those [other] devas [in their heaven] have superior merit [as a result of their] superior [former] practice of the holy life. [Yet] can the devas [here], at will, drive out those other devas [from their heaven] and banish them?

At that time the venerable Ānanda was standing behind the World-honored One, holding a flywhisk and attending on the Buddha. Then the venerable Ānanda thought, “This General Viḍḍabha is a son of King Pasenadi of Kosala and I am a son of the World-honored One. Now is the right time for a discussion between son and son.”

Thereupon the venerable Ānanda said to General Viḍḍabha:

I would like to ask you something; answer according to your understanding. What do you think, General? Within the borders of the realm of King Pasenadi of Kosala, as far as his command extends, can King Pasenadi of Kosala drive out and banish [others] at will, [even those] who have exceptional merit because they had lived an exceptional holy life?

General Viḍḍabha answered:

Renunciant, within the borders of the realm of King Pasenadi of Kosala, as far as his command extends, King Pasenadi of Kosala can drive out and banish [others] at will, [even those] who have exceptional merit because they had lived an exceptional holy life.

[The venerable Ānanda asked:]

What do you think, General, outside the borders of the realm of King Pasenadi of Kosala to which his command does not extend, can King Pasenadi of Kosala drive out and banish [others] at will, [leave alone those] who have exceptional merit because they had lived an exceptional holy life?

General Viḍḍabha answered:

Renunciant, outside the borders of the realm of King Pasenadi of Kosala, to which his command does not extend, King Pasenadi of Kosala cannot drive out and banish [others] at will, [leave alone those] who have exceptional merit because they had lived an exceptional holy life.

795a

The venerable Ānanda asked again, “General, have you heard of the devas of the Thirty-three?”

General Viḍḍabha answered, “During my stay with King Pasenadi of Kosala I have heard of the devas of the Thirty-three.”

[The venerable Ānanda asked:]

What do you think, General, can King Pasenadi of Kosala drive out and banish those devas of the Thirty-three at will who have exceptional merit because they had lived an exceptional holy life?

General Viḍḍabha answered:

Renunciant, King Pasenadi of Kosala cannot even see the devas of the Thirty-three. How much less could he drive them out and banish them! [That] he might drive out and banish the devas of the Thirty-three, this is not at all possible.

[The venerable Ānanda said:]

In the same way, General, those devas who are not disputatious, not fond of disputing, and who do not come [back] to this [human] realm, have superior merit because of their superior [former] practice of the holy life. Those devas who are disputatious, fond of disputing, and do come [back] to this [human] realm, those devas cannot even see those other devas [in their heavens], much less drive them out and banish them.<sup>359</sup> That they might drive out and banish those other devas [from their heaven], this is not at all possible.

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Gotama, what is the name of this renunciant?”

The World-honored One answered, “Great King, this monk is named Ānanda. He is my attendant.”

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying, “Ānanda has spoken like a teacher. Ānanda has spoken like a skillful teacher. I would like to ask another question. Am I permitted to ask it?”

The World-honored One answered, “Great King, ask whatever you wish to ask.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala, asked, “Gotama, are there Brahmās?”

The World-honored One asked, “Great King, why do you ask whether there are Brahmās? Great King, what I designate as Brahmās, those Brahmās are pure.”<sup>360</sup>

While the World-honored One and King Pasenadi of Kosala were discussing these matters, the messenger returned with the young [brahmin] Sañjaya Ākāsagotta. He went to King Pasenadi of Kosala and said, “Your Majesty, the young [brahmin] Sañjaya Ākāsagotta has come here.”

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala asked the young [brahmin] Sañjaya Ākāsagotta:

Some days ago, when the king was seated together with the great assembly, who was the first to say that the renunciant Gotama makes such a statement: “There never was, there never will be, nor is there in the present another renunciant or brahmin who knows all, who sees all”?

The young [brahmin] Sañjaya Ākāsagotta answered, “Your Majesty, it was General Viḍḍabha who said that first.”

Having heard this, General Viḍḍabha said, “Your Majesty, this young [brahmin] Sañjaya Ākāsagotta said it first.” 795b

While those two men were arguing thus, in the midst of this the charioteer, who had prepared the chariot, went to King Pasenadi of Kosala and said, “Your Majesty, the chariot is ready. May Your Majesty know the proper time.”

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala said to the World-honored One:

I have asked [the renunciant] Gotama about omniscience and the renunciant Gotama has answered me regarding omniscience. I have asked the renunciant Gotama about the purity of the four castes and the renunciant Gotama has answered me regarding the purity of the four castes. I have asked the renunciant Gotama about attainment and the renunciant Gotama has answered me regarding attainment. I have asked the renunciant Gotama about the existence of Brahmās and the renunciant Gotama has answered me regarding the existence of Brahmās. Whatever other matters I have asked, the renunciant Gotama has certainly answered me on those other matters. Gotama, I have many things to attend to now. Desiring to return, I take my leave.

The World-honored One answered, “The Great King himself knows the proper time.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala, having heard what the World-honored One had said, received it well and kept it in mind. Then he rose from his seat, circumambulated the World-honored One three times, and left.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, King Pasenadi of Kosala, the venerable Ānanda, and all the others in the great assembly were delighted and received it respectfully.

213. The Discourse on Adornments of the Dharma<sup>361</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying among the Sakyans in a Sakyan town called Medaḷumpa.

At that time King Pasenadi of Kosala and [his commander-in-chief] Dīgha Kārāyaṇa had for some matter gone out together to a town called Nagaraka. On arriving at its pleasure park, King Pasenadi of Kosala saw places beneath the trees that were quiet, free of noise, secluded, without disturbance, without people, suitable for sitting in meditation. Seeing this, he was reminded of the World-honored One.

King Pasenadi of Kosala said:

Now, Dīgha Kārāyaṇa, these places beneath the trees are quiet, free of noise, secluded, without disturbance, without people, suitable for sitting in meditation. In such places I have often seen the Buddha. Dīgha Kārāyaṇa, where is the World-honored One now? I wish to go and visit him.

Dīgha Kārāyaṇa answered, “Your Majesty, I heard that the World-honored One is staying among the Sakyans in a Sakyan town called Medaḷumpa.”

795c King Pasenadi of Kosala said again, “Dīgha Kārāyaṇa, how far from here is the Sakyan town called Medaḷumpa?”

Dīgha Kārāyaṇa answered, “Your Majesty, it is three leagues away.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala said, “Dīgha Kārāyaṇa, prepare the chariot. I wish to go to the Buddha.”

On receiving this instruction, Dīgha Kārāyaṇa prepared the chariot and then said, “Your Majesty, the chariot is ready and at Your Majesty’s disposal.” King Pasenadi of Kosala mounted the chariot, left the city, and went to the Sakyan town called Medaḷumpa.<sup>362</sup>

At that time, outside the gate of Medaḷumpa, many monks were practicing walking meditation in the open. King Pasenadi of Kosala approached these monks and asked, “Venerable sirs, where is the World-honored One spending the day’s abiding?”

The many monks answered:

Great King, the World-honored One is now spending the day’s abiding in the Eastern Hall, whose windows are open and the door is closed. Go there, Great King, if you wish to see him. On arriving, stand outside, clear your throat, and knock on the door. On hearing it, the World-honored One will certainly open the door for you.

King Pasenadi of Kosala descended from his chariot. As a duly anointed warrior king with command over people in a vast territory, he had five [royal] insignia: a sword, a parasol, a royal headdress, a flywhisk with bejeweled handle, and ornate sandals. He took all of them off and handed them to Dīgha Kārāyaṇa. Dīgha Kārāyaṇa thought, “His Majesty is certainly now going to enter alone. We must wait together here.”

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala, surrounded by his retinue, walked to the Eastern Hall. On arriving there, he stood outside, cleared his throat, and knocked on the door. Having heard it, the World-honored One had the door opened and King Pasenadi of Kosala entered the hall. On reaching the Buddha, he paid homage with his head at [the Buddha’s] feet and announced his full name three times: “I am Pasenadi, king of Kosala. I am Pasenadi, king of Kosala.”<sup>363</sup>

The World-honored One answered, “It is like this, Great King, you are King Pasenadi of Kosala; you are King Pasenadi of Kosala.” When King Pasenadi of Kosala had announced his full name three times and had paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, he stepped back and sat to one side.

The World-honored One asked:

Great King, what benefit is there in seeing me, such that you lower yourself by paying homage with your head at my feet, offering such formal veneration?

King Pasenadi of Kosala answered:

World-honored One, I have gained faith regarding the Buddha and the Dharma.<sup>364</sup> For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment and fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One's disciples is progressing well."

796a World-honored One, when I sit with all seated [in court], I see mothers disputing with sons and sons disputing with mothers; fathers with sons, elder brothers with younger brothers, elder sisters with younger sisters, relatives disputing back and forth with one another. When quarreling and disputing, mothers speak harsh words to their sons, sons speak harsh words to their mothers; fathers to sons, elder brothers to younger brothers, elder sisters to younger sisters. Relatives speak harsh words to one another; how much more so to other persons!

I see the World-honored One's disciples, the sangha of monks who practice the holy life under the World-honored One. If there are monks who, because of some dispute that has arisen, abandon the precepts and leave the path [of monasticism], they do not speak ill of the Buddha, the Dharma, or the Sangha of monks.<sup>365</sup> Rather, they blame themselves: "I have acted badly; I am without virtue. Why is that? Because I was not able to practice the holy life under the World-honored One for my whole life."<sup>366</sup>

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, "The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One's disciples is progressing well."

Again, World-honored One, I see a certain renunciant or brahmin who for nine or ten months trains in some practice of the holy life, but then gives it up and returns to layman's dress. He is again tainted by sensual pleasures; and being tainted by sensual pleasures, he is attached to sensual pleasures. Bound by sensual pleasures and arrogance, he accepts them and is involved with them. He does not see the danger in them, does not see the escape from them, but delights in engaging in sensual pleasures.

World-honored One, I see the disciples of the World-honored One, the sangha of monks, practice the holy life for their whole life and that even in very large numbers. Nowhere else do I see a holy life so purely lived as in the tradition of the World-honored One. This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, "The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One's disciples is progressing well."

Again, World-honored One, I see some renunciants or brahmins who are emaciated and haggard, ugly in form and complexion, their bodies covered with white pimples, so that people do not like to see them. It occurs to me, “Why are these venerable ones emaciated and haggard, ugly in form and complexion, their bodies covered with white pimples, so that people do not like to see them? These venerable ones certainly do not delight in practicing the holy life; or perhaps their bodies are afflicted; or perhaps it is because they are hiding some unwholesome deeds that they are emaciated and haggard, ugly in form and complexion, their bodies covered with white pimples, so that people do not like to see them.”

So I approach and ask them, “Venerable sirs, why are you emaciated and haggard, ugly in form and complexion, your bodies covered with white pimples, so that people do not like to see you? Is it that you do not delight in practicing the holy life? Or are your bodies afflicted? Or is it because you are hiding some unwholesome deeds that you are emaciated and haggard, ugly in form and complexion, your bodies covered with white pimples, so that people do not like to see you?” They reply to me, “Great King, it is the white disease. Great King, it is the white disease.”

World-honored One, I see the disciples of the World-honored One, the sangha of monks. They dwell happily and look well, with bright and shining complexions, clean bodies, naturally and without concern, sustained by food [given] by the wives of others, [aloof] like deer, practicing the holy life for their whole life. Having seen them, I think, “These venerable ones dwell happily and look well, with bright and shining complexions, clean bodies, naturally and without concern, sustained by food [given] by the wives of others, [aloof] like deer, practicing the holy life for their whole life. These venerable ones have attained detachment from sensual pleasures, a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present life, attaining it with ease, without difficulty. This is why these venerable ones dwell happily and look well, with bright and shining complexions, clean bodies, naturally and without concern, sustained by food [given] by the wives of others, [aloof] like deer, practicing the holy life for their whole life.” 796b

If those engaging in sensual pleasures were dwelling happily and looking well, I too should be dwelling happily and looking well. Why is that? I obtain the five strands of sensual pleasure with ease, without difficulty.

[However], these venerable ones have attained detachment from sensual pleasures, a higher state of mind, a happy abiding in the present life, attaining it with ease, without difficulty. Consequently these venerable ones dwell happily and look well, with bright and shining complexions, clean bodies, naturally and without concern, sustained by the food [given] by the wives of others, [aloof] like deer, practicing the holy life for their whole life.

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

Again, World-honored One, I see some renunciants or brahmins who are clever and wise, and proclaim themselves clever and wise.<sup>367</sup> Learned and opinionated, they know the various discourses by heart, and with their clear understanding they vigorously defeat their opponents in debate. The reputation of their good qualities has spread widely and nowhere in the world has their fame not become known. Wherever they go, they demolish the views of others and establish their own doctrine. They say, “Let us go to the renunciant Gotama and ask him about this and that matter. If he can answer, we will refute him; if he cannot answer, he has already been refuted and we will abandon him and leave.”

They hear that the World-honored One has traveled to some village or town. They approach the Buddha [there], yet they do not dare to question the World-honored One on any matter, much less try to refute him.

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

Again, World-honored One, I see some renunciants or brahmins who are clever and wise, and proclaim themselves clever and wise. Learned and opinionated, they know the various discourses by heart, and with their clear understanding they vigorously defeat their opponents in debate. The reputation of their good qualities has spread widely and nowhere in the world has their fame not become known. Wherever they go they demolish the views of others and establish their own doctrine. They say, “Let us go to the renunciant Gotama, and ask him about this and that matter. If he can answer, we will refute him; if he cannot answer, he has already been refuted and we will abandon him and leave.”

796c

They hear that the World-honored One has traveled to some village or town. They approach the Buddha [there]. They ask the World-honored One about some matter, and the World-honored One replies. Having heard his reply they are delighted by it, pay homage with their heads at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulate him three times, and leave.

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

Again, World-honored One, I see some renunciants or brahmins who are clever and wise, and proclaim themselves clever and wise. Learned and opinionated, they know the various discourses by heart, and with their clear understanding they vigorously defeat their opponents in debate. The reputation of their good qualities has spread widely and nowhere in the world has their fame not become known. Wherever they go they demolish the views of others and establish their own doctrine. They say, “Let us go to the renunciant Gotama, and ask him about this and that matter. If he can answer, we will refute him; if he cannot answer, he has already been refuted and we will abandon him and leave.”

They hear that the World-honored One has traveled to some village or town and they approach the Buddha [there]. They ask the World-honored One about some matter, and the World-honored One replies. On hearing his reply, they are so delighted by it that they take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. The World-honored One accepts them as lay followers until the end of life, as having gone to him for refuge for their whole life.

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

Again, World-honored One, I see some renunciants or brahmins who are clever and wise, and proclaim themselves clever and wise. Learned and opinionated, they know the various discourses by heart, and with their clear understanding they vigorously defeat their opponents in debate. The reputation of their good qualities has spread widely and nowhere in the world has their fame not become known. Wherever they go they demolish the views of others and establish their own doctrine. They say, “Let us go to the renunciant Gotama, and ask him about this and that matter. If he can answer, we will refute him; if he cannot answer, he has already been refuted and we will abandon him and leave.”

They hear that the World-honored One has traveled to some village or town, and they approach the Buddha [there]. They ask the World-honored One about some matter and the World-honored One replies. On hearing his reply they are so delighted by it that they ask the World-honored One to let them go forth, train, receive full ordination, and become monks. The Buddha then accepts them. They receive full ordination and become monks.

797a Then those venerable ones, having gone forth to train in the path, having received full ordination and become monks, live alone in a secluded place, and practice diligently with a mind free of negligence. Having lived alone in a secluded place and practiced diligently with a mind free of negligence, they attain fully the summit of the holy life, for the sake of which a clansman shaves off hair and beard, dons the yellow robe, leaves home out of faith, and goes forth to practice the path. In that very life they personally attain understanding and awakening and dwell having personally realized it. They know as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.”

Thus those monks, having understood the Dharma . . . up to . . . become arahants. Having become arahants, they think: “Venerable ones, formerly we were almost done for, almost lost. Why is that? Formerly although we were not renunciants, we claimed to be renunciants; although not living the holy life, we claimed to be living the holy life; although not arahants, we claimed to be arahants. Now we [truly] are renunciants, [truly] are living the holy life, and [truly] have become arahants.”

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

Again, World-honored One, within my own country I can order innocent persons to be executed and I can order guilty persons to be executed. Yet, when I sit with all seated [in court], I am not, simply for that reason, able to get [my way] by speaking like this: “Ministers, stop that now! No one asked you about that matter. They asked me about that matter. You ministers cannot decide this matter. Only I can decide this matter.” And then, in the midst of that, they start arguing about some other matter, without waiting until the current discussion has been concluded.

I have often seen the World-honored One teaching the Dharma surrounded by a great assembly. If one of them nods off and starts snoring,<sup>368</sup> someone will tell that person, “Do not nod off and snore! Do you not need to listen to the World-honored One teaching the Dharma, which is like ambrosia?” Having heard this, that person falls silent. [On such occasions] I think, “How wonderful, how extraordinary is the Tathāgata, free from attachment, fully awakened, trainer of those to be tamed! Why is that? Without blade and cudgel everybody naturally behaves according to the Dharma, in peace and happiness.”

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

Again, World-honored One, my two ministers, Isidatta and Purāṇa, owe their wealth, their common reputation, and their livelihood to me, but I cannot get my two ministers, Isidatta and Purāṇa, to respect me, venerate me, honor me, and support me in the way that they respect, venerate, honor, and support the World-honored One.

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

797b

Again, World-honored One, once long ago, while on a military exercise,<sup>369</sup> I spent the night in a small room with my two ministers, Isidatta and Purāṇa. I wanted to test them, by seeing which direction their heads would be facing as they slept: toward me or toward the World-honored One. As it happened, during the beginning of the night my two ministers, Isidatta and Purāṇa, sat cross-legged in silent meditation.<sup>370</sup> Then, in the middle of the night, because they had heard that the World-honored One was staying in a certain region, they [lay down] with their heads toward him and their feet toward me. Seeing that, I thought, “These two ministers, Isidatta and Purāṇa, consider not just what is superior in the present situation. Consequently, the way they respect me, venerate me, honor me, and support me is not equal to the way they respect, venerate, honor, and support the World-honored One.”

This is the faith I have gained regarding the Buddha and the Dharma. For this reason I have this thought, “The Tathāgata is free from attachment, fully awakened; his Dharma is well taught; and the Sangha of the World-honored One’s disciples is progressing well.”

Again, World-honored One, I am the king of the country [but] the World-honored One is the king of the Dharma.<sup>371</sup> I am of the warrior [caste] and the World-honored One is also of the warrior [caste]; I am a Kosalan and the World-honored One also is a Kosalan; I am eighty years of age and the World-honored One is also eighty. For this reason, World-honored One, I am able for my whole life to respect and venerate the World-honored One, to make offerings to him and support him. But now, World-honored One, I have many matters to attend to. Wishing to return, I ask permission to leave.

The World-honored One said, “Great king, you yourself know the proper time.” Then, having heard what the Buddha said, King Pasenadi of Kosala received and remembered it well, rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the Buddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

At that time the venerable Ānanda was standing behind the World-honored One holding a flywhisk and attending on the Buddha. Then the World-honored One turned to him and said, “Ānanda, let all the monks who are now staying in the forest around Medaḷumpa gather in the assembly hall.”<sup>372</sup>

Then, having received this instruction, the venerable Ānanda got the monks who were staying in the forest around Medaḷumpa to gather in the assembly hall. He returned to the Buddha and said:

World-honored One, all the monks that are staying in the forest around Medaḷumpa have now gathered. May the World-honored One know the right time.

Then the World-honored One went with the venerable Ānanda to the assembly hall, sat down on a seat arranged before the company of monks, and said:

Monks, today King Pasenadi of Kosala has spoken before me this “Discourse on the Adornments of the Dharma” and [then] risen from his seat, paid homage with his head at my feet, circumambulated me three times and left. Monks, you should memorize this “Discourse on the Adornments of the Dharma,” recite it well, and rehearse it well. Why is that? Monks, this “Discourse on the Adornments of the Dharma” is [spoken] according to the right meaning, according to Dharma, and is a basis for the holy life. It leads to wisdom, leads to awakening, and leads to nirvana. Persons of good family who leave home out of faith and go forth to practice the path should memorize this “Discourse on the Adornments of the Dharma,” recite it, and rehearse it. 797c

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha had said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

214. The Discourse on the Bāhitika Cloth<sup>373</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the venerable Ānanda had to attend to some small matter at the Hall of Migāra’s Mother in the Eastern Park near Sāvattthī. Then, accompanied by another monk, the venerable Ānanda left Sāvattthī and went to the Hall of Migāra’s Mother in the Eastern Park. Once the matter had been concluded, he and the monk went back to Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time King Pasenadi of Kosala came riding out of Sāvattthī on the elephant Ekaṇḍarika accompanied by the minister Sirivaḍḍha. The venerable Ānanda saw King Pasenadi of Kosala approaching in the distance and asked his fellow monk, “Is that King Pasenadi of Kosala?”<sup>374</sup> [The monk] answered, “Yes, it is.”

Then the venerable Ānanda left the road and stood under a tree. King Pasenadi of Kosala saw the venerable Ānanda among the trees and asked, “Sirivaḍḍha, is that the renunciant Ānanda?” and Sirivaḍḍha answered, “Yes, it is.” King Pasenadi of Kosala told his minister Sirivaḍḍha: “Lead this elephant to the renunciant Ānanda,” and Sirivaḍḍha, having received the king’s order, led the elephant to the venerable Ānanda.

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, where are you coming from, and where do you wish to go?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, I am coming from the Hall of Migāra’s Mother in the Eastern Park and wish to go to Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala said, “Ānanda, if you have no urgent matter to attend to at Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park, come with us to the Aciravatī River, out of compassion.” The venerable Ānanda accepted [the suggestion] by King Pasenadi of Kosala by remaining silent.

798a Then King Pasenadi of Kosala let the venerable Ānanda lead the way and together they went to the Aciravatī River. Having arrived there, [the king] dismounted. He took his elephant rug, folded it in four, spread it on the ground, and offered it to the venerable Ānanda, “Ānanda, please sit on this seat.” [But] the venerable Ānanda answered, “Please stop, please stop, Great King! Though my heart is pleased and satisfied [by your kindness].”<sup>375</sup> Three times King Pasenadi of Kosala, offered it to the venerable Ānanda, “Ānanda, please sit on this seat.” And three times the venerable Ānanda said, “Please stop, please stop, Great King! Though my heart is pleased and satisfied [by your kindness]. I have my own sitting mat, on which I will sit.” Then the venerable Ānanda spread his sitting mat and sat down cross-legged.

King Pasenadi of Kosala, having exchanged greetings with the venerable Ānanda, stepped back, sat to one side, and said, “Ānanda! I would like to ask a question. Am I permitted to ask it?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, ask whatever you wish. Having heard [your question],<sup>376</sup> I will consider it [carefully].”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, would the Tathāgata engage in bodily conduct such that renunciants or brahmins would despise this bodily conduct?”

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Great King, the Tathāgata does not engage in bodily conduct such that intelligent and wise renunciants, brahmins, or any other person in the world, would despise this bodily conduct.

Having heard this, King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying:

It is well, it is well, Ānanda! What was not accomplished by me [in my question, namely the addition of] “intelligent and wise” and “other person in the world,” that has been accomplished by the venerable Ānanda. [Indeed] Ānanda, we do not consider true any praise or blame from those who are not knowledgeable; but, Ānanda, we do consider true any praise or blame from those who are knowledgeable. [So], Ānanda, would the Tathāgata engage in bodily conduct such that intelligent and wise renunciants or brahmins or any other person in the world would despise this bodily conduct?

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Great King, the Tathāgata never engages in bodily conduct such that intelligent and wise renunciants, brahmins, or any other person in the world would despise this bodily conduct.

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, what bodily conduct is that?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, it is unwholesome bodily conduct.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, what is unwholesome bodily conduct?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, it is blameworthy bodily conduct.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, what is blameworthy bodily conduct?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, it is engaging in bodily conduct that is despised by the wise.”

798b

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked: “Ānanda, what is despised by the wise?”

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Great King, it is engaging in bodily conduct that harms oneself, harms others, harms both oneself and others; that destroys wisdom and abets the appearance of evil; [conduct] that does not bring attainment of nirvana, [conduct] that does not lead to wisdom, does not lead to awakening, and does not lead to nirvana.<sup>377</sup>

There are those who do not know as it really is what things are permissible and who also do not know as it really is what things are not permissible.

Not knowing as it really is what things are permissible and also not knowing as it really is what things are not permissible, they do not know as it really is what things are acceptable and also do not know as it really is what things are not acceptable.

Not knowing as it really is what things are acceptable and also not knowing as it really is what things are not acceptable, they do not know as it really is which things should be abandoned and also do not know as it really is which things should not be abandoned.

Not knowing as it really is which things should be abandoned and also not knowing as it really is which things should not be abandoned, they do not know as it really is which things should be achieved and also do not know as it really is which things should not be achieved.

Not knowing as it really is which things should be achieved and also not knowing as it really is which things should not be achieved, they do not do things that are permissible, but instead do things that are not permissible.

Not doing things that are permissible and instead doing things that are not permissible, they do not accept things that should be accepted but instead accept things that should not be accepted.

Not accepting things that should be accepted and instead accepting things that should not be accepted, they do not abandon things that should be abandoned, but instead abandon things that should not be abandoned.

Not abandoning things that should be abandoned and instead abandoning things that should not be abandoned, they do not achieve things that should be achieved, but instead achieve things that should not be achieved.

Not achieving things that should be achieved and instead achieving things that should not be achieved, they cause things that are unwholesome to increase and things that are wholesome to diminish. For this reason the Tathāgata never acts in such a way.

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, why does the Tathāgata never act in such a way?”

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Great King, he is free from desire, desire being extinguished, he is free from anger, anger being extinguished, he is free from ignorance, ignorance being extinguished, the Tathāgata has cut off all unwholesome things and achieved all wholesome things. He is the instructing teacher, the wonderful teacher, the skillful and well-disposed teacher, the leading charioteer, the well-disposed charioteer, who speaks skillfully, who speaks wonderfully, who being well-disposed speaks skillfully. This is why the Tathāgata never acts in such a way.

King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying:

It is well, it is well, Ānanda! The Tathāgata does not do things that are not permissible. Why is that? Because the Tathāgata is free from attachment and fully awakened. Ānanda, you are a disciple of that teacher, training in the path wishing to attain the unsurpassable peace of nirvana. Even you do not do things that are not permissible. How, then, could the Tathāgata act in such a way? 798c

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked:

Ānanda, would the Tathāgata engage in bodily conduct such that intelligent and wise renunciants or brahmins or any other person in the world would not despise this bodily conduct?

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Great King, the Tathāgata certainly engages in bodily conduct such that intelligent and wise renunciants, brahmins, or any other person in the world would not despise this bodily conduct.

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, what bodily conduct is that?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, it is wholesome bodily conduct.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, what is wholesome bodily conduct?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, it is blameless bodily conduct.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, what is blameless bodily conduct?”

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Great King, it is bodily conduct of the kind that is not despised by the wise.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala asked, “Ānanda, what is not despised by the wise?”
The venerable Ānanda answered:

Great King, it is engaging in bodily conduct that does not harm oneself, does not harm others, does not harm either oneself or others; [conduct] that awakens wisdom and does not abet the appearance of evil; [conduct] whereby one attains nirvana, [conduct] that leads to wisdom, leads to awakening, and leads to nirvana.

[There are those who] know as it really is what things are permissible and also know as it really is what things are not permissible.

Knowing as it really is what things are permissible and knowing as it really is what things are not permissible, they know as it really is what things are acceptable and know as it really is what things are not acceptable.

Knowing as it really is what things are acceptable and knowing as it really is what things are not acceptable, they know as it really is which things should be abandoned and know as it really is which things should not be abandoned.

Knowing as it really is which things should be abandoned and knowing as it really is which things should not be abandoned, they know as it really is which things should be achieved and know as it really is which things should not be achieved.

Knowing as it really is which things should be achieved and knowing as it really is which things should not be achieved, they do things that are permissible and do not do things that are not permissible.

Doing things that are permissible and not doing things that are not permissible, they accept things that should be accepted, and do not accept things that should not be accepted.

Accepting things that should be accepted and not accepting things that should not be accepted, they abandon things that should be abandoned and do not abandon things that should not be abandoned.

Abandoning things that should be abandoned and not abandoning things that should not be abandoned, they achieve things that should be achieved and do not achieve things that should not be achieved.

Achieving things that should be achieved and not achieving things that should not be achieved, they cause things that are unwholesome to diminish and things that are wholesome to increase. This is why the Tathāgata certainly acts in such a way.

799a

King Pasenadi of Kosala, asked, “Ānanda, why does the Tathāgata certainly act in such a way?”

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Great King, he is free from desire, desire being extinguished, he is free from anger, anger being extinguished, he is free from ignorance, ignorance being extinguished, the Tathāgata has cut off all unwholesome things and achieved all wholesome things. He is the instructing teacher, the wonderful teacher, the skillful and well-disposed teacher, the leading charioteer, the well-disposed charioteer, who speaks well, who speaks wonderfully, who being well-disposed speaks skillfully. This is why the Tathāgata certainly acts in such a way.

King Pasenadi of Kosala praised him, saying:

It is well, it is well, Ānanda! The Tathāgata certainly does [only] things that are permissible. Why is that? Because the Tathāgata is free from attachment and fully awakened. Ānanda, you are a disciple of this teacher, training in the path, wishing to attain the unsurpassable peace of nirvana. Even you do [only] things that are permissible; how then could the Tathāgata not act in such a way?

Ānanda has spoken well and I am now delighted. Ānanda has spoken to the point and I am extremely delighted. If Ānanda were permitted to accept the revenue of a village, I would give him the revenue of a village as a reward for his teaching. Ānanda, if Ānanda were permitted to accept elephants, horses, cattle, and sheep, I would give him elephants, horses, cattle, and sheep as a reward for his teaching. Ānanda, if Ānanda were permitted to accept women and girls, I would give him women and girls as a reward for his teaching. Ānanda, if Ānanda were permitted to accept gold and jewels, I would give him gold and jewels as a reward for his teaching.

But Ānanda is not permitted to accept any such things. [However], in my home in Kosala I have a garment, [a kind of cloak] called a bāhitika. It is the best [of all cloth]. It was sent [to me] as a token of trust by a king, packed in an empty parasol case. Ānanda, of all the cotton cloth in my home in Kosala this bāhitika is the best. Why is that? This bāhitika cloth is sixteen hands long and eight hands wide. I will present this bāhitika cloth to Ānanda for his teaching. Ānanda may make three robes from it. Please accept it to increase the merit of my family in Kosala for a long time!

The venerable Ānanda answered, “Please stop, please stop, Great King. Though my heart is pleased and satisfied [by your kindness]. I already have three robes, which I have accepted.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala said:

May Ānanda permit me to tell a simile. The wise, on hearing a simile, understand its implication. During the rainy season this Aciravatī River fills up and overflows its banks. Has Ānanda seen this?

The venerable Ānanda replied, “I have seen it.”

799b King Pasenadi of Kosala said:

In the same way, if Ānanda has three robes, he may give them to monks, nuns, or male or female novices in training. If Ānanda accepts this bāhitika and has three robes made from it, he will increase the merit of my family in Kosala for a long time.

The venerable Ānanda accepted it from King Pasenadi of Kosala by remaining silent.

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala, understanding that the venerable Ānanda had accepted it by remaining silent, presented the bāhitika cloth to the venerable Ānanda as a reward for his teaching, rose from his seat, circumambulated [Ānanda] three times, and left.

Not long after he had left, the venerable Ānanda took the bāhitika cloth, and went to the Buddha. Having paid homage at the Buddha’s feet and stood back to one side, he said:

World-honored One, today this bāhitika cloth was given to me by King Pasenadi of Kosala as a reward for my teaching. May the World-honored One step on the bāhitika cloth with both feet so that the merit of the [king’s] family in Kosala may increase for a long time.<sup>378</sup>

Then the World-honored One stepped on the bāhitika cloth with both feet and said, “Now, Ānanda, tell me all that you discussed with King Pasenadi of Kosala.”

At this, the venerable Ānanda told the Buddha everything that he had discussed with King Pasenadi of Kosala. Extending his hands with joined palms he said:

Speaking in this way, did I not misrepresent the World-honored One? Was it spoken truly according to the Dharma, spoken in the spirit of the Dharma? Was there no transgression with regard to the Dharma?<sup>379</sup>

The World-honored One said:

Speaking in this way you did not misrepresent me. You spoke truly and in accordance with the Dharma. You spoke in the spirit of the Dharma and there was no transgression with regard to the Dharma. Ānanda, if King Pasenadi of Kosala had asked me with this meaning, with these phrases, with these words, then I would have answered him with this meaning, with these phrases, with these words. Ānanda, you should bear its meaning in mind in this way, as you have spoken it. Why is that? What you have said conveys the meaning.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the venerable Ānanda and the other monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

215. The Discourse on Attaining the Best<sup>380</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

799c

At that time the World-honored One told the monks:

Within the realm of King Pasenadi of Kosala, as far as his command extends, there King Pasenadi of Kosala is the foremost one. [Yet even] for King Pasenadi of Kosala there is change and alteration. Contemplating this, the learned noble disciple becomes disenchanted. Being disenchanted, he becomes dispassionate about the foremost one, not to mention inferior ones.

The realm of the sun and moon, [that is to say,] wherever their light shines, all the region in which their light shines, is called the thousandfold world-system. In the thousandfold world-system there are a thousand suns, a thousand moons, a thousand [continents called] Pūbbavideha, a thousand [called] Jambudīpa, a thousand [called] Aparagoyāna, a thousand [called] Uttarakuru, and a thousand mountains [called] Sumeru; [there are] a thousand of the Four Great Heavenly Kings, a thousand sons of the Four Heavenly Kings, a thousand of the devas of the Thirty-three, a thousand of the deva king Sakka, a thousand of the deva Yāma, a thousand sons of the deva Yāma, a thousand Tusita devas, a thousand sons of the Tusita devas, a thousand of the devas that delight in their own creation, a thousand sons of the devas that delight in their own creation, a thousand of the devas that delight in others' creations, a thousand sons of the devas that delight in others' creations, a thousand Brahmā worlds, and a thousand individual Brahmās.<sup>381</sup>

Among these there is one Brahmā, [namely] Mahābrahmā, who is greatly venerated as the father who created [all] beings, who existed in the past and will exist [forever]. [Yet even] for Mahābrahmā there is change and alteration. Contemplating this, the learned noble disciple becomes disenchanted. Being disenchanted, he becomes dispassionate about the foremost one, not to mention inferior ones.

At a later time this world will come to destruction. When this world comes to destruction, [certain] beings will be reborn among the devas of Radiance. There they will acquire a form that is mind-made and complete in every respect. Their limbs will not wither, nor will their senses decline. They will feed on joy, their form will be pure and immaculate. With radiant bodies, they will fly through space. They will dwell there for a very long time. [Yet even] for the devas of Radiance there is change and alteration. Contemplating this, the learned noble disciple becomes disenchanted. Being disenchanted, he becomes dispassionate about the foremost one, not to mention inferior ones.

Again, there are four perceptions.<sup>382</sup> A monk may have perception of the limited, perception of the great, perception of the immeasurable, or perception of nothingness. [Yet even] for living beings who delight in such perceptions and are mentally resolved on them, there is change and alteration. Contemplating this, the learned noble disciple becomes disenchanted. Being disenchanted, he becomes dispassionate about the foremost one, not to mention inferior ones.

Again, there are eight spheres of transcendence. What eight? A monk, while perceiving forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are limited, beautiful or ugly. Having transcended these forms, he knows it; having transcended them, he sees it. Having such a perception is the first sphere of transcendence.

Again, a monk, while perceiving forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are immeasurable, beautiful or ugly. Having transcended these forms, he knows; having transcended them, he sees. Having such a perception is the second sphere of transcendence.

Again, a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates forms externally that are limited, beautiful or ugly. Having transcended these forms, he knows it; having transcended them, he sees it. Having such a perception is the third sphere of transcendence. 800a

Again, a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates forms externally that are immeasurable, beautiful, or ugly. Having transcended these forms, he knows it; having transcended them, he sees it. Having such a perception is the fourth sphere of transcendence.

Again, a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are blue, blue in color, blue in appearance, blue-tinted. It is just as the blue water lily is blue, blue in color, blue in appearance, blue-tinted; and it is just as a fine cloth from Benares that, being well pressed and ironed, may have been dyed a bright blue, blue in color, blue in appearance, blue-tinted.

In the same way a monk while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are blue, blue in color, blue in appearance, blue-tinted. [His mind becomes] immeasurable. [Having become] immeasurable, his mind is cleansed and fresh, happy and free from ill will. Having transcended these forms, he knows it; having transcended them, he sees it. Having such a perception is the fifth sphere of transcendence.

Again, a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are yellow, yellow in color, yellow in appearance, yellow-tinted. It is just as the yellow hibiscus is yellow, yellow in color, yellow in appearance, yellow-tinted;<sup>383</sup> and it is just as a fine cloth from Benares that, being well pressed and ironed, may have been dyed a bright yellow, yellow in color, yellow in appearance, yellow-tinted.

In the same way a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are yellow, yellow in color, yellow in appearance, yellow-tinted. [His mind becomes] immeasurable. [Having become] immeasurable, his mind is cleansed and fresh, happy and free from ill will. Having transcended these forms, he knows it; having transcended them, he sees it. Having such a perception is the sixth sphere of transcendence.

Again, a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are red, red in color, red in appearance, red-tinted. It is just as the kaṇṇikāra flower is red, red in color, red in appearance, red-tinted; and it is just as a fine cloth from Benares that, being well pressed and ironed, may have been dyed a bright red, red in color, red in appearance, red-tinted.

In the same way a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are red, red in color, red in appearance, red-tinted. [His mind becomes] immeasurable. [Having become] immeasurable, his mind is cleansed and fresh, happy and free from ill will. Having transcended these forms, he knows it; having transcended them, he sees it. Having such a perception is the seventh sphere of transcendence.

Again, a monk, while not perceiving any forms internally, contemplates externally forms that are white, white in color, white in appearance, white-tinted. It is just as the planet <Venus> is white in color,<sup>384</sup> white in appearance, white-tinted; and it is just as a fine cloth from Benares that, being dyed, well pressed and ironed, may have been dyed a bright white, white in color, white in appearance, white-tinted.

In the same way a monk, while not perceiving any form internally, contemplates externally forms that are white, white in color, white in appearance, white-tinted. [His mind becomes] immeasurable. [Having become] immeasurable, his mind is cleansed and fresh, happy and free from ill will. Having transcended these forms, he knows it; having transcended them, he sees it. Having such a perception is the eighth sphere of transcendence.

[Yet even] for living beings who delight in such spheres of transcendence and are mentally resolved on them, there is change and alteration. Contemplating this, the learned noble disciple becomes disenchanted.

800b

Being disenchanted, he becomes dispassionate about the foremost one, not to mention inferior ones.

Again, there are ten all-encompassing spheres (kaṣiṇa). What are the ten? Here a monk cultivates the unity of the sphere of infinite earth, attending to it above, below, and in all directions as undivided. He cultivates the unity of the sphere of infinite water . . . the sphere of infinite fire . . . the sphere of infinite wind . . . the sphere of infinite blue . . . the sphere of infinite yellow . . . the sphere of infinite red . . . the sphere of infinite white . . . the sphere of infinite space . . . the sphere of infinite consciousness as the tenth, attending to it above, below, and in all directions as undivided.

[Yet even] for living beings who delight in such all-encompassing spheres and are mentally resolved on them, there is change and alteration. Contemplating this, the learned noble disciple becomes disenchanted. Being disenchanted, he becomes dispassionate about the foremost one, not to mention inferior ones.

This is the foremost of teachings about purification, designated as the foremost, namely, “I am not, I do not exist.” And for the purpose of its realization a path has been designated.

This is the foremost among heterodox views, the best among heterodox views, namely, “Completely transcending perceptions of form . . . up to . . . he enters and dwells in the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.”

This is the foremost among realizations here and now: seeking to attain nirvana. Among realizations here and now nirvana is designated the best, that is: seeing with wisdom, as it really is, the arising of the six sense spheres, their ceasing, the gratification in them, and separation from them. And for the purpose of its realization a path has been designated.

Again, there are four modes of abandoning. What are the four? There is abandoning that is pleasant and slow, abandoning that is pleasant and quick, abandoning that is painful and slow, and abandoning that is painful and quick.

Of these, the abandoning that is pleasant and slow I declare to be inferior because it is pleasant and slow.<sup>385</sup>

[Of these], as for the abandoning that is pleasant and quick, I declare to be <superior> because it is pleasant and quick.<sup>386</sup>

Of these, as for the abandoning that is painful and slow, I also declare it to be inferior because it is painful and slow. As for the abandoning that is painful and quick, because it is painful and quick, I have not proclaimed this [type of] abandoning widely and made it known among devas and humankind, so it cannot be said to be widely proclaimed. I have, [however], proclaimed widely my [type of] abandoning, and made it known among devas and humankind, so it can be said to be widely proclaimed.

What do I mean by “my [type of] abandoning,” which I have proclaimed widely and made known among devas and humankind?

It is the eightfold path, right view . . . up to . . . right concentration—these are the eight. This is my [type of] abandoning, which I have proclaimed widely and made known among devas and humankind, and which can therefore be said to be widely known. This I have done.

Renunciants and brahmins have, with empty falsehoods and lies, evil and untrue, misrepresented me [by saying], “He declares the annihilation of living beings that really exist. The renunciant Gotama declares annihilation. He declares the annihilation of living beings that really exist.” [But] this is not so. This is not what I teach. [I say,] “The Tathāgata has, in the here and now, abandoned all.”<sup>387</sup> He has attained peace, stillness, cessation [of dukkha], nirvana.”

At that time the monks, having heard what the Buddha said, were delighted and received it respectfully.

216. The Discourse on What Arises from Affection<sup>388</sup>

800c Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time there was a brahmin whose only son, whom he loved greatly and doted on, and whom he never tired of looking at, suddenly died. After his death, the brahmin grieved, could not eat or drink, and would not dress [properly] or use scented unguents. He would only go to the charnel ground where the child had been laid to rest, and weep in recollection of him. Then, while wandering about, the brahmin approached the Buddha and, having exchanged greetings, stepped back and sat to one side.

The World-honored One said, “Brahmin, why do your faculties appear unsettled now?”

The brahmin answered:

How could my faculties be settled now? Why is that? My only son, whom I loved greatly and doted on, and whom I never tired of looking at, died suddenly. Since his death I have been grieving. I am unable to eat or drink and do not dress [properly] or use scented unguents. I only go to the charnel ground where the child had been laid to rest, and weep in recollection of him. 801a

The World-honored One said, “It is like this, brahmin; it is like this, brahmin. Whenever affection arises, there then arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.”

The brahmin said:

Gotama, how can you say that whenever affection arises, there then arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation? Gotama, you should know that whenever affection arises, there arise joy and happiness in the mind.

Three times the World-honored One spoke like this, “It is like this, brahmin; it is like this, brahmin. Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.” And three times the brahmin said to him, “Gotama, how can you say that whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation? Gotama, you should know that whenever affection arises, there arise joy and happiness in the mind.”

Then the brahmin, having heard what the Buddha said, did not agree. Having expressed only disagreement, he then rose from his seat and left, shaking his head.

At that time, in front of the entrance to Jeta’s Grove, a group of many youths from the town were gambling together. Having seen them in the distance, the brahmin thought, “There is no one in the world more clever or wise than a gambler. Let me now approach them and tell them the whole discussion that I have had with Gotama.”

Then the brahmin went to where the group of many youths from the town were gambling together and told them the whole discussion that he had had with the World-honored One. Having heard it, the group of many youths from the town that were gambling said:

Brahmin, how can he say that whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation? Brahmin, he should know that whenever affection arises, there arise joy and happiness in the mind.

On hearing this, the brahmin thought, “What these gamblers say agrees with what I say.” And he left, nodding his head.

Then the story got around until it reached the king’s palace. The king of Kosala, Pasenadi, heard that the renunciant Gotama had spoken like this, “Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.” He told Queen Mallikā, “I hear that the renunciant Gotama has said, ‘Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.’”

Hearing this, Queen Mallikā said, “It is like this, Great King; it is like this, Great King. Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala said to Queen Mallikā:

801b     Hearing the explanations of the teacher, the disciple will certainly agree.
The renunciant Gotama is your teacher, therefore you speak like this. You are his disciple, therefore you speak like this, “Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.”

Queen Mallikā said, “Great King, if you do not believe it, you can go and ask him yourself, or you can send a messenger.”<sup>389</sup>

Then King Pasenadi of Kosala, told the brahmin Nālījaṅgha:

Go to the renunciant Gotama and on my behalf ask the renunciant Gotama if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free of ailments, and if he is dwelling at ease with his usual vigor. Speak like this: “King Pasenadi of Kosala inquires if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable, and free of ailments. Is he dwelling at ease with his usual vigor?” [Then ask him,] “Did the renunciant Gotama really speak like this: ‘Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation’?” Nālījaṅgha, whatever the renunciant Gotama says to this, you should receive and remember well. Why is that? Such a person would never speak falsehood.

The brahmin Nāḷijaṅgha, having received the king's order, went to the Buddha. Having exchanged greetings, he stepped back and sat to one side. He said:

Gotama, King Pasenadi of Kosala, inquires if the noble one is healthy and strong in body, comfortable and free from ailments. Is he dwelling at ease with his usual vigor? Has the renunciant Gotama really spoken like this, "Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation"?

The World-honored One said:

Nāḷijaṅgha, let me ask you something. Answer according to your understanding. What do you think, Nāḷijaṅgha? Suppose there is a person whose mother has died and he has become deranged.<sup>390</sup> His mind being greatly troubled, he tears off his clothes and walks naked around the streets, speaking like this, "Friends, have you seen my mother? Friends, have you seen my mother?" Nāḷijaṅgha, on the basis of this case one can know that whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.

It is the same when a person's father . . . brother . . . older sister . . . younger sister . . . daughter-in-law dies and he becomes deranged. His mind being greatly troubled, he tears off his clothes and walks naked around the streets, speaking like this, "Friends, have you seen my daughter-in-law? Friends, have you seen my daughter-in-law?" Nāḷijaṅgha, on the basis of this case one can know that whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.

Nāḷijaṅgha, formerly there was a man whose wife temporarily returned to her family. Her relatives wanted to force her to remarry. When the woman learned of this, she quickly returned to her husband's house and told her husband, "My lord, you should know that my relatives now want to force me to marry another man. What are we to do?" Then that man took the woman by the arm and led her inside. He spoke like this, "Together we will attain the next world. Together we will attain the next world." Then he took a sharp knife and killed his wife and himself. Nāḷijaṅgha, on the basis of this case one can know that whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.

801c

The brahmin Nāḷijaṅgha, hearing what the Buddha said, received and remembered it well. He rose from his seat, circumambulated [the Buddha] three times, and left. Returning to King Pasenadi of Kosala, he said:

Your Majesty, the renunciant Gotama indeed spoke like this: “Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.”<sup>391</sup>

Hearing this, King Pasenadi of Kosala told Queen Mallikā, “The renunciant Gotama indeed spoke like this: ‘Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.’”

Queen Mallikā said:

Great King, let me ask the Great King something. Answer according to your understanding. What do you think? Does the king feel affection for [his son], General Viḍḍabha?

He answered, “Yes, I truly feel affection [for him].”

Mallikā asked further, “If something untoward were to happen to General Viḍḍabha, how would the king feel about that?”

He answered:

Mallikā, if something untoward were to happen to General Viḍḍabha, I would certainly feel grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.

Mallikā said, “On the basis of this case, one can know this: ‘Whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.’”

Mallikā asked further:

Does the king feel affection for his senior minister Sirivaḍḍha . . . feel affection for his [royal] elephant Ekapuṇḍarika . . . feel affection for [his only] daughter Vajjīrī . . . feel affection for [his other wife] Vāsabhā . . . feel affection for [his realms of] Kāśi and Kosala?<sup>392</sup>

He answered, “Yes, I truly feel affection [for them].”

Mallikā asked again, “If something untoward were to happen to Kāśi and Kosala, how would the king feel about that?”

He answered:

Mallikā, all of the five strands of sensual pleasure that I am endowed with and enjoy derive from these two realms. If something untoward were to happen to Kāsi and Kosala, I would even be without livelihood. How, then, could I not give rise to grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation?

Mallikā said, “On the basis of this case, one can know that whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.”

Mallikā asked the king further, “What do you think? Do you feel affection for me?”

Again the king answered, “Yes, I truly feel affection for you.”

Mallikā asked again, “If one day something untoward were to happen to me, how would the king feel about that?”

He answered, “Mallikā, if one day something untoward were to happen to you, I would certainly feel grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.” 802a

Mallikā said, “On the basis of this case, one can know that whenever affection arises, there arise grief, lamentation, sorrow, pain, depression, and vexation.”

King Pasenadi of Kosala, said:

Mallikā, from this day on, because of this, the renunciant Gotama is my teacher, and I am his disciple. Mallikā, I now take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One receive me as a lay disciple, from this day on until the end of life. I take refuge [in him] for my whole life.<sup>393</sup>

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, King Pasenadi of Kosala and Queen Mallikā were delighted and received it respectfully.

217. The Discourse at Aṭṭhakanāgara<sup>394</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time, not long after the Buddha’s final nirvana, there was a group of well-known and virtuous senior monks staying in the Rooster’s Park near the city of Pāṭaliputta.

At that time the householder Dasama of Aṭṭhakanāgara had gone to Pāṭaliputta bearing many goods of high quality, to do business by selling them. Then the householder Dasama of Aṭṭhakanāgara sold those many goods of high quality quickly and at a large profit, which made him leap up with great joy. Leaving the city of Pāṭaliputta, he went to the Rooster's Park, the abode of many well-known and virtuous senior monks. He paid homage with his head at their feet, stepped back, and sat to one side. Then the well-known and virtuous senior monks taught him the Dharma. They exhorted and inspired him, fully delighting him, teaching him the Dharma with countless skillful means. Having exhorted and inspired him, fully delighting him, they remained silent.

Then, after the senior monks had taught him the Dharma, exhorted and inspired him, fully delighting him, the householder Dasama of Aṭṭhakanāgara said, "Venerable sirs, where is the venerable Ānanda now? I would like to go and visit him."<sup>395</sup>

The senior monks answered, "Householder, the venerable Ānanda is now staying in Vesālī, in the Gabled Hall by the Monkey Lake. If you would like to visit him, you can go there."

Then the householder Dasama of Aṭṭhakanāgara rose from his seat, paid homage with his head at the senior monks' feet, circumambulated them three times, and left.

He went to where the venerable Ānanda was. Having paid homage with his head at his feet, stepped back, and sat to one side, he said, "Venerable Ānanda, I would like to ask a question. Am I permitted to ask it?"

802b The venerable Ānanda said, "Householder, ask whatever you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it."

The householder asked:

Venerable Ānanda, the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, who had attained the eye of wisdom and had seen the supreme benefit, did he teach one teaching whereby a noble disciple can make an end of all taints without remainder and attain liberation of the mind?

The venerable Ānanda answered, "Yes, he did."

The householder asked:

Venerable Ānanda, what is this one teaching taught by the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, who had attained the eye of wisdom and had seen the highest truth, whereby a noble disciple can make an end of all taints without remainder and attain liberation of the mind?

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Householder, a learned noble disciple secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil, unwholesome states . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the fourth absorption. Relying on this attainment, he then contemplates dhammas as dhammas.<sup>396</sup>

Relying on this attainment and contemplating dhammas as dhammas, being established in it, he may attain the cessation of the taints. This is possible. If, however, [despite] being established in that, he does not achieve the cessation of the taints, then it may be that, because of [contemplating] this Dharma, because of his desire for the Dharma, his love for the Dharma, his joy in the Dharma, his delight in the Dharma, his enjoyment and delight in it, he cuts off the five lower fetters and will be reborn spontaneously <in between> and attain final nirvana there.<sup>397</sup> Attaining the condition of nonreturn, he will never return to this [world].

Again, householder, the learned noble disciple, with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, dwells pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth direction, and also the four intermediate directions, above, and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind] that is boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. In the same way he imbues his mind with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, free of fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind] that is boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated.

Relying on this attainment, he then contemplates dhammas as dhammas. Relying on this attainment and contemplating dhammas as dhammas, being established in it, he may attain the cessation of the taints. This is possible. If, however, [despite] being established in that, he does not attain the cessation of the taints, then it may be that, because of [contemplating] this Dharma, because of his desire for the Dharma, his love for the Dharma, his joy in the Dharma, his delight in the Dharma, his enjoyment and delight in it, he cuts off the five lower fetters and will be reborn spontaneously <in between> and attain final nirvana there. Attaining the condition of non-return, he will never return to this [world].

This is one teaching taught by the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, who had attained the eye of wisdom and had seen the highest truth, whereby a noble disciple will make an end of all taints without remainder and attain liberation of the mind.

Again, householder, the learned noble disciple completely transcends perception of form . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.<sup>398</sup> [Relying] on this attainment, he then contemplates dharmas as dharmas. Relying on this attainment and contemplating dharmas as dharmas, being established in it, he may attain the cessation of the taints. This is possible. If, however, [despite] being established in that, he does not attain the cessation of the taints, then it may be that, because of [contemplating] this Dharma, because of his desire for the Dharma, his love for the Dharma, his joy in the Dharma, his delight in the Dharma, his enjoyment and delight in it, he cuts off the five lower fetters and will be reborn spontaneously <in between> and attain final nirvana there. Attaining the condition of nonreturn, he will never return to this [world].

802c

This is one teaching taught by the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, who had attained the eye of wisdom and had seen the highest truth, whereby a noble disciple will make an end of all taints without remainder and attain liberation of the mind.

Then the householder Dasama of Aṭṭhakanāgara rose from his seat, arranged his robe so as to bare one shoulder, extended his hands with joined palms and said:

Marvelous, venerable Ānanda! Extraordinary! I asked the venerable Ānanda about one door to the deathless and the venerable Ānanda has at once explained to me twelve Dharma doors to the deathless.<sup>399</sup> Now, by using these twelve Dharma doors, by relying on them, one will certainly emerge to safety.

Venerable Ānanda, it is as if, not far from a village, there were a large house with twelve doors. A man for some reason enters the house, and another man comes along who, not wishing for this man's benefit, gain, and safety, sets fire to the house.

Venerable Ānanda, the man [in the house] will certainly escape through [one of] the twelve doors and reach safety for himself.

In the same way, I asked the venerable Ānanda about one door to the deathless and the venerable Ānanda has at once explained to me twelve Dharma doors to the deathless. Now by using these twelve doors, by relying on them, one will certainly emerge to safety.

Venerable Ānanda, the teaching and discipline of the brahmins contain unwholesome teachings and disciplines, but even the brahmins make offerings to their teacher. How, then, could I fail to make offerings to the great teacher, the venerable Ānanda!

Then the householder Dasama of Aṭṭhakanāgara spent the night preparing an offering of fine dishes, delicious, plentiful, and easy to digest. Having prepared this food, in the morning he spread out sitting mats and invited the monastic communities of both the Rooster's Park and Vesālī to gather in a certain place. He personally brought water for washing, and with his own hands served up fine dishes, delicious, plentiful, and easy to digest. Having let everybody eat his fill, he put away the utensils and finally brought water for washing. He purchased a building worth five hundred and presented it as a separate gift to the venerable Ānanda. The venerable Ānanda accepted it and presented it for the common use of the sangha.<sup>400</sup>

This is what the venerable Ānanda said. Having heard what the venerable Ānanda had said, the householder Dasama of Aṭṭhakanāgara was delighted and received it respectfully.

803a

218. The [First] Discourse by Anuruddha

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time, in the afternoon, some monks rose from their meditation and approached the venerable Anuruddha. Having paid homage with their heads at his feet, they stepped back and sat to one side. They said, "We would like to ask a question. If permitted, may we venture to state it?"

The venerable Anuruddha answered, “Venerable friends, ask whatever you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it.”

Then the monks asked, “What does it mean for a monk to die well, to die a good death?”

The venerable Anuruddha answered:

Venerable friends, suppose that a monk, secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the fourth absorption. Such a monk is said to die well, to die a good death.

Then the monks asked further, “Is this the best way for a monk to die? Is this the best death?”

The venerable Anuruddha answered:

Venerable friends, this is not the best way for a monk to die. It is not the best death. Again, venerable friends, suppose a monk attains the supernormal powers . . . the divine hearing . . . knowledge of the minds of others . . . knowledge of former existences . . . knowledge of death and rebirth . . . and the cessation of the taints. Being without taints, [he attains] liberation of the mind, liberation through wisdom. In this very life he personally attains understanding and awakening, and dwells having personally realized it. He understands as it really is: “Birth has been ended, the holy life has been established, what had to be done has been done; there will not be another experiencing of existence.” Such a monk is said to die well, to die a good death.

Then the monks asked further, “Is this the best way for a monk to die? Is this the best death?”

The venerable Anuruddha answered, “Venerable friends, this is [indeed] the best way for a monk to die. This is the best death.”

Then the monks, having heard what the venerable Anuruddha had said, having received and remembered it well, rose from their seats, paid homage at the venerable Anuruddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

This is what the venerable Anuruddha said. Having heard what the venerable Anuruddha had said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

219. The [Second] Discourse by Anuruddha

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattṥī, in Jeta's Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika's Park.

At that time, in the afternoon, some monks rose from their meditation and approached the venerable Anuruddha. Having paid homage with their heads at his feet, they stepped back and sat to one side. They said, "We would like to ask a question. If permitted, may we venture to state it?"

The venerable Anuruddha answered, "Venerable friends, ask whatever you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it." 803b

Then the monks asked, "What does it mean for a monk to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death?"

The venerable Anuruddha answered:

Venerable friends, suppose that a monk has straight views and has adopted the moral precepts cherished by the noble ones. Such a monk is said to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death."

Then the monks asked further, "Is this the best way for a monk to die untroubled, the best way to die an untroubled death?"

The venerable Anuruddha answered:

Venerable friends, this is not the best way for a monk to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death. Again, venerable friends, suppose that a monk internally contemplates the body as a body . . . feelings . . . [states of] mind . . . dharmas as dharmas. Such a monk is said to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death.

Then the monks asked further, "Is this the best way for a monk to die untroubled, the best way to die an untroubled death?"

The venerable Anuruddha answered:

Venerable friends, this is not the best way for a monk to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death. Again, venerable friends, suppose that a monk with a mind imbued with loving-kindness dwells pervading one direction, likewise the second, the third, and the fourth direction, and also the four intermediate directions, above and below, all around, everywhere. With a mind imbued with loving-kindness, without fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. Likewise, he imbues his mind with compassion . . . with empathic joy . . . with equanimity, without fetters or resentment, without ill will or contention, he dwells pervading the entire world [with a mind that is] boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated. Such a monk is said to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death.

Then the monks asked further, “Is this the best way for a monk to die untroubled, the best way to die an untroubled death?”

The venerable Anuruddha answered:

Venerable friends, this is not the best way for a monk to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death. Again, venerable friends, suppose that a monk, completely transcending perception of form . . . up to . . . dwells having attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception. Such a monk is said to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death.

Then the monks asked further, “Is this the best way for a monk to die untroubled, the best way to die an untroubled death?”

The venerable Anuruddha answered:

Venerable friends, this is not the best way for a monk to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death. Again, venerable friends, suppose that a monk, transcending the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception, dwells personally experiencing the cessation of perception and knowing, and observes with wisdom that all taints have been eradicated. Such a monk is said to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death.

803c Then the monks asked further, “Is this the best way for a monk to die untroubled, the best way to die an untroubled death?”

The venerable Anuruddha answered, “Venerable friends, this is [indeed] the best way for a monk to die untroubled, to die an untroubled death.”

Then the monks, having heard what the venerable Anuruddha had said, received and remembered it well. They rose from their seats, paid homage with their heads at the venerable Anuruddha’s feet, circumambulated him three times, and left.

This is what the venerable Anuruddha said. Having heard what the venerable Anuruddha had said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

220. The Discourse on Views<sup>401</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time, not long after the final nirvana of the Buddha, the venerable Ānanda was staying at Rājagaha, in the Bamboo Grove, the Squirrels' Sanctuary.

At that time there was a brahmin, a heterodox practitioner who had been a friend of the venerable Ānanda before Ānanda had gone forth. Wandering about in the afternoon, this brahmin approached the venerable Ānanda. Having exchanged greetings, he stepped back, sat to one side and said to the venerable Ānanda, "I would like to ask a question. Am I permitted to ask it?"

The venerable Ānanda answered, "Brahmin, ask whatever you wish to ask. Having heard it, I will consider it."

The brahmin who was a heterodox practitioner asked this:

There are these views that were abandoned and set aside [by the Buddha], on which no exhaustive statement was made [by him], namely, "the world is eternal," "the world is not eternal"; "the world is finite," "the world is infinite"; "the life-force is the same as the body," "the life-force is different from the body"; "the Tathāgata exists after death," "the Tathāgata does not exist after death," "the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death," "the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death." Did the renunciant Gotama understand these views as they should be understood?

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Brahmin, concerning these views, which the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, abandoned and set aside, on which he did not make an exhaustive statement, namely, "the world is eternal," "the world is not eternal"; "the world is finite," "the world is infinite"; "the life-force is the same as the body," "the life-force is different from the body"; "the Tathāgata exists after death," "the Tathāgata does not exist after death," "the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death," "the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death"—the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, understood these views as they should be understood.

The brahmin who was a heterodox practitioner asked further:

Concerning these views that the renunciant Gotama abandoned and set aside, on which he did not make an exhaustive statement, namely, “the world is eternal,” “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death”—how did the renunciant Gotama understand these views as they should be understood?

804a

The venerable Ānanda answered:

Brahmin, concerning these views, namely, “the world is eternal,” “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death”—why did the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, abandon them, set them aside, and not make an exhaustive statement on them?

Brahmin, heterodox practitioners have views like this,<sup>402</sup> cling to them like this, attend to them like this, generate them like this, arrive at the next life like this, namely, “the world is eternal,” “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” [Yet] all of these views the World-honored One, the Tathāgata, free from attachment and fully awakened, abandoned, set aside, without making an exhaustive statement on them. Thus did he understand these views, and thus should these views be understood [by us].

The brahmin who was a heterodox practitioner said, “I now take refuge in Ānanda.”

The venerable Ānanda told him, “Brahmin, do not take refuge in me. Since I myself have taken refuge in the Buddha, you too should take refuge in him.”

The brahmin who was a heterodox practitioner said:

Ānanda, I now take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha of monks. May the World-honored One receive me as a lay disciple,<sup>403</sup> from this day on until the end of life, I take refuge for my whole life.

This is what the venerable Ānanda said. Having heard what the venerable Ānanda said, the brahmin who [formerly] was a heterodox practitioner was delighted and received it respectfully.

221. The Discourse with the Simile of the Arrow<sup>404</sup>

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the venerable Mālunkyāputta had gone to a secluded place to meditate. He had this thought in his mind:

There are these views, namely, “the world is eternal,” “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” The World-honored One has abandoned these views, set them aside, not made an exhaustive statement on them. I do not like that; I cannot bear that; I do not approve of that.

If the World-honored One definitely affirms to me “the world is eternal,” then I will train in the holy life under him. If the World-honored One does not definitely affirm to me “the world is eternal,” then, after closely questioning him, I will give up [the holy life] and leave. It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” If the World-honored One definitely affirms to me, “this is true and anything else is false,” then I will train in the holy life under him. If the World-honored One does not definitely affirm to me, “this is true and anything else is false,” then, after closely questioning him, I will give up [the holy life] and leave.

804b

Then the venerable Mālunīyāputta rose from his meditation seat in the late afternoon and approached the Buddha. Having paid homage with his head at [the Buddha’s] feet, he stepped back, sat to one side, and said:

World-honored One, I had gone to a secluded spot to meditate and had this thought in my mind: “There are these views, namely, ‘the world is eternal,’ ‘the world is not eternal’; ‘the world is finite,’ ‘the world is infinite’; ‘the life-force is the same as the body,’ ‘the life-force is different from the body’; ‘the Tathāgata exists after death,’ ‘the Tathāgata does not exist after death,’ ‘the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,’ ‘the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.’ The World-honored One has abandoned these views, set them aside, not made an exhaustive statement on them. I do not like that; I cannot bear that; I do not approve of that.

“If the World-honored One definitely knows that the world is eternal, then let the World-honored One tell me so! If the World-honored One definitely does not know that the world is eternal, then let him say directly that he does not know it!

“It is the same with ‘the world is not eternal’; ‘the world is finite,’ ‘the world is infinite’; ‘the life force is the same as the body,’ ‘the life-force is different from the body’; ‘the Tathāgata exists after death,’ ‘the Tathāgata does not exist after death,’ ‘the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,’ ‘the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.’

“If the World-honored One definitely knows ‘this is true and anything else is false,’ then let the World-honored One tell me so! If the World-honored One does not know ‘this is true and anything else is false,’ then let him say directly that he does not know it!”<sup>405</sup>

The World-honored One asked, “Mālunīyāputta, have I ever said to you, ‘Come and train in the holy life under me, and I will tell you that ‘the world is eternal’?’”

Mālunkyāputta answered, “No, World-honored One.”

[The World-honored One said:]

It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” Have I ever said to you, “Come and train in the holy life under me, and I will tell you that this is true and anything else is false”?

804c

Mālunkyāputta answered: “No, World-honored One.”

[The World-honored One said:]

Mālunkyāputta, have you ever said to me “I will train in the holy life under the World-honored One if the World-honored One definitely affirms to me ‘the world is eternal’”?

Mālunkyāputta answered, “No, World-honored One.”

[The World-honored One said:]

It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” Have you ever said to me, “I will train in the holy life under the World-honored One if the World-honored One definitely affirms to me that this is true and anything else is false”?

Mālunkyāputta answered, “No, World-honored One.”

The World-honored One said:

Mālunkyāputta, so I have never said these things to you and you also have never said them to me. You foolish man! Why misrepresent me with what is vain?

At this, having been rebuked to his face by the World-honored One, the venerable Mālunkyāputta was sad and depressed. He hung his head in silence, being unable to reply, as if immersed in thought.

At this the World-honored One, having rebuked Māluṅkyāputta to his face, told the monks:

If some foolish person thinks like this: “Unless the World-honored One definitely affirms to me ‘the world is eternal,’ I will not train in the holy life under the World-honored One,” then this foolish person will never attain understanding, and in the meantime he will die. It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” If some foolish person thinks like this: “Unless the World-honored One definitely affirms to me that this is true and anything else is false, I will not train in the holy life under the World-honored One,” then this foolish person will never attain understanding, and in the meantime he will die.

He is just like a man whose body has been wounded by a poisoned arrow and who, because of this poisoned arrow, is suffering extreme pain. He sees that his kinsmen and relatives, out of sympathy and concern about the wound and seeking his benefit and well-being, have called a surgeon to deal with the arrow. But the [wounded] man thinks, “The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn the family name and personal name of the person [who shot the arrow], [I must learn] if he is tall or short, stout or slim, of dark or light complexion or neither dark nor light, if he is from the warrior, brahmin, merchant, or worker caste, if he is from the east, south, west, or north.

805a

“The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the bow was made of wood from the thorny cudrania tree, from the mulberry tree, from the zelkova tree, or from horn. The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the bow grip was made from ox sinew, or deer sinew, or silk. The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the color of the bow was black, white, red, or yellow. The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the bowstring was made from sinew, silk, ramie, or hemp. The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the shaft of the arrow was made from wood or from bamboo.

“The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the string used for the fletching was made from ox sinew, deer sinew, or silk. The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the feather used for the fletching was that of a piaofang bird, a vulture, a kunji bird, or a crane. The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn if the arrowhead is long and pointed, barbed on one side, or barbed on both sides. The arrow cannot be pulled out yet. I must first learn the family name and personal name of the smith who made the arrowhead, and if he is tall or short, stout or slender, of dark or light complexion or neither dark nor light, if he is from the warrior, brahmin, merchant, or worker caste, if he is from the east, south, west, or north.” This person [who thinks thus] will never get to know [all this], and in the meantime he will die.

If some foolish person thinks like this, “Unless the World-honored One definitely affirms to me ‘the world is eternal,’ I will not train in the holy life under the World-honored One,” then this foolish person will never attain understanding, and in the meantime he will die. It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” If some foolish person thinks like this, “Unless the World-honored One definitely affirms to me that this is true and anything else is false, I will not train in the holy life under the World-honored One,” then this foolish person will never attain understanding, and in the meantime he will die.

To train in the holy life under me because of holding the view “the world is eternal”—that is not how it should be. It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” To train in the holy life under me because of holding these views—that is not how it should be.

Not to train in the holy life under me because of holding the view “the world is eternal”—that is not how it should be. It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” Not to train in the holy life under me because of holding these views—that is not how it should be.

To train in the holy life under me because of not holding the view “the world is eternal”—that is not how it should be. It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” To train in the holy life under me because of not holding these views—that is not how it should be.

[Not] to train in the holy life under me because of not holding the view “the world is eternal”—that is not how it should be. It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” Not to train in the holy life under me because of not holding these views—that is not how it should be.

If “the world is eternal,” there still is birth, old age, disease, death, sorrow, lamentation, grief, and vexation. In this way this whole great mass of dukkha arises. It is the same if “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” There still is birth, old age, disease, death, sorrow, lamentation, sorrow, pain, and vexation. In this way this whole great mass of dukkha arises.

“The world is eternal.” I have not definitely declared this. Why have I not definitely declared this? It is not connected with the purpose [of my teaching], it is not connected with the teaching [itself], it is not the root of the holy life; it does not lead to wisdom, it does not lead to awakening, it does not lead to nirvana. Therefore I have not definitely declared it.

It is the same with “the world is not eternal”; “the world is finite,” “the world is infinite”; “the life-force is the same as the body,” “the life-force is different from the body”; “the Tathāgata exists after death,” “the Tathāgata does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death,” “the Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death.” I have not definitely declared this. Why have I not definitely declared this? It is not connected with the purpose [of my teaching], it is not connected with the teaching [itself], it is not the root of the holy life; it does not lead to wisdom, it does not lead to awakening, it does not lead to nirvana. Therefore I have not definitely declared it.

805c

What are the teachings that I have definitely declared? I have definitely declared dukkha, the arising of dukkha, the cessation of dukkha, and the path to the cessation of dukkha. This I have definitely declared. And why have I definitely declared this? It is connected with the purpose [of my teaching], it is connected with the teaching [itself], it is the root of the holy life; it leads to wisdom, it leads to awakening, it leads to nirvana. Therefore I have definitely declared it. Thus, I do not declare what should not be declared and I declare what should be declared. You should remember this and train yourselves accordingly.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

222. The Discourse on Ordered Expositions

Thus have I heard. At one time the Buddha was staying at Sāvattthī, in Jeta’s Grove, Anāthapiṇḍika’s Park.

At that time the World-honored One addressed the monks:

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the four establishments of mindfulness. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the four establishments of mindfulness? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he internally contemplates the body as a body, contemplates feeling . . . mental states . . . dharmas as dharmas. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the four establishments of mindfulness.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four establishments of mindfulness. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the four establishments of mindfulness? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he internally contemplates the body as a body, contemplates feeling . . . mental states . . . dharmas as dharmas. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four establishments of mindfulness.

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the four right efforts. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the four right efforts? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he energetically exerts the mind, engenders the wish, and seeks skillful means to abandon any evil, unwholesome states that have already arisen. He energetically exerts the mind, engenders the wish, and seeks skillful means not to let arise any evil, unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. He energetically exerts the mind, engenders the wish, and seeks skillful means to let arise any good, wholesome states that have not yet arisen. He energetically exerts the mind, engenders the wish, and seeks skillful means to maintain, not to neglect, not to let regress, but to enhance and extend to completion all good, wholesome states that have already arisen. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the four right efforts.

806a

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person, who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four right efforts. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the four right efforts? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he energetically exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means to abandon any evil, unwholesome states that have already arisen. He energetically exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means not to let arise any evil, unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. He energetically exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means to let arise any good, wholesome states that have not yet arisen. He energetically exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means to maintain, not to neglect, not to let regress, but to enhance and extend to completion all good, wholesome states that have already arisen. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four right efforts.

A person, who wants to abandon ignorance, should develop the four bases of supernormal power. How does a person, who wants to abandon ignorance develop the four bases of supernormal power? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower 806b of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to intention, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated; likewise he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to energy . . . ; that possesses concentration due to mind . . . ; he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to investigation, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the four bases of supernormal power.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four bases of supernormal power. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the four bases of supernormal power? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to intention, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated; likewise he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to energy . . . ; that possesses concentration due to mind . . . ; he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to investigation, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four bases of supernormal power.

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the four absorptions. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the four absorptions? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil, unwholesome states . . . up to . . . he dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the four absorptions.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four absorptions. How does a person, who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the four absorptions? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil, unwholesome states . . . up to . . . he dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the four absorptions.

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the five faculties. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the five faculties? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the faculty of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the faculty of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the five faculties.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the five faculties. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the five faculties? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the faculty of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the faculty of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the five faculties.

806c

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the five powers. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the five powers? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the power of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the power of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the five powers.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the five powers. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the five powers? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the power of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the power of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the five powers.

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the seven factors of awakening. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the seven factors of awakening? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the awakening factor of mindfulness, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. Likewise he develops the [awakening factor of investigation of] dharmas, of energy, of joy, of tranquility, of concentration . . . He develops the awakening factor of equanimity, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the seven factors of awakening.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the seven factors of awakening. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the seven factors of awakening? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the awakening factor of mindfulness, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. Likewise he develops the [awakening factor of investigation of] dharmas, of energy, of joy, of tranquility, of concentration . . . He develops the awakening factor of equanimity, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination, should develop the seven factors of awakening.

807a

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the noble eightfold path. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the noble eightfold path? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the noble eightfold path.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the noble eightfold path. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the noble eightfold path? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the noble eightfold path.

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres (kasīṇa). How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the ten all-encompassing spheres? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one.

He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops, as the first, the all-encompassing sphere of earth, [attending to it] in all the four directions as well as above and below, as undivided and boundless. Likewise he develops the all-encompassing sphere of water . . . the all-encompassing sphere of fire . . . the all-encompassing sphere of wind . . . the all-encompassing sphere of blue . . . the all-encompassing sphere of yellow . . . the all-encompassing sphere of red . . . the all-encompassing sphere of white . . . the all-encompassing sphere of infinite space . . . he develops, as the tenth, the all-encompassing sphere of infinite consciousness, [attending to it] in all the four directions as well as above and below, as undivided and boundless. This is how a person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the ten all-encompassing spheres? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops, as the first, the all-encompassing sphere of earth, [attending to it] in all the four directions as well as above and below, as undivided and boundless. Likewise he develops the all-encompassing sphere of water . . . the all-encompassing sphere of fire . . . the all-encompassing sphere of wind . . . the all-encompassing sphere of blue . . . the all-encompassing sphere of yellow . . . the all-encompassing sphere of red . . . the all-encompassing sphere of white . . . the all-encompassing sphere of infinite space . . . he develops, as the tenth, the all-encompassing sphere of infinite consciousness, in all the four directions as well as above and below, as undivided and boundless. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres.

807b

A person who wants to abandon ignorance should develop the ten qualities of one beyond training. How does a person who wants to abandon ignorance develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the right view of the one beyond training . . . up to . . . the right insight of the one beyond training. This is how a person, who wants to abandon ignorance, should develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [ignorance], attaining liberation from it, transcending it, rooting it out, extinguishing it, completely knowing it, and understanding it with discrimination. A person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training. How does a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the right view of the one beyond training . . . up to . . . the right insight of the one beyond training. This is how a person who wants to understand ignorance with discrimination should develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training.

As with ignorance, so it is with formations. As with formations, so it is with consciousness. As with consciousness, so it is with name-and-form. As with name-and-form, so it is with the six sense spheres. As with the six sense spheres, so it is with contact. As with contact, so it is with feelings. As with feelings, so it is with craving. As with craving, so it is with clinging. As with clinging, so it is with becoming. As with becoming, so it is with birth. [As with birth, so it is with old age and death.]

A person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the four establishments of mindfulness. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the four establishments of mindfulness? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he internally contemplates the body as a body, contemplates feeling . . . mental states . . . dharmas as dharmas. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the four establishments of mindfulness.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four establishments of mindfulness. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the four establishments of mindfulness? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he internally contemplates the body as a body, contemplates feeling . . . mental states . . . dharmas as dharmas. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four establishments of mindfulness.

807c

A person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the four right efforts. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the four right efforts? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . .

up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means to abandon any evil, unwholesome states that have already arisen. He exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means not to let arise any evil, unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. He exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means to let arise any good, wholesome states that have not yet arisen. He exerts the mind, engenders the intention, and seeks skillful means to maintain, not to neglect, not to let regress, but to enhance and extend to completion all good, wholesome states that have already arisen. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the four right efforts.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four right efforts. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the four right efforts? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he exerts the mind, engenders the intention and seeks skillful means to abandon any evil, unwholesome states that have already arisen. He exerts the mind, engenders the intention and seeks skillful means not to let arise any evil, unwholesome states that have not yet arisen. He exerts the mind, engenders the intention and seeks skillful means to let arise any good, wholesome states that have not yet arisen. He exerts the mind, engenders the intention and seeks skillful means to maintain, not to neglect, not to let regress, but to enhance and extend to completion all good, wholesome states that have already arisen. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four right efforts.

A person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the four bases of supernormal power. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the four bases of supernormal power? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to intention, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated; likewise he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to energy. . . ; that possesses concentration due to mind. . . ; he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to investigation, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the four bases of supernormal power. 808a

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four bases of supernormal power. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the four bases of supernormal power? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to intention, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated; likewise he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to energy. . . ; that possesses concentration due to mind. . . ; he develops the basis for supernormal power that possesses concentration due to investigation, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four bases of supernormal power.

A person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the four absorptions. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the four absorptions? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil, unwholesome states . . . up to . . . he dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the four absorptions.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four absorptions. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the four absorptions? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil, unwholesome states . . . up to . . . he dwells having attained the fourth absorption. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the four absorptions.

808b A person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the five faculties. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the five faculties? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . .

the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the faculties of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the faculty of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the five faculties.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the five faculties. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the five faculties? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the faculties of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the faculty of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the five faculties.

A person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the five powers. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the five powers? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the power of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the power of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the five powers.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the five powers. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the five powers? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the power of faith, of energy, of mindfulness, of concentration, and the power of wisdom. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the five powers.

A person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the seven factors of awakening. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the seven factors of awakening? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the awakening factor of mindfulness, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. Likewise he develops the [awakening factor of investigation of] dharmas . . . energy . . . joy . . . tranquility . . . concentration. . . . He develops the awakening-factor of equanimity, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the seven factors of awakening.

808c The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the seven factors of awakening. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the seven factors of awakening? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the awakening factor of mindfulness, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. Likewise he develops the [awakening factor of investigation of] dharms . . . energy . . . joy . . . tranquility . . . concentration. . . . He develops the awakening-factor of equanimity, which is based on separation, dispassion, and cessation, and leads to the uncreated. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the seven factors of awakening.

A person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the noble eightfold path. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the noble eightfold path? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the noble eightfold path.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the noble eightfold path. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the noble eightfold path? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops right view . . . up to . . . right concentration; these are the eight. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the noble eightfold path.

A person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the ten all-encompassing spheres? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops, as the first, the all-encompassing sphere of earth, [attending to it] in all the four directions as well as above and below as undivided and boundless. Likewise he develops the all-encompassing sphere of water . . . the all-encompassing sphere of fire . . . the all-encompassing sphere of wind . . . the all-encompassing sphere of blue . . . the all-encompassing sphere of yellow . . . the all-encompassing sphere of red . . . the all-encompassing sphere of white . . . the all-encompassing sphere of infinite space . . . he develops, as the tenth, the all-encompassing sphere of infinite consciousness, in all the four directions as well as above and below as undivided and boundless. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres.

809a

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the ten all-encompassing spheres? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops, as the first, the all-encompassing sphere of earth, [attending to it] in all the four directions as well as above and below as undivided and boundless. Likewise he develops the all-encompassing sphere of water . . . the all-encompassing sphere of fire . . . the all-encompassing sphere of wind . . . the all-encompassing sphere of blue . . . the all-encompassing sphere of yellow . . . the all-encompassing sphere of red . . . the all-encompassing sphere of white . . . the all-encompassing sphere of infinite space . . . he develops as tenth the all-encompassing sphere of infinite consciousness, in all the four directions as well as above and below as undivided and boundless. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the ten all-encompassing spheres.

A person who wants to abandon old age and death should develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training. How does a person who wants to abandon old age and death develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the right view of the one beyond training . . . up to . . . the right insight of the one beyond training. This is how a person who wants to abandon old age and death, should develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training.

The same applies for repeatedly abandoning [old age and death], attaining liberation from them, transcending them, rooting them out, extinguishing them, completely knowing them, and understanding them with discrimination. A person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training. How does a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training? There is a time when a tathāgata appears in the world, free from attachment, fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a well-gone one, a knower of the world, an unsurpassable person, a leader on the path of Dharma, a teacher of devas and human beings, known as a buddha, an exalted one. He abandons . . . up to . . . the five hindrances, which defile the mind and weaken wisdom; and he develops the right view of the one beyond training . . . up to . . . the right insight of the one beyond training. This is how a person who wants to understand with discrimination old age and death should develop the ten qualities of the one beyond training.

Thus spoke the Buddha. Having heard what the Buddha said, the monks were delighted and received it respectfully.

Appendix

Tables of Parallels

Compiled by Roderick S. Bucknell

Readers familiar with the Pāli texts may find it instructive to compare the discourses translated here with their Pāli counterparts. To facilitate such comparison the following two tables are provided: Table 1 is designed for finding the Pāli parallel(s) to a given Madhyama-āgama discourse, and Table 2 for finding the Madhyama-āgama parallel(s) to a given discourse contained in the Pāli canon.<sup>406</sup>

In Table 1 the first column identifies each Madhyama-āgama discourse by its serial number (from MĀ 1 to MĀ 222) and its translated title. Only those discourses are listed which have known Pāli parallels; for example, Madhyama-āgama discourse no. 7 (MĀ 7) is absent because it has no known Pāli parallel.<sup>407</sup> The second column displays: (1) the location of the listed discourse in the Taishō Tripiṭaka edition (T) by volume, page number, and register (a, b, or c); and (2) immediately below this, the location of the English translation within the present four-volume set (BDK English Tripiṭaka Series), cited by volume and page number. The third column lists known parallel discourses contained in the Pāli canon. The fourth column shows the location of each of those parallels. Partial parallels are marked with an asterisk * and listed after full parallels. The eighteen divisions into which the Madhyama-āgama discourses are traditionally grouped are readily identified by their headings, each showing the relevant division number and title. This means that Table 1 can also serve as a guide to the overall structure of the Madhyama-āgama.

Table 2 amounts to a mirror image of Table 1, listing Pāli discourses on the left and their Madhyama-āgama parallels on the right. Accordingly, it has four sections corresponding to the four main Pāli Nikāyas, together with a small fifth section to accommodate the few known parallels found in the Khuddaka-nikāya or in the Vinaya. Only those Pāli discourses are listed for which known parallels exist in the Madhyama-āgama.

In both tables, the pagination and numbering of Pāli discourses are as in the PTS editions, with Samyutta-nikāya, Vol. I conforming to M. Léon Feer's 1884 edition. These tables are not intended to be exhaustive. Most notably, they do not list parallels in Chinese other than those contained in the Madhyama-āgama, nor do they list parallels preserved in languages other than Chinese and Pāli. Additional Chinese parallels and fragmentary Sanskrit parallels can be found in the detailed survey by Jin-il Chung and Takamichi Fukita, A Survey of the Sanskrit Fragments Corresponding to the Chinese Madhyamāgama, Including References to Sanskrit Parallels, Citations, Numerical Categories of Doctrinal Concepts and Stock Phrases (Tokyo: Sankibo Press, 2011). Tibetan parallels preserved in Śamathadeva's Abhidharmakośopāyikāṭīkā are listed in Yoshifumi Honjō, A Table of Āgama Citations in the Abhidharmakośa and the Abhidharmakośopāyikā (Kyoto: n.p., 1984).

Further Evidence of Structural Change

The introduction to this volume has presented preliminary evidence that both the Madhyama-āgama and the Majjhima-nikāya have undergone extensive structural change with the passage of time. Such evidence comes mainly from the two tables of discourse parallels presented below. The following paragraphs will show how close examination of these tables can yield further data of this kind.

The examination begins with Table 2, specifically its second section, headed "2. Pāli Discourses in the Majjhima-nikāya." Of the one hundred and fifty-two discourses that make up the Majjhima-nikāya, only ninety-five have parallels in the Madhyama-āgama; of the remaining fifty-seven, some have Chinese parallels outside of the Madhyama-āgama and some have no known parallel at all. In Table 2 these cases of missing Madhyama-āgama parallels manifest as gaps in the series of identifiers in the first column of section 2. For example, "MN 4" is missing from that column, since no Madhyama-āgama parallel for MN 4 is known.

Whereas most of the Majjhima-nikāya discourses that lack Madhyama-āgama parallels appear to be randomly scattered through the total set of one hundred and fifty-two, the last ten of them, numbered 143 to 152, are placed together as a continuous block at the end of the list. To express it differently: in Table 2 the series of Majjhima-nikāya discourses in the first column ends abruptly at MN 142 rather than continuing on to MN 152. This irregularity has been analyzed and interpreted in a recently published study.<sup>408</sup> The resulting explanation for it can be summarized, very briefly, as follows.

The decade of discourses MN 143–152, which is the last division of the existing Majjhima-nikāya, bears the title Salāyatana-vagga, “Division on the Six Sense Bases,” a title that accurately reflects its content. Several pieces of evidence indicate that this decade was formerly located not in the Majjhima-nikāya but in the Samyutta-nikāya, where it was contained within the Salāyatana-samyutta, “Connected with the Six Sense Bases.” At some early time it was transferred, perhaps accidentally, from there to its present location. This resulted in the anomaly noted above: the seeming lack of Madhyama-āgama parallels for the last ten discourses of the Majjhima-nikāya. Chinese parallels for these ten discourses do exist, but they are instead located in the Samyukta-āgama.

This inferred transfer accounts for ten of the fifty-seven cases where a Majjhima-nikāya discourse lacks a known parallel in the Madhyama-āgama. Besides clarifying the observed anomaly, it indirectly supports the proposition, tentatively advanced above, that the first Madhyama-āgama decade, MĀ 1–10, was transferred to that spot from an earlier location in a Sarvāstivādin Numerical Collection. It does this by providing evidence that such movements of blocks of discourses, from one nikāya/āgama to another within the Sutra-piṭaka of a given school, did sometimes occur.

Further evidence of this kind is reported elsewhere in Bucknell, “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama from Gilgit vis-à-vis the Pali Dīgha-nikāya,” pp 64–66, esp. p. 65. The relevant data are reproduced in the Dīgha-nikāya section of the present Table 2. There eleven of the thirty-four discourses that make up the Dīgha-nikāya are listed, as each of these eleven has a parallel (in two cases actually two partial parallels) in the Madhyama-āgama. This information can also be discerned, though less readily, in Table 1, where the same eleven Dīgha-nikāya discourses are shown as having parallels (again, in two cases two partial parallels) to thirteen partly scattered discourses of the Madhyama-āgama (for example, DN 15 has a parallel in MĀ 97, and DN 22 has partial parallels in MĀ 31 and MĀ 98). As before, the natural interpretation is that these eleven discourses have been transferred from one collection to another within the Pāli line of transmission—in this instance, from Majjhima-nikāya to Dīgha-nikāya. The present case differs in one respect from the one considered just above, in which a decade of discourses has been transferred from the Samyutta-nikāya to the end of the Majjhima-nikāya. The difference is that here the transferred discourses do not form a clearly defined block in their new location, but are partly scattered. This can be seen in Table 2, where the sequence of their numbers is 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 30, 31.<sup>409</sup>

The same article documents yet another instance of this phenomenon.<sup>410</sup> In this case the relevant body of textual data is Jens-Uwe Hartmann's comparative table showing the forty-seven discourses that make up the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama from Gilgit.<sup>411</sup> Analysis indicates that, of those forty-seven Dīrgha-āgama discourses, nine are likely to have been transferred into the Dīrgha-āgama from the corresponding Madhyama-āgama. Here again the transfer was accompanied by partial scattering, as seen in the serial numbers of the nine discourses in the extant Sanskrit text: 7, 10, 11, 12, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22.<sup>412</sup> The Majjhima-nikāya parallels to these nine are again among the fifty-seven discourses that are missing from the list in the Majjhima-nikāya section of the present Table 2; they are MN 60, 105, 4, 12, 102, 95, 36, 85, 100.

The above paragraphs have documented three instances of the seeming transfer of a decade of discourses from one collection to another within the corpus of a single school, namely the following. Within the Sarvāstivāda transmission, a set of nine discourses was transferred from the Madhyama-āgama to the Dīrgha-āgama. Independently of this, within the Theravāda transmission, a completely different set of eleven discourses (or perhaps ten; the two partial parallels of DN 16 obscure the picture) was transferred from the Majjhima-nikāya to the Dīrgha-nikāya. And, again within the Theravāda transmission, a set of ten discourses was transferred, evidently at a later time, from the Samyutta-nikāya to the Majjhima-nikāya.

For the three transfers of discourse material just summarized, no motive is easily discerned. Nevertheless, the demonstration that these transfers probably did occur contributes to an understanding of the structure of both the Madhyama-āgama and its Pāli counterpart, the Majjhima-nikāya. To begin with, it provides further support for the proposition, advanced earlier in this introduction, that the presence of Ekottarika-type material in the Madhyama-āgama is similarly due to importation of such material, either as entire decades or as smaller units. Looking further back in time, one can also see it pointing to an early stage in the development of the Collection of Middle-length Discourses—a stage at which both the Sarvāstivāda and Theravāda versions of it still included the two decades that would later be transferred to the respective versions of the Collection of Long Discourses. That is, it points to a stage in which the two versions of the Collection of Middle-length Discourses resembled each other much more closely than do their present derivatives.

Table 1.
Discourses of the Chinese Madhyama-āgama (T. 26)
with their Pāli Parallels

Madhyama-āgama discourse		Pāli parallel
Number and title	Vol. and page	Number	Vol. and page
Division 1. Sets of Seven
MĀ 1	T I 421a	AN 7.64	AN IV 113
Wholesome Qualities	BDK I 3
MĀ 2	T I 422a	AN 7.65	AN IV 117
Coral Tree	BDK I 8
MĀ 3
Parable of the [Border]	T I 422c	AN 7.63	AN IV 106
Town	BDK I 10
MĀ 4
Water Parable	T I 424a	AN 7.15	AN IV 11
	BDK I 17
MĀ 5
Parable of the Heap	T I 425a	AN 7.68	AN IV 128
of Wood	BDK I 23
MĀ 6
Destination of a	T I 427a	AN 7.52	AN IV 70
Good Person	BDK I 33
MĀ 8	T I 428c	AN 7.62	AN IV 100
Seven Suns	BDK I 47
MĀ 9
Seven Chariots	T I 429c	MN 24	MN I 145
	BDK I 47

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MĀ 10 Cessation of the Taints	T I 431c BDK I 56	MN 2 AN 6.58	MN I 6 AN III 387
Division 2. Karma
MĀ 11 Parable of the [Ounce of] Salt	T I 433a BDK I 63	AN 3.99	AN I 249
MĀ 12 Vappa	T I 434a BDK I 68	AN 4.195	AN II 196
MĀ 13 [Tenets to be] Transcended	T I 435a BDK I 73	AN 3.61	AN I 173
MĀ 14 Rāhula	T I 436a BDK I 78	MN 61	MN I 414
MĀ 15 Intention	T I 437a BDK I 84	AN 10.206–208	AN V 292
MĀ 16 Kālāmas	T I 438b BDK I 89	AN 3.65	AN I 188
MĀ 17 Gāmaṇi	T I 439c BDK I 96	SN 42.6	SN IV 311
MĀ 18 Sīha	T I 440c BDK I 101	AN 8.12 Mv 6.31	AN IV 179 Vin I 233
MĀ 19 Nigaṇṭhas	T I 442b BDK I 108	MN 101	MN II 214
MĀ 20 Pāṭaliya	T I 445a BDK I 122	SN 42.13	SN IV 340
Division 3. Sāriputta
MĀ 21 An Even Mind	T I 448c BDK I 141	AN 2.4.5	AN I 63
MĀ 22 Perfecting the Precepts	T I 449c BDK I 146	AN 5.166	AN III 192
MĀ 23 Wisdom	T I 451a BDK I 152	SN 12.32	SN II 50

MĀ 24 The Lion's Roar of Sāriputta	T I 452b BDK I 160	AN 9.11	AN IV 373
MĀ 25 Parables Relating to Water	T I 454a BDK I 166	AN 5.162	AN III 186
MĀ 26 Gulissāni	T I 454c BDK I 170	MN 69	MN I 469
MĀ 27 Dhānañjāni	T I 456a BDK I 176	MN 97	MN II 184
MĀ 28 Teaching the Ill	T I 458b BDK I 188	SN 55.26 SN 10.8* Cv 6.4	SN V 380 SN I 210 Vin II 154
MĀ 29 Mahā Koṭṭhita	T I 461b BDK I 201	MN 9	MN I 46
MĀ 30 Parable of the Elephant's Footprint	T I 464b BDK I 218	MN 28	MN I 184
MĀ 31 Discerning the Noble Truths	T I 467a BDK I 234	MN 141 DN 22*	MN III 248 DN II 305
Division 4. Extraordinary Qualities
MĀ 32 Extraordinary Qualities	T I 469c BDK I 247	MN 123	MN III 118
MĀ 33 Attendant	T I 471c BDK I 257	Th 30.3*	Th 1018–1050
MĀ 34 Bakkula	T I 475a BDK I 271	MN 124	MN III 124
MĀ 35 Asura	T I 475c BDK I 275	AN 8.19	AN IV 197
MĀ 36 Earthquakes	T I 477b BDK I 281	AN 8.70 DN 16*	AN IV 308 DN II 106

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MĀ 37 Campā	T I 478b BDK I 286	AN 8.20	AN IV 204
MĀ 38 To the Householder Ugga 1	T I 479c BDK I 292	AN 8.21 AN 8.22	AN IV 208 AN IV 212
MĀ 40 To the Householder Hatthaka	T I 482c BDK I 306	AN 8.24	AN IV 218
MĀ 41 On the Householder Hatthaka	T I 484b BDK I 316	AN 8.23	AN IV 216
Division 5. Conditions
MĀ 42 What is the Purpose?	T I 485a BDK I 319	AN 11.1 AN 10.1*	AN V 311 AN V 1
MĀ 43 No [Need for] Thought	T I 485b BDK I 321	AN 11.2 AN 10.2*	AN V 312 AN V 2
MĀ 44 Mindfulness	T I 485c BDK I 322	AN 8.81	AN IV 336
MĀ 45 Shame and Scruples 1	T I 486a BDK I 323	AN 7.61	AN IV 99
MĀ 46 Shame and Scruples 2	T I 486a BDK I 324	AN 7.61	AN IV 99
MĀ 47 Precepts 1	T I 486b BDK I 326	AN 10.3 AN 11.3	AN V 4 AN V 313
MĀ 48 Precepts 2	T I 486c BDK I 326	AN 5.168 AN 10.4* AN 11.4*	AN III 200 AN V 5 AN V 315
MĀ 49 Respect 1	T I 486c BDK I 327	AN 5.22	AN III 15
MĀ 50 Respect 2	T I 487a BDK I 328	AN 5.21	AN III 14
MĀ 5 Beginning	1T I 487b BDK I 329	AN 10.61* AN 10.62*	AN V 113 AN V 116

MĀ 52	T I 487c	AN 10.61	AN V 113
Nutriments 1	BDK I 339	AN 10.62	AN V 116
MĀ 53	T I 489c	AN 10.61	AN V 113
Nutriments 2	BDK I 339	AN 10.62	AN V 116
MĀ 55	T I 490b	SN 12.23	SN II 29
Nirvana	BDK I 346
MĀ 56	T I 491a	AN 9.3	AN IV 354
Meghiya	BDK I 349
MĀ 57	T I 492a	AN 9.1	AN IV 351
Spoken for Monks	BDK I 354
T I
Division 6. Kings
MĀ 58	T I 493a	SN 46.42	SN V 99
Seven Treasures	BDK I 359
MĀ 59	T I 493a	DN 30	DN III 142
Thirty-two Marks	BDK I 360
MĀ 61	T I 496a	SN 22.96	SN III 143
Cow Dung Parable	BDK I 373
MĀ 62	T I 497b	Mv 1.22	Vin I 35
King Bimbisāra	BDK I 379
Meeting the Buddha
MĀ 63	T I 499a	MN 81	MN II 45
Vebhaliṅga	BDK I 387
MĀ 64	T I 503a	MN 130	MN III 178
Divine Messengers	BDK I 407	AN 3.35	AN I 138
MĀ 66	T I 508c	Th 20.8*	Th 910–919
Origins	BDK I 432
MĀ 67	T I 511c	MN 83	MN II 74
Mahādeva's Mango	BDK I 447	Jā 9	Jā I 137
Grove		Jā 541	Jā VI 95
MĀ 68	T I 515b	DN 17	DN II 169
Mahāsudassana	BDK I 462

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MĀ 70 Wheel-turning Monarch	T I 520b BDK I 483	DN 26	DN III 58
MĀ 71 Pāyāsi	T I 525a BDK I 505	DN 23	DN II 316
Division 7. King Long Life Span
MĀ 72 History of King Long Life Span	T I 532c BDK II 3	MN 128* Mv 10.2*	MN III 152 Vin I 342
MĀ 73 Devas	T I 539b BDK II 32	AN 8.64	AN IV 302
MĀ 74 Eight Thoughts	T I 540c BDK II 37	AN 8.30	AN IV 228
MĀ 75 Path to Pure Imperturbability	T I 542b BDK II 44	MN 106	MN II 261
MĀ 76 Ukkācelā	T I 543c BDK II 50	SN 47.3*	SN V 142
MĀ 77 Three Clansmen at Sāketa	T I 544b BDK II 54	MN 68	MN I 462
MĀ 78 Brahmā's Invitation to the Buddha	T I 547a BDK II 65	MN 49	MN I 326
MĀ 79 Existence of Higher Devas	T I 549b BDK II 75	MN 127	MN III 144
MĀ 81 Mindfulness of the Body	T I 554c BDK II 99	MN 119	MN III 88
MĀ 82 [Hearing the Sound of] Crickets	T I 557c BDK II 114	AN 6.60	AN III 392
MĀ 83 Drowsiness of a Highly Regarded Elder	T I 559b BDK II 122	AN 7.58A	AN IV 85

MĀ 84 Being Without Thorns	T I 560b BDK II 125	AN 10.72	AN V 133
MĀ 85 The True Person	T I 561a BDK II 128	MN 113	MN III 37
Division 8. Blemishes
MĀ 87 Defilements	T I 566a BDK II 151	MN 5	MN I 24
MĀ 88 Quest for the Dharma	T I 569c BDK II 167	MN 3	MN I 12
MĀ 89 A Monk's Request	T I 571b BDK II 175	MN 15	MN I 95
MĀ 90 Knowledge of the Dharma	T I 572c BDK II 180	AN 10.24	AN V 41
MĀ 91 Cuṇḍa's Inquiry about Views	T I 573b BDK II 183	MN 8	MN I 40
MĀ 93 Purification by Bathing	T I 575a BDK II 191	MN 7	MN I 36
MĀ 94 Monk Kālaka	T I 576a BDK II 196	AN 10.87	AN V 164
MĀ 95 Maintaining [Wholesome] States	T I 577b BDK II 200	AN 10.53	AN V 96
MĀ 96 Absence	T I 577c BDK II 202	AN 10.55	AN V 102
Division 9. Causality
MĀ 97 Causality	T I 578b BDK II 205	DN 15	DN II 55
MĀ 98 Establishments of Mindfulness	T I 582b BDK II 226	MN 10 DN 22*	MN I 55 DN II 290
MĀ 99 Mass of Dukkha 1	T I 584c BDK II 237	MN 13	MN I 83

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MĀ 100 Mass of Dukkha 2	T I 586b BDK II 246	MN 14	MN I 91
MĀ 101 Higher State of Mind	T I 588a BDK II 253	MN 20	MN I 118
MĀ 102 Thoughts	T I 589a BDK II 259	MN 19	MN I 114
MĀ 103 Lion's Roar	T I 590b BDK II 264	MN 11	MN I 63
MĀ 104 Udumbara [Forest]	T I 591b BDK II 270	DN 25	DN III 36
MĀ 105 Wishes	T I 595c BDK II 290	MN 6 AN 10.71	MN I 33 AN V 131
Division 10. The Forest
MĀ 107 Forest 1	T I 596c BDK II 295	MN 17	MN I 104
MĀ 108 Forest 2	T I 597c BDK II 299	MN 17	MN I 104
MĀ 109 Examining One's Mind 1	T I 598b BDK II 302	AN 10.54	AN V 98
MĀ 110 Examining One's Mind 2	T I 598c BDK II 304	AN 10.51	AN V 92
MĀ 111 Fulfilling the Holy Life	T I 599b BDK II 306	AN 6.63	AN III 410
MĀ 112 Anupiya	T I 600b BDK II 312	AN 6.62	AN III 402
MĀ 113 Root of All Phenomena	T I 602b BDK II 321	AN 8.83 AN 10.58	AN IV 338 AN V 106
MĀ 114 Uddaka [Rāmaputta]	T I 603a BDK II 323	SN 35.103	SN IV 83
MĀ 115 Simile of the Honeyball	T I 603b BDK II 324	MN 18	MN I 108

MĀ 116 Spoken to Gotamī	T I 605a BDK II 332	AN 8.51	AN IV 274
Division 11. [First] Great Division
MĀ 117 Delicate [Upbringing]	T I 607c BDK II 343	AN 3.38	AN I 145
MĀ 118 Elephant	T I 608b BDK II 346	AN 6.43	AN III 344
MĀ 119 Grounds for Speaking	T I 609a BDK II 349	AN 3.67	AN I 197
MĀ 120 Impermanence	T I 609c BDK II 352	SN 22.76	SN III 82
MĀ 121 Invitation Ceremony	T I 610a BDK II 354	SN 8.7	SN I 190
MĀ 122 Campā	T I 610c BDK II 358	AN 8.10 AN 8.20	AN IV 168 AN IV 204
MĀ 123 Renunciant Soṇa Kolivīsa	T I 611c BDK II 364	AN 6.55	AN III 374
MĀ 124 Eight Obstacles	T I 613a BDK II 370	AN 8.29	AN IV 225
MĀ 125 Poverty	T I 614a BDK II 374	AN 6.45	AN III 351
MĀ 126 Engaging in Sensual Pleasures	T I 615a BDK II 378	AN 10.91 AN 5.41*	AN V 176 AN III 45
MĀ 127 Fields of Merit	T I 616a BDK II 383	AN 2.4.4	AN I 62
MĀ 128 Male Lay Disciples	T I 616a BDK II 385	AN 5.179	AN III 211
MĀ 129 Enemy	T I 617b BDK II 391	AN 7.60	AN IV 94
MĀ 130 Teaching Dhammika	T I 618b BDK II 395	AN 6.54	AN III 366

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MĀ 131 Overcoming Māra	T I 620b BDK II 403	MN 50	MN I 332
MĀ 132 Raṭṭhapāla	T I 623a BDK III 3	MN 82	MN II 54
MĀ 133 Upāli	T I 628a BDK III 25	MN 56	MN I 371
MĀ 134 Questions of Sakka	T I 632c BDK III 46	DN 21	DN II 263
MĀ 135 Sujāta	T I 638c BDK III 75	DN 31	DN III 180
MĀ 136 Merchants Who Searched for Property	T I 642a BDK III 91	Jā 196	Jā II 127
MĀ 137 The World	T I 645b BDK III 102	AN 4.23 It 112	AN II 23 It 121
MĀ 138 Meritorious Deeds	T I 645c BDK III 104	AN 7.58B	AN IV 88
MĀ 140 The Lowliest	T I 647a BDK III 110	It 91 SN 22.80*	It 89 SN III 91
MĀ 141 Similes	T I 647b BDK III 112	SN 45.140–148	SN V 43–45
Division 12. Brahmins
MĀ 142 Vassakāra	T I 648a BDK III 115	AN 7.20* AN 7.21–25* DN 16*	AN IV 17 AN IV 21–24 DN II 72
MĀ 143 Saṅgārava	T I 650b BDK III 126	AN 3.60	AN I 168
MĀ 144 Gaṇaka Moggallāna	T I 652a BDK III 133	MN 107	MN III 1
MĀ 145 Gopaka Moggallāna	T I 653c BDK III 141	MN 108	MN III 7
MĀ 146 Simile of the Elephant's Footprint	T I 656a BDK III 151	MN 27	MN I 175

MĀ 149 What One Desires	T I 660c BDK III 173	AN 6.52	AN III 362
MĀ 150 Esukārī	T I 660c BDK III 174	MN 96	MN II 177
MĀ 151 Assalāyana	T I 663b BDK III 185	MN 93	MN II 147
MĀ 152 Suka	T I 666c BDK III 200	MN 99	MN II 196
MĀ 153 Māgandīya	T I 670a BDK III 215	MN 75	MN I 501
MĀ 154 Vāseṭṭha at the Hall	T I 673b BDK III 230	DN 27	DN III 80
MĀ 155 Velāma	T I 677a BDK III 247	AN 9.20	AN IV 392
MĀ 156 Pārāyana Brahmins	T I 678a BDK III 251	Sn 2.7	Sn 284–315
MĀ 157 Yellow Reed Park	T I 679b BDK III 257	AN 8.11	AN IV 172
MĀ 158 Doṇa	T I 680b BDK III 262	AN 5.192	AN III 223
MĀ 160 Araka	T I 682b BDK III 271	AN 7.70	AN IV 136
MĀ 161 Brahmāyu	T I 685a BDK III 281	MN 91	MN II 133
Division 13. Basic Analysis
MĀ 162 Analysis of the Six Elements	T I 690a BDK III 305	MN 140	MN III 237
MĀ 163 Analysis of the Six Sense Spheres	T I 692b BDK III 315	MN 137	MN III 215
MĀ 164 Analytical Contemplation of Dharmas	T I 694b BDK III 324	MN 138	MN III 223

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MĀ 165 A Deva at Hot Spring Grove	T I 696b BDK III 334	MN 133	MN III 192
MĀ 166 In a Meditation Hut among the Sakyans	T I 698c BDK III 344	MN 134	MN III 199
MĀ 167 Spoken by Ānanda	T I 699c BDK III 350	MN 132	MN III 189
MĀ 169 To the Kurus on Non-conflict	T I 701b BDK III 358	MN 139	MN III 230
MĀ 170 [A Brahmin Named] Parrot	T I 703c BDK III 368	MN 135	MN III 202
MĀ 171 Great Analysis of Karma	T I 706b BDK III 380	MN 136	MN III 207
Division 14. The Mind
MĀ 172 The Mind	T I 709a BDK III 393	AN 4.186	AN II 177
MĀ 173 Bhūmija	T I 709c BDK III 396	MN 126	MN III 138
MĀ 174 Ways of Practice 1	T I 711b BDK III 404	MN 45	MN I 305
MĀ 175 Ways of Practice 2	T I 712c BDK III 409	MN 46	MN I 309
MĀ 178 Hunter	T I 718b BDK III 438	MN 25	MN I 151
MĀ 179 Carpenter Pañcakaṅga	T I 720a BDK III 446	MN 78	MN II 22
MĀ 180 Gotamī	T I 721c BDK III 453	MN 142	MN III 253
MĀ 181 Many Elements	T I 723a BDK III 459	MN 115	MN III 61

Division 15. Pairs

MĀ 182 Assapura 1	T I 724c BDK IV 3	MN 39	MN I 271
MĀ 183 Assapura 2	T I 725c BDK IV 8	MN 40	MN I 281
MĀ 184 Gosiṅga Sāla Forest 1	T I 726c BDK IV 13	MN 32	MN I 212
MĀ 185 Gosiṅga Sāla Forest 2	T I 729b BDK IV 24	MN 31	MN I 205
MĀ 186 Investigating	T I 731a BDK IV 32	MN 47	MN I 317
MĀ 187 Declaring the Knowledge	T I 732a BDK IV 36	MN 112	MN III 29
MĀ 188 Ajita	T I 734a BDK IV 46	AN 10.115 AN 10.116	AN V 224 AN V 229
MĀ 189 The Noble Path	T I 735b BDK IV 52	MN 117	MN III 71
MĀ 190 Shorter Discourse on Emptiness	T I 736c BDK IV 58	MN 121	MN III 104
MĀ 191 Greater Discourse on Emptiness	T I 738a BDK IV 63	MN 122	MN III 109

Division 16. [Second] Great Division

MĀ 192 Kāḷudāyin	T I 740c BDK IV 77	MN 66	MN I 447
MĀ 193 Moliya Phaggaṇa	T I 744a BDK IV 91	MN 21	MN I 122
MĀ 194 Bhaddāli	T I 746b BDK IV 101	MN 65	MN I 437
MĀ 195 Assaji	T I 749c BDK IV 116	MN 70	MN I 473

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MĀ 196 Cuṇḍa	T I 752c BDK IV 129	MN 104	MN II 243
MĀ 197 Upāli	T I 755c BDK IV 143	Mv 9.6	Vin I 325
MĀ 198 Stages of Taming	T I 757a BDK IV 149	MN 125	MN III 128
MĀ 199 Stages of the Fool and the Wise	T I 759a BDK IV 159	MN 129	MN III 163
MĀ 200 Ariṭṭha	T I 763b BDK IV 177	MN 22	MN I 130
MĀ 201 Sāti	T I 766b BDK IV 191	MN 38	MN I 256
Division 17. Potaliya
MĀ 202 Upasatha	T I 770a BDK IV 211	AN 3.70 AN 8.43	AN I 205 AN IV 255
MĀ 203 Potaliya	T I 773a BDK IV 222	MN 54	MN I 359
MĀ 204 Rammaka's [Hermitage]	T I 775c BDK IV 235	MN 26	MN I 160
MĀ 205 Five Lower Fetters	T I 778c BDK IV 249	MN 64	MN I 432
MĀ 206 Mental Defilements	T I 780b BDK IV 257	MN 16	MN I 101
MĀ 207 Sakuludāyī 1	T I 781b BDK IV 262	MN 77	MN II 1
MĀ 208 Sakuludāyī 2	T I 783c BDK IV 270	MN 79	MN II 29
MĀ 209 Vekhanassa	T I 786b BDK IV 284	MN 80	MN II 40
MĀ 210 Nun Dhammanandā	T I 788a BDK IV 291	MN 44	MN I 299

MĀ 211 Mahākoṭṭhita	T I 790b BDK IV 302	MN 43	MN I 292
Division 18. Ordered Expositions
MĀ 212 Omniscience	T I 792c BDK IV 315	MN 90	MN II 125
MĀ 213 Adornments of the Dharma	T I 795b BDK IV 328	MN 89	MN II 118
MĀ 214 Bāhitika Cloth	T I 797c BDK IV 337	MN 88	MN II 112
MĀ 215 Attaining the Best	T I 799b BDK IV 345	AN 10.29	AN V 59
MĀ 216 What Arises from Affection	T I 800c BDK IV 350	MN 87	MN II 106
MĀ 217 Aṭṭhakanāgara	T I 802a BDK IV 355	MN 52	MN I 349
MĀ 221 Simile of the Arrow	T I 804a BDK IV 365	MN 63	MN I 426

Table 2: Pāli Discourses with their Parallels in the Chinese *Madhyama-āgama

Pāli discourse Number and title	Vol. and page	Madhyama-āgama parallel
		Number	Vol. and page
Dīgha-nikāya
DN 15 Mahānidāna	DN II 55	MĀ 97	T I 578b BDK II 205
DN 16 Mahāparinibbāna	DN II 72	MĀ 36* MĀ 142*	T I 477b BDK I 281 T I 648a BDK III 115
DN 17 Mahāsudassana	DN II 169	MĀ 68	T I 515b BDK I 462

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

DN 21 Sakkapañha	DN II 263	MĀ 134	T I 632c BDK III 46
DN 22 Mahāsatiṭṭhāna	DN II 290	MĀ 31* MĀ 98*	T I 467a BDK I 234 T I 582b BDK II 226
DN 23 Pāyāsi	DN II 316	MĀ 71	T I 525a BDK I 505
DN 25 Udumbarikasīhanāda	DN III 36	MĀ 104	T I 591b BDK II 270
DN 26 Cakkavattisīhanāda	DN III 58	MĀ 70	T I 520b BDK I 483
DN 27 Aggañña	DN III 80	MĀ 154	T I 673b BDK III 30
DN 30 Lakkhaṇa	DN III 142	MĀ 59	T I 493a BDK I 360
DN 31 Singālovāda	DN III 180	MĀ 135	T I 638c BDK III 75
Majjhima-nikāya
MN 2 Sabbāsava	MN I 6	MĀ 10	T I 431c BDK I 56
MN 3 Dhammadāyāda	MN I 12	MĀ 88	T I 569c BDK II 167
MN 5 Anaṅgaṇa	MN I 24	MĀ 87	T I 566a BDK II 151
MN 6 Ākaṅkheyya	MN I 33	MĀ 105	T I 595c BDK II 290
MN 7 Vatthūpama	MN I 36	MĀ 93	T I 575a BDK II 191
MN 8 Sallekha	MN I 40	MĀ 91	T I 573b BDK II 183
MN 9 Sammādiṭṭhi	MN I 46	MĀ 29	T I 461b BDK I 201

MN 10 Satipaṭṭhāna	MN I 55	MĀ 98	T I 582b BDK II 226
MN 11 Cūḷasīhanāda	MN I 63	MĀ 103	T I 590b BDK II 264
MN 13 Mahādukkhakkhandha	MN I 83	MĀ 99	T I 584c BDK II 237
MN 14 Cūḷadukkhakkhandha	MN I 91	MĀ 100	T I 586b BDK II 246
MN 15 Anumāna	MN I 95	MĀ 89	T I 571b BDK II 175
MN 16 Cetokhila	MN I 101	MĀ 206	T I 780b BDK IV 257
MN 17 Vanapattha	MN I 104	MĀ 107 MĀ 108	T I 596c BDK II 295 T I 597c BDK II 299
MN 18 Madhupiṇḍika	MN I 108	MĀ 115	T I 603b BDK II 324
MN 19 Dvedhāvitakka	MN I 114	MĀ 102	T I 589a BDK II 259
MN 20 Vitakkasaṇṭhāna	MN I 118	MĀ 101	T I 588a BDK II 253
MN 21 Kakacūpama	MN I 122	MĀ 193	T I 744a BDK IV 91
MN 22 Alagaddūpama	MN I 130	MĀ 200	T I 763b BDK IV 177
MN 24 Rathavinīta	MN I 145	MĀ 9	T I 429c BDK I 47
MN 25 Nivāpa	MN I 151	MĀ 178	T I 718b BDK III 438
MN 26 Ariyapariyesanā	MN I 160	MĀ 204	T I 775c BDK IV 235

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MN 27 Cūḷahatthipadopama	MN I 175	MĀ 146	T I 656a BDK III 151
MN 28 Mahāhatthipadopama	MN I 184	MĀ 30	T I 464b BDK I 218
MN 31 Cūḷagosīṅga	MN I 205	MĀ 185	T I 729b BDK IV 24
MN 32 Mahāgosīṅga	MN I 212	MĀ 184	T I 726c BDK IV 13
MN 38 Mahātaṇhāsankhaya	MN I 256	MĀ 201	T I 766b BDK IV 191
MN 39 Mahā-Assapura	MN I 271	MĀ 182	T I 724c BDK IV 3
MN 40 Cūḷa-Assapura	MN I 281	MĀ 183	T I 725c BDK IV 8
MN 43 Mahāvedalla	MN I 292	MĀ 211	T I 790b BDK IV 302
MN 44 Cūḷavedalla	MN I 299	MĀ 210	T I 788a BDK IV 291
MN 45 Cūḷadhammasamādāna	MN I 305	MĀ 174	T I 711b BDK III 404
MN 46 Mahādhammasamādāna	MN I 309	MĀ 175	T I 712c BDK III 409
MN 47 Vīmaṃsaka	MN I 317	MĀ 186	T I 731a BDK IV 32
MN 49 Brahmanimantani	MN I 326	MĀ 78	T I 547a BDK II 65
MN 50 Māratajjanīya	MN I 332	MĀ 131	T I 620b BDK II 403
MN 52 Aṭṭhakanāgara	MN I 349	MĀ 217	T I 802a BDK IV 355
MN 54 Potaliya	MN I 359	MĀ 203	T I 773a BDK IV 222

MN 56 Upāli	MN I 371	MĀ 133	T I 628a BDK III 25
MN 61 Ambalaṭṭhikārāhulovāda	MN I 414	MĀ 14	T I 436a BDK I 78
MN 63 Cūḷamāluṅkya	MN I 426	MĀ 221	T I 804a BDK IV 365
MN 64 Mahāmāluṅkya	MN I 432	MĀ 205	T I 778c BDK IV 249
MN 65 Bhaddāli	MN I 437	MĀ 194	T I 746b BDK IV 101
MN 66 Laṭukikopama	MN I 447	MĀ 192	T I 740c BDK IV 77
MN 68 Naḷakapāna	MN I 462	MĀ 77	T I 544b BDK II 54
MN 69 Gulissāni	MN I 469	MĀ 26	T I 454c BDK I 170
MN 70 Kīṭṭāgiri	MN I 473	MĀ 195	T I 749c BDK IV 116
MN 75 Māgandīya	MN I 501	MĀ 153	T I 670a BDK III 215
MN 77 Mahāsakuludāyi	MN II 1	MĀ 207	T I 781b BDK IV 262
MN 78 Samaṇamaṇḍikā	MN II 22	MĀ 179	T I 720a BDK III 446
MN 79 Cūḷasakuludāyi	MN II 29	MĀ 208	T I 783c BDK IV 270
MN 80 Vekhanassa	MN II 40	MĀ 209	T I 786b BDK IV 284
MN 81 Ghaṭṭikāra	MN II 45	MĀ 63	T I 499a BDK I 387
MN 82 Raṭṭhapāla	MN II 54	MĀ 132	T I 623a BDK III 3

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MN 83 Makhādeva	MN II 74	MĀ 67	T I 511c BDK I 447
MN 87 Piyajātika	MN II 106	MĀ 216	T I 800c BDK IV 350
MN 88 Bāhitika	MN II 112	MĀ 214	T I 797c BDK IV 337
MN 89 Dhammacetiya	MN II 118	MĀ 213	T I 795b BDK IV 328
MN 90 Kaṇṇakatthala	MN II 125	MĀ 212	T I 792c BDK IV 315
MN 91 Brahmāyu	MN II 133	MĀ 161	T I 685a BDK III 281
MN 93 Assalāyana	MN II 147	MĀ 151	T I 663b BDK III 185
MN 96 Esukārī	MN II 177	MĀ 150	T I 660c BDK III 174
MN 97 Dhānañjāni	MN II 184	MĀ 27	T I 456a BDK I 176
MN 99 Subha	MN II 196	MĀ 152	T I 666c BDK III 200
MN 101 Devadaha	MN II 214	MĀ 19	T I 442b BDK I 108
MN 104 Sāmagāma	MN II 243	MĀ 196	T I 752c BDK IV 129
MN 106 Āneñjasappāya	MN II 261	MĀ 75	T I 542b BDK II 44
MN 107 Gaṇakamoggallāna	MN III 1	MĀ 144	T I 652a BDK III 133
MN 108 Gopakamoggallāna	MN III 7	MĀ 145	T I 653c BDK III 141
MN 112 Chabbisodhana	MN III 29	MĀ 187	T I 732a BDK IV 36

MN 113 Sappurisa	MN III 37	MĀ 85	T I 561a BDK II 128
MN 115 Bahudhātuka	MN III 61	MĀ 181	T I 723a BDK III 459
MN 117 Mahācattārīsaka	MN III 71	MĀ 189	T I 735b BDK IV 52
MN 119 Kāyagatāsati	MN III 88	MĀ 81	T I 554c BDK II 99
MN 121 Cūḷasuññata	MN III 104	MĀ 190	T I 736c BDK IV 58
MN 122 Mahāsuññata	MN III 109	MĀ 191	T I 738a BDK IV 63
MN 123 Acchariya-abbhūta	MN III 118	MĀ 32	T I 469c BDK I 247
MN 124 Bakkula	MN III 124	MĀ 34	T I 475a BDK I 271
MN 125 Dantabhūmi	MN III 128	MĀ 198	T I 757a BDK IV 149
MN 126 Bhūmija	MN III 138	MĀ 173	T I 709c BDK III 396
MN 127 Anuruddha	MN III 144	MĀ 79	T I 549b BDK II 75
MN 128 Upakkilesa	MN III 152	MĀ 72*	T I 532c BDK II 3
MN 129 Bālapaṇḍita	MN III 163	MĀ 199	T I 759a BDK IV 159
MN 130 Devadūta	MN III 178	MĀ 64	T I 503a BDK I 407
MN 132 Ānanda-bhaddekaratta	MN III 189	MĀ 167	T I 699c BDK III 350
MN 133 Mahākaccāna-bhaddekaratta	MN III 192	MĀ 165	T I 696b BDK III 334

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

MN 134 Lomasakaṅgiya-bhaddekaratta	MN III 199	MĀ 166	T I 698c BDK III 344
MN 135 Cūḷakamma-vibhaṅga	MN III 202	MĀ 170	T I 703c BDK III 368
MN 136 Mahākamma-vibhaṅga	MN III 207	MĀ 171	T I 706b BDK III 380
MN 137 Saḷāyatana-vibhaṅga	MN III 215	MĀ 163	T I 692b BDK III 315
MN 138 Uddesa-vibhaṅga	MN III 223	MĀ 164	T I 694b BDK III 324
MN 139 Araṇa-vibhaṅga	MN III 230	MĀ 169	T I 701b BDK III 358
MN 140 Dhātu-vibhaṅga	MN III 237	MĀ 162	T I 690a BDK III 305
MN 141 Sacca-vibhaṅga	MN III 248	MĀ 31	T I 467a BDK I 234
MN 142 Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga	MN III 253	MĀ 180	T I 721c BDK III 453
Samyutta-nikāya
SN 8.7 Pavāraṇā	SN I 190	MĀ 121	T I 610a BDK II 354
SN 12.23 Upanisā	SN II 29	MĀ 55	T I 490b BDK I 346
SN 12.32 Kaḷāra	SN II 50	MĀ 23	T I 451a BDK I 152
SN 10.8 Sudatta	SN I 210	MĀ 28*	T I 458b BDK I 188
SN 22.76 Arahanta 1	SN III 82	MĀ 120	T I 609c BDK II 352
SN 22.80 Piṇḍolyaṃ	SN III 91	MĀ 140*	T I 647a BDK III 110
SN 22.96 Gomayaṃ	SN III 143	MĀ 61	T I 496a BDK I 373

SN 35.103 Uddako	SN IV 83	MĀ 114	T I 603a BDK II 323
SN 42.6 Pacchābhūmako	SN IV 311	MĀ 17	T I 439c BDK I 96
SN 42.13 Pāṭali	SN IV 340	MĀ 20	T I 445a BDK I 122
SN 45.140–148 Pada-Vattham	SN V 43	MĀ 141	T I 647b BDK III 112
SN 46.42 Cakkavatti	SN V 99	MĀ 58	T I 493a BDK I 359
SN 47.3 Bhikkhu	SN V 142	MĀ 76*	T I 543c BDK II 50
SN 55.26 Dussīlya 1	SN V 380	MĀ 28	T I 458b BDK I 188
Āṅuttara-nikāya
AN 2.4.4 Dakkhiṇeyyā	AN I 62	MĀ 127	T I 616a BDK II 383
AN 2.4.5 Saṅgōjana, Samacittā	AN I 63	MĀ 21	T I 448c BDK I 141
AN 3.35 Devadūta	AN I 138	MĀ 64	T I 503a BDK I 407
AN 3.38 Sukhumāla	AN I 145	MĀ 117	T I 607c BDK II 343
AN 3.60 Saṅgārava	AN I 168	MĀ 143	T I 650b BDK III 126
AN 3.61 Titttha	AN I 173	MĀ 13	T I 435a BDK I 73
AN 3.65 Kesaputtiya = Kālāma	AN I 188	MĀ 16	T I 438b BDK I 89
AN 3.67 Kathāvatthu	AN I 197	MĀ 119	T I 609a BDK II 349
AN 3.70 Uposathaṅga	AN I 205	MĀ 202	T I 770a BDK IV 211

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

AN 3.99 Loṇaphala	AN I 249	MĀ 11	T I 433a BDK I 63
AN 4.23 Loka	AN II 23	MĀ 137	T I 645b BDK III 102
AN 4.186 Ummagga	AN II 177	MĀ 172	T I 709a BDK III 393
AN 4.195 Vappa	AN II 196	MĀ 12	T I 434a BDK I 68
AN 5.21 Agārava 1	AN III 14	MĀ 50	T I 487a BDK I 328
AN 5.22 Agārava 2	AN III 15	MĀ 49	T I 486c BDK I 327
AN 5.41 Ādiya	AN III 45	MĀ 126*	T I 615a BDK II 378
AN 5.162 Āghātavinaya 2	AN III 186	MĀ 25	T I 454a BDK I 166
AN 5.166 Nirodha	AN III 192	MĀ 22	T I 449c BDK I 146
AN 5.168 Sīla	AN III 200	MĀ 48	T I 486c BDK I 326
AN 5.179 Gihī	AN III 211	MĀ 128	T I 616a BDK II 385
AN 5.192 Doṇa	AN III 223	MĀ 158	T I 680b BDK III 262
AN 6.43 Nāga	AN III 344	MĀ 118	T I 608b BDK II 346
AN 6.45 Dāliddiya	AN III 351	MĀ 125	T I 614a BDK II 374
AN 6.52 Khattiya	AN III 362	MĀ 149	T I 660c BDK III 173
AN 6.54 Dhammika	AN III 366	MĀ 130	T I 618b BDK II 395

AN 6.55 Soṇa	AN III 374	MĀ 123	T I 611c BDK II 364
AN 6.58 Āsava	AN III 387	MĀ 10	T I 431c BDK I 56
AN 6.60 Citta	AN III 392	MĀ 82	T I 557c BDK II 114
AN 6.62 Udaka	AN III 402	MĀ 112	T I 600b BDK II 312
AN 6.63 Nibbedhika	AN III 410	MĀ 111	T I 599b BDK II 306
AN 7.15 Udakūpamā	AN IV 11	MĀ 4	T I 424a BDK I 17
AN 7.20 Vassakāra	AN IV 17	MĀ 142*	T I 648a BDK III 115
AN 7.21–25 Vassakāra	AN IV 21–24	MĀ 142*	T I 648a BDK III 115
AN 7.52 Purisagati	AN IV 70	MĀ 6	T I 427a BDK I 33
AN 7.58A Pacala	AN IV 85	MĀ 83	T I 559b BDK II 122
AN 7.58B Pacala	AN IV 88	MĀ 138	T I 645c BDK III 104
AN 7.60 Kodhana	AN IV 94	MĀ 129	T I 617b BDK II 391
AN 7.61 Hiri	AN IV 99	MĀ 45 MĀ 46	T I 486a BDK I 323 T I 486a BDK I 324
AN 7.62 Suriya	AN IV 100	MĀ 8	T I 428c BDK I 41
AN 7.63 Nagara	AN IV 106	MĀ 3	T I 422c BDK I 10

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

AN 7.64 Dhammaññū	AN IV 113	MĀ 1	T I 421a BDK I 3
AN 7.65 Pāricchattaka	AN IV 117	MĀ 2	T I 422a BDK I 8
AN 7.68 Aggi	AN IV 128	MĀ 5	T I 425a BDK I 23
AN 7.70 Araka	AN IV 136	MĀ 160	T I 682b BDK III 271
AN 8.10 Kāraṇḍava	AN IV 168	MĀ 122	T I 610c BDK II 358
AN 8.11 Verañjā	AN IV 172	MĀ 157	T I 679b BDK III 257
AN 8.12 Sīha	AN IV 179	MĀ 18	T I 440c BDK I 101
AN 8.19 Pahārāda	AN IV 197	MĀ 35	T I 475c BDK I 275
AN 8.20 Uposatha	AN IV 204	MĀ 37	T I 478b BDK I 286
AN 8.21 Ugga 1	AN IV 208	MĀ 38	T I 479c BDK I 292
AN 8.22 Ugga 2	AN IV 212	MĀ 38	T I 479c BDK I 292
AN 8.23 Hatthaka 1	AN IV 216	MĀ 41	T I 484b BDK I 316
AN 8.24 Hatthaka 2	AN IV 218	MĀ 40	T I 482c BDK I 306
AN 8.29 Akkhaṇa	AN IV 225	MĀ 124	T I 613a BDK II 370
AN 8.30 Anuruddha	AN IV 228	MĀ 74	T I 540c BDK II 37
AN 8.43 Visākhā	AN IV 255	MĀ 202	T I 770a BDK IV 211

AN 8.51 Gotamī	AN IV 274	MĀ 116	T I 605a BDK II 332
AN 8.64 Gayā	AN IV 302	MĀ 73	T I 539b BDK II 32
AN 8.70 Bhūmicāla	AN IV 308	MĀ 36	T I 477b BDK I 281
AN 8.81 Sati	AN IV 336	MĀ 44	T I 485c BDK I 322
AN 8.83 Mūla	AN IV 338	MĀ 113	T I 602b BDK II 321
AN 9.1 Sambodhi	AN IV 351	MĀ 57	T I 492a BDK I 354
AN 9.3 Meghiya	AN IV 354	MĀ 56	T I 491a BDK I 349
AN 9.11 Vuttha	AN IV 373	MĀ 24	T I 452b BDK I 160
AN 9.20 Velāma	AN IV 392	MĀ 155	T I 677a BDK III 247
AN 10.1 Kimatthiya	AN V 1	MĀ 42*	T I 485a BDK I 319
AN 10.2 Cetanā	AN V 2	MĀ 43*	T I 485b BDK I 321
AN 10.3 Sīla	AN V 4	MĀ 47	T I 486b BDK I 326
AN 10.4 Upanisā	AN V 5	MĀ 48*	T I 486c BDK I 326
AN 10.24 Cuṇḍa	AN V 41	MĀ 90	T I 572c BDK II 180
AN 10.29 Kosala 1	AN V 59	MĀ 215	T I 799b BDK IV 345
AN 10.30 Kosala 2	AN V 65	MĀ 213*	T I 795b BDK IV 328

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

AN 10.51 Sacitta	AN V 92	MĀ 110	T I 598c BDK II 304
AN 10.53 Ṭhiti	AN V 96	MĀ 95	T I 577b BDK II 200
AN 10.54 Samatha	AN V 98	MĀ 109	T I 598b BDK II 302
AN 10.55 Parihāna	AN V 102	MĀ 96	T I 577c BDK II 202
AN 10.58 Mūla	AN V 106	MĀ 113	T I 602b BDK II 321
AN 10.61 Avijjā	AN V 113	MĀ 51*	T I 487b BDK I 329
		MĀ 52	T I 487c BDK I 332
		MĀ 53	T I 489a BDK I 339
AN 10.62 Taṇhā	AN V 116	MĀ 51*	T I 487b BDK I 329
		MĀ 52	T I 487c BDK I 332
		MĀ 53	T I 489a BDK I 339
AN 10.71 Ākaṅkha	AN V 131	MĀ 105	T I 595c BDK II 290
AN 10.72 Kaṇṭaka	AN V 133	MĀ 84	T I 560b BDK II 125
AN 10.87 Adhikaraṇa	AN V 164	MĀ 94	T I 576a BDK II 196
AN 10.91 Kāmabhogī	AN V 176	MĀ 126	T I 615a BDK II 378
AN 10.115 Adhamma 3	AN V 224	MĀ 188	T I 734a BDK IV 46
AN 10.116 Ajita	AN V 229	MĀ 188	T I 734a BDK IV 46

AN 10.206 Cetanā 1	AN V 292	MĀ 15	T I 437b BDK I 84
AN 10.207 Cetanā 2	AN V 297	MĀ 15	T I 437b BDK I 84
AN 10. 208 Karajakāya	AN V 299	MĀ 15	T I 437b BDK I 84
AN 11.1 Kimatthiyam	AN V 311	MĀ 42	T I 485a BDK I 319
AN 11.2 Cetanā	AN V 312	MĀ 43	T I 485b BDK I 321
AN 11.3 Upanisā 1	AN V 313	MĀ 47	T I 486b BDK I 326
AN 11.4 Upanisā 2	AN V 315	MĀ 48*	T I 486c BDK I 326
AN 11.17 Dasama	AN V 342	MĀ 217	T I 802a BDK IV 355

Khuddaka-nikāya and Vinaya

Pāli discourse Number and title	Vol. and page or verse	Madhyama-āgama parallel Number	Vol. and page
It 91 Jīvika	It 89	MĀ 140	T I 647a BDK III 110
It 112 Loka	It 121	MĀ 137	T I 645b BDK III 102
Sn 2.7 Brāhmaṇadhammika	Sn 284–315	MĀ 156	T I 678a BDK III 251
Th 20.8* Anuruddha	Th 910–919	MĀ 66	T I 508c BDK I 432
Th 30.3 Ānanda	Th 1018–1050	MĀ 33*	T I 471c BDK I 257
Jā 9 Mahādeva	Jā I 137	MĀ 67	T I 511c BDK I 447

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

Jā 196 Valahassa	Jā II 127	MĀ 136	T I 642a BDK III 91
Jā 541 Nimi	Jā VI 95	MĀ 67	T I 511c BDK I 447
Mv 1.22 Bimbisāra	Vin I 35	MĀ 62	T I 497b BDK I 379
Mv 6.31 Sīha	Vin I 233	MĀ 18	T I 440c BDK I 101
Mv 9.6 Upālīpucchā	Vin I 325	MĀ 197	T I 755c BDK IV 143
Mv 10.2 Dīghāvu	Vin I 342	MĀ 72*	T I 532c BDK II 3
Cv 6.4 Sudatta	Vin II 154	MĀ 28	T I 458b BDK I 188

Notes

Division 15

- <sup>1</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahā-assapura-sutta, MN 39 at MN I 271; for a comparative study see Bhikkhu Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2011), pp. 256–259.
- <sup>2</sup> Before turning to bodily conduct, the Mahā-assapura-sutta mentions the need to have a sense of shame.
- <sup>3</sup> The Mahā-assapura-sutta next mentions moderation with food and wakefulness, before coming to clear comprehension with various activities.
- <sup>4</sup> The Mahā-assapura-sutta also mentions eating, drinking, consuming food, tasting, defecating, and urinating.
- <sup>5</sup> Before coming to destruction of the taints (the third higher knowledge), the Mahā-assapura-sutta also mentions the first and second higher knowledges: recollection of past lives and the divine eye.
- <sup>6</sup> The Mahā-assapura-sutta has some additional epithets.
- <sup>7</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷa-assapura-sutta, MN 40 at MN I 281; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 260–261.
- <sup>8</sup> The Cūḷa-assapura-sutta additionally specifies that the relatives would do so already as soon as the person is born.
- <sup>9</sup> The earlier listing instead spoke of a renunciant's defilement.
- <sup>10</sup> Instead of the removal of the five hindrances, the Cūḷa-assapura-sutta describes the arising of joy on seeing the mind free from defilements, which then leads on to tranquillity and concentration.
- <sup>11</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 有有, in conformity with a similar passage found in the Vatthūpama-sutta, MN 7 at MN I 38: atthi idaṃ, atthi hīnaṃ, atthi paṇītaṃ, atthi imassa saññāgatassa uttariṃ nissaraṇaṃ. The Cūḷa-assapura-sutta does not describe the cultivation of insight at all, but turns from the brahmavihāras directly to the simile of the pond.
- <sup>12</sup> The Cūḷa-assapura-sutta distinguishes between one who practices the proper way to recluship by tranquillizing the mind and one who has become a true recluse by destroying the taints.

- <sup>13</sup> The remainder of MĀ 183 has no counterpart in the Cūḷa-assapura-sutta.
- <sup>14</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahāgosiṅga-sutta, MN 32 at MN I 212; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 209–216.
- <sup>15</sup> The Mahāgosiṅga-sutta does not mention Mahākaccāna.
- <sup>16</sup> In the Mahāgosiṅga-sutta Anuruddha illustrates such ability with the example of a thousand wheel rims.
- <sup>17</sup> The Mahāgosiṅga-sutta instead attributes a similar description to Mahāmoggallāna.
- <sup>18</sup> For a comparative survey of variations in Mahākassapa’s listing of such qualities see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 212, table 4.4.
- <sup>19</sup> In the Mahāgosiṅga-sutta Mahāmoggallāna instead describes competence in talking about the higher Dharma.
- <sup>20</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷagosiṅga-sutta, MN 31 at MN I 205; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 203–209; Blair Alan Silverlock, “An Edition and Study of the Gosiga-sutta, The Cow-horn Discourse (Senior Collection Scroll no. 12): An Account of the Harmonious Aṇarudha Monks” (Ph.D thesis, University of Sydney, 2015).
- <sup>21</sup> In the Cūḷagosiṅga-sutta a comparable description is found only later, as part of the report given to the Buddha by Anuruddha.
- <sup>22</sup> The corresponding description in the Cūḷagosiṅga-sutta does not refer to their practice of meditation; and in relation to their regular meetings every five days it says only that they discuss the Dharma, without mentioning that they might alternatively sit together in silence.
- <sup>23</sup> The Cūḷagosiṅga-sutta does not mention the brahmavihāras.
- <sup>24</sup> Instead of the six higher knowledges, the Cūḷagosiṅga-sutta reports the attainment of cessation.
- <sup>25</sup> According to the Cūḷagosiṅga-sutta, he had also been informed about their attainments by devas.
- <sup>26</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Vīmaṃsaka-sutta, MN 47 at MN I 317, which has Jeta’s Grove at Sāvathī as its location; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 291–293; Madhyama-āgama Studies (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation 2012), pp. 67–80.
- <sup>27</sup> In the Vīmaṃsaka-sutta the inquiry is if he has succumbed to the danger that comes with fame.
- <sup>28</sup> A section of the text appears to be missing here.
- <sup>29</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Chabbisodhana-sutta, MN 112 at MN III 29; for comparative studies see Anālayo A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 635–639; and Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 223–248.

- <sup>30</sup> According to the Chabbisodhana-sutta, such a claim should not receive immediate approval, but should first be investigated.
- <sup>31</sup> In the Chabbisodhana-sutta the five aggregates of clinging is the second topic of investigation, preceded by what is seen, heard, etc., and followed by the six elements, the six senses, and an account of the gradual path.
- <sup>32</sup> The four nutriments are not mentioned at all in the Chabbisodhana-sutta.
- <sup>33</sup> Here and below adopting the variant 諸 instead of 識.
- <sup>34</sup> Adopting the variant 說 instead of 靜.
- <sup>35</sup> In the Chabbisodhana-sutta the monks approve of and rejoice in the claimant's attainment only after having completed the entire investigation.
- <sup>36</sup> For the first part of MĀ 188 the Pāli parallel is the Ajita-sutta, AN 10.116 at AN V 229; for the latter part the parallel is the Adhamma-sutta, AN 10.115 at AN V 224.
- <sup>37</sup> In the Ajita-sutta the conversation partners are seated; and Ajita is the one who broaches the topic of the teaching given by Paṇḍita, who here is his co-practitioner (sabrahmacārin). This then leads directly to the Buddha expounding the topic to the monks, without any further appearance of Ajita in the text.
- <sup>38</sup> The ensuing description of the vicissitudes of claiming to be omniscient has a counterpart in the Sandaka-sutta, MN 76 at MN I 519.
- <sup>39</sup> In the Ajita-sutta the Buddha continues expounding the topic, whereas in the Adhamma-sutta he departs and the monks then ask Ānanda to expound it.
- <sup>40</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahācattārīsaka-sutta, MN 117 at MN III 71, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvattthī as its location; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 657–664; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 289–324.
- <sup>41</sup> The introductory statement on the one path has no counterpart in the Mahācattārīsaka-sutta.
- <sup>42</sup> The Mahācattārīsaka-sutta expounds the successive conditional arising of the path factors at a later point; it has no counterpart to the ensuing description of the noble disciple's swift progress to liberation.
- <sup>43</sup> Here and below, the Mahācattārīsaka-sutta distinguishes between two types of right path factors, presenting supramundane right path factors as the second type.
- <sup>44</sup> Here and below the emendation is based on the context, which clearly requires a reference to "right view," as in the Mahācattārīsaka-sutta.
- <sup>45</sup> The Mahācattārīsaka-sutta does not continue after right livelihood with descriptions of right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration, right knowledge, and right liberation.

- <sup>46</sup> The exposition of the ten path factors in the Mahācattārīsaka-sutta has right knowledge before right liberation.
- <sup>47</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷasuññata-sutta, MN 121 at MN III 104; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, 683–688; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 325–349.
- <sup>48</sup> The Cūḷasuññata-sutta continues at this point with neither-perception-nor-non-perception.
- <sup>49</sup> Here and below, the translation is based on the emending 想 to read 相, corresponding to the reading found in the Pāli parallel, animitta.
- <sup>50</sup> The insight contemplation in the Cūḷasuññata-sutta requires the meditator to see that whatever is conditioned and the product of volition is impermanent and subject to cessation.
- <sup>51</sup> According to the Cūḷasuññata-sutta, this is the supreme dwelling in emptiness.
- <sup>52</sup> Instead of tathāgatas, the Cūḷasuññata-sutta speaks of renunciants and brahmins.
- <sup>53</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahāsuññata-sutta, MN 122 at MN III 109; for comparative studies see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 688–701; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 349–363.
- <sup>54</sup> The Mahāsuññata-sutta does not describe Ānanda’s reception of the Buddha.
- <sup>55</sup> The Mahāsuññata-sutta describes the Buddha’s abiding as being internal and by way of not giving attention to any sign, nimitta. It does not mention the arising of joy, etc., described in MĀ 191.
- <sup>56</sup> The Mahāsuññata-sutta has no such statement.
- <sup>57</sup> According to the Mahāsuññata-sutta, all four absorptions are required.
- <sup>58</sup> The translation is based on emending 彼彼心 to read just 彼心, in line with the formulation found later in the text.
- <sup>59</sup> The Mahāsuññata-sutta also mentions practice in the standing and reclining postures.
- <sup>60</sup> The Mahāsuññata-sutta discusses speech before turning to thoughts.
- <sup>61</sup> Such a statement about the Dharma and the ensuing exposition of diligence have no counterpart in the Mahāsuññata-sutta.
- <sup>62</sup> The Mahāsuññata-sutta does not explore why the Buddha dwelled in seclusion.
- <sup>63</sup> Such a distinction between imperturbable liberation and attainment of the four absorptions is not explicitly made in the Mahāsuññata-sutta.
- <sup>64</sup> The translation is based on emending 往 to read 住.

Division 16

- <sup>65</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Laṭukikopama-sutta, MN 66 at MN I 447; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 362–367.
- <sup>66</sup> The Laṭukikopama-sutta reports no such reflection.
- <sup>67</sup> Instead of an inquiry by the Buddha, in the Laṭukikopama-sutta Udāyin straightaway reports his reflection.
- <sup>68</sup> In the Laṭukikopama-sutta the monk who went begging at night is Udāyin himself.
- <sup>69</sup> The simile in the Laṭukikopama-sutta describes a quail bound by a rotting creeper.
- <sup>70</sup> Adopting the variant 止 instead of 正.
- <sup>71</sup> In the Laṭukikopama-sutta, here and below, instead of pointing out that all fetters are unwholesome, the Buddha explains that he knows the diversity of faculties of this person.
- <sup>72</sup> The translation “joy” is based on emending 善 to 喜.
- <sup>73</sup> Adopting the variant 室 instead of 空.
- <sup>74</sup> The translation of 無 follows the indication by Akira Hirakawa, Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary (Tokyo: Reiyukai), p. 752, that on its own this character can render terms such as ayoga, niḥsaṅga, vipramukta, etc.
- <sup>75</sup> The exposition in the Laṭukikopama-sutta proceeds beyond neither-perception-nor-nonperception to attainment of cessation.
- <sup>76</sup> The Laṭukikopama-sutta does not come back to the earlier theme of foolish people’s reactions to the Buddha’s regulations on food.
- <sup>77</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kakacūpama-sutta, MN 21 at MN I 122; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 145–147.
- <sup>78</sup> In the Kakacūpama-sutta the Buddha adds that Moliya Phagguṇa should remain unaffected if anyone were to maltreat the nuns.
- <sup>79</sup> The corresponding instruction in the Kakacūpama-sutta has no reference to being of much or little renown.
- <sup>80</sup> After the simile of the sāla tree grove, the Kakacūpama-sutta continues directly with the tale of the housewife Vedehikā.
- <sup>81</sup> Adopting a variant without 彼.
- <sup>82</sup> Adopting the variant 互 instead of 互.
- <sup>83</sup> The Kakacūpama-sutta does not mention the other three of the four brahmavihāras.
- <sup>84</sup> In the Kakacūpama-sutta the simile of trying to burn up the Ganges is preceded by the simile of painting on space.

- <sup>85</sup> In the Kakacūpama-sutta the cat skin simile, illustrating the five ways of speech, is immediately followed by the simile of the saw. There is no mention of the possibility of being punched, beaten, etc.
- <sup>86</sup> The instruction in the Kakacūpama-sutta for the case of being cut up by thieves mentions only mettā, not the other three of the four brahmavihāras.
- <sup>87</sup> The Kakacūpama-sutta only notes that recollecting the simile of the saw will be for the welfare and happiness of the monks, without a reference to wandering in the four directions or a proclamation regarding the attainment of nonreturn or full awakening.
- <sup>88</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Bhaddāli-sutta, MN 65 at MN I 437; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 358–362.
- <sup>89</sup> In the Bhaddāli-sutta the Buddha does not twice repeat his instruction. After Bhaddāli's refusal, the Buddha just once mentions the alternative that Bhaddāli, on being invited for a meal, can take food from it with him for later consumption.
- <sup>90</sup> Here and below, the Bhaddāli-sutta does not explain why Bhaddāli acted in this way.
- <sup>91</sup> The Bhaddāli-sutta begins a similar criticism by pointing out that the Buddha would know him as one who does not fulfill the training.
- <sup>92</sup> The Bhaddāli-sutta clarifies that to lie down in the mud was to serve as a plank for the Buddha to walk over.
- <sup>93</sup> In the Bhaddāli-sutta at this point he confesses again and the Buddha accepts his confession, which in MĀ 194 happens later.
- <sup>94</sup> Adopting the variant 已 instead of 以.
- <sup>95</sup> Instead of listing the factors, beginning with delight, whose successive arising leads to knowing and seeing as it really is, the Bhaddāli-sutta states only that such a monk will not attain realization. Conversely below.
- <sup>96</sup> Instead of qualifying the first absorption as a higher state of mind, etc., making for advance toward nirvana, the Bhaddāli-sutta just links such attainment to fulfilling the training.
- <sup>97</sup> The addition of “[not]” here and below is motivated by the fact that the context clearly requires a negative formulation; see also Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 360f, n. 114.
- <sup>98</sup> The addition of “[a little]” or “[the little]” is based on the subsequent repetition of this passage, which includes 少 at the points in question. It also seems needed for the passage to make sense, which indicates that the absence of the expected 少 would be due to a transmission error.
- <sup>99</sup> Following an emendation in the CBETA edition which adds 一, “one.”
- <sup>100</sup> In the Bhaddāli-sutta the inquiry contrasts former times, when there were fewer rules and more monks reached final knowledge, with later times when there were more rules and fewer monks reaching final knowledge.

- <sup>101</sup> Before taking up the topic of gains, the Bhaddāli-sutta first mentions that the sangha has reached greatness. Instead of “fine things,” the Pāli version speaks of “things that are the basis for taints.”
- <sup>102</sup> The theme of great merit is not mentioned in the Bhaddāli-sutta.
- <sup>103</sup> In the Bhaddāli-sutta the Buddha first asks if Bhaddāli remembers the simile.
- <sup>104</sup> In the Bhaddāli-sutta he does not explicitly request the Buddha to teach the simile.
- <sup>105</sup> Adopting the variant 闕.
- <sup>106</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kīṭāgiri-sutta, MN 70 at MN I 473; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 377–387.
- <sup>107</sup> The expression used in the present context differs from the injunction to take only a single meal in the preceding discourse; the point of the injunction here is to eat only during the day, i.e., to abstain from eating at night.
- <sup>108</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta does not provide information about Assaji’s and Punabbasuka’s former positions in society.
- <sup>109</sup> In the Kīṭāgiri-sutta this first instance of informing Assaji and Punabbasuka does not come with an anticipation that they will disobey the Buddha’s instruction.
- <sup>110</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta does not report that the same exchange took place three times.
- <sup>111</sup> In the Kīṭāgiri-sutta the question is whether they had heard the Buddha state that experiencing any type of feeling will lead to decrease of unwholesome states and increase of wholesome states, which they deny.
- <sup>112</sup> In the Kīṭāgiri-sutta they have not misunderstood the Buddha’s teaching, wherefore they are not being rebuked on that account.
- <sup>113</sup> The corresponding exposition in the Kīṭāgiri-sutta also covers neutral feeling.
- <sup>114</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta does not have a counterpart to the exposition that distinguishes feelings into bodily and mental types.
- <sup>115</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta contains no such summary statement of the principle behind the distinction between what is to be cultivated and what is not to be cultivated.
- <sup>116</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta instead defines this type of arahant as one who has mastered the immaterial attainments. The same difference recurs in relation to the body witness.
- <sup>117</sup> The addition of “[not yet]” here and in the next section (faith follower) is a makeshift device adopted to accommodate a seemingly erroneous duplication of textual material. The description of the Dharma follower virtually replicates that of the one arrived at view; and the description of the faith follower virtually replicates that of the one liberated by faith. Adding “not yet” signals that the Dharma follower and the faith follower are at earlier stages of the path than the one arrived at view and the one liberated by faith.

- <sup>118</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta mentions possession of the five faculties (indriya) in its definition of the Dharma follower and the faith follower.
- <sup>119</sup> Before announcing the four-phrase teaching (which here comes without the question whether the monks wish to know it), in the Kīṭāgiri-sutta the Buddha points out that Assaji and Punabbasuka are devoid of the qualities required for attaining final knowledge.
- <sup>120</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta instead recommends the attitude that the Buddha knows, the disciple does not know, and then depicts strong determination using the image of continuous striving even if flesh and blood were to dry up.
- <sup>121</sup> The Kīṭāgiri-sutta does not refer to wandering in the four directions or describe an increase in wholesomeness by day and night.
- <sup>122</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Sāmagāma-sutta, MN 104 at MN II 243, which has Sāmagāma as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 603–610.
- <sup>123</sup> Adopting a variant that adds another 汝.
- <sup>124</sup> Here and below, adopting the variant 住 instead of 柱.
- <sup>125</sup> Adopting a correction suggested in the CBETA edition of adopting 住 instead of 往.
- <sup>126</sup> It is somewhat unexpected that the novice should sit down while the fully ordained monk remains standing, in fact in the Sāmagāma-sutta they both sit down to one side.
- <sup>127</sup> The Sāmagāma-sutta does not have the description of a monk well-restrained in the presence of the Buddha.
- <sup>128</sup> In the Sāmagāma-sutta the Buddha instead inquires if Ānanda could envisage a disagreement among monks regarding the constituents of awakening.
- <sup>129</sup> The addition of “[not]” seems to be required to make sense of this statement in its context, as a dispute about the higher morality, higher mind, and higher insight would be precisely a dispute about the path and the stages of the path; see also Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 604f, n. 100.
- <sup>130</sup> No rebuttal of Nātaputta’s claim to omniscience is found in the Sāmagāma-sutta.
- <sup>131</sup> This simile is not found in the Sāmagāma-sutta.
- <sup>132</sup> Instead of silent sulking the Sāmagāma-sutta has contempt, and instead of shamelessness it has dogmatism.
- <sup>133</sup> Before listing these seven, the Sāmagāma-sutta names four types of litigation. The sequence of the seven settlements of litigation differs in the two versions; see Anālayo A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 608, table 11.5.

- <sup>134</sup> The original employs just the term to be used when addressing the accused monk: 君, “sir” (in contrast to the expression “venerable friend” used regularly when monks address each other). Since “sir” as a name for this type of settlement fails to make sense, it seems fair to assume that the original name for this procedure and the mode of address to be used during the procedure have been confused with each other. Therefore in the translation “sir” has been emended to “bad character,” in line with the type of terminology found in other listings of the seven kinds of settlement of litigation for what corresponds to the present case.
- <sup>135</sup> The Sāmagāma-sutta speaks of drawing out the guideline of the Dharma to settle a disagreement between monks regarding Dharma and discipline; it does not work through variations in the number of those who are in disagreement.
- <sup>136</sup> Adopting the variant 曾 instead of 曹.
- <sup>137</sup> Here and in the next case, the Sāmagāma-sutta does not give comparable details on the procedure to be adopted by the monk.
- <sup>138</sup> In the Sāmagāma-sutta the case of past insanity requires cross-questioning by the other monks.
- <sup>139</sup> The description is cryptically worded. In order to fit the context, which is clearly about someone denying having violated a rule, addition of “[not]” seems to be required. The point then is that the defendant declares either that he does not know about the alleged violation or that he does not see it as a violation.
- <sup>140</sup> After repeated cross-questioning, in the Sāmagāma-sutta the one of bad character finally admits his wrongdoing.
- <sup>141</sup> The Sāmagāma-sutta again speaks of drawing out the guideline of the Dharma.
- <sup>142</sup> Adopting a variant that reverses the sequence of 法 and 是.
- <sup>143</sup> The Sāmagāma-sutta concludes that the six principles of cordiality conduce to enduring any type of speech.
- <sup>144</sup> A comparable exchange can be found in the Upālipucchā of the Mahāvagga, Mv 9.6 at Vin I 325.
- <sup>145</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dantabhūmi-sutta, MN 125 at MN III 128; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 717–722; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 395–419.
- <sup>146</sup> The addition of “[gone beyond]” is required to accommodate what appears to be a textual error in the original. To judge from the context, the reference at this point should rather be to the stage of being tamed.

- <sup>147</sup> In the Dantabhūmi-sutta the Buddha concludes that if Aciravata had delivered the two similes, the prince would have gained confidence in him.
- <sup>148</sup> Before turning to satipaṭṭhāna, the Dantabhūmi-sutta has the standard account of the gradual path covering sense restraint, moderation in eating, wakefulness, clear comprehension, and removal of the five hindrances.
- <sup>149</sup> The Dantabhūmi-sutta does not relate satipaṭṭhāna without thoughts to the elephant simile.
- <sup>150</sup> The corresponding part in the Dantabhūmi-sutta omits the first absorption and continues after the fourth absorption with the three higher knowledges.
- <sup>151</sup> The Dantabhūmi-sutta does not relate the imperturbability reached with the fourth absorption to the elephant simile.
- <sup>152</sup> The Dantabhūmi-sutta does not relate the ability to endure various vicissitudes (which here do not include being beaten with sticks) to the elephant simile.
- <sup>153</sup> In the Dantabhūmi-sutta worthiness comes about through having reached full liberation.
- <sup>154</sup> In the Dantabhūmi-sutta such a disciple, instead of being called “untamed,” is said to have not eradicated the taints.
- <sup>155</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta, MN 129 at MN III 163; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 741–746.
- <sup>156</sup> Instead of the ten courses of action, the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta lists breaches of the five precepts.
- <sup>157</sup> Adopting the variant 考 instead of 考.
- <sup>158</sup> Here and below in the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta the person is just taking a rest, not necessarily suffering illness.
- <sup>159</sup> Adopting the variant 被 instead of 受.
- <sup>160</sup> Adopting the variant 同燃 instead of 洞然.
- <sup>161</sup> The text here repeats the description just given above.
- <sup>162</sup> Here and below, adopting the variant 齟 instead of 斷.
- <sup>163</sup> The Bālappaṇḍita-sutta instead describes the Great Hell, which is made of blazing hot iron.
- <sup>164</sup> The list of animals in the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta is in a different sequence, proceeding from animals that feed on grass or dung to those that live in darkness, water, and filth.
- <sup>165</sup> As explained by Bhikkhu Bodhi, The Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Aṅguttara Nikāya (Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2012) p. 1796, n. 1672 (in relation to an occurrence of these three in AN IV 200), timis, timīṅgalas, and timīraṇṇīgalas are “legendary fish of gigantic size.”

- <sup>166</sup> In the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta those who come running are brahmins smelling a sacrifice.
- <sup>167</sup> It is not clear what these last two animals, julouluo and julengjia, could be referring to.
- <sup>168</sup> As earlier, the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta describes wise conduct with reference to the five precepts, not by way of the ten courses of action.
- <sup>169</sup> The Bālappaṇḍita-sutta offers a detailed description of the seven treasures and four types of endowments of a wheel-turning king.
- <sup>170</sup> No such description of heaven is found in the Bālappaṇḍita-sutta.
- <sup>171</sup> The Bālappaṇḍita-sutta contains no explicit injunction that the monks should train accordingly.
- <sup>172</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Alagaddūpama-sutta, MN 22 at MN I 130; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 147–158.
- <sup>173</sup> In the Alagaddūpama-sutta the monks quote a series of similes to illustrate the nature of sensuality, which are later repeated by the Buddha and then by the monks again.
- <sup>174</sup> The listing of similes in the Alagaddūpama-sutta has a slaughterhouse and an impaling stake as two additional illustrations.
- <sup>175</sup> In the Alagaddūpama-sutta the Buddha states that it is impossible to engage in sensual pleasures without having sensual desire.
- <sup>176</sup> Adopting the variant 耶 instead of 也.
- <sup>177</sup> The Alagaddūpama-sutta lists only nine aṅgas.
- <sup>178</sup> The translation is based on emending 脫 to read 說.
- <sup>179</sup> Adopting the variant 意 instead of 竟.
- <sup>180</sup> The Alagaddūpama-sutta introduces the six standpoints for views by first describing the case of an unlearned worldling.
- <sup>181</sup> This supplementation is based on the fact that in MĀ 200 a later recapitulation of the present exposition includes formations, although out of sequence and with a variant that fits the context better. The corresponding passage in the Alagaddūpama-sutta mentions formations in both cases.
- <sup>182</sup> This view, which appears to be a type of annihilationism, has no counterpart in the Alagaddūpama-sutta.
- <sup>183</sup> In the Alagaddūpama-sutta longing for the past arises because of what does not exist externally and fear of annihilation because of what does not exist internally.
- <sup>184</sup> Adopting the variant 則 instead of 見.
- <sup>185</sup> The Alagaddūpama-sutta continues with a teaching on the impermanent, dukkha, and not-self nature of the five aggregates.

- <sup>186</sup> Adopting the variant 所 instead of 行; and inferring the former presence of 所有行 preceding 所有此見.
- <sup>187</sup> In the Alagaddūpama-sutta the Buddha clarifies that he just teaches dukkha and its cessation.
- <sup>188</sup> In the Alagaddūpama-sutta the simile of twigs in Jeta's Grove is preceded by an instruction to the monks to give up the five aggregates.
- <sup>189</sup> In the Alagaddūpama-sutta the Buddha asks the monks whether, on seeing the grass and twigs being carried away, they would think that they themselves are being carried away.
- <sup>190</sup> The Alagaddūpama-sutta continues by describing the Dharma follower and the faith follower, as well as those who have sufficient faith to be reborn in heaven.
- <sup>191</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta, MN 38 at MN I 256; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 251–256.
- <sup>192</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 緣.
- <sup>193</sup> In the Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta Sāti's silent dismay is described earlier.
- <sup>194</sup> 真說見耶, literally, “do you see that this has been truly said,” which appears to be a translation error; cf. Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 252, n. 233.
- <sup>195</sup> 如來真說見耶, which appears to involve another misunderstanding by the translators. Fumimaro Watanabe, “Logical Arguments in the Dialogues (Suttas),” Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies 20/2 (1972): 981, suggests it is based on misreading “nutriment” (āhāra) as “worthy” (araha), leading in turn to an intrusion of tathāgata.
- <sup>196</sup> The Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta has no reference to opening up a channel.
- <sup>197</sup> Such an inquiry and its response are not reported in the Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta.
- <sup>198</sup> Adopting the variant 淳 instead of 等.
- <sup>199</sup> Adopting the variant 也 instead of 耶.
- <sup>200</sup> The Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta introduces a recapitulation of dependent arising with a statement of specific conditionality in the form “when this is, that exists; with the arising of this, that arises.” (The same holds below for the cessation mode, with appropriate changes in the formulation of specific conditionality).
- <sup>201</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 佛.
- <sup>202</sup> The Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta does not explicitly mention the impossibility of committing the five heinous crimes, as well as some other impossibilities mentioned subsequently in MĀ 201.
- <sup>203</sup> Adopting the variant 仰 instead of 作.
- <sup>204</sup> The translation is based on disregarding one instance of 苦.

- <sup>205</sup> The Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta also states that in the absence of some of these conditions, conception does not take place.
- <sup>206</sup> Adopting the variant 酥 instead of 蘇.
- <sup>207</sup> The Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta at this juncture gives a full account of the gradual path.
- <sup>208</sup> No earthquake is reported in the Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta, which instead concludes by speaking of the monk Sāti as caught in the vast net of craving.

Division 17

- <sup>209</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Upasatha-sutta, AN 3.70 at AN I 205; cf. also AN 8.43 at AN IV 255.
- <sup>210</sup> The criticism seems to be of protection being directed only to living beings that dwell beyond the range of a hundred yojanas, while ignoring those that dwell close by.
- <sup>211</sup> The translation is based on the variant 主, instead of 生.
- <sup>212</sup> The Upasatha-sutta takes up the conduct of arahants only later in its exposition.
- <sup>213</sup> In the Upasatha-sutta taking a single meal is mentioned earlier, before the reference to dancing etc. and to the use of luxurious beds.
- <sup>214</sup> The present translation follows a CBETA emendation of 往 to 住.
- <sup>215</sup> In the Upasatha-sutta the list of recollections comes earlier.
- <sup>216</sup> The supplementation follows a gloss in the Pāli commentary, Mp II 322, on the similar reference to Brahmā in the Upasatha-sutta.
- <sup>217</sup> The translation is based on the variant 鉗 instead of 鉗.
- <sup>218</sup> The Upasatha-sutta speaks of Gandhāra instead of Yona.
- <sup>219</sup> Adopting the variant 懷 instead of 壞.
- <sup>220</sup> Adopting the variant 比 instead of 比丘.
- <sup>221</sup> In the Upasatha-sutta the Buddha delivers a poem at this juncture, after which the discourse concludes without reporting Visākhā's reaction.
- <sup>222</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Potaliya-sutta, MN 54 at MN I 359, which has Āpaṇa among the Āṅguttarāpaṇas as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 313–317.
- <sup>223</sup> The Potaliya-sutta does not describe Potaliya's earlier meetings with renunciants and brahmins.
- <sup>224</sup> Sexual misconduct is not mentioned in the Potaliya-sutta.
- <sup>225</sup> In the Potaliya-sutta the first set of eight leads to the cutting off of worldly affairs; the next set completes the cutting off of worldly affairs

- <sup>226</sup> The Potaliya-sutta clarifies that the problem of being chased by the other birds is that these will peck and claw the bird with the meat.
- <sup>227</sup> This question is not found in the Potaliya-sutta.
- <sup>228</sup> In the Potaliya-sutta two strong men have overpowered this man and drag him toward the charcoal pit.
- <sup>229</sup> The Potaliya-sutta does not contain the simile of the poisonous snake.
- <sup>230</sup> In the Potaliya-sutta he dreams he is seeing lovely parks and groves.
- <sup>231</sup> This question is not found in the Potaliya-sutta.
- <sup>232</sup> The expected description of the first absorption is lacking here. It could be restored as follows: “Secluded from sensual desires, secluded from evil and unwholesome states, he dwells having attained the first absorption, which is with directed awareness and sustained contemplation, with rapture and happiness born of separation.”
- <sup>233</sup> The Potaliya-sutta does not explicitly bring in the four absorptions, although in relation to each simile it describes the noble disciple leaving behind diversified equanimity and cultivating unified equanimity, which according to the commentary, Ps III 43, is a reference to the fourth absorption.
- <sup>234</sup> Before coming to the destruction of the taints, the Potaliya-sutta describes the attainment of the other two higher knowledges, recollection of past lives and the divine eye.
- <sup>235</sup> The Potaliya-sutta does not report his stream-entry.
- <sup>236</sup> The Potaliya-sutta only reports Potaliya proclaiming that he will in future give to the Buddha’s disciples. In the Pāli version Potaliya then illustrates the nature of the exposition received with a standard set of similes that describe setting upright what had been overturned, revealing what was hidden, etc.
- <sup>237</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta, MN 26 at MN I 160, which has Jeta’s Grove at Sāvathī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 170–189; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 11–37.
- <sup>238</sup> Before the episode about going to bathe, in the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta a group of monks had approached Ānanda and expressed their wish to hear a discourse from the Buddha.
- <sup>239</sup> The Ariyapariyesanā-sutta also mentions being subject to birth.
- <sup>240</sup> Adopting the variant 汚 instead of 法.
- <sup>241</sup> The Ariyapariyesanā-sutta does not refer to the Bodhisattva’s moral purification undertaken before meeting Ālāra Kālāma.
- <sup>242</sup> A similar inquiry in the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta is preceded by a description of the Bodhisattva becoming accomplished in the doctrine of Ālāra Kālāma (and later of Uddaka Rāmaputta).

- <sup>243</sup> Here and below, the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta names all five faculties, including mindfulness and concentration.
- <sup>244</sup> Adopting the variant reading 父羅摩 instead of 羅摩子.
- <sup>245</sup> In the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta he invites the Bodhisattva to be the sole leader of the group.
- <sup>246</sup> The Bodhisattva's strong determination not to change posture until awakening is attained is not mentioned in the the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta. It is, however, found in the Mahāgosīṅga-sutta, MN 32 at MN I 219.
- <sup>247</sup> The Ariyapariyesanā-sutta at this point reports that the Buddha is hesitant to teach, whereupon Brahmā intervenes and convinces him that there are some who will understand his teaching.
- <sup>248</sup> The text reads 二七日. A reference to "twenty-seven" would instead be 二十七日. The adopted rendering as "fourteen" follows André Bareau, Recherches sur la Biographie du Buddha dans les Sūtrapīṭaka et les Vinayapīṭaka Anciens: De la Quête de l'Éveil à la Conversion de Śāriputra et de Maudgalyāyana (Paris: École Française d'Extrême-Orient, 1963), p. 145; this also matches the classical expression 二八, meaning "sixteen [years of age]".
- <sup>249</sup> In the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta Uddaka has passed away just the night before.
- <sup>250</sup> The sequence of the stanzas spoken in reply to Uddaka is different in the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta, where the Buddha's plan to go to Benares does not form a reply to Uddaka's question about where the Buddha wishes to go.
- <sup>251</sup> Adopting the variant 徑 instead of 經.
- <sup>252</sup> The Ariyapariyesanā-sutta does not have such a reflection by the Buddha on the confused condition of the five monks.
- <sup>253</sup> In the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta they express their disbelief three times.
- <sup>254</sup> In the Ariyapariyesanā-sutta the Buddha asks them if they have ever heard him speak like this before.
- <sup>255</sup> The Ariyapariyesanā-sutta makes no reference to the first discourse delivered by the Buddha, which is mentioned only in its commentary, Ps II 192.
- <sup>256</sup> Adopting a variant without 求.
- <sup>257</sup> Adopting a variant without 見.
- <sup>258</sup> The Ariyapariyesanā-sutta does not refer to the arising of a tathāgata.
- <sup>259</sup> The Ariyapariyesanā-sutta instead continues after the fourth absorption with the immaterial attainments and cessation.
- <sup>260</sup> Adopting the variant 坐 instead of 伏, in keeping with earlier instances of this description.

- <sup>261</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahāmālunkya-sutta, MN 64 at MN I 432; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 355–358.
- <sup>262</sup> The Mahāmālunkya-sutta does not report three instances of the Buddha’s query meeting with no reply.
- <sup>263</sup> In the Mahāmālunkya-sutta the path is insightful contemplation of jhāna attainment.
- <sup>264</sup> The simile of a mountain stream is not found in the Mahāmālunkya-sutta.
- <sup>265</sup> The Mahāmālunkya-sutta instead describes contemplation of an absorption in terms of the five aggregates and their characteristics of impermanence etc.
- <sup>266</sup> The translation follows the variant 上 instead of 止. The Mahāmālunkya-sutta differs in that, instead of progress to a higher attainment in tranquility it mentions the attainment of nonreturn as the alternative result.
- <sup>267</sup> Adopting a variant that adds 空, in line with the earlier description of this attainment.
- <sup>268</sup> The simile of the plantain tree is not found in the Mahāmālunkya-sutta.
- <sup>269</sup> In the Mahāmālunkya-sutta Ānanda asks why some monks are liberated by mind and others through wisdom. The Buddha attributes this to differences in their faculties.
- <sup>270</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cetokhila-sutta, MN 16 at MN I 101; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 127–132.
- <sup>271</sup> In the Cetokhila-sutta the doubt is about the sangha, not about the precepts.
- <sup>272</sup> The corresponding five mental bondages in the Cetokhila-sutta are desire for sensual pleasures, desire for the body, desire for form, excessive eating and sleeping, and the wish for a heavenly rebirth.
- <sup>273</sup> Adopting the variant reading 至 instead of 得, which is in line with the earlier formulation of the same phrase.
- <sup>274</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta, MN 77 at MN II 1; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 416–424; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 81–103.
- <sup>275</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta does not mention the number of monks accompanying the Buddha or the number of followers of Sakuludāyī.
- <sup>276</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta does not report that Sakuludāyī got up and received the Buddha with joined palms.
- <sup>277</sup> In the Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta the Buddha asks only once about the talk that has been going on.
- <sup>278</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta does not state the number of followers of the other teachers or of the Buddha.
- <sup>279</sup> Adopting a CBETA correction of 養 to read 奉.

- <sup>280</sup> In the Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta the disciples even publicly state that their teacher is not able to answer a question posed by visitors, suggesting that, to get a proper reply, such a question should better be addressed to them, the disciples.
- <sup>281</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta speaks of a company of several hundred.
- <sup>282</sup> In the Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta he merely clears his throat.
- <sup>283</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta lists these five qualities in a different sequence, beginning with taking little food.
- <sup>284</sup> Adopting the variant 刀 instead of 力.
- <sup>285</sup> The translation is based on emending the Chinese text by exchanging the descriptions of the disciples and of the Buddha. The existing Chinese text has the Buddha eating a single fruit or half a fruit, whereas the disciples eat much more. Yet the general trend of the exposition requires that he eats plenty of food whereas the disciples eat relatively little. This is indeed the presentation in the Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta. It seems safe, therefore, to assume that an error in transmission has led to an interchanging of these two descriptions in MĀ 207.
- <sup>286</sup> The translation is based on the variant 露 instead of 覆.
- <sup>287</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta instead mentions the Buddha's endowment with the supreme aggregate of virtue.
- <sup>288</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta's description of the Buddha's higher wisdom, which forms the third topic, does not refer to the inabilities of the opponent and additionally reports the Buddha as asking Sakuludāyī if he thinks the Buddha's disciples would nevertheless interrupt their teacher.
- <sup>289</sup> Instead of these two higher knowledges, the Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta lists a range of different aspects of the path to liberation.
- <sup>290</sup> The Mahāsakuludāyī-sutta does not record that Sakuludāyī expressed his respect or that he took refuge.
- <sup>291</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷasakuludāyī-sutta, MN 79 at MN II 29; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 431–436.
- <sup>292</sup> In the Cūḷasakuludāyī-sutta the Buddha realizes that it is still too early to go begging alms and therefore goes to the park.
- <sup>293</sup> The Cūḷasakuludāyī-sutta does not report that Sakuludāyī got up and received the Buddha with joined palms.
- <sup>294</sup> In the Cūḷasakuludāyī-sutta the Buddha asks only once about the talk that has been going on.
- <sup>295</sup> In the Cūḷasakuludāyī-sutta the claimant to omniscience becomes irritated and prevaricates.

- <sup>296</sup> Instead of mentioning all six teachers, the Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta attributes the claim to omniscience only to Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta.
- <sup>297</sup> No such remark is found in the Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta. Since the Buddha has not yet delivered a teaching that Sakuludāyī might misunderstand, this remark does not fit the context well. Its presence here could have resulted from accidental replication of this passage from the otherwise fairly similar nearby discourse to Vekhanassa, MĀ 209, where such a remark does fit the context.
- <sup>298</sup> In the Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta the Buddha at this juncture also gives a brief teaching on conditionality.
- <sup>299</sup> Instead of taking the listing up to wrong view, the Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta continues after false speech with the undertaking of some asceticism.
- <sup>300</sup> The Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta does not introduce the attainment of absorption with the gradual path account, which it brings in only at a later point.
- <sup>301</sup> The Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta speaks of the fourth absorption as the realization of an entirely pleasant world, for reaching which the other three absorptions are the path.
- <sup>302</sup> A distinction between jhāna attainment with or without having the same virtue, etc., like the corresponding devas is not found in the Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta.
- <sup>303</sup> The Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta also mentions the attainment of the three higher knowledges.
- <sup>304</sup> In the Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta he does not get up from his seat, wanting to pay homage; he does, however, take refuge and request the going forth under the Buddha.
- <sup>305</sup> In the Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta they employ a simile to illustrate the inappropriateness of Sakuludāyī going forth under the Buddha.
- <sup>306</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Vekhanassa-sutta, MN 80 at MN II 40; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 437–440; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 139–154.
- <sup>307</sup> The translation is based on the variant 彷徨 instead of 仿佯.
- <sup>308</sup> The simile of the fire is not found in the Vekhanassa-sutta.
- <sup>309</sup> In the Vekhanassa-sutta the Buddha instead agrees to Vekhanassa's criticism.
- <sup>310</sup> Adopting a variant without 縛.
- <sup>311</sup> The simile of the lamp is not found in the Vekhanassa-sutta.
- <sup>312</sup> The translation is based on the variant 炯 instead of 洞.
- <sup>313</sup> The simile of fuel for fire is not found in the Vekhanassa-sutta.
- <sup>314</sup> The Vekhanassa-sutta does not report his stream-entry, his going forth, or his eventually becoming an arahant, instead of which he just takes refuge as a lay follower.

- <sup>315</sup> The translation is based on the variant 來 instead of 哉.
- <sup>316</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷavedalla-sutta, MN 44 at MN I 299, which has the Squirrels' Sanctuary at Rājagaha as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 276–289.
- <sup>317</sup> In the Cūḷavedalla-sutta the two discussants are the male lay disciple Visākha and the nun Dhammadinnā.
- <sup>318</sup> In the Cūḷavedalla-sutta the arising of personality is followed by the topic of its cessation by giving up craving, and then by the noble eightfold path as what leads to that cessation.
- <sup>319</sup> The Cūḷavedalla-sutta allocates right effort to the concentration group.
- <sup>320</sup> The topic of the five factors of the first absorption is covered in the Mahāvedalla-sutta, MN 43 at MN I 294, instead of the Cūḷavedalla-sutta.
- <sup>321</sup> The Cūḷavedalla-sutta does not take up the achievement of concentration.
- <sup>322</sup> The translation follows a variant without 服.
- <sup>323</sup> This topic is found in the Mahāvedalla-sutta, MN 43 at MN I 296, instead of the Cūḷavedalla-sutta.
- <sup>324</sup> This inquiry has no counterpart in the Cūḷavedalla-sutta (or the Mahāvedalla-sutta).
- <sup>325</sup> This topic is not discussed in the Cūḷavedalla-sutta (or the Mahāvedalla-sutta).
- <sup>326</sup> The Cūḷavedalla-sutta mentions three contacts experienced on emerging from cessation, namely: empty, signless, and desireless contact.
- <sup>327</sup> The corresponding inquiry in the Cūḷavedalla-sutta is concerned only with what is pleasant and unpleasant in relation to each of the three feelings.
- <sup>328</sup> The translation is based on an emendation that disregards the negation in the second case; according to the original reading not knowing neutral feeling would be pleasant. Given that not knowing painful feeling is said just above to be painful, the present formulation makes little sense and can safely be attributed to a textual error.
- <sup>329</sup> This question is not found in the Cūḷavedalla-sutta.
- <sup>330</sup> According to the Cūḷavedalla-sutta, the counterpart to knowledge is liberation (and nirvana is then the counterpart to liberation).
- <sup>331</sup> In the Cūḷavedalla-sutta it is Visākha who approaches the Buddha and reports Dhammadinnā's exposition, which similarly meets with the Buddha's approval.
- <sup>332</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Mahāvedalla-sutta, MN 43 at MN I 292, which has Jeta's Grove at Sāvathī as its location; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 268–276.
- <sup>333</sup> In the Mahāvedalla-sutta Mahākoṭṭhita asks the questions and Sāriputta replies to them.

- <sup>334</sup> This question is not found in the Mahāvedalla-sutta.
- <sup>335</sup> The translation is based on the variant 知 instead of 如.
- <sup>336</sup> The Mahāvedalla-sutta instead explains consciousness in terms of being conscious of the three types of feeling.
- <sup>337</sup> The Mahāvedalla-sutta adds that wisdom should be developed and consciousness should be understood. It does not explain that one knows through wisdom.
- <sup>338</sup> The Mahāvedalla-sutta explains the purpose of wisdom as direct understanding, penetrative understanding, and abandoning.
- <sup>339</sup> Instead of “truth,” sacca, the Mahāvedalla-sutta mentions “discussion,” sākacchā.
- <sup>340</sup> The Mahāvedalla-sutta points in particular to the craving of ignorant beings as responsible for future becoming.
- <sup>341</sup> The Mahāvedalla-sutta explicitly mentions the cessation of craving, which would be implicit in the reference to the cessation of ignorance in MĀ 211.
- <sup>342</sup> The corresponding discussion in the Mahāvedalla-sutta covers feeling, perception, and consciousness.
- <sup>343</sup> This question is not found in the Mahāvedalla-sutta.
- <sup>344</sup> In the Mahāvedalla-sutta the question that leads up to the answer with the simile of the lamp concerns what heat depends on. The reply that heat depends on vitality then elicits the question how it should be understood that according to the preceding statement vitality depends on heat, yet heat is now said to depend on vitality.
- <sup>345</sup> This question and the next are not found in the Mahāvedalla-sutta.
- <sup>346</sup> This discussion has a counterpart in the Cūlavedalla-sutta, MN 44 at MN I 302.
- <sup>347</sup> According to the Cūlavedalla-sutta, verbal formations cease first.
- <sup>348</sup> According to the Cūlavedalla-sutta, the sequence of arising is first mental activity, next bodily activity, and last verbal activity.
- <sup>349</sup> In the Cūlavedalla-sutta the three are: empty contact, signless contact, and desireless contact.
- <sup>350</sup> The corresponding discussion in the Mahāvedalla-sutta concerns the “neither pleasant nor unpleasant deliverance of the mind.”
- <sup>351</sup> Here and in what follows the translation is based on the variant 無相, instead of 無想.
- <sup>352</sup> According to the Mahāvedalla-sutta, prior determination is a third condition for remaining in the signless deliverance of the mind.
- <sup>353</sup> For this third condition (not mentioned in the Mahāvedalla-sutta) the rendering is based on the variant reading for the second 因, namely 及, “with.”

Division 18

- <sup>354</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Kaṇṇakatthala-sutta, MN 90 at MN II 125; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 519–525.
- <sup>355</sup> The Kaṇṇakatthala-sutta does not report a reply by the Buddha or preparations of the place where the meeting with the king is to take place.
- <sup>356</sup> The Kaṇṇakatthala-sutta just describes that the king approached the Buddha and paid respect, without giving any further details.
- <sup>357</sup> In the Kaṇṇakatthala-sutta the king does not praise the Buddha's reply.
- <sup>358</sup> In the Kaṇṇakatthala-sutta the general only takes an active part in the discussion after the Buddha has explained that only devas subject to ill-will are reborn in this world. In the Pāli version the general then just asks if the one type of deva can topple the other one.
- <sup>359</sup> Adopting a variant without 天天.
- <sup>360</sup> Instead of a remark on purity as the basis for designating Brahmās, in the Kaṇṇakatthala-sutta the Buddha just queries why the king had asked this. When the king explains that he wants to know if Brahmās are reborn in this world, the Buddha replies that this is the case for Brahmās who still have ill-will.
- <sup>361</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Dhammacetiya-sutta, MN 89 at MN II 118 (see also AN 10.30 at AN V 65); for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 510–519.
- <sup>362</sup> Adopting a variant without 外.
- <sup>363</sup> In the Dhammacetiya-sutta he kisses and caresses the Buddha's feet.
- <sup>364</sup> The translation is based on emending the sequence of two characters, reading 法有 instead of 有法.
- <sup>365</sup> Adopting a variant without 諸.
- <sup>366</sup> This reason for the king's faith is not mentioned in the Dhammacetiya-sutta; for a survey of variations between the two lists see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, p. 513, table 9.6.
- <sup>367</sup> The Dhammacetiya-sutta describes clever debaters who are warriors, brahmins, householders, or renunciants, each of whom is converted.
- <sup>368</sup> In the Dhammacetiya-sutta the person merely clears his throat.
- <sup>369</sup> Adopting the variant reading 征 instead of 仙.
- <sup>370</sup> In the Dhammacetiya-sutta, where the topic of the two courtiers amounts to a single reason for the king's faith, the two spend most of the night in talk about the Dharma.

- <sup>371</sup> The Dhammacetiya-sutta does not have a comparison of the Buddha's "kingship" to that of Pasenadi.
- <sup>372</sup> In the Dhammacetiya-sutta the Buddha just addresses the monks present, without asking Ānanda to summon them.
- <sup>373</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Bāhitika-sutta, MN 88 at MN II 112; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 505–510; Madhyama-āgama Studies, pp. 175–194.
- <sup>374</sup> Such an inquiry by Ānanda is not found in the Bāhitika-sutta.
- <sup>375</sup> The Bāhitika-sutta reports only a single instance of the king's invitation and Ānanda's declining.
- <sup>376</sup> Adopting the variant 聞 instead of 問.
- <sup>377</sup> The ensuing exposition has no counterpart in the Bāhitika-sutta, which instead takes up verbal and mental conduct. The same difference holds for the case of wholesome conduct.
- <sup>378</sup> In the Bāhitika-sutta Ānanda offers the cloth to the Buddha.
- <sup>379</sup> The question of a possible misrepresentation by Ānanda does not arise in the Bāhitika-sutta, where the Buddha just tells the other monks that it is a great gain for the king to have met Ānanda.
- <sup>380</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Paṭhamakosala-sutta, AN 10.29 at AN V 59.
- <sup>381</sup> The otherwise similar list in the Paṭhamakosala-sutta does not mention any sons of devas.
- <sup>382</sup> The sequence of topics differs in the Paṭhamakosala-sutta, which at this juncture lists the ten all-encompassing spheres (kaṣiṇas).
- <sup>383</sup> The association of the flowers with colors in the Paṭhamakosala-sutta differs.
- <sup>384</sup> Adopting the CBETA emendation of 大白 to 太白.
- <sup>385</sup> For the passage from here to the end of the discourse the Taishō edition offers two versions. The first version (800b19–25) is kept in the main text; the second (800c1–14) is given as an indented block at the beginning of register "c." The second version is the more coherent, despite the discrepancy mentioned in the following note 386. It is therefore adopted as the basis for the present translation.
- <sup>386</sup> The translation is based on emending "also inferior" to become "superior." In the Paṭhamakosala-sutta the pleasant and swift mode of progress is reckoned the best of the four.
- <sup>387</sup> Adopting a variant without 知.
- <sup>388</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Piyajātika-sutta, MN 87 at MN II 106; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 502–505.

- <sup>389</sup> In the Piyajātika-sutta Mallikā herself sends the brahmin to inquire about this statement by the Buddha.
- <sup>390</sup> Here and below, the Piyajātika-sutta separately takes up the case of a woman and of a man afflicted by the death of a close relative.
- <sup>391</sup> In the Piyajātika-sutta the brahmin reports the conversation to Mallikā.
- <sup>392</sup> In the Piyajātika-sutta those for whom the king feels affection are listed in a different sequence, namely: the princess Vajīrī, the queen Vāsabhā, the general Viḍūḍabha, Mallikā herself, and lastly Kāsi and Kosala. The minister Sirivaḍḍha and the king's elephant are not mentioned.
- <sup>393</sup> The Piyajātika-sutta does not report that King Pasenadi took refuge.
- <sup>394</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Aṭṭhakanāgara-sutta, MN 52 at MN I 349, which reports that Ānanda was staying at Beluvagāmakā near Vesālī; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 309–313.
- <sup>395</sup> The introductory narration to the Aṭṭhakanāgara-sutta is shorter, reporting only that the householder had come to Pāṭaliputta for some business and had then inquired from one monk where Ānanda is staying. It also differs in not referring to the Buddha's parinirvāṇa, though this event is implicit in its failure to mention the Buddha's whereabouts.
- <sup>396</sup> Instead of contemplation of dharma, the Aṭṭhakanāgara-sutta recommends reviewing the attainment as impermanent and conditioned.
- <sup>397</sup> The translation is based on emending 彼 to read 彼間, in line with the formulation usually employed in the Madhyama-āgama to describe the rebirth of a nonreturner.
- <sup>398</sup> The Aṭṭhakanāgara-sutta does not mention the attainment of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.
- <sup>399</sup> The twelve Dharma doors are the four jhānas, the four brahmavihāras, and the four immaterial spheres. The Aṭṭhakanāgara-sutta has eleven, as it does not refer to the sphere of neither-perception-nor-nonperception.
- <sup>400</sup> The Aṭṭhakanāgara-sutta does not mention that Ānanda handed the building over to the sangha.
- <sup>401</sup> Chizen Akanuma, The Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas & Pāli Nikāyas (1929) (Delhi: Sri Satguru, 1990), p. 25, lists as a parallel for MĀ 220 the Ayākata-sutta, AN 7.51 at AN IV 67. Yet this discourse differs substantially from MĀ 220. It features the Buddha and a monk, the topic is only the four undeclared questions regarding the tathāgata, and the issue at stake is not the Buddha's understanding of these, but rather the contrast between the worlding and the stream-enterer. This makes it safe to conclude that AN 7.51 and MĀ 220 are not parallels properly speaking.
- <sup>402</sup> Adopting the variant 見 instead of 具.

- <sup>403</sup> The formulation adopts the standard pericope, even though the Buddha, having already passed away, will no longer be able to accept the brahmin as a lay disciple.
- <sup>404</sup> The Pāli parallel is the Cūḷamālunkya-sutta, MN 63 at MN I 426; for a comparative study see Anālayo, A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya, pp. 353–355.
- <sup>405</sup> In the Cūḷamālunkya-sutta he even states before the Buddha that he will disrobe unless he receives a reply.

Appendix: Tables of Parallels

- <sup>406</sup> These two tables draw, in part, on earlier published tables of parallel discourses, especially Bhikkhu Anālayo and Roderick S. Bucknell, “Correspondence Table for Parallels to the Discourses of Majjhima Nikāya: Toward a Revision of Akanuma’s Comparative Catalogue,” Journal of the Centre for Buddhist Studies, Sri Lanka 4 (2006): 215–238. Such tables, particularly between Pāli and Chinese, are an increasingly widely used research tool for the study of Early Buddhism. The best-known example is Akanuma’s The Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas & Pāli Nikāyas. For a historical survey of such tables and catalogues, from their beginnings in 1883 to the present, see Roderick S. Bucknell, “Catalogues of Parallel Buddhist Sūtras in Pāli, Chinese, Sanskrit, and Other Languages,” in Proceedings of the 13th Wuyue Buddhist Academic Forum (Hangzhou: Hangzhou Buddhist Academy, 2016) pp. 427–441.
- <sup>407</sup> Twenty-one Madhyama-āgama discourses have no known Pāli parallel, namely: MĀ 7 (T I 427c/BDK I 38), MĀ 39 (T I 481b/BDK I 300), MĀ 54 (T I 489c/BDK I 343), MĀ 60 (T I 494b/BDK I 365), MĀ 65 (T I 506b/BDK I 422), MĀ 69 (T I 518c/BDK I 477), MĀ 80 (T I 551c/BDK II 87), MĀ 86 (T I 562a/BDK II 132), MĀ 92 (T I 574c/BDK II 188), MĀ 106 (T I 596b/BDK II 293), MĀ 139 (T I 646c/BDK III 108), MĀ 147 (T I 658a/BDK III 162), MĀ 148 (T I 659b/BDK III 167), MĀ 159 (T I 681c/BDK III 268), MĀ 168 (T I 700b/BDK III 353), MĀ 176 (T I 713c/BDK III 415), MĀ 177 (T I 716b/BDK III 428), MĀ 218 (T I 802c/BDK IV 359), MĀ 219 (T I 803a/BDK IV 360), MĀ 220 (T I 803c/BDK IV 362), MĀ 222 (T I 805c/BDK IV 371).
- <sup>408</sup> Roderick S. Bucknell, “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama from Gilgit vis-à-vis the Pāli Dīgha-nikāya,” in Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Dīrgha-āgama (Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2014), pp. 57–101.
- <sup>409</sup> The probable mechanism of this partial scattering is discussed in Bucknell, “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama,” pp. 86, 89–91.
- <sup>410</sup> Bucknell, “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama,” pp. 61–64.
- <sup>411</sup> See Jens-Uwe Hartmann and Klaus Wille, “The Manuscript of the Dīrghāgama and the Private Collection in Virginia,” in Paul Harrison and Jens-Uwe Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research (Wien: Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 2014), pp. 139–141.
- <sup>412</sup> Here, too, the analysis yields a viable explanation for this scattering; see Bucknell, “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama,” pp. 86–89.

Bibliography

- Akanuma, Chizen. The Comparative Catalogue of Chinese Āgamas & Pāli Nikāyas (1929). Delhi: Sri Satguru, 1990.
- Anālayo, Bhikkhu. A Comparative Study of the Majjhima-nikāya. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2011.
- . Madhyama-āgama Studies. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2012.
- . Perspectives on Satipaṭṭhāna, Cambridge: Windhorse, 2013.
- . “Selected Madhyama-āgama Discourse Passages and Their Pāli Parallels,” Dharma Drum Journal of Buddhist Studies 19 (2016): 1–61.
- . The Foundation History of the Nuns’ Order. Bochum: Projektverlag, 2016.
- . “The Luminous Mind in Theravāda and Dharmaguptaka Discourses,” Journal of the Oxford Centre for Buddhist Studies 13 (2017): 10–50.
- Anālayo, Bhikkhu, and Roderick S. Bucknell. “Correspondence Table for Parallels to the Discourses of the Majjhima Nikāya: Toward a Revision of Akanuma’s Comparative Catalogue,” Journal of the Centre for Buddhist Studies, Sri Lanka 4 (2006): 215–238.
- Bareau, André. Recherches sur la Biographie du Buddha dans les Sūtrapīṭaka et les Vinayapīṭaka Anciens: De la Quête de l’Éveil à la Conversion de Śāriputra et de Maudgalyāyana. Paris: École Française d’Extrême-Orient, 1963.
- Bingenheimer, Marcus. Studies in Āgama Literature, With Special Reference to the Shorter Chinese Saṃyuktāgama. Taiwan: Shin Weng Feng Print Co., 2011.
- Bodhi, Bhikkhu. The Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Anguttara Nikāya. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2012.
- Bucknell, Roderick S. “Catalogues of Parallel Buddhist Sūtras in Pali, Chinese, Sanskrit, and Other Languages,” in Proceedings of the 13th Wuyue Buddhist Academic Forum, pp. 427–441. Hangzhou: Hangzhou Buddhist Academy, 2016.
- . “Ekottarika-type Material in the Chinese Madhyama-āgama,” in Bhikkhunī Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Madhyama-āgama, pp. 77–112. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2017.
- . “Taking Account of the Indic Source-text,” in Konrad Meisig, ed., Translating Buddhist Chinese, Problems and Prospects, pp. 45–52. Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2010.

Bibliography

- . “The Structure of the Sanskrit Dīrgha-āgama from Gilgit vis-à-vis the Pali Dīgha-nikāya,” in Bhikkhunī Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Dīrgha-āgama, pp. 57–101. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2014.
- Chung, Jin-il, and Takamichi Fukita. A Survey of the Sanskrit Fragments Corresponding to the Chinese Madhyamāgama, Including References to Sanskrit Parallels, Citations, Numerical Categories of Doctrinal Concepts and Stock Phrases. Tokyo: Sankibo Press, 2011.
- Collett, Alice, and Bhikkhu Anālayo. “Bhikkhave and Bhikkhu as Gender-inclusive Terminology in Early Buddhist Texts,” Journal of Buddhist Ethics 21 (2014): 760–797.
- Feer, M. Léon, ed. The Saṃyutta-nikāya of the Sutta-pitaka. London: Pali Text Society, 1884.
- Hartmann, Jens-Uwe, and Klaus Wille. “The Manuscript of the Dīrghāgama and the Private Collection in Virginia,” in Paul Harrison and Jens-Uwe Hartmann, eds., From Birch Bark to Digital Data: Recent Advances in Buddhist Manuscript Research, pp. 137–155. Wien: Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 2014.
- Hirakawa, Akira. Buddhist Chinese-Sanskrit Dictionary. Tokyo: Reiyukai, 1997.
- Honjō, Yoshifumi. A Table of Āgama Citations in the Abhidharmakośa and the Abhidharmakośopāyikā. Kyoto: n.p., 1984.
- Meisig, Konrad. Das Sūtra von den vier Ständen, Das Aggañña-Sutta im Licht seiner chinesischen Parallelen. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1988.
- Ñāṇamoli, Bhikkhu. The Middle Length Discourses of the Buddha, A Translation of the Majjhima Nikāya (1995), Bhikkhu Bodhi, ed. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 2005.
- Norman, K. R. A Philological Approach to Buddhism: The Bukkyō Dendō Kyōkai Lectures, 1994. London: School of Oriental and African Studies, 1997.
- Pannasiri, Bhadanta. “Sigālovāda-Sutta,” Visva-Bharati Annals 3 (1950): 150–228.
- Pradhan, Prahlad. Abhidharmakośabhāṣya of Vasubandhu. Patna: K. P. Jayaswal Research Institute, 1967.
- Rhys Davids, T. W., and William Stede. Pali-English Dictionary (1921). Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1993.
- Silverlock, Blair Alan. “An Edition and Study of the Gosiga-sutra, The Cow-horn Discourse (Senior Collection Scroll no. 12): An Account of the Harmonious Aṇurudha Monks,” Ph.D thesis, University of Syney, 2015.
- Strauch, Ingo. “The Bajaur Collection of Kharoṣṭhī Manuscripts: Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī and the Order of Nuns in a Gandhāran Version of the Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra,” in

- Alice Collett, ed., Women in Early Indian Buddhism: Comparative Textual Studies, pp. 17–45. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2014.
- . “The Indic Versions of the *Dakṣiṇāvibhaṅgasūtra: Some Thoughts about the Early Transmission of Buddhist Āgama Texts,” in Bhikkhunī Dhammadinnā, ed., Research on the Madhyama-āgama, pp. 327–373. Taipei: Dharma Drum Publishing Corporation, 2017.
- Watanabe, Fumimaro. “Logical Arguments in the Dialogues (Suttas),” Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies 20/2 (1972): 988–976.
- Wogihara, Unrai. Sphuṭārthā Abhidharmakośavyākhyā by Yaśomitra, Part II. Tokyo: The Publishing Association of Abhidharmakośavyākhyā, 1936.

Index

A

Abhidharmakośopāyikāṭikā, 392 abiding, 65, 77, 329, 428n55

happy, 71–74, 107–108, 331–332 tranquil/in tranquility, 17–18, 23, 27–30, 68, 125–127

absorption(s), four, 374–375, 384,

428nn57, 63; 438n233, 440n265,

442nn300–301

first, 65, 87–88, 108, 254, 281–282, 295,

300, 430n96, 434n150, 438n232,

443n320

fourth, 6, 27, 45, 56, 87–89, 108, 157,

233, 247, 255, 283, 300, 312, 357,

360, 375, 384, 434nn150, 151;

438n233, 439n259, 442n301

second, 88, 108, 233, 254, 281–282

third, 88–89, 108, 233, 254, 282

See also concentration(s)

Aciravata, 150–159, 434n147 affection, 142–143, 350–355

affliction(s), 6, 45, 100, 109–110, 157–

158, 195, 247, 300

āgama(s), 393

Dīrgha-āgama, 393–394

Samyukta-āgama, 393

See also Madhyama-āgama; nikaya(s)/

Nikāyas; Pāli texts

Ajita, 46–47, 427n37

Ajita Kesakambalī, 264–265, 272–273

Ālāra Kālāma, 239, 242, 438nn241–242

alms/almsround, 24–25, 63, 77, 79, 80,

245, 262, 268, 271, 441n292

ambrosia, 266, 270, 335

Ānanda, 13–14, 18–19, 50–52, 58–75,

129–143, 235–236, 249–254, 256–

257, 316, 325–326, 328, 336–345,

356–359, 363–365, 427n39, 428n54,

432n128, 438n238, 440n269,

446nn372, 374–375, 378–379;

447nn394–395, 400

Aṅga, 3, 8, 77, 220, 264

animal(s)/bird(s)/insects, 17, 22, 41, 167–

170, 212–213, 229, 434n164,

435n167, 438n226

alligators, 168

bear, 79

bull, 79

camels, 168

cat, 99, 430n85

cattle/cow(s), 43, 47, 59, 168, 211, 228,

237, 343

chickens, 43, 169

crane, 369

crow(s), 82–83, 169, 228–229

deer, 79, 168, 246–248, 331–332, 368–

369 dog(s), 47, 79, 169, 228

donkeys, 168

elephant(s), 43, 47, 59, 79, 81–82, 84–

85, 151, 153–158, 168, 231, 237,

322, 337–338, 343, 354, 434nn149,

151–152; 447n392

fish: timis, timinṅgalas, and timirapin-

galas, 168, 434n165

fleas, 157–158

- animal(s)/bird(s)/insects (continued):
 flies/gadflies, 157–158
 glowworm/worm(s), 167–168, 277–279, 285–287
 goose, 44
 jackals, 169
julengjia and julouluo, 169, 435n167
kunji bird, 369
 horse(s), 43, 47, 59, 79, 84–85, 93, 114–115, 151, 168, 231, 237, 322, 343 leopard, 79
 mosquitoes, 157–158
 owl(s), 228–229
 ox/oxen, 47, 59, 79, 151, 322, 368–369
piaofang bird, 369
 pig(s)/swine, 43, 168–169
 sea monsters (makaras), 168
 sheep, 43, 59, 170, 237, 343
 snake(s)/serpents, 47, 59, 79, 160, 168, 172, 179–182, 230–231, 438n229 tiger, 79
 tortoises/turtle, 168–170, 220
 vulture, 177, 187, 369
 water buffalo, 168
 Aṅguttarāpans, 437n222
 annihilation/annihilationism, 189, 350, 435nn182–183
 Anuruddha, 13–15, 18, 20, 24–31, 359–363, 426nn16, 21
 Āpaṇa, 77, 437n222
 arahant(s)/arahantship, 53–54, 56–57, 206, 212–215, 217–218, 291, 334, 431n116, 437n212, 442n314
 asceticism/ascetic practices, 207, 242, 244, 442n299
 Assaji, 116–120, 127, 431nn108–109, 432n119
 Assaka, 220
 Assapura, 3, 8
 Avantī, 220
asuras, 315, 318
 attachment, 36–37, 40, 62, 70, 72, 115, 129–131, 155, 167–169, 187, 209, 215–216, 224, 226, 237, 244–247, 281, 320–321, 330, 332–336, 341, 343, 356–358, 363–364, 372–389
 Aṭṭhaka, 204–205, 263
 Aṭṭhakanāgara, 355–356, 358–359 awakening, 29, 36, 70, 240–242, 245, 253, 334, 337, 339, 342, 360, 371, 439n246 full/right/unsurpassable, 64, 87, 129, 130–131, 191, 208, 238, 242–243, 430n87, 432n128 requisites of, 242, 245 factors, seven, 133, 377–378, 386–387
B becoming, 7, 11–13, 45, 70–72, 74, 188, 198–199, 201–202, 205, 209–210, 306, 380, 444n340
 Beluvagāmaka, 447n394
 Benares, 242–243, 347–348, 439n250
See also Kāsi
 Bhaddālī, 101–115
 birth(s), 7, 12, 29, 36–38, 41, 45, 53, 62, 70–72, 74, 109–110, 125–126, 170, 188, 198–199, 201–202, 205, 209–210, 234, 242, 244–245, 248, 256, 273–274, 288–289, 344, 360, 370, 380 birth and death, 64, 86–87, 109–110, 188, 289, 438n239
See also rebirth
 birth status, 276, 284–285
See also caste(s)/class birth stories, 180–182
See also teachings
 Bodhisattva, 438nn241–242; 439nn245–246
See also Buddha
 bondage, 36–37, 85–86, 133, 187, 290, 306, 440n272

Brahmā(s), 32, 35, 57–58, 155, 189, 216,
 320, 326–327, 346, 437n216,
 439n247, 445n360
deva(s), 31
 heaven, 56, 107, 214, 279, 354 wheel, 57–58
 world(s), 17, 22, 346
brahmavihāras, 425n11, 426n23
 four, 429n83, 430n86, 447n399
See also four higher states of mind;
 mind that is boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated
 brahmin(s), 3, 7, 12–13, 32, 35, 46–48,
 57–58, 71–72, 78, 104, 155, 176, 189,
 207, 222–223, 235–236, 241, 264,
 276–277, 284–285, 289, 318–324,
 327, 330–333, 338–339, 341, 350–
 354, 359, 363–365, 368–369, 428n52,
 435n166, 437n223, 445n367,
 447nn389, 391; 448n403
See also caste(s)/class
 Brick House, 24
 buddha(s), xiv, 72, 155, 209, 215–216, 247, 281, 372–389
See also tathāgata(s)
 Buddha, 3, 8, 13, 18, 22–24, 26–27, 30,
 32, 36, 46, 48–52, 58, 63, 70, 73, 75,
 77, 81–82, 84–85, 90–91, 97–99, 101–
 104, 111, 113–118, 129–130, 133,
 142–144, 149, 151, 159, 161, 173,
 177–178, 184, 186–187, 190–193, 195,
 199–204, 206, 209–211, 216, 222–224,
 228–231, 233–237, 249–251, 256–257,
 262–263, 270–271, 280, 283–284, 288,
 291, 302, 315–318, 325, 328–337,
 344–345, 350–351, 353–355, 359, 361,
 363, 365–366, 371, 390, 426n21,
 427nn37, 39; 428nn54–55, 62;
 429nn67, 71, 76, 78; 430nn89, 91–93;
 431nn103–104, 109, 111–112;
 432nn119–120, 127–128; 434n147,

435nn173, 175; 436nn187, 189;
 437n221, 438nn236, 238; 439nn247,
 250, 252, 254–255; 440nn262, 269,
 275–278; 441nn285, 287–288, 292–
 294; 442nn297–298, 304–305, 309;
 443n331, 445nn355–358, 360, 363;
 446nn371–372, 378–379; 447nn389,
 395, 401; 448nn403, 405
See also Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha;
 Gotama; Tathāgata; Well-gone One;
 World-honored One
 Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, 125–126,
 234–235, 270, 330, 332–336, 355, 365
C
 Campa, 143
 caste(s)/class, 276–277, 284–285, 368– 369
 four, 319–324, 327
See also brahmin(s); merchant(s);
 warrior(s); worker(s)
 causality/causes and conditions, 58, 109–
 110, 192, 194, 269, 273–275, 305, 311–313
 celibacy, 42, 213
 cemetery, 6, 45, 296, 309
See also charnel ground cessation, 39–40, 56, 69–70, 88–89, 108,
 202–205, 210, 233, 253, 255–256,
 258, 261–262, 269, 283, 293, 295–
 298, 300–301, 305, 307, 309–311,
 362, 374, 377–378, 383, 386–387,
 426n24, 428n50, 429n75, 436n200,
 439n259, 443nn318, 326; 444n341
 of dukkha, 6, 45, 110, 207, 234, 247,
 304, 306, 321, 350, 371, 436n187
 of the taints, 7, 45, 110, 234, 248, 357– 358, 360
 total/without remainder, 228–233, 257
See also nirvana
 Ceti, 220

charnel ground, 350–351

See also cemetery

Chinese (language/text), xiii–xiv, 392–

393, 395, 409, 441n285, 448n406

clansman/clansmen/clanswoman, 12, 24–

25, 30–32, 81–82, 84–85, 90, 181–182, 220–222, 241, 334

clinging, 36–40, 69–70, 101, 126–128,

186, 188, 198–199, 201–203, 205,

209–210, 237, 249–252, 256, 292–293, 380, 427n31

cloth/clothes, 12, 18, 23–25, 134–135,

160, 172, 212, 217, 232, 316, 343, 353, 446n378

bāhitika, 337, 343–344

Benares, 347–348

white, 211, 222, 228, 234, 277, 285

See also lay disciple(s)/follower, white-clothed; robe(s)

Collection of Middle-length Discourses, 394–395

See also Madhyama-āgama

Collection of Long Discourses, 395

See also āgama(s): Dīrgha-āgama;

nikāya(s)/Nikāyas: Dīgha-nikāya,

compassion, 11, 28, 41, 50–51, 73–75,

96–100, 212–213, 236, 338, 357, 362

comprehension, 321–322, 425n3, 434n148

right, 5–6, 11, 16, 21, 44–45, 65, 67–70,

80, 88, 108, 134–135, 233, 254, 282

concentration, 6, 16, 21, 45, 65, 67–69,

71, 74–75, 80, 88, 108, 217–218, 233,

254, 258, 260–262, 281–282, 294–

298, 309–312, 374–378, 383, 385–

387, 425n10, 439n243, 443nn319, 321

right, 53, 56, 245, 288, 294, 350, 378,

387, 427n45

signless, 61–62, 312–313

See also absorptions, four; meditation conduct, 41–42, 72, 79, 155, 169, 170,

209, 215–216, 224–227, 247, 281,

339, 342, 372–389, 435n168,

437n212, 446n377

bodily, 3–6, 109–110, 160–161, 167–

171, 173, 176, 274–275, 303, 338–

339, 341–342, 425n2

mental, 4–6, 109–110, 160–161, 167–

171, 173, 176, 274–275, 303,

446n377

verbal, 4–6, 109–110, 160–161, 167–

171, 173, 176, 274–275, 303,

446n377

See also moral conduct/morality

consciousness, 36–37, 40–41, 45, 69–70,

189, 191–194, 197–198, 200–202,

204–205, 255, 292–293, 296, 304,

309, 380, 444nn336–337, 342

eye, 39, 194

mind, 39, 194–195

See also sphere(s), of boundless/infinite consciousness contemplation, 428n50, 440nn263, 265;

447n396

See also directed awareness and sustained contemplation; meditation continents: Aparagoyāna, Jambudīpa,

Pubbavideha, Uttarakuru, 346

craving, 85–86, 151–153, 188, 198–203,

205, 209–210, 243, 258, 260, 269,

306, 380, 437n208, 443n318,

444nn340–341

See also desire(s)

Cuṇḍa, 129–131

D

Dasama, 356, 358–359

deathless, 243, 262, 358–359

defilement(s), 6, 8, 36–37, 45, 69, 109–

110, 213, 234, 237–242, 244–245,

247–248, 257–261, 425nn9–10

five, 257, 259, 261

delusion(s), 53, 56, 115, 190, 274, 303

- dependent arising, 69, 71, 259, 261, 436n200
- desire(s), 5, 33–34, 36–37, 44, 69, 71, 92, 153, 155–156, 190, 224, 226, 244, 261, 299–300, 303, 340, 343, 440n272
- for the Dharma, 357–358
- evil, 8–11, 134, 139
- sensual/sexual, 6–7, 11, 27, 33–34, 42, 45, 53, 56, 62, 68–69, 87–88, 108, 110, 157, 213, 234, 247–252, 254, 258, 260, 281–282, 300, 312, 357, 360, 375, 384, 435n175, 438n232
- desireless/desirelessness, 68, 311, 443n326, 444n349
- destiny:
- bad, 8, 11, 161, 170–171, 224–227
  - good, 173, 175–176, 191
- See also* rebirth
- deva(s), 31–32, 57–58, 72, 107, 115, 131–132, 134–135, 155, 158, 189–191, 209, 215–222, 224–227, 242–243, 247, 279, 281–282, 287, 315, 318, 320, 324, 326, 350, 372–389, 426n25, 442n302, 445n358, 446n381
- Brahmā, 31
- of Radiance, 346
- Sakka, 346
- of the Thirty-three, 31, 219–221, 325–326, 346
- Tusita, 31, 219–221, 346
- who delight in creating, 31, 219–222, 346
- who wield power over other's creations, 31, 219–220, 222, 346
- Yāma, 31, 219–221, 346
- See also* Four Heavenly Kings; heaven(s)
- Dhammadinnā, 443nn317, 331
- Dhammanandā, 291–302
- dharma(s), 56, 155–156, 357–358, 361, 372, 377, 381, 386–387, 447n396
- Dharma, 3, 14, 16, 19, 21, 24–25, 30, 32–35, 42, 49–52, 55, 57–58, 65, 70, 72, 74–75, 93, 104–105, 112–113, 119–121, 125–128, 133–134, 136–138, 140–142, 144–151, 155–157, 177–180, 191–195, 197, 206–207, 216–217, 234, 236–237, 239–243, 250, 257, 260, 266, 268–269, 291, 302, 316, 328–330, 332–337, 345, 356–358, 426n22, 428n61, 433nn135, 141; 445n370
- assembly, 48–49
- doors, 358–359, 447n399
- eye, 234, 291
- follower, 105, 126, 431–432n117, 432n118, 436n190
- friends, 246–247
- higher/highest aspect, 16, 21, 35, 426n19
- noble/sublime, 46, 103–104, 106, 114, 116–119, 208, 224, 228, 233, 246–247, 292, 306
- path of, 72, 209, 215–216, 247, 281, 372–389
- teacher(s), 16, 21, 128, 155
- true/ultimate, 34, 49, 74–75, 128, 156, 195, 208, 269–270, 290–291
- wheel of, 243
- See also* Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha
- Dīgha, 30–32
- Dīgha Kārāyaṇa, 328–329
- diligence, 70, 74, 124–127, 134–135, 428n61
- directed awareness and sustained contemplation, 87–88, 108, 233, 254, 281–282, 295, 300, 438n232
- disciple(s), xiii, 13, 34–35, 46–47, 52–53, 70–72, 74–75, 104, 107–108, 113–114, 127–131, 133, 155–159, 185–186, 206, 209, 212–220, 224–235, 246–247, 262, disciple(s) (continued):

264–271, 273–275, 283–284, 288, 290,
292, 320–321, 330–336, 341, 343,
345–346, 348–349, 352, 355–358,
427n42, 432n120, 434n154, 438nn233,
236; 441nn280, 285, 288

See also lay disciple(s)/follower;
monk(s); renunciant(s)

discipline, 34, 49, 106, 128–131, 133,
136–138, 140–141, 144–151, 224,
228, 233, 269–270, 359, 433n135

See also rule(s)

disputation, 131, 140–141, 143
six roots of, 133–134

divine, 175

ear/hearing, 29, 360

eye, 15, 20, 109, 242, 274–276, 425n5,
438n234

See also flower(s), divine

dukkha, 6, 45, 86, 110, 129–131, 207, 234,
247, 269, 304–305, 371, 435n185,
436n187

arising of, 6, 45, 110, 199, 201–202, 209, 234, 247, 269, 304–305, 371

cessation/ending/eradicating, 6, 45,
110, 143, 190–191, 205, 207, 210,
234, 247, 269, 304–306, 321, 350,
371, 436n187

great mass of, 41, 199, 201–202, 205, 209–210, 370

See also four (noble) truths; suffering(s)

E

earthquake, 437n208

Eastern Hall, 316–317, 329

eightfold path, 52, 133, 245, 294, 350,
378, 387–388, 443n318

Ekaṇḍarīka (elephant), 337, 354

emptiness, 58–63, 65–67, 311, 428n51

eons of world expansion and contraction, 109, 273–274

equanimity, 11, 28, 88–89, 96, 100, 108, 233, 254–255, 282–283, 300, 357,
362, 377, 386–387, 438n233

evil(s), 58, 71–74, 79, 95, 107, 112, 134, 139, 141, 159, 161, 173, 180, 191,
195, 254, 321, 339, 342, 350

conduct/deeds, 53–54, 79, 109, 159–161, 164–171, 193, 274–275

desire(s), 8–11, 134, 139

inclination/intent/motive/thought(s), 33, 68, 159, 206, 215–220

qualities, 159–160, 172

state(s), 5–7, 12–13, 27, 44–45, 51, 56–
57, 68–72, 74, 77–78, 87–88, 108,
120–124, 157, 208–209, 215–220,
228–233, 243, 247–248, 254, 281–
282, 300, 312, 357, 360, 372–373,
375, 382, 384, 438n232

view, 117–119, 177–178, 191–193

Evil One. See Māra

extinction, 39–40, 69, 71, 184

eye of wisdom, 356–358

See also Dharma, eye; divine, eye

F

faith/faithful, 12, 32, 41, 70–71, 78, 83, 85, 92, 105, 112–113, 125–128, 141,
155, 191, 219–220, 235, 238–240,
243, 320, 322, 329–330, 332–337,
375–377, 385–386, 431–432n117,
432n118, 436n190, 445nn366, 370

fear(s)/fearful, 33–34, 41, 58, 108, 115,
158, 161, 173, 184–186, 188, 435n183

fearlessness, 234

Feer, M. Léon, 392

fetter(s), 8–11, 14, 19, 28, 86, 90, 96–100,
190–191, 249, 251, 357, 362, 429n71

five lower, 188, 190, 249–253, 357–358

five aggregates, 36–37, 69–70, 292, 293,
427n31, 435n185, 436n188, 440n265

five faculties, 133, 375–376, 384–385, 432n118, 439n243 five monks of Deer Park, 242, 244–247, 439n252 five heinous crimes, 436n202
See also offense(s), grave/serious; transgression flower(s)/grass, 12, 43, 50, 97, 152–153, 168, 182–183, 190, 194, 214–215, 241, 254, 288, 290, 323–324, 434n164, 436n189, 446n383
 divine, 14–17, 19–22
kaṇṇikāra, 348
See also tree(s)
 forests(s)/gardens/grove(s)/park(s), 3, 6, 8, 24–26, 45, 50, 59–60, 71–74, 77, 93, 107, 116, 129, 150, 152–158, 222, 231, 234, 241, 251–252, 262, 271, 328, 336, 429n80, 438n230, 441n292
 Anāthapiṇḍika's Park, 36, 91, 101, 159, 177, 191, 249, 257, 284, 291, 337–338, 345, 350, 359, 361, 365, 371
 Bamboo Grove, 149, 262, 270, 302, 363
 Deer Park, 242–243
 Eastern Park, 46, 58, 211, 235, 337–338
 Gosīṅga sāla forest, 13–25
 Jeta's Grove, 36, 91, 101, 159, 177, 190–191, 249, 257, 284, 291, 337–338, 345, 350–351, 359, 361, 365, 371, 426n26, 427n40, 436n188, 438n237, 443n332
 Kaṇṇakattḥala Grove, 315, 317
 Nigrodha Park, 63
 Pāvārika's Mango Grove, 222
 Peacocks' Grove, 262, 271
 Rooster's Park, 355–356, 359
 Squirrels' Sanctuary, 149, 262, 270, 302, 363
See also mountain(s); tree(s) forest-dweller, 16, 21
See also renunciant(s)

Four Heavenly Kings, 31, 219–221, 346
See also deva(s)
 four higher states of mind, 74, 108
See also brahmavihāras, four four nutriments, 37–38, 197, 427n32 four right efforts, 133, 295, 372–373, 381–382 fruit(s), 179–180, 232–233, 441n285 bilva, 268
See also tree(s)

G

Gabled Hall, 356
gandhabba(s), 208, 315, 318
 Ghāṭa, 63
 Gilgit, 394
 going beyond, 11, 28–29, 88–90, 257
 Gotama, 47–48, 104, 189, 207, 223–224, 228–231, 233, 243–245, 263–267, 270–289, 315–321, 323–324, 326–327, 332–334, 350–355, 363–364 five qualities of, 266–270, 441n283
See also Buddha; World-honored One

H

Hall of Migāra's Mother, 46, 58–59, 211, 235, 337–338
 Hartmann, Jens-Uwe, 394
 hatred, 93–96, 111, 189–190, 224, 226–227, 249–252
 heaven(s)/heavenly, 110, 173, 176, 274–275, 324, 326, 435n170, 436n190, 440n272
See also Four Heavenly Kings hell(s), 109, 161, 163–167, 170–171, 224–227, 274–275
 Great Hell, 434n162
 Six Sensory Contacts, 167
 heterodox practitioner(s)/renunciants, 46–47, 104, 197, 235, 243, 249–250,

heterodox practitioner(s)/renunciants
(continued):
262–264, 266, 270–272, 274, 276–289,
291, 363–365

See also view(s), heterodox hindrance(s), 69, 71, 258, 260

five, 6, 45, 247, 281, 372–389, 425n10,
434n148

holy life, 3–4, 7, 12, 14, 18–19, 26–27, 29, 36–41, 45–46, 50–51, 53, 62, 71–74,
107, 110–112, 125–126, 142–143, 155,
180, 188, 195, 224–227, 234, 239, 242,
244–245, 248, 256, 258, 260, 283–284,
288–289, 291, 301, 320, 324–326,
330–332, 334, 337, 360, 365–371 homeless, 12, 32, 41, 83, 85, 92, 141, 155

See also renunciant(s)

householder(s)/household life, 12, 71–74,
78, 83–85, 92, 141, 155–156, 176, 222–
235, 238, 356–359, 445n367, 447n395
See also lay disciple(s)/follower

I

identity, 185–186, 249–252

See also self

ignorance, 7, 11, 45, 62, 109–110, 188,
198, 201–202, 204–205, 234, 248,
299–301, 306, 340, 343, 371–380,
444n341

“I” and “mine,” 70, 185–187

See also identity; personality; self

Indra, 189

insight/insightful, 15, 19, 125–127, 132,
306, 380, 389–390, 425n11, 428n50,
432n129, 440n263

Īsāna, 189

Isidatta, 335–336

J

jewel(s), 343
agate, 220

beryl, 220

bīṅglēi and bīṅgliú, 220

coral, 220

gold/golden, 43–44, 84–85, 220, 232, 277, 285, 343

jade, 220

liúshào, 220

mañi-, 220

pearl, 220

rāṅggā, 220

ruby, 220

silver, 43–44, 220

tortoise shell, 220

See also treasure(s)

jhāna(s), 440n263, 442n302

four, 447n399

Jīvasena, Prince, 150–153

K

Kaccāna/Mahākaccāna, 15–16, 18, 20–21, 284–290

Kāḷakhemaka, 63

Kālī, 94–95

Kāḷudāyin, 77

Kamboja, 220

Kammāsadhamma, 32, 52

Kapilavatthu, 63

karma, 58

Kāsi, 116–117, 119–220, 243, 354–355,
447n392

See also Benares

Kassapa/Mahākassapa, 13–14, 16, 18,
21–22, 426n18

Kimbila, 24–27, 30–31

Kīṭāgiri, 116–117

knowledge(s), 6, 17, 22, 29, 33–40, 45, 51–54, 69, 71–72, 74–75, 109–110,
155, 209, 215–218, 235, 240–242,
245, 247, 258, 261, 269, 272–273,
281, 301, 306, 372–389, 443n330

of the arising/birth/rebirth and death/passing away of beings, 29, 109– 110, 360
complete/wide/unsurpassable, 39, 49, 269, 272–273
of dispassion, 151–153
of the destruction/eradication of the taints, 110–111, 234, 247, 270,
425n5, 438n234
of the divine ear, 29
of the divine eye, 425n5, 438n234
final, 101, 126–128, 289, 430–
431n100, 432n119
of former/past existences/lives, 29, 109,
270, 360, 425n5, 438n234
of having established the holy life, 36– 41, 46
higher, 109–110, 247, 270, 425n5,
426n24, 434n150, 438n234,
441n289, 442n303
of the minds of others, 29, 360
right, 51, 56–57, 115, 208, 216,
427n45, 428n46
wrong, 51, 57
Kosala, 220, 264, 315–321, 323–329,
336–345, 352–355, 447n392
Koṭṭhita/Mahākoṭṭhita, 302–313,
443n333
Kuru(s), 32, 52, 220

L

lay disciple(s)/follower, 234–235, 270,
333, 355, 365, 442n314, 448n403
female, 65, 73–74, 104, 268, 291–302 male, 65, 73–74, 104, 268, 443n317 white-clothed, 129–131
layman, 222, 224, 234, 330
liberation(s), 37, 69, 71, 86, 217–218,
258, 261, 372–389, 427n42, 428n63,
441n289, 443n330
eight, 124

full/total/without remainder, 37–38,
248, 434n153
of the mind, 29, 62–65, 73, 125–126,
208–209, 248, 305–306, 356–358, 360 right/supreme, 56, 300, 427n45, 428n46 through wisdom, 29, 125–126, 208–209,
248, 305–306, 360
“Liberation by the Destruction of Craving,” 210
livelihood, 4–6, 155, 238, 335, 355
right, 53, 55–56, 294, 427n45
wrong, 55–56
loving-kindness, 11, 26–27, 28, 41, 74–
75, 96–100, 142, 212–213, 357, 361–
362

M

Madhyama-āgama, xiii–xiv, 391–395,
409, 423, 447n397, 448n407
See also āgama(s); nikāya(s)/Nikāyas:
Majjhima-nikāya
Magadha, 220, 264
Mahābrahmā. See Brahmā
Mahāmoggallāna/Moggallāna, 16–18, 22–23
Makkhali Gosāla, 264–265, 272
Māluṅkyaputta, 249–250, 367
Malla, 220
Mallikā, Queen, 352, 354–355, 447nn389, 391–392
māra(s), 32, 35, 57–58, 155, 320
Māra, 70, 246–247
Medaḷumpa, 328–329, 336
meditation, 15, 19, 25, 33, 46, 49–52, 58,
69, 71–74, 77–78, 107, 144, 150–153,
235, 258–261, 303, 328, 336, 359,
361, 366, 426n22
concentrative, 15, 19–20
walking, 46, 48, 68, 317, 329
See also concentration

Index

- merchant(s), 176, 276–277, 284–285,
 319–324, 368–369
See also caste(s)/class, four merit(s)/meritorious, 78, 161, 173, 222, 305, 344
 exceptional/superior, 324–326 field of, 115, 158, 206, 216, 218, 264
 great, 3, 8, 17, 22, 30, 32, 113, 212,
 279, 287, 431n102
 Migāra's mother. See Hall of Migāra's
 Mother; Visākhā
 mind that is boundless, exalted, immeasurable, and well-cultivated, 11, 28,
 96–100, 357, 362
See also brahmavihāras, four; four higher states of mind
 mindfulness, 6, 24, 44–45, 54–56, 88–
 89, 93, 108, 208–209, 233, 254–255,
 282–283, 300, 375–377, 385–387,
 439n243
 four establishments of, 133, 155–156, 295, 371–372, 381
 right, 11, 16, 21, 53–56, 65, 80, 88,
 108, 134–135, 233, 254, 282, 294,
 427n45
 Moliya Phagguṇa, 91–92, 429n78
 monk(s), 3–6, 8, 9–10, 13–25, 32, 36–41,
 46, 48–56, 58–61, 63–70, 73–75, 77–
 107, 111–121, 124–127, 129, 131–133,
 136–151, 155–157, 159, 161–171,
 173–180, 183–197, 199–210, 220, 222,
 234–237, 247–250, 254, 256–257, 259,
 261–262, 264, 268, 270, 282–283,
 290–291, 296–298, 300, 302, 309–312,
 317, 326, 329–331, 333–334, 336–337,
 344–350, 355–356, 359–363, 365, 368,
 371, 390, 427nn35, 37, 39; 429n68,
 430nn87, 95; 430–431n100, 432nn119,
 126–128; 433nn134–135, 137–138;
 435nn171, 173; 436nn188–189;
 437n208, 438n238, 440nn269, 275;
 446nn372, 379; 447nn395, 401
See also disciple(s); five monks of Deer Park; renunciant(s); sangha
 Monkey Lake, 356
 moral conduct/morality, 11, 69, 71, 107, 132, 143, 156, 238, 258, 260, 361,
 432n129, 438n241
 mountain(s), 6, 45, 59, 71–74, 107, 152–
 153, 160, 163, 166, 173–175, 182,
 241, 253, 440n264
 Elephant Peak Mountain, 241
 Himalaya, 163, 174–175
 Sumeru, 346
See also forests(s)/gardens/grove(s)/ park(s)
- ## N
- Nādikā, 24
 Nagaraka, 58, 328
 Nālanda, 222
 Nālijaṅgha, 352–354
 Nandiya, 24–26, 30–31
 Ñātaputta, 129–131, 133, 264–265, 272,
 432n130, 442n296
 Nigaṇṭha(s), 129–131, 133, 211–212,
 264–265, 272, 442n296
 nikāya(s)/Nikāyas, 391, 393
Āṅguttara-nikāya, 417
Dīgha-nikāya, 393–394, 409
Khuddaka-nikāya, 391, 423
Majjhima-nikāya, 392–394, 410
Saṃyutta-nikāya, 392–394, 416
See also āgama(s)
 nirvana, 83–84, 108, 142–143, 237–242,
 244–245, 248, 253, 262, 301, 337,
 339, 341–343, 349–350, 371, 430n96,
 443n330
 final, 188, 190, 256, 355, 357–358, 363
 noble one(s), 7, 12–13, 87–89, 108–110,

143, 233, 254, 274–275, 282, 291–301, 315–318, 352–353, 361 nonreturn/nonreturner/nonreturning, 100, 126–128, 190, 217–218, 357–358, 430n87, 440n266, 447n397 novice(s), 129–131, 150–151, 159, 344, 432n126 nun(s), 65, 73–74, 91–92, 104, 257, 259, 261, 268, 291–302, 344, 429n78, 443n317

O

offense(s), 133, 137–140, 142, 180, 195
 grave/serious, 133, 141, 180
See also five heinous crimes; transgression offering(s), 53–54, 78, 115, 158, 336, 359
 omniscience/omniscient, 133, 272–273, 315, 327, 427n38, 432n130, 441n295, 442n296 once-return/once-returning, 190, 217–218

P

Pakudha Kaccāyana, 264–265, 272
 Pāli, xiii–xiv, 391–395, 409, 423, 425nn1, 7; 426nn14, 20, 26; 426–427n29, 427n36, 40; 428nn47, 49, 53; 429nn65, 77; 430n88, 431nn101, 106; 432n122, 433n145, 434n155, 435n172, 436n191, 437nn209, 216, 222; 438nn236–237, 440nn261, 270, 274; 441n291, 442n306, 443nn316, 332; 445nn354, 358, 361; 446nn373, 380, 388; 447n394, 448nn404, 406–407
 Pāli texts:
Adhamma-sutta, 427nn36, 39
Ajita-sutta, 427nn36–37, 39
Alagaddūpama-sutta, 435nn172–175, 177, 180–183, 185; 436nn187–190
Ariyapariyesanā-sutta, 438nn237–239,

241–242; 439nn243, 245–247, 249–250, 252–255, 258–259
Aṭṭhakanāgara-sutta, 447nn394–396, 398–400
Avyākata-sutta, 447n401
Bāhītika-sutta, 446nn373–375, 377–379
Bahudhātuka-sutta, xiv
Bālapaṇḍita-sutta, 434nn155–156, 158, 163–164; 435nn166, 168–171
Bhaddāli-sutta, 430nn88–93, 95, 96; 430–431n100, 431nn101–104
Cetokhila-sutta, 440nn270–272
Chabbisodhana-sutta, 426–427n29, 427nn30–32, 35
Cūḷa-assapura-sutta, 425nn7–8, 10–12; 426n13
Cūḷagosīṅga-sutta, 426nn20–25
Cūḷamālunkya-sutta, 448nn404–405
Cūḷasakuludāyi-sutta, 441nn291–295; 442nn296–305
Cūlasuññata-sutta, 428nn47, 48, 50–52
Cūḷavedalla-sutta, 443nn316–321, 323–327, 329–331; 444nn346–349
Dantabhūmi-sutta, 433n145, 434nn147–154
Dhammacetiya-sutta, 445nn361, 363, 366–368, 370; 446nn371–372
Ekottarika, 394
Kakacūpama-sutta, 429nn77–80, 83, 84; 430nn85–87
Kaṇṇakattthala-sutta, 445nn354–358, 360
Kīṭāgiri-sutta, 431nn106, 108–116; 432nn118–121
Laṭṭukikopama-sutta, 429nn65–69, 71, 75, 76
Mahā-assapura-sutta, 425nn1–6
Mahācattārīsaka-sutta, 427nn40–45; 428n46
Mahāgosīṅga-sutta, 426nn14–17, 19; 439n246

Pāli texts (continued):

- Mahāmālunkya-sutta*, 440nn261–266, 268, 269
- Mahāsakuludāyi-sutta*, 440nn274–278; 441nn280–283, 285, 287–290
- Mahāsuññata-sutta*, 428nn53–57, 59–63
- Mahātaṇhāsāṅkhaya-sutta*, 436nn191, 193, 196, 200, 202; 437nn205, 207–208
- Mahāvagga*, 433n144
- Mahāvedalla-sutta*, 443nn320, 323–325, 331–333; 444nn334, 336–345, 350, 352–353
- Paṭhamakosala-sutta*, 446nn380–383, 386
- Piyajātika-sutta*, 446n388, 447nn389–393
- Potaliya-sutta*, 437nn222–225, 438nn226–231, 233–236
- Salāyatana-samyutta*, 393
- Salāyatana-vagga*, 393
- Sāmagāma-sutta*, 432nn122, 126–128, 130–132; 432–433n133, 433nn135, 137–138, 140–141, 143
- Sandaka-sutta*, 427n38
- Upālīpucchā*, 433n144
- Uposatha-sutta*, 437nn209, 212–213, 215–216, 218, 221
- Vekhanassa-sutta*, 442nn306, 308–309, 311, 313–314
- Vīmaṃsaka-sutta*, 426nn26–27
- Pañcāla, 220
- Paṇḍita, 46–48, 427n37
- parinirvāṇa*, 447n395
- See also* nirvana
- Pasenadi, King, 315–321, 323–329, 336–345, 352–355, 446n371, 447n393
- Pāṭaliputta, 355–356, 447n395
- path, 12, 32, 41, 47–48, 53, 68, 83, 85, 92, 132, 141, 155, 206, 238, 243–245, 251–253, 257, 269, 288, 291, 305, 330, 334, 337, 341, 343, 349, 427n41, 431–432n117, 432n129, 440n263, 441n289, 442n301
- to the cessation of dukkha, 6–7, 45, 110, 234, 247, 269, 304, 371
- to the cessation of the taints, 45, 110, 234, 248
- of Dharma, 72, 155, 209, 215–216, 247, 281, 372–389
- direct, for fully realizing the world, 280–283
- factors, 70, 294, 427nn42–43, 428n46
- gradual, 427n31, 434n148, 437n207, 442n300
- middle, 245
- noble, 52, 133
- of the nonrenunciant, 8, 11
- of the renunciant, 8–9, 11
- See also* eightfold path
- pāṭimokkha*, 268
- See also* rule(s)
- Pāvā, 129–131
- Pāvārika, 222
- personality, 291–293, 443n318
- See also* identity; self
- pond(s)/springs, 12, 152–153, 425n11
- See also* river(s)/stream(s)
- Potaliputta, 380–383, 492nn383, 384, 386
- Potaliya, 211, 222–224, 228, 234–235, 272, 437n223, 438n236
- power(s), 17, 22, 30–35, 243, 246–247, 376–377, 385–386
- five, 133, 376–377, 385–386
- supernormal, 17, 22, 29–30, 32, 174, 261–262, 279, 287, 360, 374
- four bases of, 133, 174–175, 295, 373–374, 382–383
- precept(s), 41, 112, 133–134, 136–138, 141, 206, 218–219, 249–252, 257, 260, 330, 361, 440n271
- five, 434n156, 435n168

Punabbasuka, 116–120, 127, 431nn108–109, 432n119
 Purāṇa, 335–336
 Pūraṇa Kassapa, 264–265, 272

Q

Qiánruò Monastery, 77

R

rains retreat, 101, 103–104, 129–131, 262, 264
 Rājagaha, 149–150, 262, 264, 270–271, 302, 363, 443n316
 Rāma, 240–241
 Rammaka, 235–236
 rebirth, 360, 440n272, 447n397
See also birth and death; destiny renunciant(s), 3–6, 8–13, 25, 32, 35, 46–48, 57–58, 69, 71, 78–85, 90, 100–101, 104, 142–143, 155, 189, 207, 222–223, 234–235, 244, 259, 261, 263–267, 270–274, 276, 279, 281, 283–284, 288–289, 315–321, 323–327, 330–334, 337–339, 341, 350, 352–355, 363–364, 425n9, 428n52, 437n223, 445n367
 Dharma of, 3, 137–138
 heterodox, 235
 path of, 8–9, 11
 true, 3, 7–8, 34
See also disciple(s); homeless; monk(s) requisites, 3, 6, 8, 45, 55, 84, 93–94, 176, 242, 245, 288
 Revata, 13–15, 18–20
 river(s)/stream(s), 59, 152–153, 182, 253, 440n264
 Aciravatī, 235–236, 338, 344
 Ganges, 143, 253
 Nerañjarā, 241
See also pond(s)/spring(s) robe(s), 3, 5, 8–10, 12, 22–26, 32, 41, 44, 48, 55, 63, 68, 77, 83, 85, 93, 101–103, 111, 113–114, 129, 137–138, 155, 161, 173, 184, 236, 238, 243–244, 249, 262–263, 266–267, 270–271, 334, 344, 358

See also cloth/clothes rule(s), 41, 80–82, 84–85, 90, 103–104, 106–107, 111–114, 212, 430–431n100

See also discipline; pāṭimokkha

S

Sakka, 346
 Sakulā, 316–318
 Sakuludāyī/Udāyī, 262–263, 266–284, 440nn275–276, 441nn288, 290, 293; 442nn297, 305
 Sakyan(s), 58, 63, 328
 Sāma, 129
 Sāmagāma, 432n122
 Śamathadeva, 392
 sangha, 3, 8, 33, 59, 77, 101, 103–104, 106, 111–114, 116–119, 131–132, 134, 136–141, 143–149, 206, 217–218, 235, 262, 264, 268, 330–331, 359, 431n101, 440n271, 447n400
See also Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha; monk(s)
 Sañjaya Ākāśagotta, 318–319, 327
 Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta, 264–265, 272
 Sanskrit, 392–394
 Sāriputta, 13–24, 303–313, 443n333
 Sarvāstivāda/Sarvāstivādin, 393–394
 Sāti, 191–193, 195, 209, 436n193, 437n208
 Sāvathī, 36, 46, 58, 91, 101, 103–104, 159, 177, 211, 235, 249, 257, 284, 291, 337, 345, 350, 359, 361, 365, 371, 426n26, 427n40, 438n237, 443n332

Index

- seclusion, 15–16, 19, 21, 33, 45, 65–67,
71–74, 87–88, 93, 107–110, 239–240,
254, 262, 267–268, 281–282, 298,
300, 428n62
- self, 40, 183–190, 292
See also “I” and “mine”; identity; personality
- self-confession, 135, 138–139, 144–145, 147, 149
- self-effacement, 69, 71
- Senā, 241
- sense(s)/sense faculties, 5–6, 44–45, 346,
434n148
five, 87, 307–308
six, 298, 427n31
- sense sphere(s), six, 39, 62, 198, 200–
205, 313, 349, 380
- sensual/sensuality, 33–34, 54, 56, 87,
177–180, 211, 213, 258, 260, 287,
435n173
- desire(s)/pleasure(s), 6–7, 11, 27, 33–
34, 42, 45, 56, 62, 68–69, 85–88,
108, 110, 151–153, 156–157, 213,
228–234, 245, 247–252, 24, 258,
260, 281–282, 288, 300, 312, 330–
332, 355, 357, 360, 375, 384,
435n175, 438n232, 440n272
five strands of, 55, 69, 155, 209, 220–
224, 231, 246–248, 252, 287, 331,
355, 364, 441
See also sexual
- servant(s)/slave(s), 43, 59, 84–85, 171,
212, 237
- seven kinds of settlement of litigation,
135–142, 432–433n133, 433n134
- sexual, 42, 213
desire(s), 42, 53, 213
misconduct, 55, 159, 172, 224–225,
280, 437n224
- simile(s), 50, 161, 174, 344, 425n11,
429nn69, 80, 84; 430n85, 431nn10–11;
432n131, 434nn147, 435nn173–174;
428nn233, 236; 436n188, 438n229,
440nn264, 268; 442nn305, 308, 311,
313; 444n344
- of the arrow, 365, 368–369
- of being cut up with a sharp saw, 100–
101, 430n87
- of the elephant, 437nn149, 151–152
- of the infant, 249–250
- of a thoroughbred horse, 114
- Sirivaḍḍha, 337–338, 354, 447n392
- six elements, 40, 427n31
- six principles of cordiality, 142–143,
433n143
- skillful means, 30, 167, 169, 175, 177–
178, 182, 192, 288, 356, 372–373, 382
- Soma, 220
- Somā, 316–318
- speech, 42, 96–98, 155, 238, 428n60,
433n143
- bad/evil/wrong, 54–55, 93–94, 96–100, 159
- divisive, 42, 54
- false, 42, 54, 214, 224, 226, 280,
442n299
- five ways of, 96–98, 430n85
- harsh, 42, 54, 96–98
- right/wholesome, 53–55, 171, 294
- spell(s), 55, 207
- sphere(s):
all-encompassing, ten, 349, 378–379,
388–389, 446n382
of boundless/infinite consciousness,
60–61, 89, 239, 255–256, 349, 379, 388–389
four immaterial, 447n399
of infinite space, 60–61, 89, 255, 349, 379, 388–389
of neither-perception-nor-nonperception,
29, 89–90, 240–241, 349, 358, 362,
447n399

of nothingness, 61, 89, 239–241, 256, 312
 of transcendence, eight, 347–348 stage(s), 115, 132, 151–153, 322, 431–432n117, 432n129 of the fool and the wise, 159 of one beyond training, ten, 115 of subduing/taming, 115, 149, 322, 433n146
 stream-enterer(s)/stream-entry, 191, 207, 217–218, 438n235, 442n314, 447n401 suffering(s), 7, 12–13, 42, 53, 65, 70–72, 74–75, 100, 128, 131–132, 134–135, 160, 167, 173, 181–182, 228–233
 of animals, 167–169
 in hell, 161, 163–167
See also dukkha
 superhuman state(s), 27–30, 244
 Sūrasena, 220

T

taint(s), 6–7, 11–13, 16, 21, 24, 29, 36–41, 45–46, 56–57, 62–63, 70, 110–111, 114, 124–126, 185–186, 234, 241, 243, 247–248, 254–255, 257, 270, 293, 356–358, 360, 362, 425nn5, 12; 431n101, 434n154, 438n234
 tathāgata(s)/Tathāgata(s), 32, 34–35, 62, 70, 72–73, 129–131, 155–158, 185–186, 189, 206, 209, 215–218, 243–244, 247, 281, 320–321, 329–330, 332–336, 338–341, 343, 350, 356–358, 363–389, 428n52, 436n195, 439n258, 447n401
See also buddha(s); Buddha
 teachings, 14, 19, 71, 133, 180–183, 266, 313, 349, 359, 371 ten courses of action, 434n156, 435n168
 Theravāda, 394
 tranquil abiding/tranquility, 17–18, 23, 27–30, 65–66, 68, 80, 107, 115, 125–

127, 254–256, 306, 377, 386–387, 440n266
 transgression, 104, 106, 180, 195, 345
See also five heinous crimes; offense(s) treasure(s), 84–85, 174, 220, 237
 seven, 174–175, 435n169
See also jewel(s)
 tree(s), 6, 12, 24, 45, 50, 71–74, 77, 83–84, 93, 107, 168, 179–180, 232–233, 251–252, 328, 337
 of awakening, 241–242
 cudrania, 368
 mulberry, 368
 plantain, 256, 4490n268
sāla, 14–17, 19–22, 93, 429n80
śimsapā, 116
 zelkova, 368
See also forest(s)/grove(s)/park(s)

U

Uddaka Rāmaputta, 240–242, 438n242
 Udāyī. See Sakuludāyī/Udāyī
 Udāyin, 77–78, 80–90
 Ujuññā, 315, 317
 Upaka, 243
 Upāli, 143–148
uposatha, 211–222
 Uruvelā, 241

V

Vajīrī, 354, 447n392
 Vajji/Vajjians, 13, 31, 129, 220
 Vāmsa, 220
 Vāsabhā, 354, 447n392
 Vedehikā, 94–95, 429n80
 Vekhanassa, 284–289, 291, 442nn297, 309
See also Kaccāna
 Venus (planet), 348
 Vesālī, 356, 359, 447n394

Index

vexation, 7, 12–13, 42, 65, 70–72, 74, 199, 201–202, 205, 208–210, 351–355, 370
Viḍḍabha, General, 318, 324–327, 354,
447n392
view(s), 53–56, 105, 125–126, 132, 143,
183–188, 196–197, 207, 273–274,
281–282, 288, 332–334, 361, 363–
366, 369–370, 431–432n117,
435nn180, 182
evil, 117–119, 177–178, 191–193
heterodox, 349
identity/personality, 249–252, 292
right, 51, 53–57, 110, 115, 245, 274–275,
280, 294, 305–306, 350, 378, 380,
387, 389–390, 427n44
wrong, 8–11, 51, 53–54, 57, 109, 117–
119, 134, 159, 172, 274–275, 280,
442n299
Vinaya, 391, 423
Visākha, 443nn317, 331
Visākhā, 211, 222, 291–302, 437n221

W

warrior(s), 12, 153, 156, 161–162, 176,
276–277, 284–285, 319–324, 329,
336, 368–369, 445n367
See also caste(s)/class, four
Well-gone One, 26, 48, 77–82, 84–85, 90,
114, 128, 132–133, 211, 250, 270,
279–281
See also Buddha; Tathāgata(s) wheel-turning king/monarch, 174–175,
435n169
wisdom, 6, 16, 21, 29, 45–46, 48–49, 69,
71, 105, 124–127, 171, 185–186,
188–190, 208–209, 217–220, 235,
239–240, 247–248, 258, 260, 269,

281, 294, 304–306, 321–322, 337,
339, 342, 349, 360, 362, 371–390,
440n269, 441n288, 444nn337–338
eye of, 356–358
worker(s), 12, 170, 276–277, 284–285,
319–324, 368–369
See also caste(s)/class, four world(s)/world-system, 11, 15, 20, 28, 35, 42, 53–54, 57–58, 68, 71–72, 96–
100, 109, 155, 184–186, 188, 190,
209–210, 214–216, 243, 247, 256,
263, 271, 273–274, 280–283, 289–
290, 320, 332–334, 338–339, 341,
345–346, 351, 357–358, 362–389,
442n301, 445nn358, 360
See also Brahmā, world(s); eons of world expansion and contraction
worldliness/worldly, 64, 86–87, 113,
223–224, 228–233, 235, 245,
437n225
worldling(s), 71, 246, 292, 306,
435n180, 447n401
World-honored One, 3, 8, 14, 18–32, 35–
40, 46–53, 58, 63, 70–72, 77–85, 90–
92, 97–107, 111, 113–114, 116–121,
127–128, 130–133, 144–146, 151, 159,
161–163, 169–171, 173–180, 183–187,
189–197, 199–211, 215–218, 222–224,
228–236, 246, 249–250, 256–260,
262–263, 266–273, 276–289, 291–292,
301–302, 315–321, 323–337, 344–345,
350–351, 353, 355–357, 363–369, 371
See also Buddha; Gotama; Tathāgata(s)

Y

yakkha(s), 315, 318
Yona, 220, 437n218

BDK English Tripiṭaka (First Series)

Abbreviations

Ch. :	Chinese
Skt. :	Sanskrit
Jp. :	Japanese
Eng. :	Published title

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Chang ahan jing (長阿含經)	1
Skt. Dīrghāgama
Eng. The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume I, 2015) The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume II, 2016) The Canonical Book of the Buddha's Lengthy Discourses (Volume III, 2018)
Ch. Zhong ahan jing (中阿含經)	26
Skt. Madhyamāgama
Eng. The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume I, 2013) The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume II, 2020) The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume III, 2022) The Madhyama Āgama (Middle-length Discourses) (Volume IV, 2023)
Ch. Dasheng bensheng xindi guan jing (大乘本生心地觀經)	159
Eng. The Mahayana Sutra of Previous Lives and Contemplation of the Mind-Ground (2021)
Ch. Fo suoxing zan (佛所行讚)	192
Skt. Buddhacarita
Eng. Buddhacarita: In Praise of Buddha's Acts (2009)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Zabao zang jing (雜寶藏經)	203
Eng. The Storehouse of Sundry Valuables (1994)
Ch. Faju piyu jing (法句譬喻經)	211
Eng. The Scriptural Text: Verses of the Doctrine, with Parables (1999)
Ch. Xiaopin banruo boluomi jing (小品般若波羅蜜經)	227
Skt. Aṣṭasāhasrikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Ch. Jingang banruo boluomi jing (金剛般若波羅蜜經)	235
Skt. Vajracchedikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Ch. Daluo jingang bukong zhenshi sanmoye jing (大樂金剛不空真實三摩耶經)	243
Skt. Adhyardhaśatikā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Eng. The Sutra of the Vow of Fulfilling the Great Perpetual Enjoyment and Benefiting All Sentient Beings Without Exception (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)
Ch. Renwang banruo boluomi jing (仁王般若波羅蜜經)	245
Skt. *Kāraṇīkārajā-prajñāpāramitā-sutra
Ch. Banruo boluomiduo xin jing (般若波羅蜜多心經)	251
Skt. Prajñāpāramitāhṛdaya-sutra
Ch. Miaofa lianhua jing (妙法蓮華經)	262
Skt. Saddharmapuṇḍarīka-sutra
Eng. The Lotus Sutra (Revised Second Edition, 2007)
Ch. Wuliangyi jing (無量義經)	276
Eng. The Infinite Meanings Sutra (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Guan Puxian pusa xingfa jing (觀普賢菩薩行法經)	277
Eng. The Sutra Expounded by the Buddha on Practice of the Way through Contemplation of the Bodhisattva All-embracing Goodness (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Dafangguang fo huayan jing (大方廣佛華嚴經)	279
Skt. Avataṃsaka-sutra
Ch. Shengman shizihou yisheng defang bianfang guang jing (勝鬘師子吼一乘大方便廣經)	353
Skt. Śrīmālādevīsīmhanāda-sutra
Eng. The Sutra of Queen Śrīmālā of the Lion's Roar (2004)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Wuliangshou jing (無量壽經)	360
Skt. Sukhāvativyūha
Eng. The Larger Sutra on Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Guan wuliangshou fo jing (觀無量壽佛經)	365
Skt. *Amitāyurdhyāna-sutra
Eng. The Sutra on Contemplation of Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Amituo jing (阿彌陀經)	366
Skt. Sukhāvativyūha
Eng. The Smaller Sutra on Amitāyus (in The Three Pure Land Sutras , Revised Second Edition, 2003)
Ch. Da banniepan jing (大般涅槃經)	374
Skt. Mahāparinirvana-sutra
Eng. The Nirvana Sutra (Volume I, 2013)
Ch. Fochuibo niepan lüeshuo jiaojie jing (佛垂般涅槃略說教誡經)	389
Eng. The Bequeathed Teaching Sutra (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Ch. Dizang pusa benyuan jing (地藏菩薩本願經)	412
Skt. *Kṣitigarbhapraṇidhāna-sutra
Ch. Banzhou sanmei jing (般舟三昧經)	418
Skt. Pratyutpanna-buddhasammukhāvasthita-samādhi-sutra
Eng. The Pratyutpanna Samādhi Sutra (1998)
Ch. Yaoshi liuli guang rulai benyuan gongde jing (藥師琉璃光如來本願功德經)	450
Skt. Bhaiṣajyaguru-vaidūrya-prabhāsa-pūrvapraṇidhāna-viśeṣavistara
Eng. The Scripture of Master of Medicine, Beryl Radiance (Tathāgata) (2018)
Ch. Mile xiasheng chengfo jing (彌勒下生成佛經)	454
Skt. *Maitreyavyākaraṇa
Eng. The Sutra that Expounds the Descent of Maitreya Buddha and His Enlightenment (2016)
Ch. Wenshushili wen jing (文殊師利問經)	468
Skt. *Mañjuśrīparipṛcchā
Eng. The Sutra of Mañjuśrī's Questions (2016)

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Weimojie suoshuo jing (維摩詰所說經) Skt. Vimalakīrtinirdeśa-sutra Eng. The Vimalakīrti Sutra (2004)	475
Ch. Yueshangnü jing (月上女經) Skt. Candrottarādārikā-paripṛcchā Eng. The Sutra of the Girl Candrottarā (2018)	480
Ch. Zuochan sanmei jing (坐禪三昧經) Eng. The Sutra on the Concentration of Sitting Meditation (2009)	614
Ch. Damoduoluo chan jing (達磨多羅禪經)	618
Ch. Yuedeng sanmei jing (月燈三昧經) Skt. Samādhirāja-candrapadīpa-sutra	639
Ch. Shoulengyan sanmei jing (首楞嚴三昧經) Skt. Śūraṅgamasamādhi-sutra Eng. The Śūraṅgama Samādhi Sutra (1998)	642
Ch. Jinguang ming zuishengwang jing (金光明最勝王經) Skt. Suvarṇaprabhāsa-sutra	665
Ch. Dasheng rulengqie jing (大乘入楞伽經) Skt. Laṅkāvatāra-sutra	672
Ch. Jie shenmi jing (解深密經) Skt. Saṃdhinirmocana-sutra Eng. The Scripture on the Explication of Underlying Meaning (2000)	676
Ch. Yulanpen jing (盂蘭盆經) Skt. *Ullambana-sutra Eng. The Ullambana Sutra (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)	685
Ch. Sishierzhang jing (四十二章經) Eng. The Sutra of Forty-two Sections (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)	784
Ch. Dafanguang yuanjue xiuduoluo liaoyi jing (大方廣圓覺修多羅了義經) Eng. The Sutra of Perfect Enlightenment (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)	842
Ch. Da Biluzhena chengfo shenbian jiachi jing (大毘盧遮那成佛神變加持經) Skt. Mahāvairocanaḥśambodhi-vikurvītādhiṣṭhāna-vaipulyasūtrendra- rājanāma-dharmaparyāya Eng. The Vairocanaḥśambodhi Sutra (2005)	848

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Jinggangding yiqie rulai zhenshi she dasheng xianzheng dajiao wang jing (金剛頂一切如來真實攝大乘現證大教王經)	865
Skt. Sarvatathāgata-tattvasaṃgraha-mahāyānā-bhisamaya-mahākālpārāja
Eng. The Adamantine Pinnacle Sutra (in Two Esoteric Sutras , 2001)
Ch. Suxidi jieluo jing (蘇悉地羯囉經)	893
Skt. Susiddhikara-mahātantra-sādhanaopāyika-pañcāla
Eng. The Susiddhikara Sutra (in Two Esoteric Sutras , 2001)
Ch. Modengqie jing (摩登伽經)	1300
Skt. *Mātāṅgī-sūtra
Eng. The Mātāṅga Sutra (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)
Ch. Mohe sengqi lü (摩訶僧祇律)	1425
Skt. *Mahāsāṃghika-vinaya
Ch. Sifen lü (四分律)	1428
Skt. *Dharmaguptaka-vinaya
Ch. Shanjianlü piposha (善見毘婆沙)	1462
Pāli Samantapāsādikā
Ch. Fanwang jing (梵網經)	1484
Skt. *Brahmajāla-sūtra
Eng. The Brahmā's Net Sutra (2017)
Ch. Youposaijie jing (優婆塞戒經)	1488
Skt. Upāsakaśīla-sūtra
Eng. The Sutra on Upāsaka Precepts (1994)
Ch. Miaofa lianhua jing youbotishe (妙法蓮華經憂波提舍)	1519
Skt. Saddharmapuṇḍarīka-upadeśa
Eng. The Commentary on the Lotus Sutra (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)
Ch. Shizha piposha lun (十住毘婆沙論)	1521
Skt. *Daśabhūmika-vibhāṣā
Ch. Fodijing lun (佛地經論)	1530
Skt. *Buddhabhūmisūtra-śāstra
Eng. The Interpretation of the Buddha Land (2002)
Ch. Apidamojushe lun (阿毘達磨俱舍論)	1558
Skt. Abhidharmakośa-bhāṣya
Ch. Zhonglun (中論)	1564
Skt. Madhyamaka-śāstra

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Yūqie shidilun (瑜伽師地論) Skt. Yogācārabhūmi-śāstra	1579
Ch. Cheng weishi lun (成唯識論) Eng. Demonstration of Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1585
Ch. Weishi sanshilun song (唯識三十論頌) Skt. Triṃśikā Eng. The Thirty Verses on Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1586
Ch. Weishi ershi lun (唯識二十論) Skt. Viṃśatikā Eng. The Treatise in Twenty Verses on Consciousness Only (in Three Texts on Consciousness Only , 1999)	1590
Ch. She dasheng lun (攝大乘論) Skt. Mahāyānasamgraha Eng. The Summary of the Great Vehicle (Revised Second Edition, 2003)	1593
Ch. Bian zhongbian lun (辯中邊論) Skt. Madhyāntavibhāga Eng. Analysis of the Middle and Extremes (2021)	1600
Ch. Dasheng zhuangyanjing lun (大乘莊嚴經論) Skt. Mahāyānasūtrālamkāra	1604
Ch. Dasheng chengye lun (大乘成業論) Skt. Karmasiddhiprakaraṇa Eng. A Mahayana Demonstration on the Theme of Action (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1609
Ch. Jiuqing yisheng baoxing lun (究竟一乘寶性論) Skt. Ratnagotravibhāga-mahāyānottaratantra-śāstra	1611
Ch. Yinming ruzheng li lun (因明入正理論) Skt. Nyāyapraveśa	1630
Ch. Dasheng ji pusa xue lun (大乘集菩薩學論) Skt. Śikṣāsamuccaya	1636
Ch. Jingangzhen lun (金剛針論) Skt. Vajrasūcī Eng. The Diamond Needle (2023)	1642

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Zhang suozhi lun (彰所知論) Eng. The Treatise on the Elucidation of the Knowable (2004)	1645
Ch. Putixing jing (菩提行經) Skt. Bodhicaryāvatāra	1662
Ch. Jingangding yuqie zhongfa anouduoluo sanmiao sanputi xin lun (金剛頂瑜伽中發阿耨多羅三藐三菩提心論) Eng. The Bodhicitta Śāstra (in Esoteric Texts , 2015)	1665
Ch. Dasheng qixin lun (大乘起信論) Skt. *Mahāyānaśraddhotpāda-śāstra Eng. The Awakening of Faith (2005)	1666
Ch. Shimoheyan lun (釋摩訶衍論)	1668
Ch. Naxian biqu jing (那先比丘經) Pāli Milindapañhā Eng. The Scripture on the Monk Nagasena (2021)	1670
Ch. Banruo boluomiduo xin jing yuzan (般若波羅蜜多心經幽贊) Eng. A Comprehensive Commentary on the Heart Sutra ( Prajñāpāramitā-hṛdaya-sutra ) (2001)	1710
Ch. Miaofalianhua jing xuanyi (妙法蓮華經玄義)	1716
Ch. Guan wuliangshou fo jing shu (觀無量壽佛經疏)	1753
Ch. Sanlun xuanyi (三論玄義)	1852
Ch. Dasheng xuan lun (大乘玄論)	1853
Ch. Zhao lun (肇論) Eng. Essays of Sengzhao (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1858
Ch. Huayan yisheng jiaoyi fenqi zhang (華嚴一乘教義分齊章) Eng. Treatise on Doctrinal Distinctions of the Huayan One Vehicle (2023)	1866
Ch. Yuanren lun (原人論) Eng. Treatise on the Origin of Humanity (in Three Short Treatises by Vasubandhu, Sengzhao, and Zongmi , 2017)	1886
Ch. Mohe zhiguan (摩訶止觀)	1911
Ch. Xiuxi zhiguan zuochan fayao (修習止觀坐禪法要)	1915

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Tiantai sijiao yi (天台四教儀) Eng. A Guide to the Tiantai Fourfold Teachings (in Tiantai Lotus Texts , 2013)	1931
Ch. Guoqing bai lu (國清百錄) Eng. The Hundred Records of the Temple of National Purity (2022)	1934
Ch. Zhenzhou Linji Huizhao chanshi wulu (鎮州臨濟慧照禪師語錄) Eng. The Recorded Sayings of Linji (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)	1985
Ch. Foguo Yuanwu chanshi biyan lu (佛果圓悟禪師碧巖錄) Eng. The Blue Cliff Record (1998)	2003
Ch. Wumen guan (無門關) Eng. Wumen's Gate (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)	2005
Ch. Liuzu dashi fabao tan jing (六祖大師法寶壇經) Eng. The Platform Sutra of the Sixth Patriarch (2000)	2008
Ch. Xinxin ming (信心銘) Eng. The Faith-Mind Maxim (in Three Chan Classics , 1999)	2010
Ch. Huangboshan Duanji chanshi chuanxin fayao (黃檗山斷際禪師傳心法要) Eng. Essentials of the Transmission of Mind (in Zen Texts , 2005)	2012A
Ch. Yongjia Zhengdao ge (永嘉證道歌) Eng. Yongjia's Song of Actualizing the Way (2022)	2014
Ch. Chixiu Baizhang qinggui (勅修百丈清規) Eng. The Baizhang Zen Monastic Regulations (2007)	2025
Ch. Yibuzonglun lun (異部宗輪論) Skt. Samayabhedoparacanacakra Eng. The Cycle of the Formation of the Schismatic Doctrines (2004)	2031
Ch. Ayuwang jing (阿育王經) Skt. Aśokāvadāna Eng. The Biographical Scripture of King Aśoka (1993)	2043
Ch. Maming pusa zhuan (馬鳴菩薩傳) Eng. The Life of Aśvaghōṣa Bodhisattva (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)	2046
Ch. Longshu pusa zhuan (龍樹菩薩傳) Eng. The Life of Nāgārjuna Bodhisattva (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)	2047

Title	Taishō No.
Ch. Posoupandou fashi zhuan (婆藪槃豆法師傳)	2049
Eng. Biography of Dharma Master Vasubandhu (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)
Ch. Datang Daciensi Zanzang fashi zhuan (大唐大慈恩寺三藏法師傳)	2053
Eng. A Biography of the Tripiṭaka Master of the Great Cī'en Monastery of the Great Tang Dynasty (1995)
Ch. Gaoseng zhuan (高僧傳)	2059
Ch. Biqiuni zhuan (比丘尼傳)	2063
Eng. Biographies of Buddhist Nuns (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)
Ch. Gaoseng Faxian zhuan (高僧法顯傳)	2085
Eng. The Journey of the Eminent Monk Faxian (in Lives of Great Monks and Nuns , 2002)
Ch. Datang xiyu ji (大唐西域記)	2087
Eng. The Great Tang Dynasty Record of the Western Regions (1996)
Ch. Youfangjichao: Tangdaheshangdongzheng zhuan (遊方記抄: 唐大和上東征傳)	2089-(7)
Ch. Hongming ji (弘明集)	2102
Eng. The Collection for the Propagation and Clarification of Buddhism (Volume I, 2015) The Collection for the Propagation and Clarification of Buddhism (Volume II, 2017)
Ch. Fayuan zhulin (法苑珠林)	2122
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume I, 2019)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume II, 2019)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume III, 2020)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume IV, 2020)
Eng. A Forest of Pearls from the Dharma Garden (Volume V, 2022)
Ch. Nanhai jigui neifa zhuan (南海寄歸內法傳)	2125
Eng. Buddhist Monastic Traditions of Southern Asia (2000)
Ch. Fanyu zaming (梵語雜名)	2135
Jp. Shōmangyō gisho (勝鬘經義疏)	2185
Eng. Prince Shōtoku's Commentary on the Śrīmālā Sutra (2011)

Title	Taishō No.
Jp. Yuimakyō gisho (維摩經義疏)	2186
Eng. The Expository Commentary on the Vimalakīrti Sutra (2012)
Jp. Hokke gisho (法華義疏)	2187
Jp. Hannya shingyō hiken (般若心經秘鍵)	2203A
Eng. The Key to the Secret of the Heart Sutra (2023)
Jp. Daijō hossō kenjin shō (大乘法相研神章)	2309
Jp. Kanjin kakumu shō (觀心覺夢鈔)	2312
Eng. Observing the Mind, Awakening from a Dream (2022)
Jp. Risshū kōyō (律宗綱要)	2348
Eng. The Essentials of the Vinaya Tradition (1995)
Jp. Tendai hokke shūgi shū (天台法華宗義集)	2366
Eng. The Collected Teachings of the Tendai Lotus School (1995)
Jp. Kenkairon (顯戒論)	2376
Jp. Sange gakushō shiki (山家學生式)	2377
Jp. Hizōhōyaku (秘藏寶鑰)	2426
Eng. The Precious Key to the Secret Treasury (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Benkenmitsu nikyō ron (辨顯密二教論)	2427
Eng. On the Differences between the Exoteric and Esoteric Teachings (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Sokushin jōbutsu gi (即身成佛義)	2428
Eng. The Meaning of Becoming a Buddha in This Very Body (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Shōji jissōgi (聲字實相義)	2429
Eng. The Meanings of Sound, Sign, and Reality (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Unjigi (吽字義)	2430
Eng. The Meanings of the Word Hūṃ (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Gorin kuji myōhimitsu shaku (五輪九字明秘密釋)	2514
Eng. The Illuminating Secret Commentary on the Five Cakras and the Nine Syllables (in Shingon Texts , 2004)
Jp. Mitsugonin hotsuro sange mon (密嚴院發露懺悔文)	2527
Eng. The Mitsugonin Confession (in Shingon Texts , 2004)

Title	Taishō No.
Jp. Kōzen gokoku ron (興禪護國論)	2543
Eng. A Treatise on Letting Zen Flourish to Protect the State (in Zen Texts , 2005)
Jp. Fukan zazengi (普勸坐禪儀)	2580
Eng. A Universal Recommendation for True Zazen (in Zen Texts , 2005)
Jp. Shōbōgenzō (正法眼藏)	2582
Eng. Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume I, 2007) Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume II, 2008) Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume III, 2008) Shōbōgenzō: The True Dharma-eye Treasury (Volume IV, 2008)
Jp. Zazen yōjin ki (坐禪用心記)	2586
Eng. Advice on the Practice of Zazen (in Zen Texts , 2005)
Jp. Senchaku hongan nenbutsu shū (選擇本願念佛集)	2608
Eng. Senchaku Hongan Nembutsu Shū: A Collection of Passages on the Nembutsu Chosen in the Original Vow (1997)
Jp. Kenjōdo shinjitsu kyōgyō shōmon rui (顯淨土真實教行証文類)	2646
Eng. Kyōgyōshinshō: On Teaching, Practice, Faith, and Enlightenment (2003)
Jp. Tannishō (歎異抄)	2661
Eng. Tannishō: Passages Deploring Deviations of Faith (1996)
Jp. Rennyo shōnin ofumi (蓮如上人御文)	2668
Eng. Rennyo Shōnin Ofumi: The Letters of Rennyo (1996)
Jp. Ōjōyōshū (往生要集)	2682
Jp. Risshō ankoku ron (立正安國論)	2688
Eng. Risshōankokuron or The Treatise on the Establishment of the Orthodox Teaching and the Peace of the Nation (in Two Nichiren Texts , 2003)
Jp. Kaimokushō (開目抄)	2689
Eng. Kaimokushō or Liberation from Blindness (2000)
Jp. Kanjin honzon shō (觀心本尊抄)	2692
Eng. Kanjinhonzonshō or The Most Venerable One Revealed by Introspecting Our Minds for the First Time at the

Beginning of the Fifth of the Five Five Hundred-year Ages
(in Two Nichiren Texts, 2003)

Ch.	Fumu enzhong jing (父母恩重經)	2887
Eng.	The Sutra on the Profundity of Filial Love (in Apocryphal Scriptures , 2005)
Jp.	Hasshūkōyō (八宗綱要)	extracanonial
Eng.	The Essentials of the Eight Traditions (1994)
Jp.	Sangō shīki (三教指歸)	extracanonial
Jp.	Mappō tōmyō ki (末法燈明記)	extracanonial
Eng.	The Candle of the Latter Dharma (1994)
Jp.	Jūshichijō kenpō (十七條憲法)	extracanonial